BENGAL, ben-gawl', the largest of the three presidencies of British India, bounded on the N. by Nepaul, Sikkim, and Bootan; W. by Bahar, E. by the Birmese empire, and S. by the Bay of Bengal and the district of Midnapore in Orissa. Ext. 350 miles long from east to west, and 300 broad from north to south. Area, 97,244 square miles. Political Divisions. The presidency is divided into 17 districts; namely, Backergunge, Birbhum, Burdwan, Chittagong, Hooghly, Jessore, Mymansingh, Moorshedabad, Nuddeah, Purneah, Rajshahy, Rungpore, Silhet, Tiperah, the 24-Pergunnahs, Midnapore, and the Jungle Mahals. Desc. In general level, without any great elevations throughout the province. The soil, too, is generally of a light sandy loam, except in those tracts which are inundated by the overflowing of the rivers, and which are enriched by the deposit of a rich vegetable matter, thus renewing its productive capabilities. Rivers. The Ganges and the Brahmapootra, and numerous other streams, which water it in every direction. It is affirmed that there is hardly a spot in the province twenty miles distant from a river, which, in the rainy season, is not navigable. Lakes. Properly speaking, there are none. Extensive jeels or shallow collections of water are found in the rainy season; but these in the dry season all but disappear. Climate. From the beginning of

June to the end of September the rainy season prevails, from November to February the cold season, and in the middle of the latter month the hot weather begins, and continues up to April. In this last month a change begins to take place, the heat being tempered by thunder-storms and rain, and wind from the north-west. Pro. Almost every kind of grain cultivated in Europe, besides rice, millet, pease, beans, linseed, mustard-seed, sesamum, sugar, cotton, indigo, silk, opium, pine-apples, citron, lemons, grapes, pomegranates, almonds, tamarinds, plantains, ginger, and vegetables of most descriptions. Buffaloes are kept for the sake of their milk, and cattle are employed for the purposes of husbandry. Sheep and horses are reared, but they are of inferior qualities. Camels and elephants are much used by the wealthier classes, not only for the purpose of making journeys of pleasure, but for the conveyance of goods. Minerals. Not abundant; iron, coal, nitre, and salt. Zoology. The wild animals are lions, tigers, bears, wolves, foxes, jackals, leopards, hyenas, panthers, zebras, buffaloes, antelopes, apes, and monkeys. The tiger is the most formidable of all. He infests the thick jungles, watching unseen every opportunity to pounce upon his prey. Dogs swarm in the streets of every Bengal town, and goats are numerous. Of birds, a large kind of heron frequents the towns, and clears them of their offal. Reptiles are both numerous and formidable; and fish is so abundant as to be within the reach of the poorest inhabitant. Towns. Calcutta, the capital, Burdwan, Chandernagore, Dacca, Dinagepore, Moorshedabad, Narraingunge, Purneah, and Rajmahal. Manf. Cotton piece-goods of various kinds, chintzes, blanketing, diaper, woven silks, packthread, and sail-cloth. Formerly muslins of the most beautiful and delicate texture were made at Dacca, but the manufacture is now extinct. Pop. estimated at 25,000,000. Lat. between 20° and 31° N. Lon. 74° and 91° E.—Bengal was first invaded and conquered by the Afghan Mahometans in A.D. 1203, and continued tributary to the emperor of Delhi till the year 1340. From this period it continued independent till 1538, when it was subdued by Shere Shah, from whose descendants it was conquered by the emperor Akbar, and continued subject to Delhi, or nominally so, till the year 1757, when it fell into the hands of the English. At the beginning of 1857, exactly one hundred years from the battle of Plassy, which established the British power in India, commenced in Bengal that terrible series of events now historically known as the Great Indian Mutiny; and which, at its first outbreak, required all the great qualities and resources of the Anglo-Saxon race to make head against, so sudden and unlooked for was the revolt, and so numerous and well provided were the rebellious sepoys. The peculiar constitution of the Bengal army was undoubtedly one of the principal causes of the mutiny; for it was recruited generally from Hindus of the Brahmin, or highest caste, of Rajpootana, and from the inhabitants of Oude, a warlike and disaffected population; and thus presented to the designing emissary a fair field for his labours. Of the organization of this vast conspiracy against the Europeans in India little is known; but at the commencement of 1856, whilst the British were engaged in the Persian war, a traitorous correspondence was carried on between the Shah of Persia and the court of Delhi, and efforts were also made to induce Dost Mahomed, king of Cabul, to invade the Punjab, so soon as the contemplated rising of the Bengal army should leave the frontier defenceless. The first prime object, however, was to create a dissatisfaction in the mind of the native soldier; and the Hindu sepoys were sedulously taught that the government intended to insult their faith and make them Christians. Accident greatly favoured the design of the conspirators; and, in the new cartridges (which the sepoys thought were greased with a preparation of the fat of cows and pigs, and thus were abhorrent to the Hindu and Mahometan) for the Enfield rifles they saw the first step of their forcible conversion. At Dumdum, near Calcutta, and at Barrackpoor (which see), the first expression of dislike to these cartridges, on the part of the natives, took place, and measures were taken by the government and officers to allay the irritation; but it was too late; the train had been laid, the spark had unconsciously been set to it, and soon, from Meerut and Delhi to within a few miles of Calcutta itself, the light of the revolt shone out. First came the massacre of the officers, the civilians, their wives and their children, at Meerut; the naming of Delhi as the head-quarters of the rebels, whither all were to hasten with their arms and their plunder; then the march of the small British force on that ancient seat of the Mogul power; the successful attack on the mutineers, and the difficult position of the British before the city; the rising at Futtehghur, and the pitiless massacre by the Nana (Sahib) of the helpless fugitives; the Allahabad atrocities, the terrible massacres at Jhansi, the Azimghur mutiny, the gallant defence of Benares, the Bareilly assassinations, and, to crown the disastrous and horrid list, the Cawnpore butchery by the Nana. The worst was reached. General Havelock, too late to save the poor Cawnpore victims, was, by energy almost unexampled, enabled to relieve Lucknow. Delhi was successfully stormed; and Sir Colin Campbell, afterwards Lord Clyde, assuming the command of the army, commenced a successful campaign against the rebels, whose power in Oude, Rohilcund, and all the more disaffected localities, was at length effectually crushed, in the winter of 1858-59. (See AGRA, BENARES, CAWNPORE, &c.)

BENGAL, BAY OF, a part of the Indian Ocean, which includes the sea from Cape Negrais on the E. to the delta of the Godavery on the W., and extending from hither to further India. The Ganges, Brahmaputra, and the Godavery disembogue themselves into it. Lat. between 16° 30′ and 23° N. The Sea of Bengal extends to Lat. 8° N. between the islands of Junkseylon and Ceylon.

BENGUELA, ben'-gu-e'-la (Port. bain-gal'-la), an extensive territory of Western Africa, to the S. of Congo and Angola, claimed by Portugal. Desc. Mountainous, rising gradually in the interior, with a well-watered and fertile soil, producing all the tropical fruits, European vegetables, and some corn. Minerals. Gold, copper, sulphur, and petroleum. Inhabitants, mostly savages; among whom are the Giagas, a race much dreaded by the Portuguese. On the whole, comparatively little is known of the country. Lat. between 9° and 16° S. Lon. between 12° and 17° E.

BENGUELA, NEW, OR ST. PHILIPE DE BENGUELA, capital of the above, a town built by the Portuguese, and which is now the chief centre of their trade upon the African coast. Pop. 3,000. Lat. 12° 28′ S. Lon. 13° 30′ E.—Some of the inhabitants of this town are slave-dealers; and these, in one year alone, have sold as many as 38,000 Africans to a life of perpetual and inhuman misery. Near here is a saltpetre-mine, reputed the richest in the world. The Portuguese transport some of their convicts to Benguela.

BENHADAD, ben-hai'-dăd, the name of three kings of Syria or Damascus who waged war with Israel. Flourished from 940 to 800 years B.C.

BENI, ben'-e, a large and navigable river of the province of Cuzco, Peru, uniting with the Rio Mamore near the Brazilian fortress of Biera, and forming the river Madeira, which thus becomes one of the largest tributaries of the Amazon.

BENI, a department of Bolivia, S. America. Pop. 35,000.—This district was formed in 1843, by uniting the provinces Caupolican and Apolabamba.

BENIN, ben-een', a kingdom of Western Africa, bounded on the N. by Yariba, S. by the Bight of Benin, E. by the Lesser Niger, and W. by Dahomey. Area, estimated at 50,000 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, well watered, and, in general, fertile. The Niger is the principal river, and the inhabitants trade in palm-oil, salt, pepper, jasper, leopard skins, native dyed cloths, and slaves. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. between 4° and 9° N. Lon. between 4° and 8° E.

BENIN, a city of Africa, capital of the above kingdom, standing on the Benin river, 70 miles above its mouth. It is said to be 18 miles in circumference. Daily markets are held in the great streets, and separate quarters are allotted to each distinct species of merchandise. Pop. estimated at 15,000. Lat. 6° 20′ N. Lon. 5° 50′ E.

BENIN, BIGHT OF, a bay in the N. of the Gulf of Guinea.—It has no ports, except at the entrance of unnavigable rivers.

BENJAMIN, ben'-ja-min, 'son of the right hand,' or 'son of strength,' the youngest son of Jacob and Rachel, called, by his dying mother, Benoni.

BENJAMITE, one of the tribe of Benjamin.

BENNET, Henry, ben'-et, earl of Arlington, a statesman, who served in the royal army during the civil war, and after the Restoration made one of the ministry known by the name of the Cabal, which word was formed from the initials of the noblemen who composed it; viz.—Clifford, Ashley, Buckingham, Arlington, Lauderdale. In 1672 he was created an earl, and afterwards invested with the order of the Garter, and appointed lord chamberlain. B. at Arlington, 1618; D. 1685.

BENNETT, William Cox, a modern English song-writer, whose poems of childhood and other home subjects have deservedly attained celebrity. His first volume of "Poems" was published 1847; "War Songs," 1857; "Queen Eleanor's Vengeance and other Poems," 1858; "Songs by a Song-writer," and "Baby May and other Poems on Infants," both in 1859. B. at Greenwich, 1820.—His verses have a large number of readers as well in America as in England.

BENNINGTON, ben'-ing-ton, the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 1,200.

BENNINGTON, a county of Vermont, U.S. Area, 700 square miles. Desc. Fertile, and producing the usual cerealia, potatoes, butter, and cheese. Minerals. Iron, lead, marble, and yellow ochre. Manf. Cottons, woollens, paper, gunpowder; and there are many saw and planing-mills, and some iron-foundries. Pop. about 20,000.

BENNINGTON, a post township and capital of the above, 37 miles from Albany. Pop. 4,000, mostly engaged in manufactories. Here the English were defeated by the American general Stark, Aug. 16, 1777. —There is another town of this name in the state of New York, with a population of about 3,000.

BENOIT, St., ben'-waw, the name of several small parishes in France, none of them with a population above 1,600.

BENOIT, BENEDICT, the name of thirteen popes of Rome, who attained the tiara at various periods between 574 and 1740. (See BENEDICT.)

BENONI, be-no'-ni, 'son of sorrow.'

BENOWM, ben'-owm, a town of Soudan, central Africa, forming a caravan-station between Timbuctoo and Senegal. Lat. 15° 5′ N. Lon. 9° W.

BENSERADE, Isaac de, ben-se-rad', a French poet, whose wit and poetical talents introduced him to the court of Louis XIV., where he obtained the patronage of Cardinal Richelieu. His writings consist principally of sonnets and dramas. B. at Lyons la Forêt, 1612; D. at Paris, 1691.

BENTHAM, ben'-tham, a parish of the West Riding of Yorkshire, 12 miles from Settle. Area, 24,990 acres. Manf. Principally linens. Pop. about 4,000.

BENTHAM, Jeremy, the son of an attorney, and remarkable from his earliest years for the fascination which books had over him. In his fifth year he was named by his family the "philosopher;" and in his fourteenth was admitted to Queen's College, Oxford, where he soon distinguished himself among his fellow students. He studied for the law, but abandoned that profession, in disgust at the exorbitant and unjust charges which he beheld made upon suitors, and from other corruptions by which he saw the machinery of the law upheld. After visiting France three different times previous to the breaking out of the great Revolution, he became acquainted with M. Dumont, the Swiss librarian of the marquis of Lansdowne, then residing at Bowood. This gentleman greatly assisted him in the improving and the polishing of his compositions before they were given to the world. The biography of such a person as Bentham can contain little more than the record of his writings and opinions. The sum of his existence was the improvement of legislation and jurisprudence. The leading principle of his philosophy is, that the end of all human actions and morality is happiness. Seeing, in a pamphlet of Dr. Priestley, the phrase, "the greatest happiness of the greatest number," he saw delineated, for the first time, "a plain as well as a true standard of whatever is right or wrong, useful, useless, or mischievous in human conduct, whether in the field of morals or politics." From this his whole life took its direction, and he laboured long and continually for what he conceived to be the happiness of his species. B. in London, 1748.9; D. in Westminster, 1832.—The principal works of this distinguished juridical philosopher are his "Introduction to the Principles of Morals and Legislation," a "Fragment on Government," a "Book of Fallacies," the "Rationale of Judicial Evidence," the "Plan of a Judicial Establishment," and his "Panopticon," a work on prison discipline. He produced many more works, and, in the words of Sir James Mackintosh, "has done more than any other writer to rouse the spirit of juridical reformation, which is now gradually examining every part of law; and, when further progress is facilitated by digesting the present laws, will, doubtless, proceed to the improvement of all. Greater praise it is given to few to earn."

BENTINCK, William, ben'-tink, the first earl of Portland, was a page to William Prince of Orange (afterwards William III.), to whom he endeared himself by a singular act of devotion. The prince being ill of the small-pox, it was deemed necessary that he should receive the natural warmth of a young person in the same bed with him. Bentinck, though he never had had the distemper, immediately proposed himself for this hazardous service. He subsequently suffered severely from the disease, but recovered, and his master ever afterwards esteemed him as one of his greatest friends. He accompanied William to England, and, on the prince's accession to the English crown, he was created earl of Portland, and was employed in several high offices, military and civil, and attended his master on his death-bed. B. in Holland, 1648; D. in London, 1709, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.

BENTINCK, Lord William Henry Cavendish, the second son of the third duke of Portland, entered the army, and, after serving in Flanders, Russia, and Egypt, attained to high rank, and, in 1803, became governor of Madras. Here the singularity of his reforms in reference to the beards, moustaches, and turbans of the sepoys led, in 1806, to the mutiny at Vellore, which caused him to be recalled. On his return he received several diplomatic appointments, filled some military commands with indifferent success, and, in 1828, under the government of Canning, was appointed to the governor-generalship of India. There again his reforming spirit led to much dissatisfaction among the soldiery. He, however, effected the abolition of suttee, or the practice of widow-burning, which, on December 17th, 1829, was declared illegal. He also obtained the liberty for Englishmen to settle in India, although belonging to neither the military nor the civil service; systematically favoured the native population, and extended the liberty of the press. He also annexed the territory of the rajah of Coorg to the British possessions. In 1835 his health began to fail, when he resigned his office, and left Calcutta in the month of March of the same year. The native population regretted his departure, and erected an equestrian statue to commemorate his administration. After his arrival in England he became, in 1836, M.P. for Glasgow, for which city he sat until a few days before he died, when he resigned. B. 1774; D. at Paris, 1839.

BENTINCK, Lord William George Frederick Cavendish, was the third son of William Henry, fourth duke of Portland. This nobleman is better known as Lord George Bentinck, and entered the army, but quitted the profession of arms to take a part in the politics of his country. In 1826 he became private secretary to his uncle George Canning, who was then secretary for foreign affairs. In 1827 he was returned to the House of Commons for the borough of King's Lynn, for which he sat till the close of his life. Up to 1846 he may be said to have been an ardent supporter of Sir Robert Peel; but when, in that year, that statesman repealed the corn-laws, he became one of his greatest opponents. B. 1802; D. 1848.—Lord George threw great ardour and energy into all that he undertook; and, with Mr. Disraeli for his ally, was one of the strongest opponents of free trade. He was passionately fond of horse-racing, and was wont to say that "the winning of the Derby was the blue-ribbon of the turf."

Bentivoglio, Guy, ben'-te-ro'-le-o, a cardinal, was sent as nuncio to Flanders by Paul V., to endeavour to bring it again under the papal authority; and here it was he wrote his historical work on the insurrection of Flanders against the Spaniards, and the subsequent wars of the duke of Alva and the Hollanders. In 1616 Bentivoglio was sent as nuncio to France, and in 1621 was made a cardinal, and afterwards became the confidant of Urban VIII., to whom it was supposed he would have succeeded as pope but for his death. B. at Ferrara, 1579; D. 1644.

Bentivoglio, Hercules, an Italian poet, whose satires are considered next in merit to those of Ariosto. B. at Bologna, 1506; D. at Venice, 1573.

Bentley, ben'-tle, the name of several English parishes, none of them with a population above 1,000.

Bentley, Richard, a celebrated divine and critic, who, from Wakefield school, was sent, at the age of fifteen, to St. John's College, Cambridge. Thence he removed to Oxford, where he took the degree of M.A., and, in 1691, published a Latin epistle to Dr. Mill, containing critical observations on the Chronology of John Malala. He was the first who preached the lecture founded by Mr. Boyle, on which occasion he delivered eight admirable discourses in confutation of atheism. In 1693 he was appointed keeper of the royal library. In 1697 commenced his famous controversy with the Honourable Mr. Boyle on the genuineness of the epistles of Phalaris, in which much personal abuse passed on both sides; but, though some of the greatest wits of the age were on the side of Boyle, posterity has determined the case in favour of Bentley. About this time he was presented to the mastership of Trinity College, Cambridge, with which he held the archdeaconry of Ely; but, in consequence of some encroachments made by him on the college for his own emolument, a charge was laid against him, which never came to a determination. He afterwards became regius professor of divinity, when, having exacted an exorbitant fee from persons who were admitted to the degree of D.D. by mandate, he was suspended in the vice-chancellor's court. This arbitrary decree was subsequently reversed by the court of King's Bench, and the doctor was restored to his privileges. B. at Oulton, in Yorkshire, in 1661; D. 1742. —Dr. Bentley is advantageously known as a critic by his editions of Horace, Terence, and Phædrus, his unrivalled epistle to Mill, and his splendid dissertation on the Epistles of Phalaris. These last established his reputation throughout Europe as a critic of the very highest order of excellence.

Benton, ben'-ton, a parish of Northumberland, 3 miles from Newcastle. Area, 8,769 acres. Pop. about 10,000, chiefly engaged in foundries, collieries, and stone-quarries.

Benton, the name of several counties in the United States, the largest of which is in Alabama, and has an area of upwards of 1,000 square miles, and a population of 15,000, of whom a fourth are slaves.

Benvenuto Cellini. (See Cellini.)

Benykeba, Lakes of, ben-yer'-ta, two lakes in North Africa, the one salt and the other fresh. They are about 30 miles from Tunis, the inhabitants of which they supply with fish. Between the channel of the one that is salt and the sea, stands the town of Bizerta, which see.

Benyowsky, ben'-e-ous'-ke, Count Mauritius Augustus de, an Hungarian adventurer, who in 1768 joined the confederacy of the Poles against the Russians. Falling into the hands of the latter, he was exiled to Kamchatka; but, gaining the good offices of the governor, Nilof, he was made preceptor to his children, the youngest of whom, Alphanasia, fell in love with and married him. Afterwards, accompanied by her and some seventy companions, he quitted Kamchatka, and, in 1771, sailed to Formosa, and afterwards to Macao, where his wife and most of his comrades died. On his return to France, he was commissioned to found a colony in Madagascar, and in 1774 landed there, and gaining the esteem of many of the aborigines, was, in 1776, made their king. A short time after he returned to Europe to form alliances for his new rule. In 1783 he sought assistance from England and America for another expedition to Madagascar, and landed there in 1785. At the commencement of hostilities against the French he was mortally wounded. Benyowsky wrote an account of his memoirs and travels. B. at Verbova, 1741; fell, 1786.

Be'ranger, Pierre Jean de, bai-rawnzh'-ai, a French poet, who, from being first a tailor, became a printer, and then a writer of poetry. His first performances were by no means propitious to his fame or his fortunes; and when Napoleon I. was in Egypt, Béranger entertained the idea of proceeding to that country and realizing a dream of riches and glory with which he had been haunted. This, however, circumstances prevented; and in 1803, when suffering from great indigence, he sent some of his poems to Lucien Bonaparte, who subsequently assigned him an income as a member of the Institute. He now continued to write, became an editor, and, in 1809, was appointed a clerk in the secretary's department in the Academy. By this time he had written many songs, and had become popular. His effusions had spread far and wide; and as many of them were pointed satires against the governments which succeeded the fall of Napoleon, in 1821 he was discharged from his office, and subsequently, up to 1830, was twice fined and imprisoned. In the revolution of that year, he says, "he was treated with as one of the great powers;" but he remained free and independent. After the revolution he was elected a representative of the department of the Seine, in the Constituent Assembly, but soon resigned the honour which the admiration of his country had forced upon him. In his retirement he continued to chant and employ himself with a biography of his contemporaries, but did not publish so freely as he had formerly done. B. at Paris, 1780; D. in Paris, July 17, 1857.—His funeral, on the day after his death, was attended by an immense concourse, who assembled to pay their last tribute of respect to the remains of one of the greatest of the national poets of France.

Berar, bai-rar', an old province of the Deccan, in Hindostan. It was distributed among the territories of the Bombay presidency, the Nizam, and the Nagpoor rajah. Lat. between 20° and 21° N. Lon. between 76° and 79° E.

Berat, bai-rat', a town of European Turkey, in Albania, standing on the river Ergent, 30 miles from Avlona. Pop. about 10,000.—This place commands a narrow pass, which has frequently been disputed by contending pashas. Its neighbourhood abounds with grain, wine, and oil.

Berbera, ber'-be-ra, a large town, capital of the Somauli country, on the Gulf of Aden, and the land of myrrh, incense, and gums. Here an annual fair is held, greatly resorted to by caravans from the interior, there being sometimes from 10,000 to 20,000 persons present, engaged in the interchange of various kinds of commodities. Lat. 10° 26′ 15″ N. Lon. 45° 7′ 57″ E.

Berbers, ber-bers, a name given by the Arabs to the original inhabitants of N. Africa, from whom Barbary is so called. (See Barbary.)

Berbice, ber'-beece, a river of Guiana, S. America, rising in the mountains, about 100 miles from the coast, and entering the Atlantic Ocean at lat. 6° 20′ N.; lon. 57° 20′ W. Among the vegetation on the banks of this river the Victoria regia was discovered by Sir Robert Schomburgh.

Berbice, a district of Guiana, which formerly belonged to the Dutch, but now to the British, having been taken by them in 1796, and ceded to them by the peace of Paris in 1814. It extends from Abarry Creek on the west to Courantine river on the east, along the seacoast, about 150 miles. Pro. Cotton, coffee, and sugar. Pop. about 22,000, of whom not more than 1,000 are whites. Lat. between 6° and 7° N. Lon. between 57° and 58° W.

Berchett, Peter, bair'-shai, a French historical painter and engraver, who painted the ceiling of the chapel in Trinity College, Oxford. B. 1659; D. 1720.

Berdiansk, ber-de-ansk', a maritime town of South Russia, situate on the N. shore of the Sea of Azof, 150 miles from Simferopol. In its neighbourhood are coal-mines and salt lakes, which last furnish an annual supply of 1,600 tons. Pop. about 7,000. Lat. 46° 38′ 12″ N. Lon. 36° 48′ 15″ E.

Berea, be-re'-a, 'heavy,' a city of Macedonia.

Berediteheev, ber'-e-ditch-ef', a town of Russian

Poland, 24 miles from Jitomir. It has four annual fairs, at which goods to the yearly value of £600,000 are sold. Pop. 20,000.

BEREGH, ber'-eg, a county of Upper Hungary, partly skirted by the Theiss. Area, 1,070 square miles. Desc. Abounding in wood, and well watered, with large quantities of game and fish. Minerals. Iron, rock-crystal, and alum-stone. Pop. 121,500.

BERENGARIA, wife of Richard Cœur de Lion. (See RICHARD I.)

BERENGARIUS, Jacobus, ber'-en-gair'-e-us, an eminent anatomist of Carpi, was the first to discover the peculiar curative qualities of mercury, and used it with great effect. Lived in the first half of the 16th century.—He amassed great wealth, which he bequeathed to the duke of Ferrara.

BERENGER I., bai'-rainzh-air, the name of two kings of Italy, the first of whom was crowned 888, and the second, who was grandson of the preceding, in 950.

BERENICE and BERONICE, be-re-ni'-se, a name common to many of the queens and princesses in the Ptolemean family in Egypt. The most celebrated was the daughter of Philadelphus and Arsinoe. She married her own brother Ergetes. When he went on a dangerous expedition, she vowed all the hair of her head to the goddess Venus, if he returned. Some time after his return, the locks, which were in the temple of Venus, disappeared, and Conon, an astronomer, to make his court to the queen, publicly reported that Jupiter had carried them away, and had made them a constellation. She was put to death by her own son, B.C. 221.

BERENICE, daughter of Agrippa the Elder, king of the Jews. She was married to Herod, her uncle, after whose death she became the wife of Ptolemy, king of Cilicia; but she afterwards left her husband, and lived in an incestuous manner with her brother Agrippa. Titus fell in love with her, and would have declared her empress, but for fear of the Roman people. B. 28.—Berenice forms the subject of one of Racine's tragedies.

BERENICE, an ancient city of Egypt, on the W. side of the Red Sea, where a number of interesting antiquities have been found. It is 20 miles from Ras Bernass, and is said by Belzoni to have once contained 10,000 inhabitants.

BERENICIUS, Paul Peter, ber'-e-nis'-e-us, a Dutch poet and adventurer, who was conjectured to be an expelled Jesuit, and got his livelihood by sweeping chimneys and grinding knives. It is reported that he would turn into extempore verses what was said to him in prose; translate the gazettes from Flemish into Greek or Latin verse, standing on one foot; that modern and ancient languages were quite familiar to him; and that he knew by heart Horace, Virgil, Homer, Aristophanes, and several parts of Cicero and Pliny. He was suffocated in a bog, into which he fell in a fit of intoxication. The "Georgarchoniomachia" is attributed to him. Lived about the middle of the 17th century.

BERESFORD, William Carr, Viscount, ber'-es-ford, was the natural son of the first marquis of Waterford, and early entered the army. He served in Nova Scotia, at Toulon, and several other places, when, in 1808, he went to Portugal with the British forces, and organized the Portuguese army. On May 4th, 1811, he invested Badajoz, and on the 16th defeated Marshal Soult at Albuera. In 1812 he was wounded at Salamanca; and, under Wellington, had command of a division at Vittoria and Bayonne, where he greatly distinguished himself. On the 10th of April, 1814, he carried the heights of Toulouse, and was created a British peer, with the title of Baron Beresford. In 1814 and 1815 he was at Brazil; and on his return resumed the command of the army of Portugal, but in a few years resigned it. In 1823 he was made Viscount Beresford, and in 1828 was appointed master-general of the ordnance; and, at the time of his death, was governor of the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich, and also governor of Jersey. B. 1768; D. at Bedgebury Park, Kent, 1854.

BERETTINI, Peter, surnamed PETER of CORTONA, ber'-et-te'-ne, an eminent Tuscan painter, remarkable for the boldness of his conceptions. He decorated many chapels at Rome, as also the Barberini Palace; then went to Florence, where he painted the ceiling of the Pitti Palace. His style, however, is described as loose, and as having tended to corrupt the taste of his age. B. at Cortona, 1596; D. 1669.

BEREZINA, bai'-rai-ze'-na, a river of Russian Lithuania, rising in White Russia, near Polosk, and falling into the Dnieper. The small town of Beresina is situate on its banks. At the village of the same name Charles XII. crossed the Berezina on June 29th, 1708; but this river has been especially rendered famous on account of its disastrous passage by the French army during the retreat of Napoleon I. from Russia in 1812.

BEREZOV, ber'-e-zof, a town of Siberia, 400 miles from Tobolsk. Its inhabitants are principally Cossacks, subsisting by fishing and the chase. Lat. 63° 55′ N. Lon. 65° 4′ 19″ E.—Here Prince Menschikoff, the favourite of Peter the Great, died in exile in 1731. He had been banished by Peter II., the grandson of Peter I. In 1821 his grave was opened, and the coffin, from being embedded in the frozen soil, had some of its contents entire. Parts of the clothing, the eyebrows, and the heart were taken from the body, and sent to the prince's descendants.

BERG, Mathias van den, bairg, a Flemish painter, who became a pupil of Rubens. He excelled chiefly as a skilful copyist, being defective in composition. B. 1615; D. 1647.

BERG, the name of a great number of villages with small populations in Germany.

BERG, a duchy of Germany, in the circle of Westphalia, bounded N. by the duchy of Cleves, E. by the county of Mark and the duchy of Westphalia, S. by the Westerwald, and W. by the Rhine. This territory was formed by Napoleon I. in 1806, but was in 1815 ceded to Prussia, and is now included in Prussian Westphalia.

BERGA, bair'-ga, a town of Spain, 50 miles from Barcelona. It is overlooked and defended by a castle. Pop. about 7,000, engaged in the mechanical arts, the manufacture of cotton fabrics, and as muleteers conveying the produce of the neighbourhood from place to place. It was taken and retaken during the civil war of Spain in 1840.

BERGAMA, ber'-ga-ma, a ruined city of Natolia, in Asia Minor, standing about two miles distant from the site of ancient Troy.

BERGAMO, bair'-ga-mo, a province of Lombardy, divided into eighteen districts. Ext. about 100 miles long by 45 broad. Area, 928 square miles. Desc. Mountainous and covered with wood; in the N. and in the S. fertile and level; abounding in rich pastures, rearing large numbers of sheep and goats, and producing chestnuts and olives in great quantities, but neither corn nor wine equal to the consumption of its inhabitants. Minerals. Iron, marble, whetstones, and lignite. Pop. 363,754.

BERGAMO, the capital of the above district, situate between the rivers Brembo and Serio, and 28 miles from Milan. It is built in the form of an amphitheatre, on the side of a rocky hill, and is provided with walls, bastions, and ditches. It is, besides, protected and commanded by a castle, to which there is a covered passage from the city. It contains a number of parish churches, monasteries, and convents. The cathedral is adorned with many valuable paintings. One of the most remarkable edifices in Bergamo is the place for the annual fair, which is held in August, and at which the aggregate sales sometimes amount to £1,200,000. The charitable institutions are numerous, and the great article of trade is silk; also wine, iron, and grindstones. Pop. about 35,000.—This is an ancient city, being the Bergomum of the Romans. It is the birthplace of Bernardo Tasso, the father of Torquato Tasso, the author of "Jerusalem Delivered," to whom there is a statue erected in the great square of the city. It is also the birthplace of many painters of note. In 1798 it was taken by the French and made the capital of the Serio.

BERGARA, bair'-ga-ra, a town of Spain, situate on the bank of the Deva, 25 miles from Bilbao. Pop. about 4,000.—Here the "Convention of Bergara" was concluded on August 31st, 1839, between Espartero and Maroto, which terminated the disastrous civil war that had been raging for years, Don Carlos being obliged to seek refuge in France.

BERGEN, Dirk van den, bair'-gen, a celebrated landscape and animal painter, who was a pupil of Vanderveldt. B. at Haarlem, about 1640; D. 1689.

BERGEN, a seaport and capital of a province of the same name in Norway, and one of the largest and best-built places in that country, situate about 270 miles from Drontheim. It lies at the bottom of a long bay, inclosed on all sides by rugged and barren rocks. The houses are in general good, although, from their being founded on rocks, many of the streets are uneven and slanting. It has frequently suffered from fire. The inhabitants are chiefly employed in navigation, trade, and fishing. It has a German church, and several Danish parochial churches. There is also an hospital for the reception of persons infected with leprosy, a naval academy, national museum, several schools, and five public libraries. It is besides one of the three public treasuries of Norway, and the station of a naval squadron. Pop. 24,000. Lat. 60° 24′ N. Lon. 5° 18′ E. The PROVINCE of BERGEN has an area of 6,661 square miles, with a mountainous coast, indented with numerous bays, gulfs, and fiords. Its inhabitants chiefly subsist by agriculture, cattle-rearing, and fishing. Pop. 184,000. Lat. between 59° 30′ and 62° 41′ N. Lon. between 4° 42′ and 8° 12′ E.

BERGEN, the capital of the island of Rugen, in the Baltic, at the end of a small lake, 13 miles from Stralsund. Pop. about 3,300, principally employed in linen manufacture and agricultural pursuits.

BERGEN, a small town of Germany, about 2 miles from Frankfort, where, in 1759, the French under the duke of Broglio defeated the Prussians, commanded by the duke of Brunswick.

BERGEN, ber'-jen, the name of a county in New Jersey, United States. Area, 350 square miles. Desc. Fertile. Pop. 15,000.—This is also the name of two townships in the United States, the one in New Jersey, the other in New York.

BERGEN-OP-ZOOM, or BERG-OP-ZOOM, op-zoom, an important fortress and town of the Netherlands, in North Brabant, 22 miles from Breda. It has a harbour, two arsenals, and a town-house, with a trade in anchovies, and earthenware manufactories. Pop. about 8,000.—So early as 422 a castle is said to have occupied a site in this town, which, at various times, has suffered greatly during the wars of Spain. In 1747, after a siege of sixty-three days, it was taken by the French under the count of Lowenthal; and again, in 1794, it fell before the arms of the French. In 1813-14 an attempt was made to reduce it by the British, under Sir Thomas Graham; but it was unsuccessful, and the loss to the besiegers considerable.

BERGERAC, bairzh'-e-rak, a town of France, department of the Dordogne, on the river Dordogne, which divides it into two parishes, 48 miles from Bordeaux. Its trade chiefly consists in wine, brandy, and corn; and its principal manufactures are earthenware, paper, woollen caps, and other stuffs. Pop. 7,605.

BERGHEM, Nicholas, bairg'-hem, a Dutch painter, celebrated for his landscapes, into which he introduced architectural ruins, and groups of figures and cattle so admirably arranged that they appeared directly copied from nature. Some of his compositions are in the Dulwich Gallery. His drawings and etchings are also very beautiful, and are eagerly sought after. B. at Haarlem, 1624; D. 1683.

BERGHIER, Nicholas, bair-ge-ai, a French historian, who wrote a History of the Great Roads of the Roman Empire. This work is of great utility to the student of ancient geography, and the best edition is that of 1736, published at Brussels. B. at Rheims, 1567; D. at Grignan, 1623.

BERGION and ALBION, ber'-ge-on, all'-be-on, two giants, sons of Neptune, who opposed Hercules as he attempted to cross the Rhone, and who were killed with stones from heaven.

BERGMAN, Torbernolof, bairg'-man, a celebrated Swedish chemist, was educated at Upsal, where he devoted himself to medicine and the sciences connected with it. Here he gained the friendship of Linnæus, to whom he communicated a collection of nondescript insects, to one of which Linnæus gave the name of Bergman. In 1761 he was appointed professor of mathematics and natural philosophy at Upsal, and we find his name in the list of those who observed the transit of Venus in 1761. In 1767 he obtained the chemical professorship. We are indebted to him for the knowledge of the nature of fixed air, and for a number of chemical experiments. He was knighted by the king of Sweden, and received a pension of 150 rix-dollars; and his wife, at his death, received a pension of 200 rix-dollars, on condition of giving up his library and apparatus to the Royal Society of Upsala. His works were published in 6 vols., under the title of "Opuscula Physica et Chemica." B. at Catherinberg, 1735; D. at Mederi, 1784.

BERGUES, bairg, a town in the department of Le Nord, 5 miles from Dunkirk. Manf. Building of boats; lace also is made, and it is famous for its cheese. Pop. 5,455.—During various wars, it has been several times taken and retaken, and was ceded to France at the peace of the Pyrenees, 1659. The British unsuccessfully laid siege to it in 1793.

BERGUN, bair'-goon, a village of Switzerland, standing on the N. slope of the Albula mountain, on the route from the Engadine to Coiri. Pop. 600.—This village stands at a height of 4,544 feet, and overlooks the valley of Bergünerstein.

BERINA, bai-re'-na, a mountain of the Rhætian Alps, 36 miles from Coire, and remarkable for its extensive glacier. Its pass between the Upper Engadine and Valteline is at a height of 7,672 feet.

BERING. (See BEHRING.)

BERJA, bairzh'-a, a town of Spain, on the S. slope of the Sierra de Gador, 20 miles from Almeria. Pop. about 10,000.—This town is in the centre of a district abounding in lead-mines, and was, in 1804, visited by an earthquake, by which sixty-seven lives were lost.

BERKELEY, George, earl of, berk'-le, descended from Robert Fitzharding, of the royal house of Denmark, was one of the privy council to Charles II., and bestowed on Sion College a valuable library. He was the author of a valuable little book, entitled "Historical Applications and Occasional Meditations upon Several Subjects, written by a Person of Honour," 12mo. 1670. D. 1698.

BERKELEY, Sir William, of the same family, was vice-admiral of the white, and led the van in the desperate engagement with the Dutch, June 1, 1666. He steered into the midst of the enemy's fleet, where he was overpowered by numbers, and was found dead in his cabin, covered with blood.

BERKELEY, George, a celebrated divine, who was educated first at Kilkenny, and next at Trinity College, Dublin, of which he was chosen fellow in 1707. The same year he published "Arithmetica absque Algebra aut Euclide demonstrata." In 1709 he published his "Theory of Vision," which was the first attempt that ever was made to distinguish the immediate and natural objects of sight from the conclusions we have been accustomed from infancy to draw from them. In 1710 appeared the "Principles of Human Knowledge," and in 1713 the "Dialogues between Hylas and Philonus;" the object of both being to disprove the common notion of the existence of matter, and to establish the hypothesis that material objects have no other existence than in the mind. However singular his opinions were, there was so much beauty in his writings that the greatest men—amongst others Steele and Swift—courted his friendship. For the former he wrote several papers in the "Guardian," and through him became intimate with Pope. Swift recommended him to the earl of Peterborough, who took him abroad as his chaplain. In 1714 he returned to England, but set out again for the continent, with a son of Dr. Ashe, bishop of Clogher, and continued on his travels four years. He returned in 1721, and became chaplain to the duke of Grafton, lord-lieutenant of Ireland. At this time he took his degree of D.D., and a fortune was bequeathed to him by a lady of Dublin. In 1724 he was promoted to the deanery of Derry, and the year following he printed a proposal for converting the American Indians, by erecting a college in the Bermudas. His mind was so intent on this project that he obtained a grant of £10,000 from the Commons, and set sail for America, where he resided nearly two years; but the scheme failed, owing to the minister's applying the money to other purposes. In 1732 he published the "Minute Philosopher," in 2 vols. 8vo, which is a masterly attack on infidelity. The next year he was made bishop of Cloyne, and about this time published the "Analyst," in which he endeavoured to prove that the mathematicians admitted mysteries, and even falsities, in science, particularly instancing the doctrine of fluxions. He was answered by several writers, to whom he replied in 1739, in "A Defence of Freethinking in Mathematics." In 1736 he published the "Querist," addressed to magistrates, occasioned by the licentiousness of the times; and in 1744 his book on the virtues of tar-water made its appearance. B. at Kilorin, in Ireland, 1684; D. at Oxford in 1753, and was buried in Christ-church, where there is a monument to his memory.—Pope ascribed, no less justly than beautifully, to Berkeley, "every virtue under heaven." But Pope was not the only one who admired and loved the good bishop of Cloyne. Bishop Atterbury says, "So much understanding, so much innocence, and such humility I did not think had been the portion of any but angels, till I saw this gentleman." He, of all mankind, died possessed of "That which should accompany old age,

As honour, love, obedience, troops of friends."

BERKELEY, a market-town and parish of England, in the county of Gloucester, situate on the Little Avon, 19 miles from Bristol. It principally consists of two irregular streets, and has a church in the style of the later Norman and early English architecture, which is the burial-place of the celebrated Dr. Edward Jenner. It has a trade in timber, cheese, coal, and malt, which is greatly facilitated by the Gloucester and Berkeley Canal. Pop. 4,344.—This town is famous for its Gothic castle, begun in the reign of Henry I. and finished in that of Stephen. The room in which King Edward II. was imprisoned and murdered, in 1327, is still to be seen. Berkeley is a station on the Gloucester and Bristol Railway.

BERKELEY VALE, a valley in the above parish, noted for producing a much-esteemed kind of cheese called "Double Gloucester."

BERKEN, or BERQUEN, bair'-ken, a Fleming, who in 1476 discovered the art of cutting and polishing the diamond by means of a wheel and diamond-powder. B. at the commencement of the 15th century.

BERKENHOUT, John, bair'-ken-hout, a physician and naturalist, who was descended from a Dutch family, and intended for the mercantile profession, which he quitted, and entered first into the military service of Prussia, and next into that of England. In 1760 he went to Edinburgh, and studied physic, but took his doctor's degree at Leyden in 1765. While at Edinburgh he published his "Clavis Anglica Linguæ Botanicæ," a book of considerable merit. In 1778 he attended the British commissioners to America, and on his return obtained a pension. B. at Leeds, 1730; D. at Besselsleigh, near Oxford, 1791.

BERKHAMSTEAD, GREAT, berk'-ham-sted, a town and parish of Hertfordshire, 28 miles from London. The town has two principal streets, at the end of one of which are the remains of an ancient castle, of an elliptical form, defended on the one side by a double, and on the other by a triple moat. It has a church, a goodly number of chapels, and a house of correction. Pop. 3,400.—This town was formerly a Roman station, where the kings of Mercia afterwards resided in the castle. A wittenagemot, or Saxon parliament, was held in it in 697, and Ina's laws were published here. Cowper the poet was born in this parish in 1731, while his father was its rector. It is a station on the North-Western Railway. Little Berkhamstead is in the same county, and has a population of 600.

BERKHEYDEN, Job, bairk-hi'-den, a Dutch painter, who excelled in portraits and landscapes. B. at Haarlem, 1628; D. 1698.—His brother Gerard, also a painter, was famed for his architectural designs. B. 1643; D. 1693.

BERKLEY, Sir William, governor of Virginia, was born of an ancient family near London, and educated at Merton College, Oxford, of which he became fellow. In 1641 he was named governor of Virginia; and, during the civil war, took the side of the king, Virginia being the last of the colonies to acknowledge the authority of Cromwell. In 1651 he was compelled to submit to the rule of the Commonwealth; but, on the death of Governor Matthews, who had been appointed by Cromwell, he resumed the government, on condition that the people would submit to the king's authority. This was agreed to, and Charles II. was accordingly proclaimed in Virginia before his restoration to the throne took place in England. D. 1677.

BERKLEY, a county of Virginia, U.S., on the Potomac. Area, 392 square miles. Desc. Fertile, and producing corn, wheat, and butter. It abounds with iron, coal, and lime; has saw and paper-mills, and is intersected by the Baltimore and Ohio Railway. Pop. about 12,000, of whom one sixth are slaves.

BERKS, or BERKSHIRE, berks, a county of England, bounded N. by the counties of Oxford and Buckingham, from which it is separated by the river Thames, E. by Surrey, S. by Hampshire, and W. by Wiltshire. Ext. 48 miles long, by 28 broad, though in one part contracting to 7. Area, about 476,160 square acres, or nearly 744 square miles. Desc. In this shire a great deal of chalk is found lying in beds, and strata of fossil shells are found below the surface. A considerable portion of its eastern part is occupied by Windsor Forest, which is estimated to be 56 miles in circuit, including a great part of Bagshot Heath. In many other places it is well clothed with timber, particularly oak and beech. Rivers. The Thames, Kennet, Loddon, Ock, Aubourn, and Lambourn. Manf. Berkshire was formerly one of the principal seats of the clothing manufacture, which was carried on until the middle of the 17th century; but it has since entirely declined. Cotton, sacking, paper, and blankets are made in different places, and also silk to some extent. Towns. Reading, Windsor, Wallingford, Abingdon, and Newbury. Pop. about 200,000.

BERKS, a county of Pennsylvania, U.S., on the Schuylkill. Area, 1,020 square miles. Desc. Fertile, and well watered, producing the usual cerealia, and rearing numbers of cattle, pigs, and horses. Minerals. Iron, copper, tin, and porcelain clay. Manf. Paper, gunpowder, and there are several distilleries, tanneries, saw, rolling, and linseed-oil mills. Pop. 78,000.

BERKSHIRE, a county of Massachusetts, U.S., in the west part of the state. Area, 1,400 square miles. Desc. Fertile. Minerals. Iron, coal, and limestone. Manf. Woollens, cottons, iron, paper, glass, and calico-printing. Distilling and tanning are carried on to a considerable extent. Pop. 50,000.—This is also the name of several townships in the United States.

BERLIN, ber-lin', the capital of the Prussian states, situate on the Spree, in the Middle Mark of Brandenburg, and 100 miles from Dresden. The circumference of its walls and palisades is about 11 English miles, and it is entered through 16 gateways. The streets are for the most part broad and straight, and the squares regular and spacious. Berlin is indebted for its principal attractions to the celebrated Frederick II., who is supposed to have expended yearly, in its improvement, 400,000 dollars. It comprises five distinct towns: 1. Berlin Proper, founded in 1163, and containing, among other remarkable buildings, the Calvinist parish church, and Joachimsthal Academy; the garrison church, built in 1722, and adorned with the portraits of Generals Schwerin, Keith, Winterfield, Zeithen, and Von Kleist the poet. In this edifice are also deposited a quantity of colours and other trophies taken in the field. Besides these structures, there is the Lutheran parish church of St. Nicholas, built in 1223, and the most ancient church in the city; the royal arsenal, from which the Prussian army is supplied with clothing; Frederick's Hospital, or Orphans' Asylum, in which 900 children are educated and maintained gratis; the porcelain manufactory; the seminary for cadets, in which young noblemen are instructed in languages, sciences, and field exercises; and various other public institutions. In the suburbs are to be seen the large workhouse, the mint, the public storehouse, the extensive hospital of La Charité, the sugar-refineries, and the hospital of invalids, built in 1748. Across the main branch of the Spree, between Berlin Proper and Cologne, there is a fine freestone bridge, of five arches, and 160 feet in length, ornamented with the statue of the elector Frederick William, moulded by Schluser, cast by Jacobi, and erected in 1703. 2. Cologne on the Spree.—The most remarkable edifice here is the royal palace, 474 feet in length, 284 in breadth, and 104 in height. In it are the cabinet of antiquities, minerals, and medals, with the museum of natural and artificial curiosities, the great library, the royal treasury, and archives depôt, with the White Hall, which has recently been fitted up at a cost of £120,000. Near the palace stands the magnificent cathedral, opened for public worship in 1750, and belonging to the Calvinists. Besides these buildings in this quarter there is the Salzhof, or royal salt-magazine, in which are storehouses for salt and millstones.—3. Friedrichswerder, or Frederick's Island, contains the medical college, the old custom-house, the principal mint, the royal hunting-lodge, the palace of the prince of Prussia, the royal arsenal and foundry, the stamp-office, the opera-house, which was burnt down in 1843, and rebuilt in the following year, and the royal guard-house, by the side of which are colossal statues of Scharnhorst and Bulow, two celebrated commanders in the campaigns between 1812 and 1815. In this part is also a monument to Prince Blucher, the work of Rauch, and erected in 1826.—4. Dorotheenstadt, or New Town, contains, among other public buildings, the Royal Academy of Sciences, with its elegant hall, library, and cabinet of medals; the Observatory, the Anatomical Theatre, and the Brandenburg gate, the finest in the city, carried away by the French in 1807, but restored seven years afterwards.—5. Frederickstadt, founded by the elector Frederick III. in 1688, and the largest of all the sections. Here are situated the principal courts of law, the gold and silver fabrics connected with the orphan-house at Potsdam, the porcelain manufactory, the magnificent palace of the grand master of the order of Malta, the Jerusalem, Trinity, and French churches, and the Bethlem church, belonging to the Lutherans of Bohemia; also the gymnasium of Frederick William, the house of the Society of Naturalists, and other buildings as much distinguished for their external beauty as for the usefulness of the objects to which they are applied. Manf. The principal manufactures of Berlin are silk, serge, fustian, muslin, camlets, and other woollen, linen, and cotton stuffs; also stockings, carpets, embroidery, jewellery, bronze, iron, and steel, black and white lead, borax, vitriol, dye-stuffs (particularly Prussian blue), tobacco, wax, starch, paper, powder, soap, leather, hats, clocks, and watches. Berlin is a city of extensive commercial transactions, the annual sales in its wool-market alone amounting to upwards of a quarter of a million sterling. Pop. 450,000. Lat. 52° 30′ 16″ N. Lon. 13° 23′ 59″ E.—Berlin was taken by the Austrians and Russians in 1760, and was occupied by Napoleon I. in 1806, after the battle of Jena. On the 21st October of that year he entered it, and until the complete failure of the French expedition to Moscow in 1812, Prussia was forced to acknowledge the supremacy of France.

BERLIN, a township of Worcester county, Massachusetts, U.S. Pop. 2,562.—There are several other townships in the United States of this name.

BERLIOZ, Hector, bair'-le-oz, an eminent French musician, whose father was a physician, and who was forced to study for the medical profession greatly against his inclinations. When he had reached his twentieth year, he was sent to Paris to finish his studies; but there the natural bent of his genius prevailed over every other sense of duty. He quitted the lectures of the faculty and entered the Conservatoire de Musique, and in 1830 gained the first prize of the Conservatoire by his cantata of "Sardanapalus." He then went to Italy, where he studied for eighteen months, when he returned, and produced his overture to "King Lear." He now gradually rose in fame, and is the author of a great many works, although public opinion is divided as to his merits as a composer. As a conductor of concerts, however, he has attained considerable eminence both in England, Germany, and Russia. B. at Côte-St.-André, in the department of Isère, 1803.

BERMEO, bair'-maio, a seaport-town of Spain, on the Bay of Biscay, 14 miles from Bilbao. Pop. about 4,000, chiefly occupied in the fisheries.—In this place the epic poet Alonzo de Ercilla was born in 1530.

BERMONDSEY, ber'-mond-se, a suburb of London, included in the borough of Southwark, in which leather-tanning is carried on to a great extent. Pop. 48,128.

BERMUDAS, or SOMERS' ISLANDS, ber-mu'-das, a cluster of small islands belonging to Great Britain, in the Atlantic Ocean, in number about 300, but for the most part so small and barren as to have neither inhabitants nor name. Area, 20 square miles. Desc. The largest of them is St. George, which is 16 miles long, and two in breadth; St. David, Cooper, Ireland, Somerset, Long Island, Bird Island, and Nonesuch. The island of St. George has different ports, and two castles. But the whole group is so completely hemmed in with rocks, that no other fortification is necessary, it being difficult for a vessel of 10 tons to enter the roads. Pro. Indian tobacco, fruit, and legumes. Climate. The temperature is so mild, that a perpetual spring prevails, except during the middle of summer, when the heats are oppressive. Pop. about 11,000, comprising whites, coloured and free blacks. Lat. between 32° 14′ and 32° 25′ N. Lon. between 64° 38′ and 64° 52′ W.—These islands were discovered in 1522 by Juan Bermudas, a Spaniard, and in 1609, George Somers, an Englishman, was wrecked there, and soon afterwards the British formed a settlement upon them. Hulks were established subsequently, wherein were confined a great number of convicts.

BERN, or BERNE, bern, a canton of Switzerland, the largest, and now the second canton in rank of the Swiss confederation, is bounded on the E. by Uri, Unterwalden, and Lucerne; on the N. by Aargau and Solothurn; on the W. by the Jura mountains, Fribourg, and Vaud; and on the S. by the Valais. Area, 2,584 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, especially in the south, where are many of the highest points of the Alps, and many of the most beautiful valleys, as those of Simmenthal, Grindelwald, and Hasli. The Jura mountains cover the north, the two regions being separated by the valley of the Aar, whilst the whole of the territory is included in the basin of the Rhine. Rivers. The Rhine, the Aar and its tributaries, the Emmen, Simmen, Kander, and Thiele. Lakes. Neuchatel, Bienne, Thun, and Brienz, the two former being formed by the Thiele, and the two latter by the Aar. Forests. Pretty extensive, covering the mountains, and chiefly consisting of pine and beech. Pro. The vine is cultivated in the valleys, and cheese is produced as an article of commerce; grain, hemp, lint, and potatoes are grown in sufficient quantities for the purposes of the inhabitants; but the rearing of cattle and horses is the chief source of wealth. Minerals. Iron, copper, lead, gypsum, free-stone, lime, and granite. Manf. The wooden wares of the Oberland; iron and copper wares, watches, linens, woollens. Imp. Grain, tobacco, colonial products, and metals. Pop. 460,000, chiefly Protestants. Lat. between 46° 20′ and 47° 30′ N. Lon. between 6° 50′ and 8° 27′ E.—Bern, in 1353, joined the Helvetic league, which then only included seven cantons, and in 1528 adopted the Reformed religion. In the Swiss revolution of 1847 Bern was elected the principal canton, and the city of Bern was by the National Council chosen in the following year to be the capital of Switzerland.

BERN, the capital of the above canton, stands on the declivity of a hill, near the Aar, where it is crossed by two stone bridges, 22 miles from Bâle. It is large, in part fortified, and has some beautiful edifices. The three principal streets are furnished with arcades or piazzas on both sides. The chief public buildings are the cathedral, founded in the year 1471, and which is a beautiful Gothic edifice; the church of the Saint Esprit, the council-house, the arsenal, the great hospital, the orphan-house, the town library, the university, founded in 1834, the cabinet of medals and antiquities, the Economical Society, and the concert-hall. Manf. Crape, silk, linen, woollen and cotton stuffs, leather, clocks, and watches. Pop. 22,500.—Bern was founded in 1191, by Berthold V.; in 1218 it was made an imperial city; and, in 1288, was unsuccessfully besieged by Rudolph of Hapsburg. In 1405 the whole town was destroyed by fire, but afterwards rebuilt in its present form. Its name is said to be the old Suabian word for bear, its site having originally been a favourite resort of that animal. In 1835 its fortifications were destroyed, and, up to 1847, the federal diet held its sessions in it, alternately with Zurich and Lucerne. Since that time, Bern has been the seat of the government. It is the residence of three foreign ministers, and the birth-place of Haller, to whom a statue is erected in the Botanic Garden.

BERNADOTTE, Jean Baptiste Jules. (See CHARLES XIV. of Sweden.)

BERNARD, GREAT ST., bair'-nar, a pass of the Pennine

Alps, in Switzerland, where is a monastery, built by Bernard of Menthon, about 962 A.D., at an elevation of 8,150 feet above the level of the sea. This is near the line of perpetual snow, and is the highest habitation in Europe. Its inmates are monks of the order of St. Augustine, and have long enjoyed a great celebrity for their humane efforts in saving and assisting lost travellers in the mountains. The dogs of GREAT ST. BERNARD.

St. Bernard also enjoy a world-wide fame for their sagacity in assisting the monks in tracking out those who have been so unfortunate as to sink exhausted amongst the snows of these sublime but terrific Alpine heights. —St. Bernard, Little, a mountain of the Graian Alps, to the south of Mont Blanc, upon which there is also a hospice, 7,076 feet above the sea. (See Alps.)

Bernard of Menthon, the founder of the hospices of Great and Little St. Bernard, was descended from one of the most illustrious houses of Savoy, and early embracing the ecclesiastical life, became archdeacon of the church of Aosta, at the foot of the Alps. Here he employed himself for forty years in propagating Christianity among the mountaineers, and erected, in 962, on the ruins of two temples dedicated to Jupiter, the two monasteries mentioned above. B. near Annecy, 923; D. at Novara, 1008.

Bernard of Thuringia, a hermit, who, at the close of the 10th century, announced that the end of the world was approaching. A total eclipse of the sun happening at that time, many people hid themselves in caves; but the return of light dispelled their fears, the hermit retired to his cell, and the world resumed its tranquillity, although confidence was not entirely restored till the end of the 11th century.

Bernard, St., the founder of the order of Bernardines, one of the most distinguished saints of the Romish calendar, was educated at the university of Paris, which in his time was one of the most celebrated seats of learning in Europe, and, at the age of 22, entered the Cistercian monastery of Citeaux, near Dijon, inducing upwards of thirty of his companions to accompany him in his retirement. By his rigorous practice of the austerities of the order (the strictest in France), Bernard so recommended himself, that he was chosen, in 1115, head of the colony which founded the abbey of Clairvaux. His celebrity was so great, that, in 1128, he was employed to draw up the statutes of the order of the Templars; and his influence prevailed so far at the courts of both France and England as to induce them to acknowledge, contrary to justice, Innocent II. as legitimate pope, in opposition to Anacletus. In 1146 he persuaded the king of France, and other sovereigns, to enter on a crusade, and was offered the command of the army, which, however, he refused. He was canonized by Alexander III. in 1174. B. at Fontaine, 1091; D. at Citeaux, 1153.—His works were published at Paris in 2 vols. 1719.

Bernard, Claude, surnamed Poor Bernard, was the eldest son of a distinguished French magistrate, in the time of Henry IV., and after a youth spent in dissipation, took orders and consecrated his life to the poor, the sick, and the criminal. For twenty years he exercised his charity at the hospitals in Paris, devoting his heritage of £20,000 to the use of the unfortunate. B. at Dijon, 1588; D. at Paris, 1641.

Bernard, duke of Saxe-Weimar, a celebrated general, who was one of the principal supports of the Protestant cause in Germany, during the Thirty-years War. His first essay in arms was made under the king of Bohemia, and when nineteen years of age he distinguished himself at the battle of Wimpfen. He afterwards served under Gustavus Adolphus, gaining several advantages over Wallenstein, and aiding in the taking of Wurtsburg and Mannheim. On the death of Gustavus, at the battle of Lutzen, 1632, he took the command of the army, and followed up the victory. In 1634, however, he was beaten in the decisive battle of Nordlingen, which was gained by the Imperialists. From that time he allied himself closely to France, which had joined the Protestant league, and succoured and retook several towns—amongst others, Mayence, in 1635, and effected an admirable retreat into Lorraine. Subsequently, in 1636, he supported the movements of Condé in Burgundy, and in 1638 took Rheinfeld, Fribourg, and Brisach. In the midst of his successes he died, some say by poison, near Huningue, 1639. B. at Weimar, 1603.

Bernard, Samuel, a French painter and engraver, who was a pupil of Vouet and professor in the Royal Academy at Paris. He excelled in miniatures and gouaches, and was the father of the celebrated banker Samuel Bernard, who rendered valuable services to the governments of Louis XIV. and XV. B. at Paris, 1615; D. at Paris, 1687.

Bernard, J. Frederick, a learned Dutch writer and publisher, who established himself at Amsterdam in 1711. He is the author of a number of works, of which the most important are a "Collection of Voyages to the North," "Religious Customs and Ceremonies of all Nations," and "Ancient and Modern Superstitions." D. 1752.

Bernard, Catherine, a celebrated French authoress, who composed many novels, poems, and two tragedies, "Brutus" and "Laodamia," the former of which was much esteemed. She was admitted a member of the Académie des Ricovrati at Padua, and obtained the poetical prizes many times at the French Academy, and at the Jeux Floraux at Toulouse. She was the friend of Fontenelle. B. at Rouen, 1662; D. at Paris, 1712.

Bernard, James, a French divine, who was educated at Geneva, after which he became minister of the church of Vinsobres; but when the persecution commenced, he retired to Switzerland till the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and then went to Holland, where he established a school for fine arts, philosophy, and mathematics. He wrote an historical and political account of the state of Europe," and succeeded Le Clerc in the management of the "Bibliothèque Universelle." In 1693 he began the "Nouvelles de la République des Lettres." In 1705 he was chosen one of the ministers of the Walloon church at Leyden, and professor of philosophy and mathematics in that university. B. at Nions, 1658; D. 1718.

Bernard, Edward, a learned astronomer and philologer, who, in 1669, was appointed deputy to Sir Christopher Wren in the Savilian professorship of astronomy, and, in 1673, succeeded that great man. In 1684 he took his degree of D.D.; and, in 1691, was presented to the rectory of Brightwell, in Berkshire. B. near Towcester, 1638; D. at Oxford, 1697.—Bernard is celebrated for his knowledge of the Eastern languages and mathematics, and for the labour he expended in searching for and collecting MSS. for the reprints of the old mathematicians, which rendered the Oxford press famous at that period. His works are very numerous.

Bernard, Peter Joseph, called by Voltaire, Gentil-

Bernard ('pleasant'), showed, at an early age, a great taste for poesy, and was at first only an attorney's clerk, but afterwards became secretary to Marshal Coigny, who had the command of the army of Italy. After the marshal's death, he obtained a lucrative appointment, and was now able to indulge his poetic faculties. He wrote an opera, "Castor and Pollux," which had a great success; "The Art of Loving," and a number of odes, songs, &c. His works were collected and reprinted in 1803. B. at Grenoble, 1710; D. at Paris, 1775.—In 1771, Gentil-Bernard, having been guilty of an excess, entirely lost his memory, and for four years was in a state of second childhood.

BERNARDES, Diogo, bair-nar'-dais, a Portuguese poet, who has especially succeeded in the idyl, and is regarded as the Theocritus of Portugal. He has called a collection of his eclogues "Lyma," from the name of the stream on the banks of which he composed his verses. B. about 1540; D. 1596.

BERNARDI, John, bair-nar'-de, an Italian artist, who excelled in cutting grand subjects in crystals for jewellers, and whose works are said to rival those of the ancients. B. at Castel-Bolognese, about 1495; D. at Faënza, 1555.

BERNARDIN, St., bair-nar'-deen, of Sienna, an Italian monk, whose courage and charity were conspicuous during the plague which ravaged Sienna in 1400. In 1404 he entered the order of Franciscans, and was sent to the Holy Land. On his return to Italy he founded above 300 monasteries. He was much respected by the emperor Sigismund, and his eloquence had the most beneficial effect on all classes in Italy. B. at Massa-Carrara, 1380; D. at Aquila, 1444.

BERNARDINO, PASS OF, bair-nar-de'-no, one of the principal passes between Italy, Switzerland, and Germany, on the route from Coire to Bellinzona. Height, 6,970 feet above the level of the sea.

BERNAZZANO, bair-nad-sa'-no, an Italian painter of the 16th century. He excelled in landscape, fruit, flowers, and animals; and is said to have rivalled Zeuxis, having painted a fresco of a strawberry-plant, covered with fruit, so beautifully that the peacocks came and pecked at the wall till it was destroyed. D. 1536.

BERNBURG, bairn'-boorg, a town of Germany, 24 miles from Magdeburg. It is the capital of Anhalt-Bernburg. Manf. Porcelain, starch, and paper. Pop. 7,000.—Railways connect it with Berlin, Magdeburg, and Dresden.

BERNERS, John Bourchier, Lord, ber'-ners, a favourite of Henry VIII., who employed him in several capacities, and gave him the appointment of governor of Calais, where he remained until his death. B. about 1474; D. 1532.—He was the author of several productions; but his greatest work is his translation of Froissart's "Chronicles," which was undertaken by the king's command.

BERNERS, Juliana, related to the above, and one of the earliest female writers of England. Hollinshed says that she was "a gentlewoman endued with great gifts, both of body and mind, and wrote certaine treatises on hawking and hunting, delighting greatly herself in those exercises and pastimes. She wrote, also, a book of the lawes of armes and knowledge appertaining to heraldes." Lived in the 15th century.

BERNIA, or BERNI, Francis, bair'-ne-a, an Italian poet and canon of Florence, who is famous for his witty and satirical pieces, and has given his name to that class of writing in Italy. He was attached to Alexander and Hippolitus de Medici, who had quarrelled, and is supposed to have been poisoned by the former. D. 1536.—He is called the Scarron of the Italians.

BERNIER, Francis, bair'-ne-ai, a French traveller and physician, whose account of his travels was much appreciated, as he visited countries before unknown to Europeans, and threw considerable light on the state of India up to the time of Aurungzebe, at whose court he resided twelve years, during eight of which he held the appointment of physician to the emperor. He was a favourite of the emir Danichmand, who took him to Cashmere; and on his return to France, Bernier published his travels and philosophical works. D. 1688.

BERNINI, or BERNIN, bair-ne'-ne, Giovanni Lorenzo, a Florentine sculptor and architect, exercised his profession chiefly at Rome, where he produced his most famous works; amongst which may be mentioned "the Confession of St. Peter," the Barberini Palace, and the front of the College de Propaganda Fide. He executed also three busts of Charles I. of England from a picture by Vandyke, on viewing which he is said to have observed, that it was the most unfortunate face he ever beheld. At the age of 69 he visited Paris, at the pressing invitation of Louis XIV., and his progress to that city was one continuous ovation. He was received by Louis as a man whose presence honoured France; but when he saw the front of the Louvre, then being erected under Claude Perrault, Bernini said "that a country which had architects of that stamp had no need of him." While at Paris he executed a bust of Louis XIV., and on his return to Rome an equestrian statue of the same monarch, which was placed at Versailles. At 80 years of age he executed a statue of Christ, and presented it to Queen Christina of Sweden, who, however, declined it, saying she was not rich enough to pay for it as it deserved; he, however, bequeathed it to her by his will. Bernini was also a painter, and left about 150 pictures. B. at Naples, 1598; D. at Rome, 1680.

BERNIS, Francis Joachim de Pierre de, bair'-ne, a French cardinal and archbishop of Albi, who was indebted to the marchioness of Pompadour for his preferments in church and state. After having been employed as ambassador to different courts, he was made minister of foreign affairs, and obtained a cardinal's hat. But the ill success of the French arms, and the derangement of the finances, occasioned his disgrace and temporary banishment from court. In 1764 he was recalled, and nominated archbishop of Albi. He afterwards was appointed ambassador to the pope, and had a considerable share in procuring the destruction of the Jesuits. He had the additional title of protector of the French Church at Rome, where he lived in splendour and hospitality till the Revolution disordered his finances, on which he obtained a pension from the court of Spain. He wrote some works, consisting principally of poems. B. at St. Marcel, 1715; D. at Rome, 1794.

BERNOUILLI, James, bair'-noo-eel'-e, a famous mathematician, who was destined for the Reformed church, but whose inclination led him to the study of mathematics, which he pursued privately and without any assistance but from books. In 1676 he set out on his travels, and at Geneva devised a method of teaching a blind girl to write. He wrote a treatise on the comet which appeared in 1680, and soon after went to Holland, where he studied the new philosophy. He returned to Bâle in 1682, and read lectures on experimental philosophy and mechanics. About 1684, Leibnitz published, in the "Acta Eruditorum" at Leipsic, some essays on his new calculus differentialis, but without discovering the method. Bernouilli, however, and his brother, discovered the secret, and were highly praised by Leibnitz. His works were printed at Geneva, 1744. B. at Bâle, 1654; D. 1705.

BERNOUILLI, John, brother to the above, whose labours in the sciences he shared, was in 1695 appointed professor of mathematics at Groningen, and on the death of James he returned to Bâle, where he succeeded him in the professorship of mathematics. In 1714 he published a treatise on the management of ships; and in 1730 his memoir on the elliptical figure of the planets gained the prize of the Academy of Sciences. His writings were published at Geneva in 1742. B. at Bâle, 1667; D. 1748. John Bernouilli left three sons, Nicholas, Daniel, and John, who were all celebrated for their mathematical acquirements.

BERNSTORFF, John Ernest Hartwig, Count of, bairn'-storf, a celebrated Danish statesman, who in 1750 became prime minister of Denmark, under Frederic V., in which office he distinguished himself as the patron of manufactures, commerce, and art. Under Christian VII. he was created a count, but was deprived of the offices he held at the instigation of Struensée; at whose death, however, he was reinstated. He emancipated the peasants on his estates, who in gratitude raised a monument to his memory. B. at Hanover, 1712; D. at Copenhagen, 1772.

BERNSTORFF, Andrew Peter, Count of, nephew of the preceding, was educated at Leipsic and Gottingen, and after travelling through Europe, became gentleman of the chamber to the king of Denmark. He was created count in 1767, and in 1769 was appointed prime minister, when he ceded to Russia the Gottorp part of Holstein for Oldenburg and Delmenhorst. He introduced a new system of finance and prepared the abolition of villanage in Schleswig and Holstein; he was also warmly opposed to any restriction of the liberty of the press, and his death was considered a public calamity. B. at Hanover, 1735; D. 1797.

BERODACH-BALADAN, be-ro'-dăk bă-lăi'-dan, 'who creates contrition,' or 'the son of death,' a king of Babylon, called Merodach.

BERQUIN, Arnauld, bair-kĕ, a French writer, who first distinguished himself by his idyls, which are full of sensibility and sweetness, but whose principal work is his "Ami des Enfans" (the Children's Friend), which the French Academy declared to be the most useful book that had been published during the year. He translated from the English, "Sandford and Merton," and several other interesting and wholesome books for youth. B. at Bordeaux, 1749; D. at Paris, 1791.

BERRY, Sir John, ber'-e, an English naval commander, who first distinguished himself at the battle of Southwold Bay, for which he was knighted. In 1682 he commanded the Gloucester frigate, in which James, duke of York, was proceeding to Scotland; and when that vessel was wrecked at the mouth of the Humber, by his presence of mind saved the prince, with many about him. On the prince of Orange's approach in 1688, Sir John Berry became sole commander of the fleet; but on William III.'s accession to the throne, he became attached to his government, and so retained his appointments and influence. He was poisoned while paying off a king's ship. B. in Devonshire, 1635; D. at Portsmouth, 1691.

BERRY, Caroline Ferdinande Louise, Duchess de, bair-re', was the daughter of Ferdinand I., king of Naples and Sicily, and was married to the duke of Berry, the second son of Charles X. He was assassinated on a Sunday, whilst handing the duchess to a carriage as she came out of the opera-house. She passed through a variety of troubles, and in 1830, after the French revolution, accompanied Charles X. to Holyrood Palace, in Edinburgh. In 1832 a movement in La Vendée took place in her favour. She was under hiding in Nantes, when, being betrayed by a converted Jew, she was found in a small hole behind a stove, where she had been inclosed for sixteen hours, and was carried to the castle of Blaye. In 1833 she was released, having remarried a son of the prince of Lucchesi-Palli, with whom she retired to Sicily. B. at Naples, 1798.

BERRYER, Antoine Pierre, bair'-re-ai, a distinguished French advocate and pleader, who, in 1815, assisted in the defence of the generals who followed Napoleon I. to Waterloo. From that period he rose to great eminence as a defender of order and an assertor of the liberties of his country. He unsuccessfully defended Louis Napoleon on his trial for lauding at Boulogne, and in 1858 was engaged for the defence of the count de Montalembert, when that nobleman was proceeded against by the French government for certain alleged libellous expressions contained in his celebrated article in the "Correspondant" newspaper, "A Debate in the English Parliament on India." B. in Paris, 1790.

BERTAUT, John, bair'-to, a French bishop and poet, whose first essays charmed the court of Henry III. He was mainly instrumental, with the cardinal of Penon, in the conversion of Henry IV., who gave him the rich abbey of Aumay, and he was named chief chaplain to Marie de Medici on her marriage with the French monarch. In 1606 he was made bishop of Séez. His poems were printed at Paris in 1620; and besides these he wrote several theological pieces. B. at Caen, 1570; D. 1611.

BERTHIER, Alexander, bair'-te-ai, one of the marshals of Napoleon I., prince of Neufchatel and Wagram, and vice-constable of France. He first served in the American War of Independence, under Lafayette, and at the commencement of the French revolution was made a general. He behaved with great bravery in La Vendée, and was at the head of Napoleon's staff in Italy, Egypt, and Germany. Indeed, he occupied the first place in the confidence of the emperor, and was with him in all his expeditions. In 1814 he submitted to the new régime and was created a peer; but when the emperor escaped from Elba, he retired to his family at Bamberg, where he shortly afterwards committed suicide by throwing himself from the third story of his palace. B. 1753; D. 1815.

BERTHOLLET, Claude Louis, bair'-tol-ai, one of the most eminent chemists of his day, who, with Lavoisier, Fourcroy, and Guyton de Morveau, planned a new chemical nomenclature, which, with all its drawbacks, was found of essential service to chemical science. He accompanied Napoleon I. in his Egyptian expedition; and on his return became a senator and an officer of the Legion of Honour. On the fall of the emperor, however, he was among the first to desert him; and Louis XVIII. conferred on him the title of count. His greatest work is "Essai de Statique Chimique;" but he wrote a great number of memoirs and other scientific essays. B. at Talloire, in Savoy, 1748; D. 1822.

BERTIE, ber'-te, a county of North Carolina, U.S., on the Roanoke, at its entrance into Albemarle Sound. Area, 680 square miles. Desc. Fertile, and producing cotton and tobacco in abundance. Pop. 13,000, of whom one half are slaves.

BERTIUS, Peter, bair'-te-oos, a Flemish geographer, who became professor of philosophy at Leyden, which office he lost for being an Arminian. He then went to Paris, joined the Romish church, and was made cosmographer to Louis XIII., and professor of mathematics. B. at Bavaren, 1565; D. 1629.—His best works are "Theatrum Geographiæ Veteris," and an "Introduction to Universal Geography."

BERVIE, or INVERBERVIE, ber'-ve, a town and parish of Kincardineshire, situate on the coast of the North Sea, at the mouth of a stream called Bervie, 9 miles from Stonehaven. Area, 2,000 acres. It has manufactories of linen, but its inhabitants are chiefly engaged in the fisheries. Pop. 1,459.—It is a station on the Aberdeen Railway.

BERWICK, ber-rik, the name of several towns in the United States, none of them with a population above 1,800.

BERWICK, the name of several parishes of England, none of them with a population above 500.

BERWICKSHIRE, a county of Scotland, bounded N. by the county of Haddington, E. by the German Ocean, W. by Mid-Lothian, and S. by Roxburghshire and the river Tweed. Area, 446 square miles. Desc. The surface of the country is unequal, except on the banks of the rivers; and it is in general bare of wood, although planting has been carried on to a considerable extent, and the hilly tracts have been converted into extensive sheep-pastures. Agriculture in all its branches is also pursued to great perfection. Rivers. The Tweed and its affluents, the Blackadder and the Whiteadder; the Eye, the Eden, and the Leader. Minerals. None of importance. Manf. Inconsiderable. The only harbour, properly so called, is at Eyemouth. Towns. Dunse, Greenlaw, Lauder, Eyemouth, and Coldstream. Pop. 36,297.

BERWICK-UPON-TWEED, formerly a town and county in itself, on the Tweed, independent of England and Scotland, but, since the Municipal Reform Act, included in England for all purposes except parliamentary elections. It is 47 miles from Edinburgh. Area of parish, 5,120 acres. It is connected with its suburbs, Tweedmouth and Spittal, by a bridge over the Tweed, which has 15 arches, and measures 1,164 feet long and 17 wide. The Town-house is a handsome structure, with a stately spire, 150 feet high, where there is a choir of eight bells. The barracks, with the store-house, form a handsome square; and, besides the church, which is a spacious building, without a spire, there are several other places of worship for Presbyterians. Its chief trade consists in exporting corn, pork, eggs, and salmon; and it has sail-cloth, cordage, and linen manufactories. It has a long pier, which was begun in 1811, and which shelters a harbour, and stretches a long way into the sea. Pop. of parish, 10,007; of parliamentary borough, 15,094.—This town was long the theatre of many sanguinary combats between the English and Scotch before it was finally ceded to England in 1502.—It is a station on the North British Railway.

BERWICK, NORTH, a seaport-town and parish of Haddingtonshire, situate on the coast of the Frith of Forth, 20 miles from Edinburgh. It has a harbour and a small trade in corn. Pop. of parish, 1,643; of borough, 863.—In this parish are Tantallon Castle, the Bass Rock, and North-Berwick Law, which last is a conical hill, nearly 1,000 feet above the level of the sea.—Here are the termini of a branch of the North British Railway.

BERZELIUS, Jons Jacob, ber-ze'-le-us, a distinguished Swedish chemist, whose powers as an analyst were considered perfect. He rose to the highest honours in his native country, and, in 1836, the Royal Society of London awarded him the Copley medal. He was a member of almost all the learned societies in the world; and at his death the members of the scientific societies of his native country wore mourning for two months out of respect for his memory. B. at Wasersunda, East Gothland, 1779; D. at Stockholm, 1848.

BESANÇON, bai-sang'-sawng, a city in the department of Doubs, on the river Doubs, 52 miles from Dijon. It was fortified by Louis XIV.; and, besides a library of 80,000 volumes, it has a museum, a cathedral, court-house, royal college, a barracks, an arsenal, and an hospital. It has also an academy of painting and sculpture, which was founded in 1773. Manf. Druggets, carpets, watches, jewellery, porcelain, and leather. It has also a trade in corn, wine, cattle, and iron goods. Pop. 42,000.—This is an ancient town, being in existence in the time of the Romans, and some of its streets still have Roman names. It was twice taken by Louis XIV., and was in 1678 united to France. In 1814 the Austrians laid siege to it, but without success.

BESOR, be'-sor, 'joyful,' or 'beautiful,' a small stream in the south of Canaan.

BESSARABIA, bes'-sa-rai'-be-a, a frontier province of Russia in Europe, lying on the Black Sea, between the northern mouth of the Danube and the Dniester, and bounded on the west by Moldavia, of which it once formed a part. Area, 18,018 square miles. Desc. In general flat and lying low, except in the north, where it is traversed by some of the off-shoots of the Carpathians. Rivers. The Danube, Pruth, and Dniester, by which the province is, with the exception of the N.W. extremity, wholly inclosed. Pro. The usual cerealia, and millet, maize, hemp, flax, and tobacco. Fruits and wines are produced; but a great portion of the land is devoted to pasture. Exp. Tallow, salt, cheese, wool, and cattle. Towns. Akerman, Bender, Kishenau, and Ismail. Pop. about 800,000. Lat. between 44° 45′ and 48° 40′ N. Lon. between 26° 35′ and 30° 30′ E.—Bessarabia was successively included in the empire of the Goths, Huns, Avares, and finally formed a portion of Moldavia. It was conquered by the Turks in 1484. In 1812 it was ceded by Turkey to Russia, and in 1829 the treaty of Adrianople gave Russia the right of establishing a quarantine station on the Sulina mouths of the Danube.

BESSEL, Frederick William, bes'-sel, an eminent Prussian astronomer, who, in 1810, became director of an observatory erected by the king of Prussia at Königsberg. Here he pursued his labours uninterruptedly, and in 1818 produced his "Fundamenta Astronomiæ," a work which struck the greatest philosophers with amazement, and placed his reputation on the highest pinnacle of scientific renown. He produced many other works, and was elected a member of most of the celebrated learned societies of the world. B. at Minden, 1784; D. 1846.

BESSIERES, Jean Baptiste, bes'-se-air, one of the marshals of Napoleon I., and created by that emperor duke of Istria. He distinguished himself in many memorable battles, and at Marengo led the charge which decided the fate of the day. He defeated Kutusoff at Olmutz, and at Jena, Friedland, and Eylau displayed the most consummate skill in handling his troops. For his conduct in the Peninsula, he was, in 1809, made duke of Istria, and at the battle of Eslingen, in Germany, he worsted the division of the Austrian general Hohenzollern. In the Russian expedition, he was commander of the cavalry of the Guard, and in 1813 commanded the whole of the French army in Germany. On the morning before the battle of Lutzen, Bessieres fell, struck by a bullet in the breast, and for some time his death was kept a secret from the army. D. at Preissac, near Cahors, 1768; D. 1813.

BETHABARA, be-thăb'-a-ra, 'the house of passage,' a ford of the river Jordan.

BETHANY, beth'-a-ne, 'the house of song or of affliction,' a noted village at the foot of Mount Olivet, near Jerusalem.

BETHAVEN, beth-ai'-ven, 'the house of vanity or of grief,' a town near to Bethel.

BETHEL, beth'-el, 'the house of God,' a city so named by Jacob. It became a seat of idolatry in Israel; hence, "Come to Bethel" expressed an invitation to idol-worship.

BETHELITE, a native of Bethel.

BETHENCOURT, John de, bai'-ten-koor, a Norman baron, who was chamberlain to Charles VI., king of France, and being ruined in the war with England, sought to repair his fortunes in foreign countries, and made a descent from Spain on the Canary Isles, in 1402. Not having sufficient force, however, he returned, and obtained reinforcements from Henry III. of Castile, with which he was successful, and was crowned king in 1404, under the title of Louis. He converted the greater portion of the Canaries to Christianity, and in 1405 received from the Pope the appointment of bishop to the islands. The following year he went to Normandy, where he passed the remainder of his days. D. 1425.

Billault, Augustus Adolphus Marie, a French politician, who, in Louis Philippe's reign, at first supported the policy of M. Thiers, but afterwards opposed that minister, and also M. Guizot. At the revolution of 1848 he joined the Socialist party, and subsequently attached himself to the fortunes of Louis Napoleon. After the coup-d'état of December 2, 1851, he was made president of the legislative body. B. at Vannes, Morbihan, 1805.

Billingsley, Sir Henry, bil'-lings-le, an eminent mathematician, who was educated at Oxford; after which he was bound apprentice to a haberdasher in London. He acquired a large fortune, and became successively sheriff, alderman, and in 1596 lord mayor, when he was knighted. He received into his house Whitehead, an expelled friar, from whom he learned mathematics, in which he became remarkably skilled. Sir Henry was the first who published Euclid's Elements in English, with annotations drawn from the MSS. of his master. This was in 1570. D. 1606.

Billiton, beel-e-ton, an island in the Eastern seas, lying between Borneo and Sumatra. Area, 1,150 square miles. Desc. Well wooded, and surrounded by rocks and islets. Pop. 6,000. Lat. 3° 13′ S. Lon. 108° 7′ E.—It was ceded to the English, with Banca, by the sultan of Palembang; but in 1822 was given up to the Dutch.

Bilson, Thomas, bil'-son, a learned prelate, who was educated at Winchester school, of which he afterwards became master, prebendary of the cathedral there, and warden of the college. In 1585 he published a treatise of the "Difference between Christian Subjection and Unchristian Rebellion," dedicated to Queen Elizabeth; and in 1593 another, on the "Perpetual Government of Christ's Church," one of the most able treatises in favour of episcopacy ever written. In 1596 he was made bishop of Worcester, and the following year was translated to Winchester. In 1604 he published a famous book, on "Christ's Descent into Hell;" and in the same year was one of the managers at the Hampton-court conference. He had also a share in the present translation of the Bible. B. at Winchester, 1530; D. at Westminster, 1616.

Bilston, bils'-ton, a town of Staffordshire, 3 miles from Wolverhampton. It has great iron-works, and numerous manufactories for japanned enamelled goods and iron-ware. Pop. 23,527. The Birmingham and Staffordshire Canal runs through this town, and it is about one mile from the Willenhall station, on the Liverpool and Birmingham Railway.

Binab, be'-nab, a town of Persia, 55 miles from Tabriz. It contributes a contingent of 400 men to the army of Azerbijan.

Binabola, or Twelve Pins, bin-a-bo-la, a mountain-range in Galway, Ireland, not far from Ballinahinch. The highest point is 2,400 feet above the level of the sea.

Binche, beensh, a town of Belgium, on the Haine, 10 miles from Mons. Manf. Hardwares, cutlery, lace, and paper. Pop. 5,235.

Bindrabund, been-drà-boond', a town of Hindostan, on the Jumna, 40 miles from Agra. Here the temples which are dedicated to Krishna are amongst the most colossal works of Hindoo architecture.

Binfield, bin'-feeld, a parish of Berkshire, 3 miles from Wokingham. Area, 3,530 acres. Pop. 1,280.—Here it is said that Pope composed his "Windsor Forest."

Bingen, bing'-en, a frontier town, on the Rhine, in the grand duchy of Hessen-Darmstadt. It has a good trade in corn and wines, and is beautifully situate at a part where the river makes a considerable curve. It is much frequented by tourists. Pop. about 3,000. There is a short railway from here to Kreuznach.

Bingham, Joseph, bing'-ham, a learned divine, who was elected a fellow of University College, Oxford, in 1689, and became one of the college tutors. In 1695 he delivered a sermon on the doctrine of the Trinity, which raised such a party against him, that he was compelled to resign his fellowship and retire to the rectory of Headbourne-worthy, in Hampshire, to which he was presented by Dr. Radcliffe, the most celebrated physician of his day. Here he began the "Origines Ecclesiasticæ," which was completed in 1772, in 10 vols. 8vo and 2 vols. folio, and which is one of the most celebrated ecclesiastical works in the English language. In 1712 Bishop Trelawny gave him the rectory of Havant, near Portsmouth. B. at Wakefield, 1668; D. at Headbourne-worthy, 1723.

Bingley, bing'-le, a town and parish in the West Riding of Yorkshire, 15 miles from Leeds. Manf. Worsted, cotton, yarns, and paper. Pop. 15,339.—It is a station on the Midland Railway.

Bintang, been'-tang, an island of the Dutch East Indies. Area, 600 square miles. Gum, pepper, and rice are its principal products. Pop., inclusive of the neighbouring smaller islands, 13,000.

Bion, bi'-on, a Greek bucolic poet, who was a contemporary of Theocritus and Moschus. He wrote some idyls, which are marked by great taste, and which have been translated into several languages. B. at Smyrna. Flourished about three centuries B.C.—The subjects of pastoral composition, however, admit of very little variety.

Bion, a philosopher and sophist of Borysthenes, in Scythia, who rendered himself famous for his knowledge of poetry, music, and philosophy. D. 241 B.C.

Biot, Jean Baptiste, be'-o, an eminent mathematician and natural philosopher of France, whose researches in, and connected with, the polarization of light, procured him the award of the Rumford medal by the Royal Society of London in 1840. He was an extensive contributor to science, and a member of several of the leading learned societies of Europe. B. at Paris, 1774

Bir, bir, a town of Asiatic Turkey, situate on the Euphrates, 115 miles from Antioch, formerly an important place; but it was taken and destroyed by Tamerlane. It was here that the navigation of the Euphrates to the Persian Gulf was first proposed.—The name signifies 'a well,' and is common to many small towns in Arabia.

Biragne, Réne de, be'-rag, a Milanese of a noble family, who entered the French service, and became a favourite of Henry II., who gave him the government of the Lyonnese. Biragne soon became a confidant of Catherine of Medici, and, under Charles IX., one of the principal instigators of the massacre of St. Bartholomew. By this monarch he was naturalized, and, in 1570, was appointed keeper of the seals, and, in 1573, chancellor. He entered into all the follies and vices of the court of Henry III., and introduced the fashion of keeping the breed of small Maltese and Lyonnese dogs. On becoming a widower he took orders, and was made bishop of Lavaur, and then cardinal. He restored and magnificently endowed the church of St. Catherine du Val des Ecoliers, at Paris, and erected close by, a monumental fountain. Indeed so lavish was he, that at his death, his only daughter was supported by alms. D. 1583.—He was a time-serving and unprincipled character.

Biragne, Clement, a Spanish engraver, who discovered the art of engraving on diamonds. The first work he executed of this kind was a portrait of Don Carlos, son of Philip II.; and he also engraved on a diamond the arms of Spain, to serve as a seal for that prince. Lived in the second half of the 16th century.

BIRBHOOM, or BEERBHOOM, beerb'-hoom, a district of Bengal, situate at the N.W. extremity of the province. Area, 3,300 square miles. Desc. Hilly, and mostly covered with jungle; but in the open parts rice and sugar are produced in abundance. Minerals. Coal and iron, which is smelted and wrought by the natives. Pop. 1,580,600. Lat. between 23° 25′ and 24° 25′ N. Lon. between 86° 20′ and 88° 20′ E.

BIRCH, Thomas, birch, an English divine, who was indefatigable in literary pursuits, and has left many valuable historical and biographical works. He was designed by his parents, who were Quakers, for business; but, at his earnest desire, was permitted to indulge his taste for literature. In 1730 he was ordained in the established church, and was introduced to Lord Chancellor Hardwicke, to whom he principally owed his advancement. He was a fellow and secretary of the Royal Society, and a trustee of the British Museum, to which institution he bequeathed his library and MSS., and £500 towards increasing the stipends of the three assistant librarians. His principal work was "The General Dictionary, Historical and Critical," in 10 volumes, which included a translation of Bayle's; and, besides this, he wrote several other biographical and historical works. B. in London, 1705; D. by a fall from his horse, 1766.

BIRD, William, bird, an English musician, who was attached to the chapel royal of Edward VI.; and, in the reign of Elizabeth, was organist of the queen's chapel. His compositions are numerous and excellent, he being one of the principal contributors to Queen Elizabeth's "Virginal Book," and the celebrated canon, "Non Nobis Domine" is also generally ascribed to him. B. 1543; D. 1623.

BIRD, Edward, R.A., an artist, who confined himself principally to comic subjects, but produced many historical and religious pieces besides. He became historical painter to the Princess Charlotte of Wales. B. at Wolverhampton, 1772; D. in Bristol, 1819.—His "Village Politicians" is a well-known picture.

BIRD ISLAND, the name of various small islands, discovered at different periods in the Eastern seas, and the Pacific and Atlantic oceans.

BIREN, John Ernest, be'-rĕ, duke of Courland, was descended from a mean family in that country, and repaired in 1714 to St. Petersburg, where he ingratiated himself into the good graces of Anna, duchess dowager of Courland, who made him her favourite; and, when she became empress of Russia, intrusted to him the administration of the kingdom. His conduct was arbitrary and cruel. Several noble families were reduced to ruin, and more than 20,000 persons were exiled by him to Siberia. In 1737 the empress compelled the nobles to choose him duke of Courland, where he governed in the like despotic manner. On the death of the empress he assumed the regency, by virtue of her will; but, in 1740, a conspiracy was formed against him by Marshal Munich, and he was condemned to death, which sentence was changed to banishment. Peter III. recalled him, and Catherine II. restored him to his former dignity. In 1763 Biren re-entered Mitau; and, profiting by the lessons of misfortune he had experienced, governed for the remainder of his life with mildness and justice. B. 1690; D. 1772. (See ANNA.)

BIRGER DE BIELBO, beer'-ger beel'-bo, regent of Sweden, who married Ingeborg, daughter of King Eric le Bègue. In 1236 he saved Lubeck, which was besieged by the Danes, and subsequently brought over to Christianity the inhabitants of Finland, whose incursions had desolated Sweden. At the death of Eric IX., he was named regent, and governed well and wisely till his death in 1266. B. 1210.—It was he who founded the city of Stockholm.

BIRGHAM, or BEIGHAM, brig'-am, a village of Northumberland, 4 miles from Coldstream. Here, in 1290, a treaty of peace was concluded between England and Scotland, but, on the demise of Margaret, queen of Scotland, it was broken.

BIRINGOCCIO, or BIRINGUCCI, Vannuccio, be'-reen-gotch'-e-o, an Italian mathematician, who was the first of his countrymen who wrote on the art of casting cannon, making gunpowder, and fireworks. His work entitled "Pyrotechnia" was printed at Venice, in 1540, 4to. Lived in the first half of the 16th century.

BIRKBECK, George, M.D., birk-bek, one of the greatest friends of the working classes of England, and an active promoter of every professional or scientific pursuit which had for its aim public utility. In 1799 he became a lecturer on natural and experimental philosophy in the Andersonian Institution of Glasgow. In 1804 he relinquished his professorship and went to London, where he settled and rapidly rose into eminence as a physician. He was the originator of the mechanics' institutions, and in 1823 presided at a meeting which had for its object the founding of the "London Mechanics' Institution." On the 15th December of the same year, he was elected president of that institution, an office which he held to the time of his death. B. at Settle, in Yorkshire, 1776; D. in London, 1841.

BIRKENFELD, beer'-ken-felt, a principality of West Germany, belonging to Oldenburg, and inclosed by Rhenish Prussia and Meissenheim. Area, 143 square miles. Desc. Mountainous and well wooded, and watered by the Nahe, one of the tributaries of the Rhine. Pro. Cattle, hemp, flax, and oil-seeds. Minerals. Coal and iron. Pop. 31,000.—This province was ceded to Oldenburg by the treaty of Vienna, in 1815; and its capital has the same name.

BIRKENHEAD, bir-ken-hed, a new and well-built town and township of Cheshire, on the bank of the Mersey, opposite Liverpool, and 15 miles from Chester. It sprung into existence principally through the construction of shipbuilding-docks in 1824. Pop. about 25,000.

BIRKENHEAD, Sir John, a political writer, who, in the civil war, conducted, in favour of the court, a periodical work, called "Mercurius Aulicus," and also wrote a number of pamphlets against the parliamentarians, when these were in power, for which he was several times imprisoned. At the Restoration he was knighted and made master of requests; and was a member of the Royal Society. B. at Northwich, Cheshire, 1615; D. at Westminster, 1679.

BIRMAN EMPIRE. (See BURMAH.)

BIRMINGHAM, bir'-ming-ham, one of the principal manufacturing towns of England, situate in Warwickshire, and 112 miles from London by railway. It stands on the river Rea, and embraces within its boundaries the neighbouring townships of Aston and Edgbaston. It has a great many places of worship for almost every denomination, and various charitable establishments; as King Edward VI.'s Free Grammar-school, founded in 1552, and rebuilt in 1835 from designs by Barry; the Blue-coat school, established in 1722; the dissenters' charity school, and several others. There is a convent of the Sisters of Mercy in Birmingham, and it possesses a general hospital, a dispensary for the relief of indigent sick persons at their own residences, and a handsome theatre, built in 1792. The Town-hall, where assemblies and public meetings are held, is one of the most magnificent structures in the town. It occupies a commanding site, is built with classic elegance, and is capable of accommodating 8,000 persons standing, or 4,000 seated. Its organ is one of the finest in the kingdom, and the triennial musical festivals, which are held in this building, are unsurpassed throughout the country. A Queen's College has lately been established and munificently endowed in connection with London University. The town has also large bathing-establishments, and many places adapted for public recreation and amusement. Manf. These embrace almost every kind of iron, brass, steel, and electro-plated goods; bronze, or-molu, and japanned wares; buttons, toys, jewellery, papier-maché goods, pins, steel pens, tools, saddlery, glass, cutlery, and fire-arms. The steam-engine factory of Soho, which is in this town, and with which the name of Watt is associated, is the largest in the world. It is estimated that not fewer than 20,000 families are directly and indirectly employed in the various kinds of manufactures produced in this town. Pop. 232,841.—Birmingham is supposed to have been a place for the manufacture of arms even in the time of the ancient Britons, but it has not been the scene of many historical events. It is in communication with all the chief cities of the kingdom by means of railways. There is a town named Birmingham in Pennsylvania, U.S.

Birnam, bir'-nam, a hill of Scotland, 12 miles from Perth, and about the same distance from Dunsinane. It is noticed here from its connection with the tragedy of Shakspeare's "Macbeth," in which the apparition of a child, crowned, and holding a bough, affirms that

> "Macbeth shall never vanquish'd be, until > Great Birnam wood to high Dunsinane hill
> Shall come against him."

Biron, Armand de Gontaut, baron de, be-rawng', a celebrated French general, who was for some time page to Queen Margaret of Navarre; and, afterwards entering the army, signalized himself in the wars of Piedmont, under Marshal Brissac. He displayed great courage and prudence in the civil war, being present with the Catholic army at the battles of Dreux, St. Denis, and Moncontour, although he secretly favoured the Huguenot party, and saved several of his friends in the massacre of St. Bartholomew, in 1572. In 1577 he was made a marshal of France, and was dispatched by Henry III. to the Low Countries to succour the duke of Alençon, but was defeated by the duke of Parma. On the death of Henry III. he was one of the first to recognize Henry IV., and rendered great services to that prince at the battle of Arques and the attack on Paris. B. in Périgord, 1524; D. 1592, at the siege of Epernay, in Champagne.

Biron, Charles de Gontaut, duc de, son of the above, was admiral and marshal of France, and is noted for the friendship which Henry IV. entertained for him, and for his treason towards that monarch. He made his first essays in war under his father, and covered himself with glory at the battles of Arques and Ivry, and at the sieges of Paris and Rouen. The king loaded him with honours, and saved his life at the fight of Fontaine Française, and sent him ambassador to England. Notwithstanding, however, all these favours, Biron, swollen with pride, ambition, and avarice, entered into a conspiracy with Spain and Savoy against his sovereign; and the plot being revealed by Lafin, who had been its instigator, he was beheaded. Henry endeavoured to make him avow his crime, with the view of pardoning him, but was unsuccessful in his magnanimous attempt. B. 1562; suffered 1602.

Birr, beer, a village of Switzerland, 3 miles from Brugg, in the canton of Aargau, where, in 1768, Pestalozzi began first to teach his celebrated educational system.

Birr, bir, formerly called Parson's Town, a town in King's County, Ireland, 34 miles from Limerick. Pop. about 6,000.—Here the earl of Rosse erected his magnificent telescope for the study of astronomy.

Birsha, bir-sha, 'in evil,' the king of Gomorrah.

Birstall, bir'-stall, a parish in the West Riding of Yorkshire, 7 miles from Leeds. Area, 13,180 acres. Manf. Woollen, worsted, cotton, and silk. In its neighbourhood are both coal and iron mines. Pop. 38,222.—It is near the York and North Midland Railway.

Biscaino, Dominique, bees-ka-e'-no, an Italian painter and engraver, the best of whose works are in the Dresden Gallery; viz. the "Adoration of the Magi," the "Circumcision," and the "Woman taken in Adultery." B. at Genoa, 1632; D. 1657.

Biscay, bis'-kai, one of the three Basque provinces, inclosed by the Bay of Biscay, Old Castile, Alava, and Guipuscoa. Area, 1,200 miles. Pop. 150,000.—(See Basque Provinces.)

Biscay, Bay of, that part of the Atlantic Ocean which lies between the island of Ushant in France and Cape Ortegal in Spain, having the Spanish province of Biscay to the south. It washes the whole west coast of France and the north coast of Spain. It receives the waters of the Adour, Charente, Gironde, and Loire, and contains the islands Belleisle, which is used as a convict station, Ré, and Oleron, on the coast of France. Depth. Varying from 20 fathoms on the W. of France, to 200 on the N. of Spain.

Biscop, John van, bees'-kop, a Dutch designer and engraver, who, although following the profession of an advocate, executed a great number of prints, the most considerable of which is a set of plates for the "Paradigmata Graphices variorum Artificum." B. at the Hague, 1646; D. at Amsterdam, 1686.

Bishop, Sir Henry Rowley, bish'-op, one of the best of English musical composers, who received his musical tuition under Signor Bianchi; and in the course of nearly twenty years, during which he was connected with Drury-lane or Covent-garden theatres, produced upwards of seventy operas, ballets, and musical entertainments. Many of his songs and glees are the most beautiful effusions in English melody, and by their qualities of animation, grace, and pathos, will yet long continue to charm the ear. He relinquished composing for the stage in 1826, and in 1848 was elected professor of music at Oxford University. B. in London, 1780; D. 1855.—We may mention, as among his best works, "Guy Mannering," "The Slave," "The Virgin of the Sun," the "Miller and his Men," and "Maid Marian." Many of his arrangements are also extremely beautiful.

Bishop Auckland. (See Auckland.)

Bishop-Stortford, stor'-ford, a town and parish of Hertfordshire, on the river Stort; it is 10 miles from Hertford. A navigable canal, completed in 1769, joins the river Lea, and allows communication with the metropolis by water. The town is built on the side of a hill, and consists of four principal streets in the form of a cross. The church was partly rebuilt in 1820. Pop. 5,280.—It is a station on the Eastern Counties and Norfolk Railway. The vestiges of a castle, built by William the Conqueror, on an artificial mount, are to be seen here.

Bishopthorpe, thorp, a parish of Yorkshire, 4 miles from York. Area, 760 acres. Pop. 500.—There is a palace in this place, which, ever since the demolition of Cawood Castle, in the Cromwellian wars, has been the residence of the archbishop of York.

Bishop-Wearmouth, weer'-mouth, a parish of Durham, united by an iron bridge over the Wear to the town of Sunderland. Area, 8,880 acres. Pop. 35,035.

Bisi, Bonaventure, bee'-ze, an Italian artist, who relinquished historical subjects to paint miniatures, reproducing in this way the choicest of Guido's productions. His works are held in considerable estimation. B. at Bologna, 1612; D. at Modena, 1662.

Bissagos, bees-sa'-goes, a group of islands, about 16 in number, with numerous islets, lying off the western coast of Africa, between the Gambia and Sierra Leone, near the mouth of the Rio Grande. These islands are inhabited by a tall and intrepid race of men, fond of war; but little is known of them.

Bissao, bees'-sa-o', one of the largest islands in the archipelago of the Bissagos. Ext. 40 miles long by 30 wide. Pop. 8,000. Lat. 11° 24′ N. Lon. 14° 10′ W. It is the centre of the Portuguese slave-trade, and all the white inhabitants upon it are engaged in the odious traffic.

Bistritz, bees'-treetz, a town of Transylvania, on a small river of the same name, 30 miles from Szamosujvar. Pop. 6,500.—This place is the capital of a district of the same name, which has an area of 530 geographical square miles, and a Pop. of 55,000. It is divided by a branch of the Carpathian mountains, and the climate is pronounced invigorating.

Bitche, beetch, a town and fortress of France, in the department of the Moselle, about 60 miles from Metz. It is situate in a pass of the Vosges, and its fort is on an isolated rock in the middle of the town, mounting, it is said, eighty pieces of cannon, and requiring 1,000 men for its defence. It is deemed almost impregnable. Pop. 4,000. The Prussians unsuccessfully besieged it in 1797.

Bithynia, bi-thin'-e-a, a country of Asia Minor, formerly called Bebrycia. It lay to the south of the Euxine Sea, and was a beautiful and romantic country, intersected by lofty mountains and fertile plains, rich in fruits and wine, and abounding in forests.

Biton, bi'-ton, a Greek mathematician, who wrote a treatise on warlike machines, which is extant in the "Mathematici Veteres," Paris. Lived in the fourth century before Christ.

Bizerta, be-zer'-ta, the most northern town of Africa, in a bay of the same name, 35 miles from Tunis. It has two castles; but these are all but useless as defences, being commanded by the neighbouring heights. Pop. 10,000. Lat. 37° 16′ 36″ N. Lon. 9° 49′ 15″ E.

Bizot, Peter, be'-zo, a French numismatist, who was canon of St. Saviour d'Herrison, and wrote a work entitled "Histoire Médallique de la République de Hollande:" Amsterdam, 1690. B. 1630; D. 1696.

BLACK, Joseph, blăk, an eminent Scotch chemist, who, in 1765, succeeded Dr. Cullen in the chemical chair at Edinburgh. He was the author of several chemical works, and was the discoverer of latent heat, on which subject he issued a pamphlet; but his researches principally appeared in the "Philosophical Transactions of London," and in the "Memoirs of the Royal Society of Edinburgh." James Watt, the inventor of the steam-engine, was greatly indebted to the knowledge of Dr. Black. B. at Bordeaux, of Scotch parents, 1728; D. at Edinburgh, 1799.

BLACKBOURN, William, blăk'-boorn, an English architect, who obtained considerable reputation by his plans for the erection of penitentiary-houses and prisons. B. at Southwark, 1750; D. 1790.

BLACKBURN, blăk'-burn, a market-town and parish of Lancashire, on the Derwent, 22 miles from Manchester. Area, 45,620 acres. The town is irregularly built, but contains many places of worship, a free grammar-school, a charity school for girls, a national and a Lancasterian school, several Sunday schools, a theological academy, a cloth-hall, lying-in hospital, several banks, a horticultural society, an assembly-room, and a theatre. It is a place of considerable commercial importance. Manf. Extensive, principally cotton goods; and coal is abundant in the neighbourhood. Pop. 46,536.—It communicates with Bury, Bolton, and Manchester by railway.

BLACKBURNE, Francis, an English divine, archdeacon of Cleveland, who wrote in favour of religious liberty, and was desirous of removing subscriptions to the Articles of the Church, and remodelling the liturgy so as to embrace every description of Protestant against the Papists. He leaned so much towards the dissenters, that the congregation of Dr. Chandler, on his death, invited him to become their minister, but he declined. His principal work is "The Confessional," which first brought him into notice, and a complete edition of his works was published in 1805, 7 vols. 8vo. B. at Richmond, Yorkshire, 1705; D. 1787.

BLACK FOREST, a mountainous region in the grand duchy of Baden, separating the basins of the Rhine and the Neckar. Desc. Covered almost entirely with wood, and in several parts attaining an elevation of nearly 4,000 feet above the level of the sea. The Feldberg is the highest mountain in West Germany, being 4,675 feet. Rivers. The Danube, Neckar, Murg, Kinzig, and Els, all of which have their sources in this region. Pro. Chiefly timber and live stock. Minerals. Silver, lead, zinc, iron, and copper. Manf. Woollens, wooden clocks, and toys. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. between 47° 30′ and 49° 30′ N. Lon. between 7° 40′ and 9° E.

BLACKHEATH, blăk-heeth', an open and elevated common at the N.W. extremity of Kent. In the vicinity is Morden College, an hospital erected by Sir John Morden, in 1695, for the reception of decayed merchants. Many fine villas stand on the heath, which is crossed by the Roman Watling-street, and which has been the scene of some remarkable events in history. It is a station on the North Kent Railway.

BLACKLOCK, Thomas, blăk'-lok, a Scotch divine and poet, who was the son of a mason, and lost his sight by the small-pox in his infancy. In 1740 he was deprived of his father, who had been particularly attentive to his education; and Dr. Stephenson, a physician of Edinburgh, then placed him at the university, where he made considerable progress in the classics and sciences. In 1762 the earl of Selkirk procured for him a presentation to the church of Kirkcudbright; but the appointment was violently opposed by the congregation, on account of his blindness and the too great elevation and refinement of his preaching. After two years' litigation, he resigned, and retired to Edinburgh on a small annuity. His poems were published in 1754. B. at Annan, 1721; D. at Edinburgh, 1791.

BLACK SEA, the PONTUS EUXINUS of the ancients, washed the shores of Asia Minor on the S., those of Sarmatia on the E. and N., and those of Dacia, Mœsia, and Thracia on the W. Ext. 700 miles, with an average breadth of 240. Area, 172,000 square miles. Desc. It abounds with fish, and receives the waters of more than forty rivers; among which are the Danube, the Dniester, the Dnieper, the Bug, the Don, and the Kuban. It was anciently called Axenus, from Ashkenas, the son of Gomer, who settled on its shores, in Asia Minor. But this origin being forgotten in course of time, the Greeks explained the term by axeinos, 'inhospitalis,' in which they were favoured by the inhospitable and stormy nature of the sea itself, as well as by the savage manners of the people who dwelt around it. In the course of time, however, when their ferocity had been gradually softened by intercourse with foreign nations, and by the numerous colonies which had been planted on their coasts, the name of the sea was changed to euxinos, 'hospitalis.' Its modern name, the Black Sea, has been obtained from the gloomy appearance of its black and rocky shores, covered with dark and impenetrable woods, as well as from the dreadful storms and thick fogs with which it is infested in winter. Lat. between 40° 45′ and 46° 45′ N. Lon. extending from 27° 30′ to 41° 50′ E.—On Nov. 14, 1854, a hurricane swept over this sea, and destroyed a great number of French and British transports, laden with stores for the Anglo-French army then in the Crimea.

BLACKSTONE, Sir William, blăk'-stone, a learned English judge, who, in 1738, was entered at Pembroke College, Oxford, and at the age of 20 composed a treatise on the elements of architecture. He also cultivated poetry, and obtained Mr. Benson's prize medal for the best verses on Milton. These pursuits, however, were abandoned for the study of the law, when he composed his well-known effusion, called "The Lawyer's Farewell to his Muse." In 1740 he was entered at the Middle Temple, and in 1744 chosen fellow of All-souls College. In 1749 he was appointed recorder of Wallingford, in Berkshire, and in the following year became LL.D., and published an "Essay on Collateral Consanguinity," occasioned by the exclusive claim to fellowships made by the founder's kindred at All-souls. In 1758 he printed "Considerations on Copyholders;" and the same year was appointed Vinerian professor of the common law, in which capacity his lectures gave rise to his celebrated Commentaries. In 1759 he published "Reflections on the Opinions of Messrs. Pratt, Moreton, and Wilbraham," relating to Lord Lichfield's disqualification; his lordship being then candidate for the chancellorship. The same year appeared his edition of "The Great Charter, and Charter of the Forest." Of this work it has been said that there is not a sentence in the composition that is not necessary to the whole, and that should not be perused. In 1761 he was made king's counsel, and chosen member of parliament for Hindon, in Wilts. The same year he vacated his fellowship by marriage, and was appointed principal of New-inn Hall. In 1763 he was appointed solicitor-general to the queen, and bencher of the Middle Temple. In the next year appeared the first volume of his "Commentaries," which was followed by three others. It is upon these that his fame now principally rests; and, although opinion is divided as to the correctness and depth of the matter they contain, the beauty, precision, and elegance of their style have called forth universal admiration. In 1766 he resigned his places at Oxford; and in 1768 was chosen member for Westbury, in Wiltshire. In 1770 he became one of the judges in the court of King's Bench, whence he removed to the Common Pleas. He now fixed his residence in London, and attended to the duties of his office with great application, until overtaken by death. B. in London, 1723; D. 1780.—The fundamental error in the "Commentaries" is thus pointed out by Jeremy Bentham. "There are two characters," says he, "one or other of which every man who finds anything to say on the subject of law may be said to take upon him,—that of the expositor, and that of the censor. To the province of the expositor it belongs to explain to us what he supposes the law is; to that of the censor, to observe to us what he thinks it ought to be. Of these two perfectly distinguishable functions, the former alone is that which it fell necessarily within our author's province to discharge." Blackstone, however, makes use of both these functions throughout his work, and hence the confusion. His productions have found several translators on the continent.

BLACKWALL, blăk-wawl', a suburb of London, on the

E. side of the Thames, 4 miles from St. Paul's. Pop. 29,384.—Here are the East and West India docks and shipbuilding-yards. This suburb is connected with London by a railway, raised above the streets to almost a level with the roofs of the houses, on a brick viaduct. It is noted for its whitebait, a small and delicate fish, caught off here in the Thames.

BLACK WATER, two rivers in Ireland; one in the county of Cork, rising near Killarney, and falling into the sea at Youghal, and the other traversing the counties of Armagh and Tyrone, and falling into Lough Neagh.

BLACKWELL'S ISLAND, blăk'-wels, is in the East River, opposite New York, in the United States, and is the seat of the penitentiary and a lunatic asylum.

BLACKWOOD, Sir Henry, blăk'-wood, a brave British admiral, who entered the navy in his eleventh year, and was present at the engagement off the Dogger Bank. When hostilities began with the French in 1793, he was made first-lieutenant in the Invincible man-of-war; and when "the glorious first of June" of 1794 arrived, he fought with such gallantry that he was promoted to the rank of commander. In 1798 he became captain of the Brilliant, of twenty-eight guns; and off the island of Teneriffe, defeated two French frigates, each of them nearly double his strength. He continued to be actively engaged till he was appointed to the Penelope, of thirty-six guns, serving under Lords Keith and Nelson, Sir Sydney Smith, and other distinguished commanders. At Trafalgar he was captain of the Euryalus, and was present at the death of the heroic Nelson, whose last words to him were, "God bless you, Blackwood, I shall never see you more." In 1806 he was appointed to the command of the Ajax, of eighty guns, which, on the night of the 14th of February, 1807, took fire, and went down, carrying half of her crew along with her. Sir Henry was saved with the greatest difficulty. He now commanded the Warspite, and continued throughout the war to be constantly employed against the enemy. In 1814 he was made captain of the fleet, and was deputed to convey to this country the allied sovereigns. On this occasion he was promoted to the rank of rear-admiral, and made a baronet. In 1819 he became commander-in-chief of the naval forces in India, and in 1827 was elevated to the command at Chatham. B. 1770; D. 1832.

BLADEN, Martin, blā'-den, a lieutenant-colonel under the duke of Marlborough, to whom he dedicated a translation of "Cæsar's Commentaries." He sat in five parliaments, and in 1715 was made comptroller of the Mint, and in 1717 commissioner of trade and plantations. D. 1746.—Besides translating the "Commentaries," he was the author of "Orpheus and Eurydice," a masque; and "Solon," a tragi-comedy.

BLADENSBURG, blā'-dens-burg, a village of the United States, on the banks of the Potomac, 7 miles from Washington. Here, in August, 1814, the Americans were defeated in a battle by the British.

BLAIR, Robert, blair, an ingenious Scotch poet, and the minister of Athelstaneford, in East Lothian, Scotland. He is known to fame as being the author of "The Grave," in which is the often-quoted sentiment of "Angels' visits few and far between." B. at Edinburgh, 1699; D. 1747.

BLAIR, John, a learned Scotch chronologist, who, in 1754, published his "Chronological Tables," folio, which were well received, and reached a second edition in 1768. He subsequently was appointed mathematical tutor to the duke of York, and in consequence obtained several church preferments, the principal of which was a prebend of Westminster. B. at Edinburgh; D. 1782.—Sir Henry Ellis, principal librarian in the British Museum, edited an edition of the Chronology of this author in 1844.

BLAIR, Hugh, an eminent Scottish divine, was the son of a merchant of Edinburgh, where he received his education. While yet a student, he formed a comprehensive scheme of chronological tables for his own use, which being communicated to his learned friend John Blair, mentioned above, were improved and extended by the latter into a work of great labour and value. In 1739 he took the degree of M.A., and in 1741 was licensed to preach. The year following he was ordained to the parish of Colessie in Fife, and to the charge of the Canongate church at Edinburgh, where he officiated till 1758, when he was removed to the High Church, which was the most important ecclesiastical charge in Scotland. The university of St. Andrews conferred on him, in 1757, the degree of D.D., and in 1759 he began a course of lectures on rhetoric and belles-lettres, which were so much applauded, that in 1762 George III. endowed a professorship for him at Edinburgh, with a salary of 70*l.* a year. In 1763 he wrote a dissertation on the poems of Ossian, in which he urged many ingenious observations in behalf of their authenticity. In 1777 a volume of his sermons appeared, which attained so rapid a sale as to induce the author to publish another volume in 1779, which was as well received as the former; and these were subsequently followed by three volumes more. In 1780 he obtained a pension from the crown of £200 a year, and three years afterwards he quitted his professorship through infirmities; but his salary was continued to him for life, and an addition of £100 a year was made to his pension. At that time he published his lectures, which have had an immense circulation, and, as has been the case with his sermons, have been translated into various languages. B. at Edinburgh, 1718; D. 1800.

BLAIR ATHOL, or ATHOL, ăth'-ol, a village and parish in Perthshire, Scotland, 30 miles from Perth. Area, 312 square miles. Pop. 2,084. This parish contains the mountains Benygloe and Bendearg, which are respectively 3,725 and 3,550 feet above the level of the sea. In it is also the castle of Blair-Athol, the pass of Killiecrankie, and Athol forest.

BLAKE, Robert, blaik, one of England's most skilful and intrepid naval and military commanders, was educated at Oxford, where, in 1617, he took the degree of B.A. In 1640 he represented Bridgewater in parliament, and at the beginning of the civil war took part with the Parliamentarians, and served under Colonel Fiennes at Bristol, when that town was taken by Prince Rupert. He afterwards assisted in taking Taunton by surprise, and of this place he was made governor, and in 1645 defended it against Goring with such bravery for two successive sieges, that he was publicly thanked and rewarded by Parliament. In 1649 he was appointed commander of the fleet in conjunction with Deane and Popham; and soon afterwards sailed in search of Prince Rupert, whose fleet he blockaded in Kinsale harbour. The prince afterwards escaping to Lisbon, he was there followed by Blake, who demanded leave of the king of Portugal to attack him, and, being refused, he took several of the Portuguese ships coming home from Brazil laden with treasure. During his absence Prince Rupert made sail to the Mediterranean, whither he was followed by Blake, who attacked him in the harbour of Malaga, and destroyed nearly the whole of his fleet. After this he returned to England with several prizes, again receiving the thanks of Parliament, by whom he was also made warden of the Cinque Ports. Soon after this he reduced the Scilly isles, Guernsey, and Jersey, for which he was again thanked by the House and appointed one of the council of state. On the prospect of a war with the Dutch in 1652, he was appointed sole admiral of the fleet, and was attacked in the Downs by Van Tromp, who had 45 sail, whilst Blake had only 23. He fought, however, with such determination, that the Dutch admiral was glad to retreat. In the November following, Van Tromp sailed into the Downs, with above 80 men of war, and off the Goodwin Sands, on the 29th of that month, an obstinate battle was fought between him and Blake, who had only half his force, and who was compelled to run with his shattered ships into the Thames. It was on this occasion that Van Tromp passed through the English Channel with a broom at his maintop, signifying that he had swept the sea of the English ships. In February, 1653, Blake was enabled to put to sea with 80 men of war, and off Cape la Hogue fell in with the Dutch, who had an equal number and 300 merchantmen under convoy. A most bloody engagement ensued, which lasted three days, and in which the Dutch lost 11 men of war and 30 merchant vessels, whilst the English lost only one ship. In June following the fleets of the belligerent admirals fought again off the Foreland; and the Dutch sustaining a severe defeat, barely saved themselves in the shallow waters of Calais,

In 1654 Blake sailed into the Mediterranean, where he demolished the castle of Tunis because the dey refused to deliver up the English whom he held as captives. A squadron of his ships, also, under the command of Captain Stayner, intercepted a Spanish Plate fleet, and took the admiral, vice-admiral, and two galleons. Blake having received information that another Plate fleet lay at Santa Cruz, in Teneriffe, sailed thither, and notwithstanding the strength of the place, boldly went in, burnt the ships, and came out with comparatively little loss, whilst the slaughter of the Spaniards was immense. For this he again received the thanks of Parliament, and was presented with a diamond ring worth £500. He soon afterwards returned to his station at Cadiz, but his ill health inspired him with a strong desire to return to England; and accordingly he set sail for his native land, but died as his ship was entering Plymouth harbour, August 27, 1657. His body was interred in Henry the Seventh's chapel, Westminster Abbey, whence it was removed at the Restoration, and buried in St. Margaret's churchyard. B. at Bridgewater, 1599.

BLANC, MONT, blang, the highest mountain in Europe, belonging to the Alps of Savoy. Height, 15,777 feet. Lat. 45° 49′ 58″ N. Lon. 6° 51′ 54″ E.—On the 8th August, 1786, this mountain was first ascended by Paccard. Since that time, however, many ascents have been made, and in 1851, Mr. Albert Smith, an English litterateur, having climbed the mountain, undertook, by the aid of painted scenes and dioramas, to explain the operation to the English public. This entertainment was entirely successful, having been presented, with various additions and alterations, more than a thousand times up to its close in 1858. (See ALPS.)

BLANC, Louis, a talented French political and historical writer, who, in 1839, established a paper in Paris, called "La Revue du Progrès," intended to be the organ of certain democratic sections of the French community then in existence. In 1840 his work on the "Organization of Labour" appeared, advocating the doctrine that men should labour for the community, rather than for themselves, and that they should be remunerated in accordance with their wants by a central government under a chosen administration. These principles enjoyed an ephemeral popularity even in England, which, however, was soon at an end. After the revolution of 1848 he was elected a member of the provisional government, and was principally instrumental in abolishing the punishment of death for political offences. In the same year he was compelled to leave his country, when he took refuge in London. B. at Paris, 1813.—Louis Blanc has written a "History of the Ten Years," from 1830 to 1840; and is at present engaged on a "History of the French Revolution," eight volumes of which have already appeared.

BLANCHARD, Laman, blănch'-ard, a various and frequent contributor to English periodical literature. His first work was entitled the "Lyric Offering," which was published in 1828, and in 1831 he became editor of the "New Monthly Magazine." He was afterwards editor of the "True Sun" newspaper, and was subsequently on the staff of several other papers, and at his death assisted in conducting the "Examiner." B. at Great Yarmouth, 1803. Put an end to his life in London, 1845.

BLANCHE of Castile, blansh, queen of France, was the daughter of Alphonso IX., king of Castile, and in 1200 married Louis VIII. of France, by whom she had nine sons and two daughters. On the death of her husband in 1226, she became regent, her son Louis (afterwards Louis IX.) being only twelve years old. In this position, aided by Cardinal Romain, she acted with firmness and prudence, and defeated several attempts made against her and the government. The education of the young king she sedulously promoted, and he was early married to the daughter of the count of Provence. During the expedition of St. Louis to the Holy Land, she also governed the kingdom with great discretion; but the news of his defeat and imprisonment so affected her spirits, that she died in 1252. B. 1197.—Blanche was equally noted for her beauty as her wisdom. Thibaut, count of Champagne, was greatly enamoured of her, and sang her charms in his verses.

BLANCO, CAPE, blăn'-ko, the name of various capes in different parts of the world, the principal being on the west coast of Africa. Lat. 20° 46′ 55″ N. Lon. 16° 58′ 6″ W.

BLANDFORD, or BLANDFORD FORUM, blăn'-ford, a neat and well-built town and parish in Dorsetshire, on the river Stour, 17 miles from Dorchester. Manf. Principally buttons. Pop. nearly 3,000.

BLARNEY, blar'-ne, a village of Ireland, 4 miles from Cork. It has few inhabitants, but is remarkable for having in its neighbourhood what is called the "Blarney Stone," the kissing of which is said to confer upon the Irish an eloquent power in the language of courtship.

BLASTUS, blăs-tus, 'one that sprouts or brings forth,' the chamberlain of Herod Agrippa.

BLAUBEREN, blow-bair'-en, a town of Wurtemburg, on the Blau, 10 miles from Ulm. Pop. 1,700.—The French, in 1800, here defeated the Austrians.

BLAYE, blai, an old town of France, in Guienne, on the Gironde, 21 miles from Bordeaux. Pop. 3,389.—Here, in 1833, the duchess de Berry was imprisoned. (See BERRY, DUCHESS OF.)

BLEDDYN, bled'-in, an ancient British prince, who reigned, with his brother Rhiwallon, in North Wales, till 1068, when he ruled alone. Fell in battle in 1072. Bleddyn was an active prince, and framed a code of good laws.

BLEDDYN, a British bard, many of whose pieces are in the Welsh Archæology.—Flourished in the 13th century.

BLEECK, Peter Van, blesk, an eminent painter, who executed the celebrated picture of Johnson and Griffin, two famous comedians, in the characters of Ananias and Tribulation, in the "Alchymist." D. in London, 1764.

BLEIBACH, blī'-bak, a village in Illyria, 8 miles from Bleiberg. Pop. about 6,000.—Here are lead-mines, which annually yield from 33,000 to 35,000 cwt. of mineral.

BLE'NEAU, blei'-no, a village of France, 30 miles from Auxerre. Pop. 1,400.—Here, in 1652, Marshal Turenne defeated the prince of Condé.

BLENHEIM, or BLINDHEIM, blen'-him, a village of Bavaria, in the circle of the Upper Danube, 8 miles from Donawert. It gives name to a great battle fought in its vicinity, on the 13th August, 1704, by the English and Imperialists, under the duke of Marlborough, with the French and Bavarians, under Marshal Tallard, Count Marsin, and the elector of Bavaria; the latter being completely defeated. In this celebrated battle 10,000 French and Bavarians were left dead on the field, the greater part of thirty squadrons of horse and dragoons perished in the Danube, and about 13,000 (including Marshal Tallard), and many other officers of distinction, were made prisoners. On the other side, about 4,500 men were killed, and about 8,000 wounded. This battle is known on the continent as the battle of Hochstadt.

BLENHEIM PARK, formerly Woodstock Park, near Woodstock, Oxfordshire, which was presented, together with a magnificent palace and grounds, to the first duke of Marlborough, by the nation, in commemoration of the above-mentioned victory. Area of the park, 2,940 acres.

BLESS, Henry, bless, an historical and landscape painter, whose pieces are called owl-pictures, because he placed that bird as a mark. B. in Bovine, near Dinant, 1480; D. 1550.

BLESSINGTON, Marguerite, countess of, bles'-sing-ton, was the third daughter of a Mr. Edmund Power, whose fortunes were entirely dissipated by a reckless extravagance. She, in her 15th year, was married to a Captain Farmer, with whom she led a very unhappy life, and whose house she left. Subsequently, he, in a state of intoxication, fell from a window in the King's Bench prison, and was killed. Four months after this event she married the earl of Blessington, and after passing a few years in the enjoyment of every luxury, she and her husband in 1822 set out on a continental tour, which was prolonged to the death of the earl, which took place in 1829. In 1827 Count D'Orsay had married a daughter of Lord Blessington by his first wife; but this marriage proving unhappy, they separated, and he, after the death of the earl, continued to live with Lady Blessington during the remainder of her life. After the decease of the earl, she came to London, where, for twenty years, her salons were as popular as those of Holland House, and were the resort of all the celebrated men of the day. To support her expenditure, she entered upon a career of authorship, which knew little relaxation throughout the remainder of her life. She wrote "Conversations with Lord Byron," several novels, an endless number of tales and sketches; edited Heath's "Book of Beauty," "the Keepsake," "Gems of Beauty;" and also contributed to the columns of the Daily News, and those of the Sunday Times. With all this industry, however, she could not support her extravagance, and, in 1849, the costly furniture of Gore House had to be sold. Count D'Orsay, in the hope of getting employment under Louis Napoleon, went to Paris, where he died in 1852. The countess had followed him in April, 1849, and shortly afterwards suddenly expired. B. near Clonmel, Ireland, 1799; D. at Paris, 1849.

BLIGH, William, bli, a seaman, who, when a lieutenant, was appointed to the command of the ship Bounty, in which he made a voyage to Otaheite for the purpose of obtaining bread-fruit plants and others, to be transported to the islands of the West Indies. A mutiny took place on board his ship, when he and eighteen others were cast adrift in an open boat, in which, after sailing upwards of 3,500 miles, they arrived at the island of Timor without having lost a man. Bligh subsequently reached England, and narrated the history of his adventures, when he was again sent out to the South Seas, and carried out the object of his original mission. In 1806 he was appointed governor of New South Wales, but the wildness of his conduct and the severity of his measures caused him to be arrested by order of the civil and military officers of the colony, which ended his government. B. 1753; D. 1817. —The mutiny of the Bounty was made use of by Lord Byron for some of the passages in his poem of "the Island." (For the fate of the mutineers of the Bounty, see ADAMS, John.)

BLOCH, Mark Eleazar, blok, a German naturalist, who practised medicine at Berlin, and was a member of the Society of the Curiosities of Nature. He wrote a "Natural History of Fishes," with 432 plates, which has been translated into French, and forms 12 vols. folio. It is one of the finest works of its kind. B. at Unspach, 1723; D. at Carlstad, Bohemia, 1799.

BLOEMART, blo'-mart, a family of Flemish painters and engravers, of whom the best known is Cornelius. He went to Paris, 1630, and executed the engravings for the "Temple of the Muses." He afterwards went to Rome, and he is the head of the school which produced the Natalis, Rousselet, &c.

BLOIS, blwaw, an ancient city of France, in the department of the Loire and Cher, on the Loire, 100 miles from Paris. The streets are narrow, and many of the houses low. The castle, intimately connected with many events in French history, stands on a rock overhanging the river. The principal public buildings are the cathedral, the Jesuits' college (now a provincial school), the episcopal palace; and it has a public library with 20,000 vols. Manf. Serge, stamine, and other cloths, as well as hardware and glass. It has, besides, a trade in wine, brandy, corn, timber, and fruit. Pop. about 18,000.—Before the time of Gregory of Tours, the French historian, who lived in the 6th century, this was an important place. Thibaut, count de Chartres, took possession of it in the reign of Charles the Simple, and his successors held it till the time of Guy II., who, in 1391, sold his possessions to the duke of Orleans. Blois thence became the favourite residence of the Valois family. Louis XII. was born, and Francis I., Charles IX., and Henry III. resided here. During the religious wars of the 16th century, Blois was, in 1576 and 1588, the seat of the States-general. At the meeting in 1576, Jean Bodin defended the royal prerogatives against the growing power of the League; but, unable to defeat it, Henry III. was obliged to put himself at its head. Again convoked after the "day of the barricades," 1588, the States made the "edict of union" a "state law," and called the duke de Guise to the supreme power; but Henry III. caused him to be assassinated in the castle of Blois. In 1814 the empress Maria Louisa retired here, and thence her last decrees were dated.

BLOMFIELD, blom'-feeld, Charles James, bishop of London, was the son of a schoolmaster, and received his university education at Trinity College, Cambridge. He was distinguished by his classical, critical, and philological abilities. In 1824 he was raised from the rectory of St. Botolph, Bishopsgate, to the episcopal bench as bishop of Chester; and, in 1828, succeeded Bishop Howley as bishop of London. From that time he exerted himself to extend the influence of the Church, and in the discussion of all ecclesiastical subjects took a prominent part in the House of Lords. B. at Bury St. Edmunds, 1786; D. 1857.—He edited, with commentaries, an edition of the tragedies of Æschylus.

BLONDEL, blon-del', a favourite minstrel of Richard I., Cœur-de-Lion, who, on being made prisoner and thrown into a German dungeon, on his return from the Crusades, was accidentally discovered by Blondel singing, beneath the walls of his prison, the first part of a lay of their joint composition. Lived in the 12th century.

BLOOD, Colonel Thomas, blud, originally an officer in Cromwell's army, and who has rendered himself famous by his extraordinary exploits. One of these was the seizing of the duke of Ormond with an intent to hang him at Tyburn; from which fate his grace was delivered by his servants. A second was the stealing of the crown and other regalia from the Tower. In this daring enterprise he was taken disguised as a clergyman. Charles II. caused him to be brought before him; and, in his presence, Blood confessed that he had once formed a design against his life, but that the sight of his majesty awed him so greatly, that he desisted from its execution. The king granted him a pardon, and gave him an estate of £500 a year in Ireland; but for what reason, or upon what principle of justice, history has never yet explained. D. 1680.

BLOOMFIELD, Robert, bloom'-feeld, was the son of a tailor, and himself a shoemaker, in which capacity he composed "the Farmer's Boy," a beautiful didactic poem, in which the scenes of rustic labour are truthfully described. He was patronized by Capel Loft, Esq., who brought out his poem in 1800. The admiration which it excited is attested by the fact of 26,000 copies having been sold in three years. He wrote several other effusions, but his first was the best. B. at Bury St. Edmunds, 1766; D. at Shefferd, Bedfordshire, 1823.

BLOUNT, Charles, blount, Lord Mountjoy and earl of Devonshire, was the second son of James Lord Mountjoy. His person and accomplishments attracted the notice of Queen Elizabeth, who conferred on him the honour of knighthood; and some of our readers will remember the manner in which he is introduced, among the courtiers of that queen, in Sir Walter Scott's "Kenilworth." In 1594 he was made governor of Portsmouth, and succeeded his brother in the peerage, assembling some troops, with which he served in the Netherlands and in Brittany; but the queen was displeased at his absence, and ordered him to remain at court. She made him knight of the Garter in 1597, and gave him a military appointment in Ireland, where he suppressed a rebellion. In 1603 he returned to England, bringing with him Tyrone, the rebel chieftain. Subsequently, James I. created him earl of Devonshire, and made him master of the ordnance. Towards the close of his life he fell into disgrace, by marrying the divorced Lady Rich, daughter of Essex. B. 1563; D. 1606.

BLUCHER, Field-Marshal Lebrecht Von, bloo'-ker, a distinguished Prussian general, whose bravery and boldness procured him the sobriquet of "Marshal Forward." In his fourteenth year he entered the Swedish service as an ensign, and fought against the Prussians in "the Seven Years' War." He was made a prisoner, when he was persuaded to enter the Prussian service, in which he was afterwards to become so distinguished. He soon rose to a senior captaincy, but, taking disgust at the system which promoted an inferior officer of merit over him, he requested permission to retire, which was granted by his eccentric sovereign Frederick the Great. He now became a farmer in Silesia, where, by industry, he accumulated a good estate, upon which he seemed likely to settle for life, as he had already passed fifteen years in getting it together. In 1786, however, Frederick-William succeeded to the throne of Prussia, when he was courteously recalled to the army, invested with the rank of major in his old regiment of Black Hussars, and began to serve against the French. In 1789 he received the order of Merit; and, in 1793-4, fought at the battles of Orchies, Luxembourg, Oppenheim, Frankenstein, Kirchweiller, and Edesheim. In 1802 he possessed himself of Erfurt and Muhlhausen; and, in the same year, after the battle of Jena, made a successful retreat before Soult, Murat, and Bernadotte, although ultimately forced to capitulate, only upon the condition, stated in writing, of being "without ammunition and provisions." Being now a prisoner of the French, he was exchanged for General Victor; and, in 1813, was again in the field, at the head of a combined force of Prussians and Russians. At the battles of Lutzen, Bautzen, and Haynau he greatly distinguished himself, and received, in acknowledgment, the order of St. George, from the emperor Alexander of Russia. In 1813 he held the undivided command of 60,000 men, with whom he defeated Marshals Ney, Macdonald, Sebastiani, and Lauriston, and contributed greatly to the victorious results of the battle of Leipzig. In 1814 he took possession of Nancy; and, at Brienne, withstood a determined attack from Napoleon I. In the same year he entered Paris, and would have taken a dreadful revenge upon its inhabitants, had he not been restrained by Wellington and the other generals. He now wore upon his breast all the insignia of all the illustrious orders of Europe, and the king of Prussia created a new one for his especial honour. Its symbol was a cross of iron, as the sign of his invincible courage. At this time he visited England, where he had the academical degree of LL.D. conferred on him by the university of Oxford. After this he returned to his country, and retired to his Silesian estate. In 1815, however, the escape of Napoleon from Elba summoned him once more to the battle-field, and he took command of the Prussian army in Belgium. He was defeated, with great loss, at Ligny, on the 16th of June, when his horse was shot under him, and when he himself lay, covered by the animal, until several regiments of French cuirassiers had passed over him. He was reported dead to Napoleon; but le vieux diable, 'the old devil,' Napoleon's name for him, appeared at the close of the battle of Waterloo, and inflicted a terrific slaughter upon the flying French. After this crowning triumph, he once more retired to his château in Silesia, where his sovereign visited him in his latest moments. "I know I shall die," said the veteran; "I am not sorry for it, seeing that I am now no longer of any use." B. at Rostock, on the Baltic, 1742; D. at Krulowitz, Silesia, 1819.

BLUE FIELDS, a river of the Mosquito territory, Central America, falling into an inlet of the Caribbean Sea, after a course of several hundred miles. At its mouth is a town of the same name, where is the residence of the king, and which commands the entrance of the harbour.

BLUE MOUNTAINS, a range of mountains in Australia and New Holland, N.W. of Port Jackson.

BLUE RIDGE, the easternmost ridge of the Alleghany Mountains, in Pennsylvania and Virginia, U.S., about 130 miles from the Atlantic. (See ALLEGHANY or APALLACHIAN MOUNTAINS.)

BLUMENBACH, Johann Friedrich, bloo'-men-bak, a distinguished German anatomist and physiologist, who in 1775 published a work on the "Varieties of the Human Race," which fixed his fame. In 1776 he became extraordinary professor of medicine in the university of Gottingen; and from that time devoted himself to the promotion of the sciences in connection with medicine, anatomy, and physiology. He published numerous works, and in 1812 was appointed secretary to the Royal Society of Sciences at Gottingen. In 1816 he was made physician to the king of Great Britain and Holland; and in 1821 a knight commander of the Guelphic order. In 1831 he was elected a member of the Academy of Sciences of Paris. B. at Gotha, 1752; D. 1840.

BLYTH, blythe, four rivers of England; one of which falls into the German Ocean, near Southwold; another into the river Tame, Warwickshire; another into the North Sea, at Blyth, Northumberland; another into the Trent, about 5 miles from Rugeley.

BLYTH, a seaport-town of Northumberland, at the mouth of the Blythe, 11 miles from Newcastle. The chief trade is in coals and salt. Pop. 2,060.

BLYTH, a market-town and parish of England, 3 miles from Nottingham. Area, 17,070 acres. Pop. about 4,000.

BOADICEA, bo'-a-dis'-e-a, or bo-a-di-se'-a, an ancient British queen, the wife of Prasatagus, king of the Iceni, who, for the security of his family, made the Roman emperor co-heir with his daughters. On this, the Roman officers took possession of his palace, gave the princesses up to the brutality of the soldiers, and scourged the queen in public. Boadicea, roused to revenge, assembled her countrymen and stormed Camalodunum (the present Colchester), and put its garrison to the sword. Subsequently Suetonius Paulinus defeated the Britons, and Boadicea either fell among the slain or poisoned herself after her defeat, A.D. 60.

BOANERGES, bo'-a-ner'-ges, 'sons of thunder,' a title given to James and John, as zealous preachers.

BOAZ, bo'-az, 'alacrity,' a wealthy citizen of Bethlehem, who married Ruth.

BOCCACIO, John, bok-ka'-che-o, a celebrated Italian writer, the son of a Florentine merchant, and who, when young, became intimate with the poet Petrarch. He resided a long time at Naples, where he fell in love with the natural daughter of the king, and where the sight of the tomb of Virgil determined his future vocation. His "La Teseide," written in octave-syllabic measure, was the first chivalrous poem in the Italian language. Chaucer borrowed from it his "Knight's Tale," to which Dryden gave a new name, and re-cast it as "Palamon and Arcite." He wrote several other poems; but the work upon which his fame rests is the "Decamerone," consisting of one hundred tales, ten of which are supposed to be told in the afternoons of ten successive days, by a party of three young men and seven young women. The stories chiefly consist of love-intrigues, and are of a licentious character. B. at Certaldo, in Tuscany, 1313; D. at Certaldo, 1375.—Boccacio and Petrarch were the revivers of classical learning in Italy, and the former may justly be considered as the father of Italian prose in its purer state; for, although he is chiefly known as an admirable story-teller, yet he, at the same time, was a learned man, and wrote several treatises on classical subjects, and was the first to introduce into Italy copies of the Iliad and Odyssey. Of Boccacio's works many editions and translations have been published.

BOCCAGE, Maria Anne le Page, a French poetess, who at the age of 16 married Peter Joseph du Boccage. At an early period she displayed a taste for poetry, and acquired the friendship of several eminent literary characters; amongst whom were Voltaire, Heinault, and Montesquieu. In 1746 she obtained a prize from the academy at Rouen; and contended for another given by the French Academy for a eulogium on Louis XV.; but on this occasion succumbed to Marmontel. She published a poem entitled "Paradis Terrestre," taken from Milton, and translated the "Death of Abel." B. at Rouen, 1710; D. 1802.

Boccanera, bok'-ka-nair'-a, the name of a noble Italian family, who figured in Italian history during the 13th and 14th centuries. One of them, Simon, was the first doge or duke of Genoa, being elected in 1339. D. of poison, 1362. (See Genoa.)

Boccherini, bok-ker-e'-ne, a musical composer, who excelled in symphonies, in which he was the precursor of Haydn. The king of Spain attached him to his court, and he settled at Madrid. B. at Lucca, 1740; D. 1805.—Continental critics say that his compositions are of so religious a kind, that if the Almighty wished to listen to mundane music, he would choose Boccherini's.

Bocchetta, bok-ket'-ta, a celebrated pass of the Apennines, the key of the route from Novi to Genoa, and from which a magnificent view may be had of the surrounding scenery. Redoubts were raised here by the Imperialists in 1746, and the French passed the defile in 1796.

Boccold, John, bok'-kold, commonly called John of Leyden, li'-den, a fanatic tailor of that city, who associated himself with Mathias, a baker of Haarlem. They, at the head of a rabble of Anabaptists, made themselves masters of the city of Munster. Here, however, they were besieged by the bishop, and Mathias being slain in a sally, Boccold succeeded him, assuming the regal and prophetic character. He set up a government modelled according to a perversion of scriptural declarations, and called himself king of Sion. He allowed a plurality of wives, and took fourteen to himself; one of whom he put to death for questioning his divine authority. The city being taken, Boccold was hanged, in the 26th year of his age. This happened in 1536.

Bochart, bok'-ar, a celebrated Oriental scholar, who was a minister at Caen, Normandy. He was versed in most of the Eastern languages,—Hebrew, Syriac, Chaldean, Arabic, Ethiopian, &c. Christina of Sweden, wishing to see him, he in 1652 went to Stockholm, where he was received with great honours. He died suddenly at Caen, in 1667, whilst arguing against Huet in the academy there. He is the author of many works; of which the principal are, "Sacred Geography," "History of the Animals of Scripture," "An Account of the Minerals, Plants, and Precious Stones of the Bible." B. at Rouen, 1599.

Bochim, bo'-kim, 'weepers,' a place where the Israelites assembled after the death of Joshua.

Bock, Jerome, bok, called also Le Bouc, a German naturalist, one of the fathers of botany, being the first who attempted a natural classification of plants, and to seek under their modern names those mentioned in the Bible. B. at Heidelbach, 1498; D. at Hornbach, 1554.

Bodley, Sir Thomas, the patron of the Bodleian Library at Oxford, and from whom it derives its name, was, in 1564, chosen fellow of Merton College, Oxford, and served the offices of public orator and proctor. He was subsequently employed by Queen Elizabeth in several embassies; but, in 1597, falling into disgrace, he determined to retire from public life, and the same year began to restore the University Library of Oxford. That noble fabric was almost wholly rebuilt by him, and furnished with a great number of books collected at a considerable expense, and at his death he bequeathed nearly his whole property for its support and augmentation. By this means the Bodleian Library has come to be the first of its kind in the world. On the accession of James I. he received the honour of knighthood. B. at Exeter in 1544; D. at Oxford in 1612, and was buried in the chapel of Merton College.

Bodmin, bod'-min, a market-town and parish of Cornwall, 26 miles from Plymouth. It principally consists of one wide street, extending nearly a mile from E. to W. It has a spacious church, a county jail, a bridewell, and a lunatic asylum. Pop. 4,705.

Boece, or Boethius, Hector, bo-e'-the-us, a Scotch historian, who, on the foundation of King's College, Aberdeen, by Archbishop Elphinstone, was appointed the first principal. In gratitude for this honour, he, on the death of that prelate, wrote his life, with an account of his predecessors in that see. But his greatest work is the History of Scotland, in Latin, which is written in an elegant style, although full of legendary tales and perverted facts. B. at Dundee in 1470; D. 1536, and was buried near the tomb of Bishop Elphinstone, in the chapel of his college.

Bœotia, be-o'-she-a, a country of Greece, forming a part of the modern Livadia. It was called Bœotia, according to some, from Bœotus, son of Itonus; or, according to others, from bous, 'an ox,' owing to Cadmus having been led by an ox to the spot where he built Thebes. Its inhabitants were noted for their natural dullness and stupidity, even to a proverb (Boiötia us); yet it will be found that no single province in Greece, save Attica, could furnish a list of poets and other writers in which are included such names as Hesiod, Corinna, Pindar, and Plutarch.

Boerhaave, Herman, boor'-haf, a celebrated physician, who was educated at the university of Leyden, with a view to the ministry, and in 1689 took his degree of Doctor of Philosophy. In two discourses he had refuted the doctrines of Epicurus and Spinosa, by which he raised his character for piety and learning. Subsequently, however, a report spread that he had become a disciple of Spinosa, and which, although untrue, determined him to renounce the ministry, and adopt medicine for his profession. In 1701 he read lectures upon the institutes of physic; and in 1709 was appointed professor of medicine and botany. In 1714 he was chosen rector of the university, and displayed so much spirit against Cartesianism, as to rouse the resentment of the friends of that system against him, particularly a theological professor at Franeker, who charged Boerhaave with being a deist; for which the furious divine was obliged, by his own university, to make an apology. In 1713 he was nominated professor of chemistry, a science which he greatly improved. In 1715 he was appointed rector of the university of Leyden and physician to the hospital of St. Augustine. His fame had now spread over the world. He was chosen a member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, and of the Royal Society of London; and a Chinese mandarin is said to have written him a letter with this direction, "To the illustrious Boerhaave, physician, in Europe." B. at Voorhout, near Leyden, 1668; D. in 1738.—Boerhaave was the most distinguished physician of his age, and wrote a great many works upon those sciences in close connection with his profession. He excelled as an illustrative experimentalist, and it is said that he had such unwearied patience, that he performed one experiment 300 and another 877 times.

Boethius, or Boetius, bo-e'-the-us, Anitius Manlius Torquatus Severinus, a Roman philosopher, who was descended from a patrician family, and who in 510 was advanced to the consulship. He was a profound scholar, and well versed in mathematical learning. He defended the Catholic faith against the Arians, and for his zeal in defence of Albinus, a senator, Theodoric, king of Italy, sent him prisoner to the tower of Pavia, where he wrote his immortal book, entitled "Consolation of Philosophy," which has passed through numerous editions, and was translated into Anglo-Saxon by King Alfred. B. at Rome, 455; beheaded in prison, in Pavia, 526. In 996 Otho III. erected to his memory, in the church of St. Augustine, in Pavia, a monument, which existed till the last century, when the church was destroyed.

Bogli poor, bog-le-poor', the capital of a district of the same name in British India, on the Ganges, 104 miles from Moorshedabad. It is a handsome and flourishing town. Pop. 30,000.—The district is watered by the Ganges, and is supposed to be inhabited by the aborigines of Hindostan. Area, 8,270 square miles. Pop. 2,019,900. Lat. between 24° and 26° N. Lon. between 86° and 89° E.

Bogota, bo-go'-ta, the capital of the republic of New Grenada, S. America, situate on a plateau nearly 9,000 feet above the level of the sea. Nearly one half of this city is occupied by religious buildings, and it is parcelled out into large squares, in which there are several palaces, a theatre, a mint, a barracks, and some convents. It has, besides, a university, and the river San Francisco runs through it. In its neighbourhood are coal-fields and salt-mines. Pop. 40,000.—An earthquake seriously damaged this town in 1826.

BOGOTA, RIO DE, a large river of S. America, rising near the city of Santa Fé, and, running through a narrow glen of 40 miles long, forms the cataract of Tequendama, 900 feet high.

BOHEMIA, bo-he'-me-a, a kingdom of Europe, forming part of the Austrian dominions, and comprised in the Germanic confederation, is situate nearly in the heart of Germany. It has Bavaria on the W., the kingdom of Saxony on the N., Silesia and Moravia on the E., and Austria proper on the S. Ext. Its greatest length from E. to W. is 210, with a breadth from N. to S. of 171 miles. Area, 20,223 square miles. Divisions or Circles. This country is divided into the following sixteen circles, exclusive of the metropolis, Prague, which ranks as a separate district: Buntzlau, Königingratz, Bitschow, Chrudim, Czaslau, Budweis, Tabor, Prachin, Pilsen, Klattau, Saatz, Elnbogen (including the small district of Egra), Leutmeritz, Rakonitz, Beraun, and Kaurzim. Desc. Bohemia is separated into nearly two equal parts by the river Moldau, and forms an inclosed plateau, traversed by various off-shoots from the lofty mountains with which it is surrounded. These are the Rasenberg, or Giant Mountains, on the N.; the Suderengebirge on the N.E.; the Bohmerwald on the S.W.; and the Erzgeberge, or Ore Mountains, in the N.W. Rivers. The Moldau and the Elbe, of which Bohemia forms the upper basin, and to which all its streams are affluents. There are on the right the Isar, and on the left the Aussе, Mettau, Moldau, Erlitz, and Eger. The Moldau is the largest, and also receives several tributaries. Lakes. None, properly speaking. There are many small pieces of water and some extensive swamps and morasses, particularly the Servina swamp, a considerable portion of which has been drained and converted into pasture-land. Forests. Extensive, and supplying a large amount of timber. Climate. Cold but healthy. Pro. The soil being fertile, corn, pulse, hops, flax, hemp, fruit, and all kinds of garden vegetables are produced in abundance. Saffron is raised in a smaller proportion; and wine, though made of an excellent flavour, is produced but in small quantities. Minerals. Bohemia formerly had mines of gold; and still has those of silver, tin, iron, quicksilver, cobalt, zinc, arsenic, bismuth, calamine, antimony, sulphur, saltpetre, vitriol, alum, and pit-coal; garnets, sapphires, topazes, hyacinths, chrysolites, amethysts, opals, chalcedonies, cornelians, and agates, are also found. The Bohemian diamond is a species of rock crystal. This country abounds likewise in marble, alabaster, porphyry, jasper, asbestos, serpentine, gypsum, and moonstone, as well as in porcelain earth and granite. Mineral waters exist in various situations. Manf. Yarn, linen, cambric, veils, lace, ribbons, stockings, thread, printed linen, woollen stuffs, wax-cloth, glass, mirrors, garnets, and other minerals (exclusive of metals); cotton and silk stuffs, hats, paper, leather, wooden wares, musical instruments, alum, vitriol, and gunpowder. Exp. Besides the foregoing articles, there are exported great quantities of metals, both raw and wrought, vegetable products, cattle, and wool. Imp. The principal imports consist of salt, wine, colonial products, spirituous liquors, silk, Spanish wool, cotton, quicksilver, iron, lead, hardware, jewels, trinkets, and dye-stuffs. Towns. Prague, and the capitals of the sixteen circles, most of which are of the same names. Rel. Roman Catholic, but all denominations are tolerated. Gov. Hereditary monarchy, with the right of both male and female succession. Pop. 4,500,000, of whom one third are Tchèques or Sclaves, about one half Germans, and the rest Jews. Lat. between 48° 33′ and 51° 3′ N. Lon. between 12° and 16° 46′ E.—Bohemia derives its name from the Boii, a Celtic race, who took possession of the country about 600 years B.C., but who were driven out, under Augustus, by the Marcomans, who were in their turn conquered by the Tchèques, a race of the Sclaves. These founded many states or republics, the principal of which was Prague. At the commencement of the eighth century, all these states were united under one chief, named Croc or Crac. Pozémysl, who had married Crac's daughter, succeeded; and thus, in 722, laid the foundation of a dynasty which did not expire till 1306. Up to 1086, it had been a dukedom, but in that year Wratislas II. was named king by a decree of Henry IV., emperor of Germany, Duke Spitignew I. having, in the 10th century, recognized the suzerainty of the Germanic empire. At the death of Wenceslas II. in 1306, the kingdom passed at first to Rudolph of Austria, then to Henry of Carinthia, and finally to the house of Luxembourg, belonging to which four kings reigned, from 1309 to 1437. It was in the reign of Wenceslas IV., one of this dynasty, that John Huss and his disciples spread through Bohemia the doctrines of reform. In 1437 Albert of Austria, by marriage, became possessed of Bohemia; but his son, Ladislas I., dying in 1457 without issue, George Podiebrad, a simple gentleman, was then elected. This monarch maintained his position in spite of the thunders of the Vatican, the treason of his son-in-law, Mathias, king of Hungary, and the rebellion of his most powerful nobles. After him Ladislas II. and Louis of the Jagellons of Poland, occupied the throne. In 1526 Ferdinand I., brother of Charles V., was elected king; and with him commenced the Austrian house of Bohemia. Up to 1547 the kings had been elected; after that time they became hereditary, and since that date, Austria retained possession of this kingdom. The king of Bohemia was one of the seven electors of the German emperors.

BOHEMOND, or BOEMOND, Mark, bo-he'-mond, the first prince of Antioch, who, in 1081, accompanied his father, Robert Guiscard, duke of Apulia, in his attempt on the Eastern empire. On the return of Guiscard to Italy, he left the command to his son, who defeated the emperor Alexis in two battles. On his father's death in 1085, he became prince of Tarentum; but, desiring to increase his dominions, took part in the first crusade. In 1098 he took Antioch, of which he was made prince by the Crusaders, and established there a little kingdom, which existed nearly 200 years. He afterwards took Laodicea, but was himself made prisoner. On gaining his liberty, he returned to Greece with a large army, but met with little success. D. 1111.—Six princes of his name succeeded him in the sovereignty of Antioch, the last, Bohemond VII., being dethroned in 1288. (See ANTIOCH.)

BOILDIEU, bwoild'-yu(r), a celebrated French musical composer, who was made professor at the Conservatory, and subsequently quitted Paris for St. Petersburg, where the emperor Alexander appointed him master of the chapel. In 1812 he returned to Paris. His principal works are, "The Caliph of Bagdad," and "La Dame Blanche." B. at Rouen, 1775; D. at Jarcy, la Brie, 1834.

BOILEAU, Nicholas, surnamed DESPREAUX, bwoi-lo', a famous French poet, who was bred to the law, in which, however, he made little progress. His satires gained him great reputation, and placed him in the foremost rank of the reforming poets of his time. Louis XIV. was highly pleased with them, and distinguished him by several marks of his favour. His "Art of Poetry" appeared in 1673, and served in some degree as a model for the English poet Pope, who imitated it in many of his best passages in the "Essay on Criticism." In 1684 he was chosen member of the French Academy, and in 1701 was elected pensionary of the Academy of Inscriptions and Medals, which he held till 1705, when his growing infirmities obliged him to resign. The best edition of his works is that of Durand, in 1747, 5 vols. 8vo. B. at Paris, in 1636; D. 1711.—Boileau rendered great services to French literature in superseding the vicious works of his age, and teaching the people to admire Corneille, Molière, and Racine, and at the same time himself offering the most beautiful models of pure and perfect poetry. He had two brothers, who were the authors of some unimportant writings.

BOIS-LE-DUC, bwaw-le(r)-dook, 'the duke's wood,' is a strongly fortified-town of the Netherlands, in Dutch Brabant, situate at the conflux of the rivers Dommel and Aa, 28 miles from Utrecht. The town is entered by four gates, and is approached by water at three openings. The cathedral church, built in 1366, is one of the finest structures in the Netherlands. A considerable trade is carried on, particularly in corn; they have also manufactures of knives and needles. Commerce is greatly promoted by the many canals which pass through the town. Pop., garrison inclusive, 22,000.—This city surrendered in 1794, without much opposition, to the French under General Pichegru. In January, 1814, it again surrendered to the Prussian army under General Bulow.

BOISMONT, bwaw'-mawng, a celebrated .French preacher, well known for his sermons and panegyrics, in which are many very eloquent passages, and who was admitted to the Academy in 1755. His sermon which is most to be noted was preached in 1782, in order to gather contributions for the establishment of an asylum for disabled soldiers and ecclesiastics. Such was its great effect on his auditors, that a sum of £150,000 was collected, and the asylum founded at Rougemont. He delivered the funeral orations over the Dauphin, Queen Maria Leczinska, Louis XV., and Maria Theresa. B. 1715; D. 1786.

BOISSY D'ANGLAS, Francis Antony, bwoiss'-se dawng'-gla, a French statesman, who was, in 1792, elected by the department of Ardèche a member of the Convention, in which assembly he distinguished himself by his moderation, powers of application, and by his heroic firmness. He was president on the 1st Prairial (1795), when the mob, invading the Assembly, wished to force the Convention to establish the reign of terror. Boissy was insulted and menaced; and, to terrify him, the head of representative Féraud, who had just been beheaded before his eyes, was shown to him. He uncovered himself, and saluted this relic of his unfortunate colleague; then, resuming his seat, remained unmoved in this scene of disorder and anarchy. He took a part in all the affairs of his country during the Republic and the Empire, and, at the restoration, was made a peer. B. at St. Jean Chantre, 1756; D. at Paris, 1826.

BOJADOR, CAPE, boj'-a-dor', situate on the W. coast of Africa, in lat. 26° 12′ N.; lon. 16° 47′ E.—The ancients considered it the end of the world. It was doubled for the first time about 1433, by Gillianez, a Portuguese.

BOKHARA, or UZBEKSTAN, bok-ha'-ra, a country of Central Asia, bounded on the N. by the desert of Kizil-Koom and the khanat of Kokhand, E. by Kunduz and Badakshan, S. by Cabul, and W. by the desert of Kharism. Area, estimated at 235,000 square miles. Desc. Barren, its soil mostly consisting of a stiff clay of great aridity, save where it is watered by the streams which descend from the high mountain-ranges with which it is surrounded. Rivers. The Kohik, the Oxus or Amoo, and the Kushku or Kurshee. About nine tenths of the cultivated land of the country is situate on the banks of these rivers. Pro. Rice, pulse, wheat, barley, maize, cotton, indigo, and fruits, which are very fine. In the gardens, great quantities of melons, pumpkins, and cucumbers are raised. Of the first, Bokhara would appear to be the native country, and from it the natives extract a kind of molasses. In the mountainous regions a considerable quantity of timber is grown, and, in the plains, willows and poplars, which are used in house-building. Minerals. Some gold is found among the sands of the Oxus or Amoo, but all other metals are imported from Russia. Manf. Unimportant; the most extensive are those of cotton and silk, and a cloth in which both of these materials are combined. The people make excellent morocco leather, have good dyes, and are skilful in the manufacture of swords, although much inferior to the Persians. Towns. Bokhara, Samarcand, and Balkh. Pop. 1,500,000. Lat. between 36° and 42° N. Lon. between 63° and 70° E.—The government of this country is administered by a khan, who is despotic, and who maintains a standing army of about 25,000 men, of whom 4,000 are infantry. He is the most powerful of the princes of Turkistan, and can, if required, easily raise his army to 100,000 men.

BOKHARA, the capital of the above, is situate on the banks of the Kohik, 130 miles from Samarcand. It is said to be 9 miles in circumference, and to be entered by twelve gates. The citadel is in the centre of the city, and it contains the palace, the harem, the royal stables, the residences of the state officers, and the barracks. A vast number of mosques adorn the city, and there are schools and colleges in abundance. As the merchants of Turkey, Persia, Russia, China, Tartary, India, and Cabul meet here, there is an active commerce carried on. Pop. estimated at 160,000. Lat. 39° 48′ N. Lon. 64° 26′ E.

BOLAN PASS, bo-lan', a defile in the mountains of Beloochistan, on the route from the Lower Indus to Afghanistan, and about 55 miles in length. It is infested by the Beloochee freebooters, and has an elevation, at its highest point, of 5,793 feet. Lat. 29° 30′ to 29° 52′ N. Lon. between 67° and 67° 40′ E.—The BOLAN RIVER runs through this pass, which, in 1839, took the Bengal column, with its accompanying artillery, six days to march through it.

BOLBEC, bol'-bek, a town of France, on the Bolbec, 17 miles from Havre. Manf. Cottons, woollens, linens, dye-works, and chemical factories. Pop. 9,664.

BOLESLAS, bo-les'-la, the name of five kings of Poland, who reigned at different periods between 992 and 1289.

BOLEYN, Anne, bool'-en, wife of Henry VIII., king of England, and mother of Queen Elizabeth, was the daughter of Sir Thomas Boleyn, afterwards created Viscount Rochford and earl of Wiltshire. Her mother was Lady Elizabeth Howard, daughter of the duke of Norfolk. Her early years were spent at the French court, where she attended the wife of Louis XII., on whose death she returned to England, and became maid of honour to Queen Catharine, which occasioned her to be often in the company of Henry. That monarch became enamoured of her person, and in order to make her his wife, determined to procure a divorce of his queen. This design he carried into execution, and married Anne privately; but, when she became pregnant, he publicly acknowledged her his queen, and she so continued till he conceived a passion for Jane Seymour. He then caused her to be tried for high treason, in having been unchaste with her brother and four other persons,—Henry Norris, Sir Francis Weston, William Brereton, and Mark Smeton, all of whom suffered death for their alleged crime. B. 1507; beheaded, on the green before the Tower, 1536.—The body of this unfortunate lady was thrown into a common chest of elm-tree, "used to put arrows in," and her brutal husband married Jane Seymour the day following her execution.

BOLINGBROKE, bol'-ing-brok, a market-town and parish of Lincolnshire, 4 miles from Spilsby. Area, 2,570 acres. Pop. 1,000.—Here are the remains of a castle in which Henry IV. was born.

BOLINGBROKE, bol'-ing-brok, or bool'-ing-brok, Henry St. John Viscount, a distinguished political writer and statesman, who, in 1701, entered parliament as member for Wotton-Basset, and, in 1704, became secretary at war. In 1707 he resigned; but, in 1710, he was one of the ministry. For the next four years he assisted in governing the country, and, by the inglorious treaty of Utrecht, in April, 1713, brought the war with France to a close. In 1712 he was created Viscount Bolingbroke; and, in 1714, Queen Anne died. This was a fatal blow to Bolingbroke, who had quarrelled with his old friend Harley, the earl of Oxford, and who was endeavouring to form a new cabinet. The death of the queen disarranged all his measures, and, in the following year, he was compelled to make his escape to France in disguise, to evade the vengeance of his enemies. On the accession of George I., he was impeached, by Walpole, at the bar of the House of Lords, and, not appearing to take his trial, he was attainted by act of parliament. Meanwhile he had entered the service of Charles Stuart, the Pretender, who appointed him his prime minister, but who, after his return from Scotland, dismissed him. In 1723 he was permitted to return to England, but he was not re-admitted to the House of Lords. This excited his animosity, and he began to write against the ministry with considerable effect, and finally succeeded in overthrowing Sir Robert Walpole. In 1735 he once more withdrew to France, where he resided until the death of his father; which event enabled him to take possession of the family estates at Battersea. Here he passed the remainder of his days, employing his pen upon other subjects besides such as had political tendencies. B. at Battersea, 1678; D. at Battersea, 1751.—The works of Bolingbroke are now little read, notwithstanding the many charms which his style possesses.

BOLIVAR, Simon, bol'-e-var, a South American, and the liberator of Bolivia from the Spanish yoke, was the most distinguished general that has yet appeared in that country. He received his university education at Madrid, and afterwards visited Italy, Switzerland, Germany, France, and England. In 1802 he returned to Madrid, and married a beautiful lady three years younger than himself, he being then only 19. In 1809 he returned to S. America, where, shortly after his arrival, his wife died, when he once more visited Europe, and did not return till the following year, when he dedicated himself to the freedom of his country, and, at Venezuela, entered upon his military career as a colonel in the service of the newly-founded republic. In June, 1810, we find him in London, endeavouring to induce the British cabinet to assist the independent party against the royalists, and in the following year he was acting as governor of Puerto Cabello, the strongest fortress of Venezuela. He was now fairly committed to the revolutionary cause, serving under General Miranda, whom he afterwards accused as a traitor, and who subsequently died in a dungeon in Spain. The war continued to rage, and after many reverses and changes, he gradually won his way to that goal for which he heroically and disinterestedly fought. At length, in 1821, the independent troops were successful in the battle of Carabobo, where the royalists lost upwards of 6,000 men, and which decided the cause against Spain. On the 20th of August of the same year a republican constitution was adopted, and decreed to continue, as then defined, till 1834. Bolivar was chosen president, and he turned his attention to the internal administration of the country. In 1823 he assisted the Peruvians to obtain their independence, and was declared their liberator, and invested with supreme authority. On the 10th of February, 1825, however, he convoked a congress, and resigned his dictatorship in the following words: "I felicitate Peru on being delivered from two things which, of all others on earth, are most dreadful—war, by the victory of Ayacucho, and despotism, by this my resignation." He now visited the upper provinces of Peru, which, calling a convention at Chuquisaca, gave the name of Bolivia to their country, in honour of their liberator, and appointed him perpetual protector, and to draw up a constitution. On the 25th of May, 1826, he presented his Bolivian code to the congress of Bolivia, which was afterwards adopted, though with some dissatisfaction, although it was also subsequently adopted by the congress of Lima, where, under its provisions, he himself was elected president for life. He now set out for Colombia, where disaffection and party strife were at their height. His conduct here was misconstrued, and he was supposed to be assuming the powers of a dictator. These suspicions seem to have deeply affected him, for he wrote to the senate, in February, 1827: "Suspicions of tyrannous usurpation rest upon my name, and disturb the hearts of Colombians. I desire to be made only a private citizen." In 1829 new disturbances arose, and in 1830 a convention was called for the purpose of framing a new constitution for Colombia. The proceedings were begun by Bolivar, who once more tendered his resignation. He was pressed to retain his position; but his resolution was already formed, and he bade adieu to public life, broken in mind and body. He retired to Carthagena, whence, in 1831, he sent an address to the Colombians, vindicating his conduct, and complaining of their ingratitude. This was his last act which had relation to public affairs; for by the end of another week he was no more. B. at Caracas, 1783; D. at San Pedro, near Carthagena, 1831.

BOLIVIA and UPPER PERU, bo-liv'-e-a, an independent republic of S. America, nearly inclosed by the states of Brazil, Peru, Chili, and the Argentine Republic. Ext. Its extreme length is 1,100, and its breadth 800 miles. Area, 374,480 square miles. Divisions. It is divided into nine departments,—La Paz, Oruro, Potosi, Chuquisaca, or Sucre, Cochabamba, Beni, Santa Cruz, Tarija, and Lamar, or Cobija. These again are subdivided into provinces. Desc. Nearly the whole of this country being within the tropics, it might be supposed that its climate would correspond with its geographical position; but from the centre of the country being composed of ramifications of the Andes, high table-lands and valleys, the air is, on this account, tempered; so that not more than one half of its surface has a tropical climate. As a whole, therefore, the country is fertile in the valleys, whilst the region between the Pacific and the Andes is nearly barren. The plains of Chuquitos and Moxos are clothed with immense forests, and the lands between the various hill-ridges may be characterized as undulating plains covered with a coarse grass, on which vast herds of llamas are pastured. Rivers. The Beni, Mamore, Rio Grande, or Guapai. All these are affluents of the Madeira, which, in its turn, becomes an affluent of the Amazon. The Pilcomayo and Paraguay are other streams which are tributaries of the La Plata. These all come from the E. declivity of the Andes, whilst those on the W., except in the case of the Loa, do not reach the Pacific, but are lost in their course. The Desaguadero flows out of Lake Titiaco, and runs for 200 miles through Bolivia. Lakes. Titiaco, the largest in S. America. There are many other collections of water, formed principally in the rainy season, but which cannot properly be called lakes. Pro. Rice, barley, oats, maize, cotton, indigo, sugar-cane, Peruvian bark, cacao, medicinal drugs, potatoes, the choicest fruits, and timber. Minerals. Gold is found in all the rivers of the E. Cordillera of the Andes, and the "mines of Potosi" have been proverbial for their richness in silver, and lead, tin, sulphur, nitre, and salt are obtained. Copper-mines are abundant, although, from their distance in the interior, they cannot be successfully wrought. Manf. Limited; the natives principally occupy themselves with the pursuit of agriculture and the rearing of cattle; but the Indian population produce fine cloths, parasols, and fans; cotton goods and glass wares are manufactured at Cochabamba; cloths of llama and alpaca hair at La Paz; hats of wool at Atacania, and silver-wire vessels in the mining districts. Towns. La Paz, Potosi, Oruro, Chuquisaca, Cochabamba, Santa Cruz, Tarija, and Cobija. Pop. 1,030,000. Lat. between 12° 10′ and 25° 30′ S. Lon. between 58° and 70° 40′ W.—Bolivia, under the name of Upper Peru, was formerly comprised in the Spanish viceroyalty of Buenos Ayres, but on gaining its independence, it assumed the name of Bolivia. (See BOLIVAR.)

BOLOGNA, bo-lone'-ya, a city of Italy, built in a plain, in the States of the Church, 24 miles from Modena. It lies at the foot of the Apennines, between the rivers Savena and Reno, in a rich and fertile valley. It contains a number of elegant churches and cloisters, which are adorned in the interior with beautiful paintings. Among other public edifices may be noticed its palaces, the Registry, the Chamber of Commerce, and the two towers degli Asinelli and de' Garisendi; the former 371 feet in height, the loftiest in Italy; the latter originally 130 feet in height, but now reduced to nearly 70, from its leaning to one side. A famous university exists here, which had the honour of first drawing the attention of Europe to the Roman law; and, besides, an observatory, galleries of sculpture and painting, a school of music, cabinets, libraries, and a botanical garden. Manf. Cloth, silk stockings, and other stuffs; satins, damasks, taffeta, velvet, gauze, crape, and linen. The other products of Bologna and its environs are fruit, wine, the well-known soap-ball, cheese, oil, and honey. Pop. 78,000. Lat. of Observatory, 44° 29′ 54″ N. Lon. 11° 21′ E.—This city, occupying the site of the ancient Felsona, has filled a considerable place in Italian history, from its having been the residence of many illustrious families, and from its having been the seat of the school of the Caracci, who restored a correct taste in painting, after Michael Angelo and Raphael. It is the birth-place of Aldrovani, Galvani, Malpighi, Massighi, the Zanoki, the painters Albani, Guido, Domenichino, and the three Caracci. In 1506 it was finally annexed to the Ecclesiastical States. In 1796 it was entered by Bonaparte, who expelled from it the papal authorities. After the revolutionary movements of 1848, an Austrian corps d'armée made it its headquarters. This occupation of the Papal States by Austrian troops was for many years the fertile source of danger to the peace of Europe, France and Sardinia especially protesting against the Austrian occupation.

BOLOGNA, LEGATION OF, a province of Italy, in the pope's dominions, having the Ferrarese on the N., Romagna on the E., Tuscany on the S., and Modena on the W. Ext. 50 miles long by about 30 broad.

Area, 1,292 square miles. Desc. Marshy in the north-east part of the province, where it is watered by the Po; level and productive in the middle, and mountainous in the south. Pro. Rice, corn, wine, oil, fruit, hemp, flax, saffron, silk, and all kinds of vegetables. Pigs and horned cattle are reared in great numbers, and bees are preserved for their honey. Minerals. Chalk, gypsum, and marble. Pop. 322,228.

BOLOR-TAGH, bo'-lor-taw, a mountain-chain of Central Asia, separating China on the E. from Koondooz and Kafristan on the W. Lat. extending from 35° to 45° N. Lon. between 70° and 75° E.—Its culminating point exceeds 19,000 feet in height. Lat. between 35° and 40° N.

BOLTON LE MOOR, bole'-ton, a town of Lancashire, situate on an affluent of the Irwell, 12 miles from Manchester, and consisting of two townships,—Great and Little Bolton. It has a dispensary and news-room, besides other charitable and useful institutions, a parish church, chapels of ease, and numerous dissenting places of worship. It has also a theatre, an assembly-room, and a concert-room; a mechanics' institute, and some libraries. Manf. Muslins, calicoes, quiltings, shawls, jeans, and fustians. In its neighbourhood are several coal-pits, and it has paper and flax mills, besides chemical works. Pop. about 9,000.—The prosperity of this town is to be attributed to the introduction of the mule-jenny, which was invented by Arkwright and Crompton, and gave such a wonderful impetus to the cotton manufacture of the country. It is connected by railway with Manchester, Bury, and many more of the manufacturing towns of the north of England.

BOLTON, a township and parish in Northumberland, not far from Alnwick. Area, 2,048 acres. Pop. 165.—This is the place where, in 1513, the earl of Surrey collected his troops before the battle of Flodden, where James IV. of Scotland and so many of his nobility fell.

BOMARSUND. (See ÅLAND.)

BOMBAY, THE ISLAND OF, bom-bai', is situate on the western coast of Hindostan, off the shore of Concan, in the province of Bejapore. Ext. 8 miles long by about 3 broad. Area, including Colaba island, 18 square miles. In 1661 this island was taken possession of by the English.

BOMBAY, PRESIDENCY OF, one of the three presidencies into which British India is divided. It is bounded on the N. and N.W. by the dominions of the Guicowar; on the W. by the Indian Ocean; on the S. by Goa, Mysore, and the presidency of Madras; and on the E. by the territories of the Nizam and Indore. Area, 120,065 square miles. To this extensive territory may be added the recently-acquired possessions of Scinde, which, with the states of the native princes subject to the British government, gives an additional 20,600 square miles. Districts. These are Bombay Island, with Ahmedabad, Baroach, Surat, Kaira, all lying N. of the island; Candeish, Darwar, N. and S. Concan, Poonah, and Ahmednuggur, lying south of the island; and Scinde. Desc. This immense expanse of territory is necessarily diversified in its physical aspects, which, under the heads of the various districts of which it is composed, are, where necessary, described in this work; but, considering the many diversities which it presents, it may be viewed as an aggregate of barren hills, elevated table-lands, long valleys, and rugged mountain tracts. Rivers. The principal are the Nerbudda, Mhye, Taptee, and Sabermutty, disemboguing themselves in the Gulf of Cambay. There are several other streams which have their sources in the presidency; such as the Godavery and the Kishna, which empty themselves into the Bay of Bengal. Climate. Not so hot, and more healthy in general, than the other presidencies. Pro. Rice and cotton are the chief objects of culture; sugar and indigo are produced in Candeish, and a vast quantity of fruits in the N. parts; dates and cocoa-palms are abundant. Manf. Sugar, indigo, and silk cloths, ornamented with gold and silver, and wove at Poonah. These are the principal manufactures; the roads in the interior being so bad, and the navigable rivers so few, as to impede a rapid development of the resources of the country. Gov. This is vested in a governor, assisted by three councillors, with several secretaries and various other officers of state, subject to the governor-general of India, who resides at Calcutta. Pop. including the presidency and all the state, 15,600,000. Lat. between 14° and 24° N. Lon. between 72° and 76° E.

BOMBAY, CITY OF, derives its name from the Portuguese Bom-bahia, signifying 'good harbour,' the capital of the above presidency, and is situate on a narrow point of land at the S.E. extremity of the island of the same name. It is surrounded by strong fortifications. The castle is a regular quadrangle, with numerous works, particularly towards the sea; and the whole is encompassed by a broad deep ditch, which can be flooded at pleasure. In the centre of the town is the Green, a wide open space, which is surrounded with many large and well-built houses. Here is the English church, an extremely handsome edifice, to the left of which is the government-house; on the right is the bazaar, or market-place; and at the entrance to this street stands the theatre, which is a fine building. Besides the English church, there are a Scotch church, numerous temples for the worship of the Hindoos, mosques for the Mahometans, and a synagogue for the Jews. The Portuguese Roman Catholics have also several chapels. The Elphinstone College was founded in 1837; and in the presidency there are 120 native schools, besides nearly 2,000 native Hindoos village schools. There is also an observatory. COMMERCE. From the situation of Bombay, it commands an extensive commercial intercourse with the countries situate in the Persian and Arabian gulfs, with both the western and eastern coasts of India, as well as with the islands in the Eastern Ocean, and with China. Of the trade to China, the principal commodity is cotton-wool; the other articles of which the trade of Bombay consists, are sandal-wood and pepper, the produce of Malabar and the other adjacent countries; gums, drugs, and pearls from Arabia, Abyssinia, and Persia; elephants' teeth, cornelians, and other produce from Cambay; sharks' fins, birds' nests, and other articles from the Maldive and Laccadive islands. With Europe also, and with different parts of America, Bombay carries on a considerable trade. The art of shipbuilding is carried to great perfection by the Parsees, who are accounted superior ship-carpenters. There are excellent rope-walks, which are equal to any in England, with the exception of the government yards. Its dockyard is large and well contrived, and has abundance of naval stores, together with large quantities of timber for building and repairing ships, and forges for all kinds of smith's work. Pop. upwards of 500,000, composed of British, Portuguese, Armenians, Jews, Mahometans, Hindoos, and Parsees. Lat. of the Observatory, 18° 53′ 45″ N. Lon. 72° 51′ 14″ E.—The first line of railway in Hindostan was opened in 1853, between Bombay and Tanna, a distance of 20 miles. Railways, which will almost girdle the three presidencies, are now in contemplation.

BONA, bo'-na, a considerable seaport of Algeria, in the province of Constantina, with a commodious harbour, 45 miles from Constantine. This place is nearly two miles in circumference, is entered by four gateways, and is, in every respect, greatly improved since it became a possession of the French. It has excellent markets and bazaars, cafés, washing-rooms, and a theatre. Manf. Tapestry, saddlery, and native clothing; besides having a trade in corn, wool, and wax. Pop. 12,000, of whom a third are natives. Lat. 36° 53′ 58″ N. Lon. 7° 46′ 5″ E. This was formerly one of the settlements of the French African Company, established during the reign of Louis XIV.; but in 1805 it fell into the hands of the English. It is now one of the most flourishing towns in the province of Algeria.

BONA DEA, bo'-na de'-a, a name given to Ops, Vesta, Cybele, Rhea, by the Greeks; and, by the Latins, to Fauna or Fatua. This goddess was so chaste, that no man but her husband saw her after her marriage. Her festivals were celebrated only in the night, by the Roman matrons in their houses; and all the statues of the men were carefully covered with a veil where the ceremonies were observed.

BONAPARTE, FAMILY OF, bo'-na-parte, a distinguished family, originally from Tuscany, but settled in Corsica for several generations previous to the close of the last century.

BONAPARTE, the EMPERORS. (See NAPOLEON I., II., and III.)

BONAPARTE, Charles, a judge of the island of Corsica, the father of Napoleon I., emperor of the French, and of a large family of sons and daughters, most of whom, under the patronage of their great brother, attained a considerable position and influence in Europe. Charles Bonaparte married, in 1767, Letitia Ramolini. D. at Montpellier, 1785, shortly after the death of his youngest child, Jérome. Letitia, left with eight children and little property, was obliged in 1793 to quit Corsica, and repaired to Marseilles, where she lived with her family in a very humble manner. On the establishment of the consular government, in 1789, the Bonapartes went to Paris, altering but little the style of their living. In 1804, Napoleon, being proclaimed emperor, Letitia received the title of Madame la Mère, and also that of "general protectress of charitable establishments." She saved a large sum of money, and was in the habit of saying, "Who knows but one day I shall have to find bread for all these kings?" After the downfall of the Empire, she retired to Rome. D. there 1839; B. at Ajaccio, 1750.—Letitia was a woman of great energy and courage; and Napoleon ascribed no little of his greatness to the influence of the early training of his mother.—The eight children of Charles and his wife are mentioned below in the order in which they were born.

BONAPARTE, Joseph, eldest son of the above, after taking a prominent part in the events which happened during the Consulate and the Empire, was appointed, in 1806, by Napoleon I., king of Naples. Reigning over this kingdom two years, he was transferred, in 1808, to Madrid, and was nominally king of Spain till 1813. He afterwards retired to the United States, under the name of Count of Survillers, then to England, and finally to Florence. B. 1768; D. at Florence, 1814, leaving two daughters. In 1794 he married Julia Clary, daughter of a Marseilles merchant.

BONAPARTE, Napoleon, second son of the above. (See NAPOLEON I.)

BONAPARTE, Lucien, third son of the above, was, in 1799, president of the council of the Five Hundred, and contributed greatly to the successful result of the Napoleon coup d'état of the 18th Brumaire. He was afterwards employed in a mission to the court of Spain, and in 1804 was made prince of Canino. On his way to America he was, in 1810, taken prisoner by the English, and detained at Ludlow, Shropshire, for three years. After 1814, he returned to Italy. B. 1775; D. at Viterbo, 1840.—Lucien was possessed of great boldness and talent; and, less docile than his brothers, Napoleon I. could not so effectually mould him to his purposes, being encountered, in all his demands on Lucien, by a haughtiness and intelligence equal to his own. He was twice married; the best-known of his children being Charles Lucien, prince of Musignano and Canino.

BONAPARTE, Eliza, eldest daughter of the above, was married in 1797 to Felix Bacciocchi, a Corsican soldier of good birth. She was afterwards made princess of Piombino and Lucca, and subsequently grand duchess of Tuscany. In all these positions Eliza had the chief power, her husband being simply her first subject and aide-de-camp. B. 1777; D. at Trieste, 1820.—She left one child, Napoleon Eliza. (See BACIOCCHI.)

BONAPARTE, Louis, fourth son of the above, accompanied Napoleon in his expeditions to Italy and Egypt, was employed by the emperor in several capacities, and, in 1806, was proclaimed king of Holland. For four years he reigned over the Dutch; and although but a viceroy of his brother, yet his good and admirable qualities endeared him greatly to the people. In 1814 he retired to Rome; and afterwards, under the name of count de St. Leu, to Florence. B. 1778; D. at Florence, 1846.—Louis was fond of study and retirement, and it was only in obedience to the stronger mind of Napoleon that he undertook the burdens of administration and government. In 1802 he married Hortense Beauharnais, daughter of Josephine; but this marriage, although his wife was a most beautiful and accomplished woman, proved exceedingly unhappy, and they separated in 1810. Their first son, Napoleon Charles, whom the emperor fondly loved and adopted, died in 1807. Their second son, Charles Napoleon, died at Forli, in 1831, fighting for Italian independence. Their third son, Louis Napoleon, born in 1808, was elected president of the French republic, 1848, and emperor of th. French, 1852. (See HORTENSE.)

BONAPARTE, Marie Pauline, second daughter of the above, was first married to General Leclerc, whom she accompanied to St. Domingo, where she displayed the greatest courage. Leclerc dying in the isle of Tortua, Pauline returned to France, and Napoleon married her in 1803 to Prince Camillo Borghese, duke of Guastalla, a wealthy Italian noble. This union, unlike the first, was not a happy one. B. 1780; D. 1825.—Pauline was of a haughty but kind disposition, and possessed strong prejudices. She was never favourably inclined to Maria Louisa, and Napoleon exiled her from court in consequence of a public affront to that empress. After the emperor's downfall, however, Pauline thought no more of his resentment, but sent him some magnificent and valuable diamonds, the only offering she had in her power to make. She left no children.

BONAPARTE, Caroline, third daughter of the above, married in 1800 Joachim Murat, grand duke of Berg, who was proclaimed in 1808 king of Naples. On the death of her husband in 1815, she retired to Italy, where she lived with the title of countess of Lipona. B. 1782; D. 1839.—She left one child, Lucien Napoleon Murat, better known as Prince Murat. B. 1803.

BONAPARTE, Jérome, fifth and youngest son of the above, after serving in the West Indies, and performing various missions in the service of France, married, in the United States, a Miss Paterson, daughter of a rich Baltimore merchant. This marriage was afterwards dissolved, and Jérome, by Napoleon's desire, married, in 1807, the Princess Catherine of Wurtemburg, and in a few days after he became king of Westphalia, which dignity he held till 1813. After the fall of Napoleon, he resided in Italy for some time, with the title of prince de Montfort. When, under Louis Napoleon, the fortunes of the Bonaparte family were again in the ascendant, Jérome returned to Paris, and was appointed president of the state council. B. 1784.—He had by his second wife the Princess Mathilde, B. 1820, who was married in 1841 to Prince Demidoff, and Prince Napoleon Joseph, B. 1822, known as Prince Napoleon.

BONAPARTE, Prince Louis Lucien, second son of Lucien Bonaparte, is distinguished for his devotion to scientific and philological pursuits, and has written several works on chemistry, in French and Italian, and in 1857 published the "Bonaparte Polyglot," being the parable of the sower, from St. Matthew, in seventy-two European languages and dialects. He is likewise a proficient in that singular language, the Basque, and of which he has published a grammar. Under Napoleon III. he was made a senator. B. at Morngrove, Worcestershire, 1813.

BONAPARTE, Prince Napoleon Joseph Charles, son of Jérome Bonaparte and Princess Catherine of Wurtemburg, was, on the recall of the Bonaparte family from their long exile, elected to the Constituent Assembly, and became one of the leaders of the extreme republican party. He subsequently, however, retired from this course, and attached himself to his cousin, Napoleon III. In 1854 he had a command in the expedition of the allies against Sebastopol, and fought at the battle of the Alma. In 1858 he was appointed minister of Algeria, but shortly afterwards resigned this post. In 1859 he married the Princess Clothilde, daughter of Victor Emmanuel, king of Sardinia. B. at Trieste, 1822.

BONAVISTA, or BOAVISTA, bo'-na-vees'-ta, the largest of the Cape de Verde islands, next to St. Jago, Circumference, 48 miles. Pop. 4,396. Lat. 16° 17′ N. Lon. 22° 59′ E.

BONAVISTA, CAPE AND BAY OF, lie on the east side of Newfoundland. The cape lies in lat. 48° 15′ N.; lon. 52° 32′ W.

BONDOU, bon'-doo, a kingdom of Central Africa, situate on the W. bank of the Falcme, with a healthy climate and a fertile soil. Pro. Corn, gums; and a great number of cattle are reared. Pop. 1,500,000. Lat. between 14° and 15° N. Lon. between 11° and 13° W.

BONHEUR, Rosa, bon-hur', a French artist, distinguished as a painter of animal and still life. Her father, being himself an artist, directed her studies and taught her to copy nature; and with this view he frequently took her into the country, where she could see it in all its aspects, and at the same time copy the living creation as she beheld it moving in its freest and most careless conditions, or in a state of labour. Her "Labourage Nivernais" (ploughing in the snow) fixed her reputation, and her "Horse Fair," which was exhibited in 1855, at the French Exhibition, in London, excited universal admiration. Her whole family are more or less artistic in their tastes, and she has both brothers and sisters who have acquired distinction in the paths of sculpture and painting. B. at Bordeaux, 1823.

BONI, bo-ne', an independent state of the Celebes, in the South Pacific Ocean, with a town of the same name. This is the most powerful state in the island. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. between 4° 20′ and 5° 20′ S. Lon. between 119° 35′ and 120° 30′ E.

BONI, GULF OF, separates the two S. peninsulas of the Celebes, and is 200 miles in length by from 40 to 75 in breadth.

BONIFACE, ST., bon'-i-face, a saint of the Roman calendar, and a native of England, who was sent by Gregory II. to convert the Germans. Gregory III. made him an archbishop. B. in Devonshire, 680; slain by some peasants in Friesland, in 755. His letters were printed in 1616.

BONIFACE I., pope and saint, succeeded Zozimus in 418, and was maintained in the pontifical chair by the emperor Honorius, against his rival Eulalius. D. 422.

BONIFACE II. succeeded Felix IV. in 530. He was born at Rome, his father being a Goth. He compelled the bishops in a council to allow him to nominate his successor, and accordingly he named Vigil; but another council disavowed the proceedings of the first. D. 532.

BONIFACE III. succeeded Sabinen in 606, and died a few months after his election; but he obtained from the emperor Phocas the acknowledgment that the see of Rome was supreme over all other churches.

BONIFACE IV. was the son of a physician, and came to the tiara in 607. He converted the Pantheon into a church. D. 615.

BONIFACE V. was a Neapolitan, and succeeded Adeodatus in 617. He endeavoured to convert the natives of Britain to Christianity, and confirmed the right of sanctuary in churches. D. 625.

BONIFACE VI. came to the chair on the death of Formosus, in 896, but held it only fifteen days; for, being elected by a popular faction, he was deposed.

BONIFACE VII., whose surname was Francon, assumed the chair after murdering Benedict VI. and John XIV. He was acknowledged sovereign pontiff in 974, and died a few months after. His corpse was exposed in the public streets, and trodden under foot.

BONIFACE VIII., in 1294, terrified his predecessor Celestine into a resignation, by denouncing to him, at midnight, eternal damnation if he did not quit the pontifical chair. The credulous pope, thinking this a supernatural voice, obeyed the command next day, and the crafty cardinal was elected. He commenced his pontificate by imprisoning his predecessor, and laying Denmark under an interdict. He also behaved in a haughty manner towards the Colonnas, a distinguished Roman family, who protested against his election, and called a council to examine the charge. Boniface excommunicated them as heretics, and preached a crusade against them. He incited the princes of Germany to revolt against Albert of Austria; and also issued a bull, in which he asserted that God had set him over kings and kingdoms. Philip the Fair caused this bull to be burnt at Paris; on which Boniface laid France under an interdict. Philip appealed to a general council, and sent his army into Italy, which took Boniface prisoner. The pontiff's behaviour on this occasion was bold enough; for, putting on the tiara, and taking the keys and the crosier in his hands, he said, "I am a pope, and a pope I will die." D. at Rome a few months afterwards, in 1303. He wrote several works. His persecuting qualities are alluded to by Dante in the 27th chapter of the "Inferno."

BONIFACE IX. was a Neapolitan by birth, and of a noble family. He was made cardinal in 1381, and pope in 1389. D. 1404.

BONIFACIO, CAPE, bon'-e-fa'-che-o, the south-east point of the island of Corsica.

BONIFACIO, a seaport-town of Corsica, on the S. coast, 44 miles from Ajaccio. It is neatly built, and tolerably fortified. Pop. 3,400.

BONIFACIO, STRAIT OF, is between the islands of Sardinia and Corsica, and at its narrowest part is 7 miles across.

BONIN, or ARZOBISPO ISLANDS, bo-nin', three groups in the North Pacific, known individually as the Parry, the Baily, and the Peel and Kater islands. On the Peel Islands there are a few English and other Europeans settled, engaged in the whale-fishery. Lat. between 26° 30′ and 27° 44′ N. Lon. between 142° and 143° E.

BONN, bon, a neat town of Prussia, on the left bank of the Rhine, 14 miles from Cologne. It has four parish churches, a library with 100,000 volumes, an observatory, a museum, a botanic garden, and a university. It is the seat of a superior mining court. Manf. Silk, cotton, and tobacco. Pop. 15,000.—This town was formerly very strongly fortified, but was taken, in 1703, by Marlborough, after a severe bombardment. It is the birthplace of Beethoven, to whose memory a monument has been erected. His royal highness Prince Albert, the late Prince Consort, was educated at the university of Bonn.

BONNER, Edmund, bon'-ner, who rose to be an English prelate, was educated at Oxford, and afterwards entered into the service of Wolsey, who bestowed upon him several benefices. Henry VIII., to whom he was chaplain, sent him to Rome to get the sentence of divorce from Catherine of Aragon confirmed; and here his behaviour was so bold, that the pope threatened to throw him into a caldron of boiling lead. In 1538 he was nominated bishop of Hereford, being then ambassador at Paris; but, before his consecration, he was translated to the see of London. Hitherto he had professed a zeal for the Reformed doctrines, but now that Henry was dead, and Edward VI. reigning in his stead, he scrupled to take the oath of supremacy, for which he was sent to prison; but, on making his submission, was released. His negligence, however, in complying with the laws, occasioned him a second imprisonment, and the loss of his bishopric. On the accession of Mary, he was restored to his episcopal functions, when he deprived the married priests in his diocese, set up the mass in St. Paul's, and, through the whole of this reign, evinced a most sanguinary spirit, bringing numbers of Protestants to the stake. When Queen Elizabeth came to the throne, however, retributive justice fell upon his head, and he was sent to the Marshalsea prison, where he was confined during the remainder of his life. His body was interred in St. George's churchyard, Southwark. B. at Hanley, Worcestershire, at the close of the 15th century; D. in prison, 1569.

BONNET, Charles, bon'-nai, a Swiss naturalist, whose studies were chiefly directed to the consideration of the conditions of insect life. B. at Geneva, 1720; D. 1793.

BONNEVAL, Claude Alexander, count de, bon'-ne-val, a French military adventurer, who, after serving in the army and navy of his own country, transferred his allegiance to Austria, and subsequently became a Musulman. In Turkey he attained high distinction; and, under the title of Achmet Pasha, introduced European tactics, and taught the Turks the management of artillery. B. 1675; D. in Turkey, 1747.

BONNIVARD, Francis de, bon'-ne-var, Byron's "Prisoner of Chillon," whose liberal opinions induced him to adopt the republic of Geneva as the most agreeable government for him to live under. For his defence of the rights of the republic against Charles III., duke of Savoy, he was twice imprisoned, the first time at Grolée, where he was immured for two years; and the second in the castle of Chillon, on Lake Geneva, where he remained six years. B. at Seyssel, in the French district of Buge, 1496; D. at Geneva, 1570.—Bonnivard wrote a history of Geneva, bequeathed his ecclesiastical possessions to the state, and to the town his books, which were the foundation of its public library. The shuddering picture which Byron has drawn of the sufferings of the two brothers of Bonnivard while chained to the stone columns in the dungeon of Chillon, has no foundation in truth. "The eldest of the three" was the only one of his kindred confined there.

BONONCINI, Giovanni, bo-non-se'-ne, a musical composer, who, in conjunction with Handel and Ariosti, was engaged for the establishment of the Royal Academy of Music in London. His compositions were deficient in vigour, but were marked by much grace and tenderness. B. at Bologna, 1660. (See ARIOSTI.)

BONPLAND, Aimé, bonp'-land, a superior botanist, and the companion of Humboldt in his South-American explorations. In 1804 he became superintendent of the gardens of the empress Josephine at Malmaison, and when she died, in 1814, he resigned his situation. In 1816 he once more visited S. America, and, after encountering considerable dangers, finally settled in the neighbourhood of San Borja, a small town on the banks of the Uruguay, in Brazil, where he continued to reside till his death. B. at La Rochelle, 1773; D. 1858.

BOODROOM, or BODRUN, bood-room, a small town of Asia Minor, in Natolia, situate at the head of a deep bay, nearly 100 miles from Smyrna. It is supposed to occupy the site of the ancient Halicarnassus. Many relics of antiquity are to be observed here, and in the vicinity. Vestiges of the ancient walls may be discerned; and above the town are the remains of a theatre, measuring about 280 feet in diameter, and which appears to have had 36 rows of marble seats. Pop. about 10,000. Lat. 37° N. Lon. 27° 20′ E.

BOONE, Daniel, boon, a colonel in the United States service, and one of the earliest settlers in Kentucky, where he signalized himself by his many daring exploits against the Red Indians, and also by his extensive surveys and explorations of that state. In 1793 he removed to Upper Louisiana, then belonging to the Spaniards, and was named by them commandant of a district there. B. in Pennsylvania, 1735; D. in Missouri, 1820.—Boone was one of the most successful of the enterprising American pioneers of the 18th century, and may be said to have explored, defended, and aided in the settlement of the country from the Alleghany Mountains to the frontier of Missouri.

BOONE, boon, the name of several counties and townships in the United States.

BOORO, boor'-o, an island of the Asiatic Archipelago, 50 miles from Ceram. Area, 1,970 square miles. Desc. Mountainous and fertile, producing sago, rice, fruits, cajeput-oil, and dye-woods. Pop. 18,000. Lat. between 3° and 4° S. Lon. between 126° and 127° E.—In this island are mounts Tamahoo and Dome, respectively 6,528 and 10,400 feet high.

BOOSEMPRA, or BOOSUM PRAH, boo'-sem-pra', a river of the country of Ashantee, in W. Africa. It disembogues itself into the Atlantic, in lat. 4° 52′ N.; lon. 2° 30′ W.

BOOTAN, or BHOTAN, boo'-tan, an extensive region of Northern Hindostan, lying between Bengal and Tibet, having Sikkim on the W., Bengal and Assam on the S. and E., and the great Himalaya chain on the N. Area, 64,500 square miles. Desc. Very mountainous, and in many parts extremely cold, but productive and highly cultivated, the slopes of the mountains being cut into terraces for this purpose. Mountains. These consist of offshoots from the Himalaya chain, which here attains an elevation of 25,000 feet. Forests. In the lower part of the country these are both fine and extensive, notwithstanding that they are on a height of 8,000 or 10,000 feet above the sea. Pro. Maize, wheat, barley, buckwheat, and rice. Minerals. Iron and copper, and other metals are said to be plentiful. Manf. Woven goods, hardware articles, arms, gunpowder, and paper, which consists of a kind of satin obtained from bark. Towns. Tassimdon and Punakka. Rel. Buddhism. Pop. 1,500,000. Lat. between 26° 30′ and 28° 30′ N. Lon. between 88° 30′ and 94° E.

BOOTES, bo-o'-tes, a northern constellation near the Ursa Major, also called Bubulcus and Arctophylax.

BOOTH, Barton, booth, an English actor, who, at the age of 17, entered into a strolling company, and whose reputation became so great that Betterton engaged him. When Addison's "Cato" was to be acted, he was selected to perform the principal part, and sustained it so well that one night a subscription of fifty guineas was collected in the boxes and sent to him. He afterwards became manager of the house, and continued to perform nearly to his death. B. in Lancashire, probably at Warrington, 1681; D. 1733.

BOOTH, Sir Felix, the owner of a large distillery, distinguished for the great liberality he showed, when sheriff of London in 1829, in paying all the expenses, amounting to £17,000, of Captain Ross's second expedition to the Arctic regions, and whose name will always be honourably connected with the history of maritime discovery. He was knighted by William IV., and received the thanks of Parliament. B. 1755; D. at Brighton, 1850.

BOOTHIA FELIX, boo'-the-a fe'-lix, an insular portion of British North America, running into the Arctic Ocean, named in honour of Sir Felix Booth. Lat. between 69° and 75° N. Lon. between 92° and 97° W. This country was discovered by Captain John Ross, who here determined the position of the magnetic pole.

BOOTON, boot'-on, an island of the Asiatic archipelago, lying to the S.E. of the Celebes. Area, estimated at 1,800 square miles. Desc. Fertile, producing maize, rice, cloves, and tropical fruits in abundance. Pop. including Panganasane, another island, perhaps 300,000. Lat. 5° S. Lon. 123° E. The Dutch used formerly to dispatch annually to this island an extirpator, to destroy the clove and nutmeg trees, in order that they might secure a monopoly of the trade.

BORDA, John Charles, bor'-da, a French mathematician, who early entered the navy, and was employed on a voyage of discovery along the coasts of Europe and Africa, with a view of improving navigation and geography. The result of this expedition was published in two vols. 4to, 1778. In the American war he served under D'Estaing, with the rank of rear-admiral. Before this he had introduced uniformity into the architecture of the French ships of war. He contributed numerous papers to the memoirs of the Academy of Sciences, chiefly relating to the construction of vessels and hydraulics. In 1787 he published the "Description and Use of the Circle of Reflection," in which he recommended the employment of the specular circles invented by Tobias Mayer. He also invented the mensuration-rod, for ascertaining the station-lines. One of his last labours was the accurate determination of the length of the pendulum vibrating seconds at Paris. B. at Dax, 1733; D. at Paris, 1799. To this mathematician and Coulomb is ascribed the rise of the correct views of experimental philosophy for which the French have since become distinguished.

BORDE, John Benjamin, bord, a French writer, who became first valet to Louis XV., and on the death of that monarch was appointed farmer-general. He employed his leisure hours in studying music and the belles-lettres. His collection of airs, in 4 vols. 8vo, and essays on music, ancient and modern, in 4 vols. 4to, are proofs of his skill in the first, and in the second he distinguished himself by the "Memoirs of Coucy," 2 vols. 8vo, "Interesting Pieces towards a History of the Reigns of Louis XIII. and of Louis XIV.," "Letters upon Switzerland," "History of the South Sea," and other works. B. at Paris, 1734; guillotined, 1794.

BORDEAUX, bor-do', a commercial city of France, in the department of the Gironde, on the Gironde, situate 60 miles from its mouth in the Atlantic. The old town is not very attractive, the streets being for the most part crooked, narrow, and badly paved; but it has a number of handsome edifices. The new town is finely built, possessing large and handsome quays, and the bridge over the Gironde is one of the finest in Europe. The most remarkable public buildings are the Exchange, the ancient Hôtel des Fermes, the palace founded by Bonaparte in 1810, an elegant theatre, the old town-house, and the palace, first occupied by the dukes of Guienne, and afterwards by the Parliament. The cathedral is a structure of great antiquity, and the other churches are also interesting; but many of them were greatly injured during the Revolution. The institutions in literature are, a university, which was founded in 1441, and consists of two colleges, with a lyceum; an academy of arts and sciences, instituted in 1712; a public library with 120,000 volumes; and an academy of painting, sculpture, and architecture, founded in 1670, and revived in 1768. Manf. Glass, earthenware, woollen stuffs, lac, cottons, woollens, printed calicoes, tobacco, chemicals; and there are iron-foundries and a great number of sugar-refineries. Exp. Wine and brandy are exported in great quantities to Britain, Ireland, Holland, Sweden, Denmark, and other northern states. Vinegar, plums, raisins, chestnuts, walnuts, wood, turpentine, cork, honey, and hams are also exported. Imp. The principal are, from England, woollen stuffs, tin, lead, coal, herrings, salted flesh, leather, dye-stuffs, and different kinds of provisions; from Holland, Denmark, and Sweden, staves, deals, timber for ship-building, hemp, pitch, copper, and cheese. A great trade is also carried on with the colonies. Pop. 137,538. Lat. 44° 50′ 19″ N. Lon. 0° 34′ 32″ W.—This is the Burdigala of the Romans, and was celebrated for its mines in the 4th century. In 1132 it passed into the hands of the English, who kept it till 1451. In 1548 it was visited with great severity by Henry II. of France. He sent the duke of Montmorency to execute his commission, and at every tenth house a Bordelais was hanged, and the municipal authorities executed in the public square. This rigour was on account of an insurrection which had taken place against the salt-tax. It is the birthplace of Ausonius, the Latin poet, Edward the Black Prince, and his son Richard II. of England, Pope Clement, the distinguished painter Charles Vernet, and the historian Montesquieu.

BORDEAUX, DUC DE, Henry Charles Ferdinand Mario Dieudonne d'Artois, the son of Charles Ferdinand, duc de Berry. On the dethronement of Charles X. of France, his son the Dauphin, Louis Antoine, renounced his claim to the throne in favour of this prince; but he left France with the royal family in August, 1830. Louis Philippe then ascended the throne, and the duc de Bordeaux took the title of comte de Chambord. The French legitimists designate him as Henry V. B. 1820.

BOREAS, bor'-e-as, the name of the north wind blowing from the Hyperborean mountains. He was worshipped as a deity, and represented with wings and white hair.

BOREL, or BORELLI, Giovanni, bo-rel'-le, an eminent Italian professor of mathematics and medicine, who discovered and translated the lost books of Apollonius Pergæus, wrote the first theory of Jupiter's satellites, and endeavoured to apply mathematics to medicine. In 1666 he was called to the professor's chair at Pisa, where he lectured with great success, and wrote much in connection with the sciences he pursued. Being supposed to have favoured a revolt of the Messinians, amongst whom he had gone to live, he was invited by Queen Christina of Sweden to Rome, where she then was. Thither he immediately went, and lived under the favour of her patronage until his death. B. at Naples, 1608; D. at Rome, 1679.—The work "De Motu Animalium" is that upon which the medical reputation of Borelli depends.

BORGHESE, FAMILY OF, bor-gai'-zai, a distinguished Italian family, amongst whom have been several cardinals, and other members who have taken distinguished positions in the public affairs of Italy. One of the family, Prince Camillo Borghese, married the widow of General Leclerc, Marie Pauline Bonaparte, the sister of Napoleon I. In 1805 he was created a prince of the French empire, and, with the title of duke of Guastalla, became governor-general of the departments beyond the Alps, which embraced those former Italian states, and which were now annexed to France. Subsequently to the fall of the emperor, he fixed his abode at Florence, where, in a palatial structure, he lived in princely splendour. He had another residence at Rome, which he adorned with costly works of art. D. 1832.

BORGIA, Cæsar, bor'-je-a, a profligate son of Pope Alexander VI., on whose accession he was made archbishop of Valenza and cardinal; but being jealous of his brother Francis, who was most in favour, he contrived to have him drowned. He also dispatched a number of other persons, to gratify his avarice and revenge. Having renounced the cardinalship, he was made duke of Valentinois by Louis XII. of France, with whom he entered into a league for the conquest of the Milanese. On the death of his father, he was sent prisoner to Spain, but made his escape, and died fighting as a volunteer in the service of his brother-in-law, the king of Navarre, under the walls of Pampeluna, in 1507.

BORGIA, Lucretia, sister of the above, has been represented as equally profligate with her brother; a charge which is hardly credible, when we consider the characters of those who have been her panegyrists. Among these are the names of Ariosto, Strozzi, and Timbaedio, and several historians, who could not all have concurred in commending an embodiment of wickedness. She was three married, and left several sons, which may be considered as another argument greatly in her favour. D. at Ferrara, 1523.

BORGO, bor'-go, 'a town,' the prefix of many of the names of places in Italy.

BORINAGE, bor'-e-naj, a district of Belgium, in the province of Hainault. Pop. 32,000.—Almost its whole extent is covered with coal-mines.

BORISSOV, bo-ris'-sof, a small town of European Russia, on the Beresina, 36 miles from Minsk. Near this was the scene of the disastrous passage of the Beresina by the French in 1812.

BORLASE, William, bor'-lais, an ingenious antiquary, who in 1720 entered into orders, and two years afterwards obtained the rectory of Ludgvan, and afterwards that of St. Just, in Cornwall. He was elected a fellow of the Royal Society; and, having presented a variety of fossils and pieces of antiquity to the university of Oxford, he received the thanks of that learned body, and the degree of LL.D. He also gave many curious ores and fossils to the poet Pope for his grotto at Twickenham. B. at St. Just, Cornwall, 1696: D. 1772.—He wrote an essay on Cornish crystals, in the "Philosophical Transactions," "Antiquities of the County of Cornwall," folio, two editions; "Observations on the Scilly Islands," 4to; and "The Natural History of Cornwall," folio; all of them valuable.

BORNEO, bor'-ne-o, an island of Asia, in the Eastern Archipelago, in the Pacific Ocean, encompassed by the China Sea, the Sea of Java, the Sea of Celebes, and the Straits of Macassar. Ext. about 800 miles in length, by 700 in breadth. Area, estimated at 300,000 square miles, being the largest island, with the exception of Australia or New Holland, in the world. Desc. Mountainous in the interior, and flat and marshy for 10 or 15 miles inland along the coast. Mountains. Of the interior of this island not much is known; and although its mountain system is extensive, still little, beyond indicating the general direction of its ranges, can be said upon it. To the north of the Krunbang Mountains, which form the S. boundary of Sarawak, are the Batang-

Lupar and the Madi ranges, and between these and the Chinese Sea lies Borneo proper. Running in a N.W. direction from Lake Kili-Babi (lat. 5° 30′ N.), the highest known point in Borneo is reached. This is attained in Mount Kili-Babi, which is 13,698 feet above the level of the sea. Other ranges traverse the country, but their heights are not definitely ascertained. Rivers. The principal are the Borneo or Brunai, the Batang-Lopar, the Sarawak, the Pontianak, the Majak, the Pembuan, and several others of more or less extent, and traversing the country in all directions; so that Borneo presents, in this respect, a great contrast to New Holland; being one of the best-watered countries on the face of the globe. Lakes. The only known one of importance is the Kili-Babi, which is 35 miles long by 30 broad. Forests. Very extensive, in which the gutta-percha tree is a conspicuous object. Climate. In the higher parts, as temperate as it is in Europe; but in the lower, hot and unhealthy. Zoology. The elephant, rhinoceros, striped tiger, leopard, bear, deer, horse, and monkey. The ourang-outang is thought to be peculiar to Borneo and Sumatra. There is a porcupine which is said to be a favourite food of the natives, and the only animal that can feed on the upas-tree with impunity. The peninsula of Unsoong, in this country, is declared the most eastern point on the globe in which the elephant is found in its wild state. Birds are found in great variety, as are insects. Bees especially abound, and their wax is transported to China. The lac insect is also found. Crocodiles appear in the rivers, which are well supplied with fish. On the north and north-eastern coasts tortoises abound, and their shells are exported to China. Pro. Rice, sago, mandioc, sugar, camphor, cassia, cotton, opium, pepper, nutmeg, cloves, betel-nuts, cocoa-nuts, areca-palm, and a great variety of timber trees; also sandal-wood, ebony, banana, bread-fruit, cajeput-oil, benzoin, gums, and woods used for frankincense; indigo, safflower, turmeric, several dye-woods, and fruits of every description. Minerals. Gold, silver, diamonds, antimony, iron, tin, and coal. The principal diamond-mines are those of Landak, on the river of the same name, about 50 miles from Pontianak. Pop. about 3,000,000, consisting of Dyaks, Malays, and Chinese. Lat. between 7° 4′ N. and 4° 10′ S. Lon. between 108° 50′ and 119° 20′ E.—Borneo was discovered by the Portuguese in 1521, and is divided into several districts, governed by independent sovereigns, who frequently wage war with each other. Several of the European powers have endeavoured to establish colonial settlements in Borneo; but, with the exception of the Dutch, none of these had any permanent success, till Sir James Brooke, an English gentleman of independent fortune, landed on its coast in 1838. After that time the attention of a great many merchants of this country was directed to the proceedings of Sir James, whose efforts to establish and extend the commercial relations of England with this distant part of the globe, exemplified uncommon perseverance and enterprise. (See BROOKE, Sir James; SARAWAK, &c.)

BORNEO.

BORNEO, a seaport and capital of the kingdom of Borneo, on the north-west part of the island, 10 miles distant from the sea, on the river Brunai. The houses which occupy the banks on both sides of the river are supported on piles, and ascended by ladders, the river being freely permitted to flow under them. It is a place of considerable trade. Pop. about 20,000. Lat. 4° 56′ N. Lon. 114° 44′ E.

BORNHOLM, born'-hawlm, an island of Denmark, in the Baltic, about 100 miles from the outer point of Zealand. Ext. 30 miles long by 20 broad; area, including three small neighbouring islands, 227 square miles. Desc. Mountainous. Pro. Flax, hemp, and oats. Minerals. Potter's clay, blue marble, and coal. Manf. Linens, wooden clocks, and earthenware. Pop. 27,000. Lat. between 54° 59′ and 55° 19′ N. Lon. between 14° 42′ and 15° 10′ E.

BORNOU, bor-noo', an extensive country of Africa, bounded on the N.W. by Fezzan, N. by the country of Bilma, S.E. by Cashna, and S.W. by Nubia. The whole country may be regarded as a level plain, with a thick copse, high coarse grass, and numerous creeping and climbing plants. Around Lake Tchad, for a considerable distance, there is an alluvial soil, susceptible of a higher cultivation than has yet been bestowed upon it. Rivers. The Shary and Yeou. Climate. This is characterized by an intense heat, though not by a uniform heat. Two seasons, commencing soon after the middle of April, the other at the same period in October, divide the year. The first is introduced by violent winds, that bring with them, from the S.E. and S., an intense heat, with the deluge of sultry rain, and such tempests of thunder and lightning as destroy multitudes of cattle and numbers of the people. At the commencement of the second season, the ardent heat lessens; the air becomes soft and mild, and the weather perfectly serene. Zoology. Horses, asses, mules, dogs, horned cattle, goats, sheep, and camels (the flesh of which is much esteemed) are the common animals. The game consists of partridges, wild ducks, and ostriches, the flesh of which is prized above all other kinds. The other animals are the lion, leopard, civet-cat, wolf, fox, elephant, antelope, camelopardalis, crocodile, and hippopotamus; and there are many snakes, scorpions, centipedes, and toads. Bees are so numerous, that the wax is often thrown away as an article of no value. Pro. Maize, cotton, hemp, indigo, and all kinds of grain. The india-rubber tree is found in abundance. The riches of the inhabitants chiefly consist in slaves and cattle. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. between 12° and 18° N. Lon. between 12° and 18° E.

BORODINO, bo-ro-de'-no, a village in Russia, near Moskwa, about 90 miles W. Moscow, remarkable for the great battle gained on September 7, 1812, by the French over the Russians.

BORRODALE, bor'-ro-dail, in the S.E. part of Cumberland, bordering on Westmoreland, a romantic district, among Derwentwater fells, 7 miles from Keswick. These fells or hills are some of the loftiest in England, and it is in one of them that the black lead, or plumbago, is found, wherewith almost all the world is supplied. The mines are opened only once in seven years, and when a sufficient quantity of this valuable and singular mineral is taken out, they are carefully closed again. Pop. 425.

In 1755 he sailed to intercept a French squadron bound to North America, of which he took two ships, and Hoquart became his prisoner a third time. For this service he received the thanks of the House of Commons. In 1758 he took Cape Breton and Louisburg, in conjunction with General Amherst. The year following he commanded in the Mediterranean, and while lying at Gibraltar, hearing that the French admiral, M. De la Clue, had passed the Straits, he refitted his ships, and came up with the French fleet, of which he took three and burnt two in Lagos Bay. He once more received the thanks of Parliament, and had an annual pension of £3,000 conferred upon him. In 1760 he was appointed general of the marines, with a salary of £3,000 a year, which he retained until his death. B. in Cornwall, 1711; D. at Hatchfield Park, near Guildford, 1761.—It was of this admiral that Lord Chatham said, when he proposed expeditions to other commanders, he heard nothing but difficulties; but when he applied to him, these were either set aside or expedients suggested to remove them.

BOSCOBEL, bos'-ko-bel, Shropshire, near White Ladies, in the parish of Tong. Pop. 20.—Its grove is noted for the oak in which Charles II. was hid, and where he saw the parliament soldiers pass by in quest of him, after the battle of Worcester, in 1651.

BOSJESMANS, boz-jes'-manz, literally 'bushmen,' is the designation applied by the Dutch colonists at the Cape of Good Hope to a nomadic people who skirt the colony on the north, and who neither rear cattle nor have tribal distinctions such as the Hottentots have.

BOSNA-SERAJO, bos'-na se-ra'-jo, a town of European Turkey, the capital of Bosnia, situate on the Bosnia, 120 miles from Belgrade. It is meanly built, with the exception of a few of the public offices. The old citadel, which stands at some distance from the town, is surrounded with thick walls, turrets, and bastions, and defended by numerous cannon. Manf. Lances, daggers, and other arms; there is likewise a considerable trade with Dalmatia, Turkey, Croatia, and South Germany. Pop. about 35,000.—In the neighbourhood there are mineral baths and iron-mines.

BOSNIA, bos'-ne-a, a river which gives its name to a province of European Turkey, and which, after a course of 150 miles, unites with the Save, 24 miles from Brod.

BOSNIA, a country of the south of Europe, subject to the Turks, separated from Sclavonia on the N. by the Save, from Servia on the E. by the Drin, from Dalmatia on the S. by a ridge of mountains, and from Croatia on the W. by the Verba. Area, 18,800 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, but containing many fruitful fields and vineyards, especially in the north. Its mountains are offshoots from the Dinaric and Julian Alps, in some places attaining an elevation of 6,000 feet. Rivers. The Save and its tributaries, the Bosnia, Verba, and Drin; and the Narenta in the S. Pro. Wheat, maize, barley, flax, hemp, tobacco, wines, olives, and fruits. A great number of cattle are reared, the pasturage being good. The sheep are celebrated for their wool, and there is an excellent breed of horses. Minerals. Gold, silver, mercury, lead, and iron. The last two only are allowed by the government to be mined. Pop. 1,100,000. Lat. between 42° 30′ and 45° 15′ N. Lon. between 15° 50′ and 19° 30′ E.—This country belonged to the ancient Pannonia, and, in the middle ages, was sometimes tributary to Hungary and sometimes to Servia. In 1463 it became tributary to Turkey and, in 1522, was united to that empire. The Bosniac have frequently risen against their rulers; and, in 1850-51, Omar Pasha gained considerable reputation by suppressing a rebellion against accepting the Tanzimat or reformed constitution of Turkey.

BOSPHORUS, or BOSPORUS, bos'-fo-rus, two narrow straits, situate at the confines of Europe and Asia. One was called Cimmerian, and joined the Palus Mæotis to the Euxine, and is called by the moderns the Strait of Kaffa; and the other was called the Thracian, and by the moderns "Canal of Constantinople," which connects the Euxine Sea with the Propontis. It is so narrow that, in a calm day, persons could converse with each other from the opposite banks.

BOSQUET, General, bos'-kā, a French commander, who, in 1829, entered the Polytechnic School, and, in 1833, became a sub-lieutenant in the artillery. In 1835 he went with his regiment to Algeria, where he began to distinguish himself. Between 1836 and 1848 he had passed through the successive ranks of captain, chef-de-bataillon, lieutenant-colonel, and colonel, when, in that year, he was appointed by the republican government, general of brigade. In 1854 the emperor Napoleon III. raised him to the rank of general of division, and enrolled him in the staff of the army of Marshal St. Arnaud. He was with the French army in the Crimea, where he greatly distinguished himself, and was wounded in the assault on the Malakoff tower at the siege of Sebastopol. He was made a marshal of France, and in 1859 appointed to a command in the war against Austria. B. at Pau, in 1810.

BOSSUET, James, bos'-soo-ai, a celebrated French preacher, who, in 1669, was made bishop of Condom, at which time he was also appointed tutor to the dauphin, for whom he composed his "Discourse on Universal History," which was printed in 1681. It was from this work that Voltaire conceived his opinion of Bossuet's great eloquence. It is divided into three parts, and Mr. Charles Butler, a critic, says that it scarcely contains a sentence in which there is not some noun or verb conveying an image, or suggesting a sentiment of the noblest kind. The same year he was made bishop of Meaux. In 1697 he was appointed counsellor of state. Bossuet distinguished himself as a controversialist against the Protestants, and his "Exposition of the Doctrine of the Catholic Church upon Matters of Controversy" was written with so much talent and ingenuity as to draw many persons over to popery. It was translated into several languages, and procured for the author the thanks of the pope. Several able Protestants attacked the bishop, who encountered them with great spirit. B. at Dijon, 1627; D. at Paris, 1704.—His funeral orations are, no doubt, splendid, affecting, and eloquent; but their style is by far too dramatic to suit the tastes of those who view the occasions which call them forth, as being better adapted for an humble expression of sorrow, than for a pompous display of sentiment.

BOSTON, bos'-ton, a seaport-town and parish of Lincolnshire, situate on both sides of the river Witham, 28 miles from Lincoln. Area of parish, 5,220 acres. This is an ancient town, and was formerly rich in monastic and religious institutions, though scarcely a vestige is now left of the six friaries and three colleges which it once contained. The parish church, dedicated to St. Botolph, is a noble Gothic structure, justly admired for its elegance and simplicity. It was founded in 1309. Besides the church, there are places of worship belonging to Baptists of different denominations, to Unitarians, and Methodists; also a Quaker meeting-house. The neighbouring sea yields great numbers of fish; and a considerable traffic is carried on in shrimps, immense quantities of which are sent to London. Since the inclosure of the neighbouring fens, large quantities of oats are annually shipped for London. Pop. 17,600.—A station on the Great Northern Railway.

BOSTON, the capital of Massachusetts, U.S., stands on a peninsula at the bottom of a fine bay, about 210 miles from New York. It is built in the form of a crescent about the harbour, gradually rising backwards upon a slope. The streets are generally spacious and well built of red brick; but the surface on which they are laid being uneven, they have a somewhat irregular appearance. The principal edifices are the State-house, Faneuil-hall, the City-hall, Exchange, hospital, Custom-house, gaol, houses of industry and correction, an athenæum, an Odeon, about one hundred churches, and two theatres. There are a great many schools, literary, scientific, and charitable institutions, and the medical branch of the Harvard University is here. Literature flourishes in this town above, perhaps, any place in the United States,—authors, printers, and publishers existing in large numbers. Longfellow's poems, Prescott's histories, Mrs. Stowe's "Uncle Tom," were all originally published in Boston. The harbour is commodious, the largest class of vessels being able to lie close to the quays. There is a beautiful park, comprising fifty acres, and forming a fine promenade. Imp. This town being the great emporium of New England, it imports most kinds of European manufactures, E. and W. India produce, and flour, grain, cotton, tobacco, staves, and coal from most of the other states of the Union. Exp. Beef, pork, lard, woollen and cotton manufactured goods, cordage, boots, shoes, paper, hardware, and furniture. Pop. in 1850, 138,788; including the villages within a compass of 9 miles round the Exchange, the population was, in the same year, 269,874. Lat. 42° 21′ 23″ N. Lon. 71° 4′ 9″ W.—Boston was founded about 1630, and was formerly called Trimountain, from three hills, on and around which it is built. It was subsequently called Boston, in compliment to the Rev. John Cotton, who had been a clergyman at Boston, in Lincolnshire, and who had fled here from religious persecution. It is called the cradle of American independence. In June, 1775, the battle of Bunker's Hill was fought in its neighbourhood, where there is a granite column commemorating the victory over the British. It is the birthplace of Franklin the philosopher.

BOSWELL, James, bos'-wel, the biographer of Dr. Johnson, was the son of Alexander Boswell, of Auchinleck, one of the justices of session. He was educated at the school and university of Edinburgh, and early distinguished himself by his love of poetry and the belles-lettres. Being, however, rather addicted to pleasure, and wishing to enter into the army, his father, who designed him for his own profession, would not allow him to adopt a military life. At his request he went to London, where he contracted an intimacy with Dr. Johnson and other men of literary eminence. Thence he went to Utrecht and studied the civil law; after which he travelled through Germany and Switzerland. In the latter country he was introduced to Rousseau, and at Ferney visited Voltaire. He next went to Italy, and passed over to Corsica, where, by means of an introductory letter which he received from Rousseau, he formed an intimacy with General Paoli. On his return he published an account of Corsica. About this time he was admitted an advocate at the Scotch bar, and distinguished himself in the famous Douglas cause against the Hamilton family, who laid claim to the property of the last duke of Douglas, in opposition to Mr. Archibald Douglas, the legitimacy of whose birth was disputed. The indolence of his disposition, however, coupled with his fondness for pleasure, were powerful impediments to his advancement in the legal profession; accordingly, he made little progress as a votary of Themis. In 1773 he accompanied Dr. Johnson in a tour through the Highlands and the western isles of Scotland, of which tour he wrote an entertaining account, published in 1785. On the death of his father he removed to London, and was admitted at the English bar, but never attained any considerable practice. By the favour of Lord Lonsdale, however, he was chosen recorder of Carlisle. In 1790 he published a book of high value in biographical literature,—"The Memoirs of Dr. Johnson," in 2 vols. 4to, and since reprinted in 3 vols. 8vo. It is upon this work that his fame rests. It has received the commendation of the highest authorities, has given gratification to thousands upon thousands of readers, and presents us with the best portrait of a great man that has ever been painted. B. at Edinburgh, 1740; D. 1795.—It may be considered a somewhat curious fact, that during more than the twenty years of acquaintance which subsisted between Dr. Johnson and Boswell, they had been in each other's company not more than 276 days. This period embraces their tour to the Hebrides, when they were together from the 18th of August to the 22nd of November, 1773. Out of this period one of the most entertaining books that has ever been written was produced,—a book which is the richest storehouse of wit and wisdom of which any language can boast.

BOSWORTH, bos'-worth, a town of Leicestershire, 11 miles from Leicester. The church is spacious, and has a beautiful spire. Pop. 2,500, chiefly engaged in knitting worsted stockings.—About three miles from the town is Bosworth Field, where, in 1458, the memorable battle between Richard III. and the earl of Richmond, afterwards Henry VII., was fought. On Crownhill, an adjoining knoll, Lord Stanley put the crown upon the head of "Courageous Richmond." In allusion to this fact, Shakspere makes Stanley say, in Richard III.,—

"Lo! here this long usurpèd royalty,
From the dead temples of this bloody wretch,
Have I pluck'd off, to grace thy brows withal;
Wear it, enjoy it, and make much of it."

BOSWORTH, Joseph, D.D., F.R.S., &c., an eminent Anglo-Saxon scholar and philologist, who was reared for the church, in which he officiated for several years, both in England and Scotland; but whose declining health forced him to resign his duties. In 1823 he published his "Elements of Anglo-Saxon Grammar," which brought him into correspondence and acquaintance with some of the leading Anglo-Saxon scholars of the day. In 1838 his "Dictionary of the Anglo-Saxon Language" appeared, of which another edition, in a more compendious form, was published in 1848. After that period he occupied himself in translating several Anglo-Saxon works, and in preparing for publication the Anglo-Saxon and Morso-Gothic gospels in parallel columns. B. in Derbyshire, 1788.

Botany Bay, bot'-a-ne, a bay on the south-east coast of Australia, New South Wales, 5 miles from Sydney. Lat. 34° S. Lon. 151° 15′ E. It was, in 1770, discovered by Captain Cook, who named it Botany, from the great quantity of herbs which he found on its shores. In 1787 it became an English penal settlement. In 1825 a column was erected on its shore to the memory of La Perouse, the French navigator.

Bothnia, both'-ne-a, an extensive province in the north of Europe, which was formerly divided into East and West, the eastern division being ceded to Russia at the peace of Frederickshamm in 1809. West Bothnia, with Lapland, constitutes the most northern portion of Sweden, reaching, on the west side of the gulf, from the borders of Angermanland to Tornea. It is divided into the four districts of Umea, Pitea, Lulea, and Tornea, so called from their chief towns. Area, about 62,500 square miles. Lat. between 63° 30′ and 69° N. Lon. between 14° 20′ and 24° E.

Bothnia, Gulf of, is that part of the Baltic Sea which separates Sweden from Finland. It begins at the island of Aland, and extends 360 miles in length and 135 in extreme breadth, to Tornea, between lat. 60° 20′ and 65° 50′ N.—This gulf receives nearly all the great rivers of Sweden and Finland; but its depth is not greater than that of the Baltic generally.

Bothwell, both'-well, a village and parish in Lanarkshire, Scotland, 9 miles from Glasgow. Pop. 15,300.—This village is famous for a battle fought, in 1679, between the Scottish Covenanters and the royal forces, wherein the former were completely routed. Bothwell Bridge was the scene of the action. Reached by the Clydesdale Junction Railway.

Bothwell, James Hepburn, Earl, remarkable in the history of Scotland in connection with Mary, queen of Scots, and his supposed share in the murder of Henry Darnley, her husband. When that unfortunate prince was blown up in the house where he slept, in the vicinity of Holyrood palace, suspicion fell strongly upon Bothwell and the queen. Bothwell was tried and acquitted. After this, he seized Mary near Edinburgh, and carried her prisoner to Dunbar Castle, where he first endeavoured, by soothing speeches and protestations of love, to prevail on her to marry him. That she did so at last is certain; but it is said, and seemingly with justice, that she was forced to it by the worst advantages being taken of her. During these iniquitous proceedings, Bothwell procured a divorce from his former wife. Mary soon after created him earl of Orkney. But a confederacy among the lords being formed against him, he retired to the Orkneys, and thence to Denmark, where he died in prison, it is said confessing his own guilt and the queen's innocence of the king's murder. D. in the castle of Malmory, in 1576.—This is the historical personage chosen by Professor Aytoun for the hero of his poem of "Bothwell." (See Aytoun.)

Botta, Carlo Guiseppe, bot'-ta, an Italian, who studied medicine at the university of Turin, and in 1786, took a doctor's degree. He wrote several historical works, and received a pension, with the honour of knighthood, from Charles Albert, king of Sardinia. He wrote a "History of Italy," and a continuation of Guicciardini's history from 1530 down to 1789; upon the merits of which public opinion is divided. He is also the author of a "History of American Independence," which has been highly spoken of in the United States. B. at San Giorgio, Piedmont, 1766; D. at Paris, 1837.

Botta, Paul Emile, son of the above, became French consul at Mosul, and early distinguished himself as a naturalist. After spending some years in Egypt, and making a journey through a portion of Arabia, he settled at Mosul, and in 1843 disentombed an Assyrian palace in the mound of Khorsabad, 14 miles from the seat of his consulship. This was before the discoveries made by Mr. Layard; so that M. Botta may be considered the first who led the way in the path of Assyrian remains. B. at Paris, about 1800.

Bouche, boosh, under Napoleon I., this was the prefix to the names of several departments of the French empire.

Bouches-du-Rhone. (See Rhone, Mouths of.)

Bouchier, Thomas, boo'-sheer, an archbishop of Canterbury, who is said to have introduced the art of printing into England in 1464, by bringing over a compositor from Haarlem at his own expense. D. 1486.

Bouffleis, Lewis Francis de, boof'-flai, a marshal of France, who early in life entered the army, and in 1669 became colonel of a regiment of dragoons, and distinguished himself in several actions under the gallant Turenne. In 1708, after the battle of Oudenarde, he defended Lisle against Prince Eugene, for which he was created a peer. At the battle of Malplaquet, he effected his retreat without losing any of his artillery or soldiers. This was his last public achievement. B. 1644; D. at Fontainebleau, 1711.—When William III. took Namur, he kept Bouffliers prisoner, contrary to the capitulation. The marshal asking the reason of this conduct, was told it was on account of the French having kept the garrison of Dixmude: "Then," said he, "mine ought to be detained rather than myself." "Sir," it was replied, "you are of more value than 10,000 men."

Boughton, baw'-ton, the name of a number of English parishes, none of which has a population over 1,500.

Bouillon, boo'-ee-yawng, the chief town of a duchy of the same name, in Belgium, 50 miles from Namur. It is small, but neatly built, and has a castle. Pop. 2,700, principally engaged in the manufacture of woollens.

Bouillon, Godfrey, duc de, one of the leaders in the Crusades. He took Antioch and Jerusalem, of which the Christian soldiery proclaimed him the first Latin king. He, however, rejected the title, and contented himself with that of "Defender and Baron of the Holy Sepulchre." In 1099 he defeated the sultan of Egypt at Ascalon. B. about 1060; D. 1100.—The glowing eulogy of Tasso preserves the memory of this warrior fresh in the minds of the lovers of historical romance.

Boulac, Boolak, or Bulak, boo'-lak, a town of Egypt, situate on the Nile, 1 mile from Cairo, of which it is a suburb. Pop. about 13,000.—In 1799 this place was burned by the French; but it was rebuilt by Mehemet Ali, and has since become a town of considerable importance. It is the place whence the passengers for Suez and India debark.

Boulogne-sur-Mer, boo'-loyne, an old seaport-town of France, in the department of the Pas de Calais, at the mouth of the Liane, 20 miles from Calais. The town is divided into Upper and Lower. The latter lies on the shore, and is better built, and considerably more populous, than the other, which, at a short distance, stands on an eminence. It has a cathedral, an episcopal palace, a town-hall, and other public buildings. The inhabitants of Boulogne carry on an active trade in fresh and salt fish, especially herrings and mackerel, which are caught in great numbers off the coast; also in coal, salt, fresh and salted butter, soap, and earthenware, as well as in the linen and woollen stuffs manufactured in the town. Pop. 31,000. Lat. 50° 44′ 32″ N. Lon. 1° 36′ 15″ E.—It has steam communication with Folkstone, and is at the head of the railway from Boulogne to Amiens and Paris.

Boulogne, a parish and town of France on the Seine, about 4 miles from Paris. Pop. nearly 8,000.—The "Bois de Boulogne," which Napoleon III. immensely improved, takes its name from this town, and is the most beautiful and fashionable promenade in the vicinity of Paris.

Boulton, Matthew, bolt'-ton, an inventor and improver in the mechanical arts. In 1769 he entered into communication with Watt, the improver of the steam-engine; after which the Soho works, near Birmingham, became famous for the mechanical skill displayed in the construction of its steam-engines. His coining-machinery was a triumph of its kind, and he, in conjunction with his partner, Watt, greatly contributed to give an impetus to British industry. B. at Birmingham, 1728; D. 1809.—Boulton was of a generous and ardent disposition, and is said to have expended £47,000 in experiments on the steam-engine, before Watt had so far perfected it as to bring any return of profit.

Bou-Maza, boo'-ma'-za, an Arab chief, whose real name was Si Mahomet ben Abdallah. Like Abd-el-Kader, he acquired in early life a saintly reputation, and, declaring himself invulnerable, promised heaven and riches to all who assisted in the expulsion of the French from Africa. In 1845, in connection with Abd-el-Kader, he obtained several advantages over the generals of France, but was subsequently, in 1846, defeated by Colonel (afterwards Marshal) St. Arnaud. Ultimately, on 10th January, 1847, General Herbillon completely routed his forces, and he surrendered in the following April to St. Arnaud. Brought to France, he had a handsome residence assigned to him in Paris, with a pension of 15,000 francs. In 1854 he quitted the French soil, commanded, during the Russian war, a body of Bashi-Bazouks, and was made a colonel in the Turkish service. B. about 1820.—(See Abd-el-Kader.)

Bourbon, boor'-bawng, the family of, succeeded the line of Valois, and reigned in France from 1589 to 1848, except during the period of the Napoleonic régime. It is a branch of the stock of Capet, being descended from a brother of Philip the Fair.

Bourbon, Charles, duke of, constable of France, was the son of Gilbert, count of Montpensier, who distinguished himself at the famous battle of Marignan, in 1516, but soon after fell into disgrace, through the enmity of the mother of Francis I., whose offer of marriage he had rejected. On this he associated with Charles V. and the king of England against his sovereign. The plot, however, was discovered, and he escaped into Italy, where he became lieutenant-general to the emperor Charles, and afterwards his commander-in-chief. B. 1489; killed in an assault upon Rome, 1527.

Bourbon, or Reunion, an island in the Indian Ocean, about 400 miles to the east of Madagascar. Ext. 38, with a breadth of 28 miles. Desc. The island is composed of two mountains; the smallest is the southern one, in which the volcanic fires are still raging. A great part of its surface is a complete volcanic desert, destitute of every kind of vegetation. In other parts, however, the soil is fertile, the air pure, the climate delicious, and the sky always beautiful. Its volcanic peaks range from 7,218 to 10,100 feet above the level of the sea. Pro. Coffee, tobacco, sugar, rice, and cloves. The forests contain wood fit for shipbuilding; also aloe, ebony, palm, with a variety of trees that afford odoriferous gums and resins. Though earthquakes are unknown, the island is subject to violent hurricanes, which injure the crops, often throw down houses, root up trees, and occasion the destruction of shipping. Towns. St. Denis is the principal and capital. Pop. about 105,000, inclusive of the inhabitants of some small neighbouring islands. Lat. 20° 51′ 43″ S. Lon. 55° 30′ 18″ E.—This island was, in 1545, discovered by the Portuguese, and in 1810 was occupied by the English, and restored to France in 1814. It is the only settlement now possessed by the French between Africa and India.

Bourdeilles, Peter de. (See Brantome.)

Bourg, boorg, the name of a great number of towns and villages in France, of which the principal is the capital of the department of Ain, situate 20 miles from Macon. Pop. upwards of 12,000.—It is the birthplace of Lalande, the astronomer.

Bourges, boorj, a large but ill-built town of France, in the department of Cher, 123 miles from Paris. It stands on a rising ground, between the rivers Yévrette and Auron, which here unite their streams. The only public buildings of note are the fine Gothic cathedral, and the great tower, formerly used as a state prison. Manf. Silk, woollen, and cotton stuffs, stockings, caps, and other articles of clothing. The chief articles of trade are corn, wine, cattle, wool, hemp, and cloth. Pop. 26,000.—This town, in the time of Cæsar, was one of the strongest cities of Gaul. It is the birthplace of Louis XI., and a station on the railway du Centre.

Bourmont, Louis Auguste Victor de Chaisne, Marshal Count de, boor'-mawng, a French general, who, at the age of 15, entered the army, and, under the empire of Napoleon I., rose to be one of his marshals. On the fall of the emperor, he attached himself to the Bourbons, and in 1830 was appointed to the command of the army which was to reduce Algeria under the power of France. In a few weeks he won this extensive colony, but was superseded in his command by General Clauzel, who charged him with having appropriated to his own purposes the treasure of one of the captured towns. After this he retired from public life, living in exile in Germany, Holland, and England, as his inclination led him. On the accession of Louis Philippe he was permitted to return to France, when he took up his residence in the castle of Bourmont, in Anjou, where he lived in strict retirement to the time of his death. B. at Paris, 1773; D. at the castle of Bourmont, in Anjou, in 1846.

Bourne, Vincent, born, an English poet, usher of Westminster School, whose effusions show a classical taste and a fertile imagination. B. about 1696; D. 1747.

Bourrienne, Louis Antoine Fauvelet de, boor'-re-en, in his ninth year entered the military school of Brienne, where he became acquainted with the future emperor, Napoleon I., of France. From being schoolfellows they became acquaintances, and from acquaintances friends. Bourrienne was being educated for the French artillery, but was forced to relinquish the military profession when he found that he could not hold a commission in the French army unless he could give proofs of being of noble lineage. Directing his ambition into another channel, in his twentieth year he was attached to the embassy of the Marquis de Noailles, ambassador of Louis XVI. at the court of the emperor Joseph of Austria. In 1792 he returned to Paris, after two years of the study of international law at Warsaw, and a short stay at the Polish court of King Poniatowski. Napoleon was in Paris at this time, and the friendship of the two schoolfellows was renewed. The fortunes of neither of them were very bright, and they used to share the purses of each other, and wander about the streets of Paris without employment. It was at this period that they beheld, on the 20th June, the attack which was made by the people on the Tuileries, and which is so spiritedly described in Bourrienne's "Life of Napoleon." On the fall of the Bourbons and the rise of Napoleon, Bourrienne became his private secretary, a post which he held from 1796 to 1802, when he was dismissed for some scandalous connection with the house of Coulon, the army contractors. In 1805 he was appointed chargé d'affaires of France for the circle of Lower Saxony, in which office he was charged with peculation, and forced to refund a million of francs. He was now a ruined man. On the fall of Napoleon he attached himself to the Bourbon dynasty, and became a deputy for the department of Yonne in the representative chamber. In 1828 he was compelled to seek refuge in Belgium from his creditors, where he commenced writing his Memoirs of the emperor. This work was published in ten volumes in the course of 1829-30, and created an immense sensation. This was the greatest act of his life. The revolution of 1830 unsettled his reason, when he was put into an hospital for the insane in Caen, Normandy, where he ended his days. B. at Sens, 1769; D. 1834.

Bourtang, boor'-tawng, a fortress of the Netherlands, in Groningen, in an extensive morass, 12 miles from Winschoten. In 1593 it was taken by the Spaniards, and in 1795 again by the French.

Boussa, boos'-sa, a town of Central Africa, on the Niger, east of Timbuctoo. Pop. estimated at 15,000. Lat. 10° 14′ N. Lon. 5° 20′ E.—Here Mungo Park, the traveller, was murdered.

Bouvines, boo'-veen, a fortified town of the Netherlands, 6 miles from Lille. Here, in 1214, the emperor Otho was defeated by Philip Augustus.

Bow, or Stratford le Bow, bo, a village and parish in the county of Middlesex, 4 miles from St. Paul's. Area, 630 acres. Pop. 7,000. It is a station on the Eastern Counties Railway.

Bowdich, Thomas Edward, bou'-dich, an English traveller who forms one of the exploring band who have helped to render the continent of Africa known to the eyes of men by their explorations and writings. He was the son of a Bristol merchant, and was for a short time a partner in his father's house. In 1814, however, he embarked for Cape-Coast Castle, where his uncle, Mr. Hope Smith, was governor of the settlements belonging to the African Company. Returning to England in 1816, he was appointed the chief of a mission to the king of the Ashantees. The embassy was quite successful, mainly through the energy and talents of young Bowdich; and in 1819 he published an account of it, with the title "A Mission to Ashantee." He then went to Paris, where he resided about eighteen months, engaged in the study of natural science. In 1822, after having published several works, by which he made some money, he undertook another voyage to Africa, with the view of exploring that continent. He reached, with his wife, the mouths of the Gambia (see AFRICA), and there, being seized with fever, died, January 10, 1824. B. at Bristol, 1790.—After his death, Mrs. Bowdich published several works, from materials collected by her husband in his various travels.

BOWDITCH ISLAND, bo'-ditch, an island in the South Pacific Ocean, 8 miles long and 4 broad. Pop. 600. Lat. 9° 23′ S. Lon. 141° 12′ W. The American exploring expedition discovered this island in 1841.

BOWLES, Reverend William Lisle, boles, was educated at Oxford, and received several preferments in the Church, when, in 1828, he became canon residentiary of Salisbury Cathedral. He is distinguished in the annals of literature, not only by a great many excellent publications, but by the "Pope and Bowles controversy," which lasted from 1819 to 1828. This controversy originated in a proposition which Mr. Bowles thus laid down in his "Essay on the Poetical Character of Pope:"—"All images drawn from what is beautiful or sublime in nature are more beautiful and sublime than images drawn from art, and are therefore more poetical; and in like manner, the passions of the human heart, which belong to nature in general, are, per se, more adapted to the higher species of poetry than those which are derived from incidental and transient manners." Both Byron and Campbell entered the lists against him. The proposition of Mr. Bowles, however, in our opinion, is sound. B. at King's Sutton, Northamptonshire, 1762; D. at Salisbury, in 1850.

BOWRING, Sir John, bou'-ring, a various and voluminous writer, who has distinguished himself in the paths of philology, politics, poetry, and as a translator and reviewer. His knowledge of the principal European languages is not only extensive but accurate, which is proved by the translation she has, from time to time, given to the world, of the poetry of different nations. These compriso "Specimens of the Russian Poets," "Batavian Anthology," "Specimens of the Polish Poets," "Ancient Poetry and Romances of Spain," "Specimens of the Magyars," and "Christian Anthology." In 1825 he was appointed to the editorship of the "Westminster Review," in which the principles of Jeremy Bentham received a large share of his exposition. In 1834-5 he was sent as a commissioner to France, to report on the actual state of commerce between that country and Great Britain. He also visited Switzerland, Italy, and Syria, studying their commercial relations, and reporting upon them to Parliament. In 1835 he became a member of the House of Commons, in which he sat till 1837. In 1841 he was again elected, and kept his seat till 1849. Between 1838 and 1839 he produced a complete edition of the works of Jeremy Bentham, edited by himself, and published at Edinburgh, in 11 volumes. In 1849 he was appointed British consul at Hong-Kong, and superintendent of trade in China. In 1853 he returned to London, and published his "Decimal System," and in 1854 was knighted and appointed governor of Hong-Kong. In November, 1856, in consequence of acts of hostility against the British, he ordered Admiral Seymour to bombard the city of Canton, and thus commenced the war with China, which ended in the treaty of Tien-tsin, which see, as also ELGIN, Lord. B. at Exeter, 1792.

BOWYER, William, bo'-yer, the most learned English printer of whom we have any account. Both his father and grandfather were printers; so that the noble art may be said to have become hereditary in his family. In 1716 he was admitted a sizar of St. John's College, Cambridge, where he remained till 1722. From this period he commenced contributing to various learned works in the way of corrections, annotations, prefaces, &c., whilst, at the same time, he superintended his printing business. In 1763 his celebrated edition of the Greek Testament, with conjectural emendations, appeared. This work has been much commended and been translated into German. It is, however, as an erudite and critically accurate printer of the works of others that Bowyer is celebrated. His bust in marble, with a portrait of his father, is to be seen in Stationers' Hall. B. in London, 1699; D. 1777.

BOX, box, a parish in Wiltshire, 7 miles from Chippenham. Area, 4,130 acres. Pop. 2,000.—In this parish the Great Western Railway runs through a freestone hill by a tunnel 1¼ mile long.

BOXTEL, box'-tel, a village of the Netherlands, 6 miles from Bois-le-Duc, in the province of North Brabant. Pop. about 4,000.—Here, in 1794, the Anglo-Dutch army was defeated by the French.

BOYACA, bo-ya'-ka, a department of Bolivia, S. America, including the whole of the E. Andes, and comprising the provinces of Canazare, Pamplona, Socorro, and Tunja. It is watered by several rivers, and produces coffee, cotton, indigo, tobacco, caiva, and wheat.—The village of Boyaca stands 5 miles from Tunja, and is remarkable for a victory which secured the independence of Colombia, and which was achieved by Bolivia over the Spaniards in 1819.

BOYD, Robert, Lord, boid, a Scotch nobleman, was the son of Sir Thomas Boyd, of Kilmarnock, who was killed in 1439, in revenge for having murdered Lord Darnley. The son acquired great popularity with King James II. and the people. The former created him a peer by the title of Lord Boyd of Kilmarnock. On the death of that monarch, in 1460, he was appointed justiciary of the kingdom, and one of the lords of the regency during the minority of James III. He and his family engrossed almost all the public offices to themselves, and went so far as to carry off the young king from Linlithgow to Edinburgh, where Lord Boyd got himself declared sole regent. He also effected a marriage between the king's sister and his son, afterwards earl of Arran. In 1469 the king, at the instigation of some of his nobles, called a parliament to examine into the conduct of Boyd, who fled to England. D. at Alnwick, 1470.—The earl of Arran was divorced from his lady, and died in exile at Antwerp, in 1474. The unfortunate Lord Kilmarnock, who suffered in 1746, was a descendant of this house.

BOYDELL, John, boi'-del, an ingenious artist, and magistrate of London, was brought up a land-surveyor under his father; but seeing some landscapes which greatly pleased him, he apprenticed himself to an engraver. In 1745 he published some small landscapes for the use of learners, and the encouragement he received induced him to persevere in engraving and publishing. He also sought out English artists, to whom he was a liberal patron, particularly to Woollet. But Mr. Boydell did not confine himself to prints. He had the honour to establish an English school of historical painting, which received the name of the Shakspeare Gallery. He also presented to the corporation of London some fine pictures for the council-chamber in Guildhall. In 1791 he was made lord mayor. By the French revolution, and the consequent war, this worthy man experienced such losses as to be under the necessity of procuring an act of parliament for the disposal of the Shakspeare Gallery, and his pictures and prints, by way of lottery. B. at Dorrington, 1719; D. 1804.

BOYER, Abel, bwoi'-yai, a French lexicographer and grammarian, who quitted his country on the revocation of the edict of Nantes. He went to Geneva, and afterwards visited England, where he taught the French language and compiled a French and English grammar and dictionary, which have gone through numerous editions. B. at Castres, 1664; D. in England, 1729.

BOYLE, Robert, boil, a learned writer and philosopher, the seventh son of Richard, earl of Cork. He early devoted himself to the study of natural science; was frequently present at Oxford, where a philosophical society was held, which afterwards became the famous Royal Society, of which he was one of the earliest members. In 1654 he fixed his residence at this town, for the sake of enjoying the company of his learned friends. Here he remained till 1668, applying himself principally to experimental philosophy, and contriving a more perfect air-pump than that which had hitherto been in use. Natural philosophy, however, was not the only subject which engaged his attention at this period of his life. He cultivated an acquaintance with the learned languages, and devoted so much time to the study of theology and sacred criticism, that at the restoration of Charles II. he was pressed to enter into orders, with a view of being raised to the episcopacy. A natural diffidence, however, induced him to decline this and every other offer of preferment. Whilst labouring incessantly in the cause of science, he did not neglect the duties of the Christian philanthropist, and particularly exerted himself in advancing designs of charity and schemes of improvement. As a director of the East-India Company, he was the principal instrument in procuring their charter; for which he only required, as a return, that they would do something towards propagating Christianity in their settlements. With this view he caused to be printed at Oxford 500 copies of the Gospels and Acts of the Apostles, in the Malay tongue. He was also at the expense of printing, in Arabic, "Grotius de Veritate." In 1678 he declined the high honour of the presidency of the Royal Society. Three years afterwards he was engaged in promoting the propagation of the gospel among the Indians of North America. Two years before his death he was obliged to have recourse to an advertisement to prevent the intrusion of visitors, and thus gained time to perfect some important works, particularly in the department of chemistry. B. at Lismore, in Ireland, 1627; D. in London, 1691, a week after his sister, Lady Ranelagh, with whom he had resided since 1688.—By his will he founded an annual lecture at St. Paul's, on the principal truths of natural and revealed religion. It is said, that, from imitating the stammering of other children, he, when young, contracted the habit, which afterwards proved incurable.

Boyle, a barony of Ireland, in the county of Roscommon. Area, 94,283 Irish acres, of which about 30,000 are waste and bog.

Boyle, a town and parish in the above barony, 8 miles from Carrick-on-Shannon. Area, 20,737 acres. Pop. of parish, 10,265; of town, 3,500.—This place is situate on the banks of a river of the same name.

Boyne, boin, a river of Ireland, rising in the Bog of Allen, near Carbery, and falling into the Irish Sea, 4 miles below Drogheda. On the banks of this river, 3 miles to the west of Drogheda, the "battle of the Boyne" was fought and won by William III. over the forces of James II., on the 1st July, 1690.

Bozrah, boz'-ra, 'tribulation,' a famous city of Idumea, on the frontiers of Edom and Moab.

Bozzaris, boz-za'-ris, Marco, the Leonidas of modern Greece, was a Souliote, who distinguished himself by his devotion to his country in defending it against the Turks. He fell in the August of 1823, in a night attack upon a body of Albanians, who were advancing with the view of taking Missolonghi, which he had successfully defended for a considerable time. B. about the beginning of the present century, in the mountains of Epirus. Fell near Kerpinisi, 1st August, 1823. This Greek hero was buried in Missolonghi with every mark of honour, when the Greek executive government issued a decree, in which they styled him the Leonidas of modern Greece.

Brabant, duchy of, brä-bänt' (Fr. brab'-a), formerly one of the most important provinces of the Netherlands, but now divided into the provinces of Antwerp and South Brabant in Belgium, and North Brabant, which still forms a part of Holland. For its history, see Holland, &c.

Brabant, North, a province of the Netherlands. Area, 2,000 square miles. Desc. A uniform level, without much fertility, bare of wood, and in some parts forming large marshes. Rivers. The Aa, Maese, Dommel, Donge, and Dintel. Pro. Wheat, rye, oats, lint, and fruit. Sheep and cattle rearing is the chief branch of rural industry. Manf. Linen, woollen, and cotton fabrics, earthenware, and leather. Pop. about 404,000. Lat. between 51° 13′ and 51° 50′ N. Lon. between 4° 12′ and 5° 58′ E.

Brabant, South, a province of Belgium, occupying a central position in that kingdom. Area, 1,200 square miles. Desc. Hilly in the south, well watered, and fertile. Rivers. The Dyle, Senne, and Demer. Pro. Corn, hemp, flax, hops, and oil-seed. Cattle and sheep rearing is extensively pursued, and a considerable portion of the soil is occupied by wood. Minerals. Iron and stone. Manf. Woollen, cotton, and linen fabrics; lace, soap, leather, and chemicals. Pop. about 800,000. Lat. between 50° 32′ and 51° 3′ N. Lon. between 4° and 5° 10′ E.—It is intersected both by canals and railways.

Bracciolini, Francis, brat'che-o-le'-na, an Italian poet, whose poem, entitled "La Croce Ritaquistrata," published in 1605, is esteemed next to Tasso's "Jerusalem." B. at Pistoia, 1566; D. 1645.

Brachmanes, brăk-mai'-nes, Indian philosophers, who derive their name from Brahma, one of the three beings whom God, according to their theology, created, and with whose assistance he formed the world. According to some authors, Brahma is the parent of all mankind, or the patriarch Abraham, who, in the language of the Indian philosophers, is called Brachma or Brama.

Bradfield, brăd'-feeld, the name of several parishes in England with small populations, and of a chapelry, 7 miles from Sheffield, with a population of about 7,000.

Bradford, brăd'-ford, a market-town and parish in the West Riding of Yorkshire, 8 miles from Leeds. Area of parish, 33,710 acres. This is the principal seat of the stuff and woollen yarn manufactories of England. In its vicinity are both coal and iron-works, whilst it is connected with both the North and Irish seas by means of the Leeds and Liverpool Canal. It has several churches and chapels; an academic establishment, called Airedale College, at Undercliffe; a free grammar-school, a mechanics' institution, exchange, cloth-hall, court-house, gaol, a dispensary, infirmary, and several other charitable institutions. Pop. of parish, 149,543; of parliamentary borough, with its several townships of Bowling, Manningham, and Horton, 103,778. It is a station on the Great Northern Railway.

Bradford-on-Avon, a market-town and parish in Wiltshire, 30 miles from Salisbury. Area, 11,740 acres. This town is divided by the river Avon, and is celebrated for its woollen-cloth manufactures. Pop. 4,240.—There are several other parishes with small populations named Bradford in England.

Bradford, a county in Pennsylvania, U. S. Area, 1,170 square miles. Desc. Fertile, and producing wheat, oats, potatoes, Indian corn, and butter. Minerals. Coal, iron, and sandstone. It has a number of different kinds of mills, driven by water-power. Pop. 43,000.

Bradgate Park, brăd'-gait, a small parochial liberty, 5 miles from Leicester, where, in 1537, the unhappy Lady Jane Grey was born.

Bradley, James, brăd'-le, an eminent astronomer, who entered the Church, but, in 1721, becoming Savilian professor of astronomy at Oxford, he resigned his livings. In 1741 he succeeded Dr. Halley as astronomer royal, and, at the same time, the university of Oxford presented him with the degree of D.D. In the fifth year of his office he addressed a letter to the earl of Macclesfield, on the apparent motion of the fixed stars, for which he received the gold medal of the Royal Society. In 1748 he obtained a grant of £1,000 to procure instruments for the Greenwich observatory, and subsequently obtained a yearly pension of £250. B. at Shireborn, in Gloucestershire, 1692; D. at Chalford, 1762, and was buried in Minchinhampton.—Bradley was a careful observer, and Newton gave him the character of being the best astronomer in Europe. He discovered the laws of aberration and of nutation. He left behind him, in MS., a vast number of valuable observations, which were subsequently published, and which are computed at about 60,000 in number.

Bradshaw, John, brăd'-shaw, a noted English lawyer, who was named "President of the High Court of Justice," which sat in judgment on Charles I. For discharging the duties of this office, the Parliament rewarded him with a present of Summer Hill, a seat of the earl of St. Alban's. B. in Derbyshire, 1586; D. 1659. At the Restoration, his body, after being hung at Tyburn with the bodies of Cromwell and Ireton, was buried under the gallows.

Brady, Nicholas, brai'-de, a divine and poet, who is well known by his version of the Psalms of David, which he executed, in conjunction with Mr. Tate, and which is now generally used in churches. B. at Ban-don, Ireland, 1659; D. rector of Richmond and Clapham, Surrey, 1726.

BRAGA, bra'-ga, a city of Portugal, 35 miles from Oporto. This place is the residence of the primate of Portugal, and has a magnificent cathedral and palace. Manf. Cutlery, jewellery, and firearms. Pop. 17,000.

BRAGANÇA, bra-gan'-sa, a town of Portugal, in the province of Tras-os-Montes, on the Ferrenza, 26 miles from Miranda. It is protected by a citadel, and has a college. Manf. Silk, velvet, and other fabrics. Pop. 5,600.

BRAGANÇA, HOUSE OF, dates from the commencement of the 15th century, and is now represented in the reigning dynasty of the kingdom of Portugal. Its originator was a natural son of King John I., named Alfonso, who was, by his father, created duke of Bragança and lord of Guimaraens. He married Beatrix, daughter and heiress of the count of Barcellos and Ourem, from which union sprang the dukes of Bragança. The present line ascended the Portuguese throne in 1640, when that people revolted against the yoke of Spain, and when the then duke of Bragança was proclaimed, and assumed the title of John IV. From that period the crown has continued in the same line. This family also gave an emperor to Brazil.

BRAHE, Tycho, bra, a famous astronomer, was descended from a noble Swedish family, settled at Knudstorp, in Denmark, where he studied philosophy and rhetoric, with a view of making the law his profession. The solar eclipse, however, which happened whilst he was at the university of Copenhagen, in 1560, directed his attention to astronomy, which he considered as a divine study, and to which he applied himself with the greatest assiduity. In 1565 he returned home, and in a quarrel with a Danish nobleman lost his nose, which he supplied with an artificial one made of gold, so naturally formed and painted, that the defect was hardly to be perceived. About this time he ardently entered upon the study of chemistry, in hopes of finding the philosopher's stone. After this he travelled for some years, and on his return to Denmark, resided with his uncle, who furnished him with the means of making celestial observations; and here it was that, in 1573, he discovered a new star in the constellation Cassiopea. Shortly afterwards he incurred the displeasure of his relations by a marriage which was deemed imprudent on account of the humbleness of the connection; and the quarrel was so great, that the king was obliged to interfere to effect a reconciliation. At the command of his sovereign, Frederick II., he was somewhat reluctantly, on account of his rank, made to read lectures on astronomy at Copenhagen. The king, however, was so delighted with the pursuits of Brahe, that he gave him the isle of Hven or Hoen, where he laid the foundation of an observatory, to which he gave the name of Uraniburg, or the City of the Heavens. Besides this he had an observatory sunk in the ground, to which he gave the name of Stelberg, or the City of the Stars. The king added to the donation a pension and some lucrative places. In this situation he resided about twenty years; but on the death of the king he lost his pension, and in 1596, in the time of Christian IV., he was driven from his country by the united influences of ignorance, envy, and detraction. The emperor, Rudolph II., pressed him to come to his dominions, and in 1601 he settled at Prague, with a pension of 3,000 ducats. In 1600 he had been joined by the celebrated Kepler, and these illustrious men pursued their studies together until the death of Tycho. B. at Knudstorp, in Denmark, in 1546; D. at Prague, 1601.—He was a man of great genius, but superstitious, being addicted to judicial astrology and attentive to omens. His works show him to have been an accurate observer. The "Rudolphine Tables" and the "Historia Cœlestis" are the best.

BRAHMA, bra'-ma, one of the three gods who, according to the superstition of the Hindoos, were created by God, and who assisted in the creation of the world.

BRAHMAPOOTRA, bra'-ma-poo'-tra, the largest river of India, and known in Tibet by the name of the Sanpoo. It joins the Megna in lat. 25° 20′ N., and after receiving numerous affluents, and uniting with the Ganges 30 miles below Pubna, it takes the local name of Pudda, and falls into the Bay of Bengal. Entire length, 1,500 miles.

BRAHMINS, bra'-mins, Indian philosophers, who worship the god Brahma, live frugally, eating no flesh, and abstaining from the use of wine, and all carnal enjoyments. (See BRACHMANES.)

BRAMAH, Joseph, bra'-ma, the son of a Yorkshire farmer, who, from being a carpenter and joiner, went to London, and adopted the profession of engineer and machinist. In 1784 he patented the lock which goes by his name, and which is considered one of the most ingenious that has ever been invented. He also made numerous improvements in pumps, fire-engines, water-cocks, and the hydraulic press. His inventions in connection with this last, he patented in 1796. His whole life was directed to mechanical improvements, and his last patent was obtained for discovering a mode of preventing dry-rot in timber, by covering it with a thin coating of Parker's Roman cement. B. at Flamborough, in Yorkshire, 1749; D. in 1814.

BRAMANTE D'URBINO, Lazarus, bra-man'-tai, a celebrated Italian architect, who executed several great works for the popes Alexander VI. and Julius II. His fame, however, rests on his being the architect of St. Peter's, at Rome, of which magnificent cathedral he drew the plans, laid the foundations in 1513, but did not live to see it completed, leaving the execution of it at his death to Michael Angelo Buonarotti. B. at Castle Durante, in the duchy of Urbino, in 1444; D. at Rome, 1514.

BRAN, brăn, the son of Llyr, and father of Caradog, or Caractacus, king of Britain, is classed with Prydain and Dynwall, as having consolidated the form of elective monarchy in Britain. When his son was delivered up to the Romans, Bran and his family were carried to Rome, where they embraced the Christian religion, and at their return introduced it among their countrymen. D. about 80.

BRANDENBURG, bran'-den-boorg, an important province of Prussia, having Brunswick and Hanover on the W., Mecklenburg and Pomerania on the N., the grand duchy of Posen on the E., and Silesia, with a part of Saxony, Anhalt, and Magdeburg, on the S. Area, about 1,600 square miles. Desc. Flat, with a sandy soil, and comparatively unfruitful. Rivers. The Elbe and the Oder, which are connected by canals. Pro. Buckwheat, rye, hemp, flax, tobacco, hops, and potatoes. Minerals. Iron, alum, gypsum, and vitriol. Pop. 267,000.—This province is divided into the two regencies of Frankfort and Potsdam, and has numerous canals and railways.

BRANDENBURG, an old town of the above province, on the Havel, which divides it into the old and new towns, 37 miles from Berlin. Manf. Cloth and fustian, woven and knitted stockings; and there are breweries, tanneries, and a boat-building yard. Pop. 16,500.

BRANDENBURG, MARK OF, an old state of Germany, now comprised in the Prussian province of Brandenburg, a part of the province of Saxony. The margraves of Brandenburg having united themselves to the electorate, the great elector, Frederick III., in 1701, declared himself king of Prussia, with the title of Frederick I.

BRANDENBURG, NEW, a town of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, 18 miles from Strelitz. Manf. Woollen and cotton goods, leather, paper, and chemicals. Pop. 6,000.

BRANDON, brăn'-don, a town of Suffolk, on the Lesser Ouse, 70 miles from London. It has a trade in corn, malt, coals, and timber. Pop. 2,300.—It is a station on the Eastern Counties and Norwich Railway.

BRANDON, Charles. (See SUFFOLK, Duke of.)

BRANDT, Sebastian, brant, a German poet, who wrote a number of works, the most celebrated of which is "The Ship of Fools," a burlesque poem, in which he satirizes the writings of his age. It met with great success, and found translators in several countries. B. at Strasburg, 1454; D. 1520. (See BARCLAY, Alexander.)

BRANDT, a Hamburg chemist, who in 1669 accidentally discovered phosphorus, whilst making experiments with urine in search of gold. He received a pension from the elector of Hanover. D. about 1692.

BRASIDAS, brăs'-i-dăs, a Spartan general, who distinguished himself in the Peloponnesian war, and in 426 B.C. made himself master of Amphipolis. He was wounded in a combat with Cleon, the Athenian general, who was endeavouring to retake this place, and D. 422 B.C.

BRANDYWINE CREEK, brăn'-de-wine, a river of the United States, rising in Pennsylvania, and falling into Christiana Creek, at Wilmington.—At Chadd's Fort, on this river, a determined battle was fought on September 11th, 1777, between the British and American forces, when the former gained a complete victory.

BRANTOME, Lord Abbot of, bran'-tome, the name given to Peter de Bourdeilles. He was a licentious French writer, who, in fifteen volumes, has given us lively pictures of the times in which he lived, and is distinguished for his vivid descriptions of beauty, courtesy, and knightly prowess. B. at Périgord, 1527; D. at Richemont, 1614.

BRAUNSBERG, brouns'-bairg, a town of Prussia, on the Passarge, 35 miles from Konigsberg. Pop. 8,500. This is the birthplace of Baron Trenck, and in its cathedral lie the remains of the astronomer Copernicus, who in 1545 died and was buried here.

BRAVA, bra'-va, an island of Africa, in the Cape Verd archipelago. Ext. 7 miles long and 6 broad. Desc. Mountainous, but fertile. Pop. 5,000. Lat. 14° 19′ N. Lon. 21° 45′ W.—This island was, in 1680, taken possession of by the Portuguese, when they were driven from the neighbouring island of Fogo by a volcanic eruption.

BRAVO MURILLO, Don Juan, bra'-vo moo-reel'-yo, a modern Spanish statesman, who has been an active participator in the numerous changes in the government of his country. He held office in 1836 under the Isturitz ministry, and in 1840 was compromised in a conspiracy formed against the regent Espartero, being obliged to take refuge in France for three years. In 1847 he was minister of justice under the duke of Sotomayor, and afterwards served under Narvaez, as minister of commerce, public works, and finance. When that minister resigned, in 1850, Bravo Murillo remained at the head of affairs; but just as he seemed all-powerful, he, in 1852, lost the favour of the queen, and fell. He was a Conservative, opposing all reform. B. 1803.

BRAY, Sir Reginald, brai, an eminent statesman, who assisted in placing Henry VII. upon the throne, and with whom he was in great favour. Besides being a politician, he seems to have possessed a genius for architecture, as Henry the Seventh's chapel at Westminster was built under his direction. D. 1501, and was buried at Windsor.

BRAY, Thomas, an English divine, who, after being in Virginia, U.S., for some time, returned to England, and formed the scheme of establishing parochial libraries. He laboured with great zeal in his favourite object of propagating the gospel among the Indians and negroes, and went to America several times to promote it. In 1696 he took the degree of D.D., and in 1706 accepted the living of St. Botolph, Aldgate. B. in Shropshire, 1656; D. 1730. He wrote "Catechetical Lectures," "Bibliotheca Parochialis," and some other religious pieces.

BRAY, a parish of Berkshire, on the Thames, 2 miles from Maidenhead. Area, 8,900 acres. Pop. 4,000. Monkey Island is here, situate in the Thames.—This is the parish in which Pendleton, the time-serving vicar of the reign of Henry VIII., officiated, and lived and died the "Vicar of Bray," notwithstanding the many changes of doctrine which took place in the reign of that monarch and his three successors. The well-known song, the "Vicar of Bray," was written in allusion to this easy changing individual. The concluding lines of each verse, are:—

> "That this is law, I will maintain,
> Until my dying day, Sir,
> That whatsoever king shall reign,
> I'll be Vicar of Bray, Sir."

BRAY, a maritime town and parish of Ireland, 12 miles from Dublin. Area of parish, 2,986 acres. Pop. 3,200.—The scenery in the neighbourhood of this town is remarkably beautiful.

BRAZIL, bra-zil', an immense empire of South America, bounded on the E. by the Atlantic Ocean; on the W. by Peru and Paraguay, although the respective limits of those countries are not exactly defined; on the N. the great river Amazon, and on the S. the Plata, form the natural boundaries; but with the exception of Chili and Patagonia, its internal territories touch all the different states of the south portion of the American continent. Ext. about 2,600 miles from N. to S., and 2,400 from W. to E. Area, estimated at from 2,500,000 to 2,780,000 square miles, or more than twelve times larger than France. Coast-line, 3,500 miles. Divisions. These consist of nineteen provinces, fifteen of which are situate along the coast, and four in the interior. Desc. It may be viewed as divided into two kinds of country, an upland and a lowland, occupying nearly equal portions. The upland extends over the central and eastern part, and the lowland chiefly stretches along both sides of the river Amazon, occupying likewise a smaller portion of the shores and the south-west border of the country. Towards the interior the land rises by gentle gradations to the height of from 3,000 to 5,000 or 6,000 feet above the level of the sea; and in these temperate regions European fruits and grain are reared in abundance, while the intermediate valleys are found extremely favourable for the raising of sugar, coffee, and generally for all sorts of tropical produce. Mountains, table-lands, and plains. There are no mountains of very great elevation. The country is from N. to S. traversed by two parallel ranges, from which others diverge, and inclose extensive plains and low-lying tracts. In the province of Minas Geraes, the peak of Itambe attains an elevation of 8,426 feet above the level of the sea. The culminating points of the Serro de Espinhaco chain are Itacolami and Piedade, which respectively attain an elevation of 5,750 and 5,830 feet. The Serra dos Orgaos, or Organ Mountains, so called from the resemblance of their peaks to the tubes of an organ, reach their culminating point in the Morro dos Canados, which has an elevation of 4,476 feet. These are the loftiest peaks of the Brazilian mountains. The table-lands occupy more than half the empire, and have an elevation of from 2,000 to 2,500 feet; whilst the plains of Silvas, equal to six times the size of France, occupy the shores of the Amazon and its affluents, and afford provender to innumerable herds of wild animals. Rivers. Unequalled for number and extent in any other part of the globe. The Amazon, the largest, though not the longest in the world, and its tributaries the Rio Francesco, Negro, and Madeira; the Branco, a tributary of the Rio Negro; the Tapajos, and Xinju; the Araguay, Maranhao, Paranahyba, and Toncantins; the Vazabarris, Itapicuru, Paraguassu, and the Belmonte; in the interior, the Uruguay, Yguazu, Tietaz, Para, Paraguay, and Parana, with many other streams of smaller dimensions meandering through the country. Lakes. Comparatively few of great extent. The Lagoa dos Platos, in the province of Rio Grande, Sao Pedro, is the largest, being 150 miles long, and 35 in its broadest part. There are some others of from 20 to 30 miles in length in the W. provinces, requiring no particular description. Forests. Immense. Humboldt says, "If the name of primeval forests can be given to any forests on the face of the earth, none can claim it perhaps so strictly as those that fill the connected basins of the Orinoco and the Amazon." All travellers concur in stating that the interior of Brazil forms in general a vast and impenetrable forest, the trees of which are closely interwoven with brushwood, and with innumerable shrubs and creeeping plants, which cling round them to their summits, and which, being generally adorned with the most beautiful flowers, give a peculiar and rich appearance to the scenery. These forests also abound in the greatest varieties of useful and beautiful woods, well adapted for dyeing, for cabinet-work, or for ship-building. There are some of these which have the property of hardness in a superior degree, and others which are very heavy, and have a peculiar fragrance. Among them may be noticed the cocoa-nut, mahogany, logwood, rosewood, Brazil-wood, and the caoutchouc tree; all of which are found in abundance. The variety and the beauty of the flowers of this favoured land are not the least remarkable features in its vegetable productions. In some parts, the whole country is like a vast flower-garden, and almost overpowers the senses by the intensity of its loveliness. Climate. In the northern parts, and in the neighbourhood of the Amazon, great heat prevails; in the higher parts, and towards the south, the climate is more temperate, and even cold, the thermometer falling as low as 40°. On the whole, however, the climate is delightful. Zoology. The forests afford a haunt to innumerable apes, and other wild animals, such as the jaguar, the wolf, the saratu, which has the appearance of a fox, the opossum, the sloth, the porcupine, the ounce, the tapir, the wild boar, the squirrel, rats; and several kinds of bats, vampires, and quanchrù, which in the night fasten on domestic animals and suck their blood. The birds of Brazil are of wonderful variety and beauty. The largest is the American ostrich, or emu. There are many varieties of eagles, hawks, and kites; besides toucans, parrots, woodpeckers, and humming-birds. Pigeons are caught by grain steeped in the juice of the mandioc-root, and the lakes in the south abound with water-fowl. Insects and reptiles are numerous in most parts. Of domestic animals, immense herds of horses, sheep, goats, and pigs are reared; whilst the extensive thinly-wooded plains literally swarm with horned cattle, whose tallow, hides, and horns form the articles of a large export trade. Pro. The land in Brazil almost everywhere yields an abundant produce. Maize, beans, cassava-root, which is generally used as bread by all ranks, are very generally cultivated; also wheat and other European cereals; and where the farmer has a sufficient supply of provisions, and has the means, he grows coffee, and prepares for cultivating and manufacturing sugar, manioc, cocoa, rice, tobacco, maize, bananas, ginger, yams, cloves, cinnamon, lemons, oranges, figs, and other kinds of fruits. Minerals. These are considerable, and comprise gold, silver, iron, diamonds, topazes, and other precious stones. Gold and diamonds, for which Brazil has been so long celebrated, abound in almost all the higher regions of the interior; and they are chiefly found in the beds of the mountain torrents, where the stream is most rapid. Through the country of Minas Geraes, which is one of the eastern provinces of Brazil, runs a ridge of mountains, in which those streams have their rise, which, running to the S.W., fall into the Parana, or, turning to the S.E., are carried by the Rio Francesco into the Atlantic. All those streams, more especially near their sources, have been found rich both in gold and diamonds; and almost all the towns in the interior were originally mining stations. On the river Cuiaba, about 1,000 miles into the interior, are situate the most western mining stations that are to be found in Brazil. Diamonds, however, have mostly been found in the beds of rivers. The largest was found in the Rio Abasté, in 1791; it weighed 138½ carets. In 1847 another was found by a negro, worth £15,000. In the diamond-mines about 20,000 negroes are employed; but, notwithstanding the immense riches which these jewels may be supposed to confer, it has been found that, in the short space of a year and a half, the exports of sugar and coffee were of more value than all the diamonds that had been found in the country during a period of eighty years. The district of Cerro do Frio, or of the Cold Mountains, in which the diamond-works are established, consists of a range of rugged mountains, which have a northerly and southerly direction, and are generally estimated to rise 4,000 or 5,000 feet above the level of the sea. The tract of country termed the diamond-ground extends about 50 miles from north to south, and about 25 from east to west. Manf. Cotton-weaving and tanning. All the branches of industry, however, are mostly performed by slaves. Towns. Rio Janeiro, Bahia, Pernambuco, San Paulo, Maranham, Para, Villa Bella, and Cachaeira. Pop. about 5,300,000. Lat. between 4° 30′ N. and 33° S. Lon. between 35° and 70° W.—Brazil was discovered in 1500 by Pedro Alvarez Cobral, a Portuguese navigator; but it was not till about the year 1549 that the court of Portugal sent a governor to regulate and superintend the affairs of the new colony. The possession of Brazil was long contested by the Portuguese and the Dutch, the latter being, however, at last driven from the country. In 1808 King John VI., having been driven from Europe by Napoleon I., took up his residence in Brazil. Returning in 1821, Brazil was lost to Portugal; for in 1822 it declared itself an independent state, electing the son of John VI., Don Pedro, its emperor. In the following year its independence was acknowledged by Portugal. In 1831 the throne was abdicated in favour of the emperor, Don Pedro II., who was then only in his sixth year, and who, in 1841, in his fifteenth year, was forced to do away with the regency and assume the reins of government. Under his sway Brazil has materially advanced in all the arts of civilization. In 1843 the Prince de Joinville, Louis Philippe's son, married a sister of Don Pedro II. In 1851, the war which had been carried on between Brazil and Buenos Ayres led to the fall of Rosas and the opening of the Parana. (See Barbacena.)

Brazos de Dios, bra'-zos de(r) de'-os, one of the largest rivers of Texas, U.S., which rises in that state, and, after a course of 900 miles, falls into the Gulf of Mexico, 50 miles from Galveston.

Brazza, brat'-sa, an island in the Adriatic, belonging to Austria, opposite to Spalatro, in Dalmatia. Ext. about 30 miles long, and from 6 to 9 broad. Area, 170 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, but producing corn, figs, almonds, oil, saffron, and wine. Pop. 15,500.

Breadalbane, bre-dâl'-ban, a mountainous district of Scotland, forming the W. part of Perthshire. In it are the mountain Ben Lawers, 3,945 feet high, and Lochs Tay and Lyon.

Brechin, brech'-in, a town and parish in Forfarshire, Scotland, on the side of a hill rising from the N. bank of the Esk, which is here crossed by a good bridge of two arches, 8 miles from Montrose. A bishop's see was founded at Brechin about the year 1150, and well endowed by King David I.; and there are the remains, partly entire, of an ancient cathedral, 160 feet in length by 61 in breadth. Linen is the staple manufacture. Pop. of parish, 8,210; of town, 6,637.

Brecknock, or Brecon, brek'-nok, a county of S. Wales, bounded N. by Radnor, W. by Cardigan and Carmarthen, S. by Monmouth and Glamorgan, and E. by Hereford and Monmouth. Ext. about 35 miles in length, by 30 in breadth. Area, 731 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, and about a third of the whole entirely waste and uncultivated. Rivers. Wye, Usk, Irvon, Tawe, and the Taaf. Minerals. Copper, lead, abundance of iron, and great quantities of coal and limestone. Manf. Woollen cloth, wool, worsted stockings; and there is a trade in timber, iron, cattle, sheep, swine, butter, and cheese. Pop. 61,474.—In this county are Brecknock Beacon, which is the loftiest hill in S. Wales, being 2,862 feet, and Cradle Mountain, 2,515 feet above the level of the sea.

Brecknock, or Brecon, brek'-on, the county-town of Brecknockshire, situate at the confluence of the rivers Usk and Honddu, or Hondey, 14 miles from Builth. It is irregularly built, consisting principally of three streets, and the houses in general are of very indifferent structure. There are three parish churches, St. John's, St. David's, and St. Mary's, within the precincts of the ancient wall, and several other places of worship. Manf. Chiefly cloth and cotton stockings. Pop. about 6,000.—Mrs. Henry Siddons was born here in 1755.

Breda, brai'-da, a fortified town of the Netherlands, on the Merck, near the influx of the Aa, having an easy communication with the sea, and 24 miles from Bois-le-Duc. It has a church with a spire 362 feet high, a town-hall, magnetic observatory, Latin school, and several Roman Catholic and Protestant places of worship. The town is of a triangular form, with a gate at each angle. Its natural position, being in the midst of a marsh, contributes materially to its defence; and the adjoining country can be laid under water by means of sluices which communicate with the Merck. It is further protected by a large castle, constructed by William, prince of Orange, afterwards William III. of England. Manf. Breda was in former times a commercial town, and had extensive cloth-manufactories; but there are now only a few manufactories of stockings, carpets, hats, musical instruments, and several breweries. Pop. about 13,000.—Before the revolt of the Netherlands against the matchless severity of Philip II. of Spain, this was a favourite residence of William I. of Orange. Here, occupied more with hounds and hawks than with politics, he exercised a princely hospitality. In 1566 Louis of Nassau and Count St. Aldegondo first proposed the famous league of the nobles, called "the Compromise of Breda," in this town; and Charles II. of England resided in it during part of his exile.

Several congresses have sat here—in 1575, 1667, and 1748. That of 1667 led to the peace of Breda between England and Holland, by which the Dutch ceded to Great Britain, New York and New Jersey states, then called New Belgium. The railway connecting Antwerp and the Hague passes through Breda.

BREDERODE, Henry, Count, brai'-dai-rod, a Dutch patriot, who joined with the counts Egmont and Horn in opposing the tyranny of Cardinal Granvelle, the Spanish governor of the Netherlands. In 1566 he presented to Margaret of Parma, who had succeeded Granvelle, the famous "Request," which gave rise to the insurrection of the "Gueux" or "Beggars." Under the grinding oppression of the duke of Alva's administration in the Low Countries, he retired to Germany. D. 1588.

BRE'GUET, Abraham Louis, brai'-goo-ai, a celebrated French clock and watch mechanician, who, at an early age, went to Paris, and first perfected those continually-going watches which wind themselves. Afterwards, he invented for watches repeating movements and escapements of all kinds, of a delicacy and precision before unknown. He was a member of the Institute, and of other learned societies; and greatly enriched and extended the science of horology. B. in Switzerland, his parents being French Protestant refugees; D. at Paris, 1823. The bréguet chain takes its name from him.—His grandson, LOUIS, was one of the first scientific men in France to apply himself to the study of the electric telegraph, and to recognize its immense advantages. B. 1804.

BREITKOPF, John Gottlieb Emmanuel, brite'-kopf, an ingenious German printer and letter-founder, who considerably improved the shape of printing-types. He also devised a method of printing music, maps, and charts with types. B. at Leipsic, 1719; D. 1794.—He is the author of a treatise on the Origin of Printing, and another on the History of Playing-cards, the Invention of Paper made from Linen, and the Invention of Engraving on Wood in Europe.

BREMEN, brem'-en, a duchy of the kingdom of Hanover, lying between the Weser and the Elbe, and having Hadeln on the E., and Luneburg with Verden on the S. Area, 2,000 square miles. Desc. In the low grounds, along the banks of the rivers, the soil is excellent. In the central part, on the other hand, it is rather arid. Pop. about 200,000.—In 1719 this duchy, exclusive of the town of Bremen, was sold to the duke of Brunswick; but it now belongs to Hanover.

BREMEN, one of the four free cities of the Germanic confederation, stands on the Weser, 60 miles from Hamburg. Area of district, 112 square miles. The town is divided by the Weser into the old and new, both of which are fortified. The buildings most deserving of notice are the Cathedral, Exchange, and Town-hall, and the Observatory of Olbers. The principal street is of great length, and, like the greater part of the town, is well built and paved. Commerce. The trade of Bremen consists partly of its manufactures of refined sugar, cotton, woollen cloths, dye-stuffs, &c.; but chiefly of the exportation of the products of Westphalia and Lower Saxony, and the importation of great quantities of foreign goods. Pop. including district, about 80,000. —Under the reign of Napoleon I. this town was the capital of the department Weser; but, in 1815, the treaty of Vienna restored it to its old franchises. In the Germanic confederation, it holds the third rank among the free cities, and, with them, holds the seventeenth rank in the diet.—It is connected by railway with E., N., and W. Germany, Belgium, and France.

BREMER, Frederika, bre'-mer, an eminent Swedish novelist, known to English readers by her novels of "Neighbours," "The President's Daughter," "Life in Dalecarlia," and several other works, mostly translated by Mrs. Mary Howitt. B. at Abo, in Finland, 1802.

BRENDITZ, brain'-ditz, a village of Moravia, 2 miles from Znaym. The archduke Charles made this place his head-quarters during the battle of Znaym, in 1809.

BRENNER, brain'-ner, one of the culminating points of the mountains of the Tyrol. It rises between the Inn, the Aicha, and the Adige, to a height of 6,778 feet; and the mountain to which it belongs, is traversed at an elevation of 4,050 feet on the way to Innspruck from Brixon.

BRENNUS, bren'-nus, a general of the Galli Senones, who invaded Italy, defeated the Romans at the river Allia, and entered their city without opposition. The Romans fled into the Capitol, and left the whole city in the possession of the enemies. The Gauls climbed the Tarpeian rock in the night, and the Capitol would have been taken, had not the Romans been awakened by the noise of geese which were before the doors, and immediately repelled the enemy. Camillus, who was in banishment, marched to the relief of his country, and so totally destroyed the Gauls, that not one remained to tell the news of their fate.

BRENTA, brain'-ta, a river of Austrian Italy, having its source in Lake Caldonazzo, in the Tyrol, and, after a course of 112 miles, falling into the Adriatic, through the canal of Brenta-nova, or Brentono, at Brondolo.

BRENTFORD, brent'-ford, a market-town, and the nominal capital of Middlesex, on the Thames, 8 miles from London. The town is divided by the river Brent, which is crossed by a bridge. Pop. about 6,500.

BRESCIA, brai'-sha, a large city of the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom, the capital of the delegation of the same name, 34 miles from Parma. It is surrounded by walls, ditches, and bastions, and the ramparts are lined with trees. It contains several handsome squares and streets, numerous churches, an episcopal palace, a theatre, and the Broletto, or old palace of the republic. There are also several fountains; and on the outside of the walls are to be seen the remains of an ancient aqueduct. Manf. Arms, leather, silk, flax, wool, linen; and there are a number of oil-mills. Its wine enjoys a high reputation. Pop. of town, 35,000.—This place is celebrated for its Roman remains. In 1822 an entire edifice was excavated, and now forms a museum of antiquities. In 1796 it was taken by the French, and by the treaty of Vienna, in 1815, was assigned to Austria. In 1849 it was involved in the commotions which then distracted continental Europe, and although barricaded, the Austrians, under General Haynau, carried it at the point of the bayonet. Its fortifications were, afterwards, greatly strengthened.

BRESCIA BRESCIANO, a district of Lombardy, which takes its name from the above, and formerly belonged to the republic of Venice. Ext. 65 miles in length and 25 in breadth. Pop. 316,000.

BRESLAU, bres'-lou, the capital of Silesia, Prussia, is situate in a principality of the same name, on the Oder, at the influx of the small river Ohlau, which divides the town, at a distance of 130 miles from Dresden. It consists of the old and new towns, contiguous to which are five suburbs, one standing on an island in the Oder. It is surrounded with strong walls and other fortifications, and has six large and six small gates. There are a great many places of worship, belonging to different denominations, and the cathedral of St. John, built on an island outside of the town, has seventeen chapels. The university, transferred here from Frankfort-on-the-Oder in 1811, has a public library of 250,000 volumes and 2,300 MSS. The town has several other libraries, gymnasia, schools of industry and arts, several Protestant colleges, and it is the seat of a mining board. The number of hospitals and other charitable institutions is considerable, and there are several establishments for poor students. Manf. Linen, printed cottons, calico, chintzes, woollen stuffs, silk, Turkish yarn, thread, needles, plate, earthenware, jewellery, starch, snuff, and sealing-wax. It has a trade in timber, flax, hemp, corn, oxen, madder, and mining produce. Pop. 112,500.—In 1807 Breslau was bombarded and taken by the French. It has communication with Vienna, Berlin, Stettin, and Hamburg, by railway.

BRESLAU, a government of Prussia, in the province of Silesia. Area, 3,870 geographical square miles. Desc. Mountainous in the S., but level in other directions. Rivers. The Oder, with its tributaries the Stober and the Weide. Pro. The usual cereals, with flax, madder, hops, and tobacco. Minerals. Iron, copper, lead, zinc, and arsenic. Cornelians, opals, agates, and garnets, are frequently found. Pop. 1,084,522.

BRESSAY, bres'-sai, one of the Shetland islands. Ext. about 4½ miles long and 3 broad. It is separated from the mainland of Shetland by Bressay Sound, a fine harbour, where the Greenland whale-ships and Dutch herring-vessels frequently rendezvous. Pop. about 1,000. Lat. 60° 14′ N. Lon. 1° 12′ W.

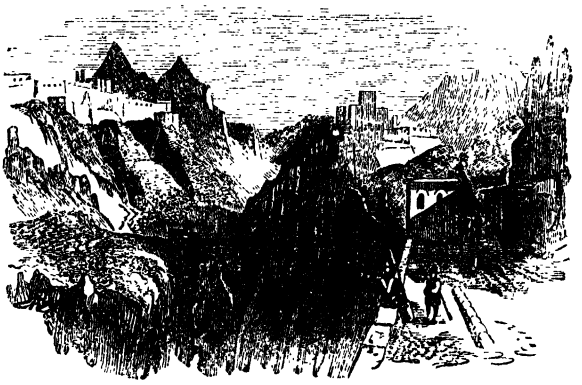
BREST, brest, a seaport city of France, one of the chief stations of the French marine, and one of the best harbours in Europe, is situate on a bay on the west coast of Brittany, in the department of Finisterre, 310 miles from Paris. The greater part of the town is built on a hill, and consists of narrrow, steep, winding, and dirty streets; in the suburb of Recouvrance, however, these are broad and regular, and the houses very handsome. The harbour, situate between this suburb and the town, is in the form of a long canal, and is capable of containing 60 ships of the line. On a steep rock at the entrance stands the citadel, which is defended towards the land by strong outworks. Opposite to it is a stately tower, which serves, with the citadel and several batteries, to protect the harbour. The principal public buildings and objects of curiosity in the town are the barracks, rope-walks, cloth-manufactories, forges, and foundries; the immense naval arsenal and dockyard; a prison, called Le Bagne, built on a hill, and capable of accommodating 4,000 convicts; the two quays which encompass the harbour; the house of correction, the hospital, theatre, two marine academies, and the fine walk called Le Cours. Its commerce is principally limited to the supplying of provisions to the town and port. Pop. 61,160. Lat. 48° 23′ 32″ N. Lon. 4° 29′ 25″ W.—Cardinal Richelieu was the first to take advantage of the situation of Brest and convert it into a naval station. Vauban extended and improved its fortifications. It was at Brest that Mary queen of Scots landed, when on her way to St. Germain. In 1694 it was attacked by an English fleet under Admiral Berkeley; but the expedition failed. As a naval school and port of construction, it ranked before both Cherbourg and Toulon, until the vast extensions and improvements made by Napoleon III. at Cherbourg, placed the latter in advance of all the other ports of France.

BRETAGNE, or BRITTANY, brit′-a-ne, one of the provinces into which France was divided before the Revolution. It now forms the departments of Finisterre, Côtes-du-Nord, Morbihan, and Loire Inférieure. It takes its name from the Britons, and is supposed to have been peopled by the natives of Great Britain, at the time of the Roman dominion, and after the Saxon invasion.

BRETIGNY, bre-teen′-ye, a village of France, department of the Eure and Loire, 6 miles from Chartres.—This place is memorable for a treaty concluded there in 1360. By it the French king, John, recovered his freedom from being a prisoner since the battle of Poictiers.

BRETON, CAPE, bret′-on, an insular colony of British N. America, situate to the E. of Nova Scotia. Ext. Extreme length from N. to S. 100 miles, by an extreme breadth of 84. Area, 3,120 square miles. Desc. It is separated from Nova Scotia by a narrow strait called the Gut of Canso, about three miles wide, and is about 60 miles from Newfoundland, the intervening space forming the entrance to the Gulf of St. Lawrence. This island derives its importance from the fisheries carried on in the adjoining seas, to which the possession of a port in the island became necessary. Its principal towns are Sydney and Louisburg. Pop. 35,000.—This island was first taken possession of in August, 1712, by the French, and in 1745 by the British, to whom it was finally ceded in 1763.



BRETON, CAPE, a cape on the E. coast of the above island. Lat. 45° 55′ N. Lon. 59° 40′ W.

BRETT, bret, a river of Essex, falling into the Stour.

BREUGHEL, broi′-gel, the name of a Flemish family of painters, who originally came from a village of the same name near Breda. Flourished in the 16th century.

BREWSTER, Sir David, broo′-ster, a distinguished experimental philosopher, whose discoveries in reference to the properties of light have led to great improvements in the illumination of lighthouses. In 1815 he received the Copley medal for his paper on the "Polarization of Light by Reflection," and in the following year, for his discoveries in physics, received from the Institute of France 1,500 francs, which was the half of their prize. In 1816 he invented the kaleidoscope, in 1818 received the Rumford medal of the Royal Society, and in 1830 was presented with the medal of the Royal Society for his further researches on the properties of light. In the same year, with Davy, Herschel, and Babbage, he originated the British Association, the first meeting of which was held at York, in 1831. He was now knighted by William IV., and decorated with the Hanoverian Guelphic order. In 1841 he became principal of St. Leonard's College at St. Andrew's. In 1849 he was elected president of the British Association, and the same year had the high honour of being chosen, in the place of Berzelius, one of the eight foreign associates of the French Academy of Sciences. His writings on scientific subjects are very numerous, and for twenty-two years he edited the "Edinburgh Encyclopædia." Of the "Edinburgh Philosophical Journal," he was also one of the editors, as well as of the "Edinburgh Journal of Science." B. at Jedburgh, Scotland, 1781.

BRIANÇON, bre′-an-sawng, a fortified town of France, in the department of the Upper Alps, 50 miles from

BRIANÇON.

Grenoble. Manf. Cutlery, cotton goods, and lead pencils. Pop. 4,500.—This is the most elevated town in France, being 4,285 feet above the level of the sea, and was one of the head-quarters of the French army at the commencement of the war against Austria, 1859.

BRIAREUS, bri-air′-e-us, a famous giant, son of Cœlus and Terra, who had a hundred hands and fifty heads, and was called by men Ægeon, and only by the gods Briareus. He assisted the giants in their war against the gods, and, according to the accounts of some, was thrown under Mount Ætna.

BRIDE, ST., bride, the name of several parishes, with small populations, in England and Wales. The largest is in the city of London. Pop. 6,039.

BRIDGEND, bridj′-end, a town of Glamorganshire, S. Wales, 6 miles from Cowbridge. Pop. 1,471.

BRIDGETOWN, bridg′-town, the capital of the island of Barbadoes, situate in the Bay of Carlisle, which is 4 miles broad and 3 long. It is esteemed one of the finest cities in the West-India islands. Pop. about 20,000. Lat. 13° 4′ N. Lon. 59° 37′ W.—Bridgetown was made a city in 1842, and has suffered, at different times, both from fires and hurricanes. It was burnt down in April, 1668. The greatest part of it was again destroyed by fire in 1756, 1766, and 1767. It had scarcely recovered from the effects of the dreadful conflagrations of these years, when it was torn from its foundations by the storm of 10th October, 1780, in which above 4,000 of the inhabitants miserably perished.

BRIDGETOWN, the name of several townships in the United States. One in Cumberland, New Jersey; another in Queen Anne County, Maryland; and a third in Kent, a county of the same state.

BRIDGETOWN, the name of a parish in Cork, Ireland. Pop. 1,000.—This is also the name of several villages in Ireland.

BRIDGEWATER, bridg'-waw-ter, a town of Somersetshire, situate on the river Parret, 10 miles from Taunton, with which it is connected by a canal. The streets of this town are wide and well paved, but the houses are irregularly built. Besides the parish church, which is a spacious and handsome building, with a lofty spire, there are places of public worship for various other denominations. It has also a large town-hall, a gaol, a court-house, and an infirmary. Pop. of parish, about 11,000.—Here Admiral Blake was born in 1599. It is a station on the Exeter and Bristol Railway.

BRIDGEWATER, the name of several townships in different states of the United States.

BRIDGEWATER, Francis Egerton, duke of, was the youngest son of Scroop, fourth earl, and first duke, of Bridgewater, and succeeded to the title in 1748, on the death of his brother. He has been styled the "Father of British Inland Navigation," being mainly instrumental in the cutting of the first navigable canal in England. This was from Salford, near Manchester, to Worsley, and succeeded so well, that another was executed to pass from the river Worsley, over the Irwell, to Manchester. This canal begins at Worsley Mill, about seven miles from Manchester, and has an aqueduct over the river Irwell, where the canal runs thirty-nine feet above the river, and where the barges pass on the canal, and the vessels in the river sail under them. This aqueduct begins at Barton Bridge, three miles from Worsley, and is carried two hundred yards over a valley. The duke afterwards extended his canal to the Mersey. He spent prodigious sums upon these projects, to accomplish which he lived on the simplest fare, and with scarcely a servant to attend him. By them, however, he ultimately realized an immense fortune. B. 1736; D. 1803. (See BRINDLEY.)

BRIDGEWATER, earl of, Francis Henry Egerton, eighth earl of Bridgewater, ninth Viscount Brackley, and Baron Ellesmere, was the younger son of John, lord bishop of Durham, by Lady A. S. Grey, daughter of the duke of Kent, chamberlain to Queen Anne. He was a person of learning, and published an edition of the "Hippolytus" of Euripides, with scholia, various readings, and copious notes in Latin. He is noticed here chiefly on account of bequeathing £8,000 to be applied to the publication of one thousand copies of a work "On the Power, Wisdom, and Goodness of God, as manifested in the Creation, &c." This bequest elicited a series of separate works, known as the "Bridgewater Treatises," written by some of the most distinguished religious and scientific men of the time. The earl also bequeathed £12,000 to the British Museum, the annual income of which was to be applied to the purchase of MSS., and the taking proper care of them for the use of the public. B. 1758; D. in Paris, 1829.—In his latter years this earl fell into singular eccentricities; among which was a great partiality for canine company, which he carried so far as to dress some of his favourite dogs in the garments of men, and have them at table to dine with him.

BRIDGNORTH, bridg'-north, a town of Shropshire, divided by the Severn into the Low and High towns, 20 miles from Shrewsbury.—The two are connected by a stone bridge, which has six arches. It was formerly surrounded with walls, part of which still remain. At each extremity of the High Town stand the churches of St. Mary Magdalene and St. Leonard. Immense quantities of excellent malt are made here, equal, if not superior, to any other place in the kingdom. Pop. 5,734.

BRIDLINGTON. (See BURLINGTON.)

BRIDPORT, brid'-port, a seaport-town of Dorsetshire, situate on the Brit or Bride river, 15 miles from Dorchester, and one mile from its own harbour. It lies between two branches of the river, and consists principally of three spacious streets, which, from time to time, have been greatly improved. The church, dedicated to St. Mary in 1362, is a large Gothic edifice, in the form of a cross, and its tower is seventy-two feet high. There are alms-houses, an endowed charity-school, besides other benevolent institutions, a market-house, a town-hall, and a prison. Manf. Cordage, sail-cloth, nets, and twines of all descriptions. Pop. 4,653.

BRIEG, breeg, a well-built and populous town of Silesia, Prussia, in a principality of the same name, on the Oder, over which there is here a stately wooden bridge, 24 miles from Breslau. It has a ducal castle, a gymnasium, a library, and there are various workhouses and establishments for the poor. Manf. Linen, cotton, and woollen fabrics. Pop. about 14,000.—It is a station on the railway from Breslau to Oppeln.

BRIELLE, or BRILL, breel, a town of the Netherlands, on the island of East Voorne, not far from the mouth of the Maese, 15 miles from Rotterdam. It has a good harbour, and is a handsome, well-built town, and strongly fortified. Pop. about 5,000.—The capture of this place by William de la Marck, at the head of the "beggars of the sea," in 1572, was the first important event which took place in the struggle between Holland and Spain, and laid the foundation of the Dutch republic. It is the birthplace of De Witt, the famous statesman, and Van Tromp, the famous admiral of Holland.

BRIENNE, John de, bre'-en, elected king of Jerusalem in 1210. The emperor Frederick II. married his daughter, having the kingdom of Jerusalem as a dowry. He was afterwards elected emperor of Constantinople, which he defended with great bravery against the Greeks and Bulgarians. On one occasion, says Gibbon, he made a sally at the head of his cavalry, and out of forty-eight squadrons of the enemy, no more than three escaped from the edge of his invincible sword. D. 1237.—A contemporary poet affirms that the deeds of valour which this hero performed outshone those of Hector, Ajax, Roland, Uggier, and Judas Maccabæus. His reign is given at length by Du Cange, in the third book of his history of Constantinople. His avarice, however, disgraced his other qualities, and hastened the ruin of the empire.

BRIENNE-LE-CHATEAU, bre'-en-le(r)-sha'-to, a town of France, in the department of the Aube, 14 miles from Bar-sur-Aube. Pop. 2,000.—Here Napoleon I. and Bourrienne received the rudiments of their military education, and here, in 1814, the emperor gained an advantage over the allies, when his fortunes were fast on the wane.

BRIENZ, bre'-entz, a village of Switzerland, 30 miles from Bern. It is situate on the lake of Brienz, which is 800 feet above the level of the sea, and surrounded by lofty mountains, whose numerous torrents and waterfalls are sublimely picturesque. Among these the fall of the Giesbach is the principal. Pop. 3,200.

BRIEUC, or BRIEUX, ST., bre'-u(r), a well-built town of France, in the department of the Côtes-du-Nord, 238 miles from Paris. It has a trade in grain, flax, thread, linen, woollen, cattle, honey, wax, paper, leather, and iron, and has manufactures of earthenware, and thriving fisheries. Pop. about 15,000. Lat. 48° 31′ 1″ N. Lon. 2° 45′ 6″ W.—This town arose from a monastery erected here at the end of the 5th century by St. Brieuc.

BRIGGS, Henry, brigs, an English mathematician, who, in 1596, was appointed Gresham professor of geometry, which he resigned in 1615, on being made Savilian professor at Oxford. B. at Warleywood, near Halifax, Yorkshire, 1556; D. at Oxford, 1630.—He was the first improver of logarithms, after Napier, the original inventor, whom he visited twice, and each time resided with, in Scotland. He published, in 1624, a work of stupendous labour, entitled "Arithmetica Logarithmica," containing logarithms of 30,000 natural numbers. He also wrote some other valuable books on mathematical subjects.

BRIGGS, Henry Perronet, R.A., an eminent English painter, both in history and portraits. The principal of his historical works are "The First Interview between the Spaniards and Peruvians," and "The Ancient Britons instructed by the Romans in the Mechanical Arts." Among his portraits are Mrs. Siddons, Mrs. Opie, Reverend Sidney Smith, and the Duke of Wellington. B. 1793; D. in London, 1844.—One of his composition-pictures is "Othello relating his Adventures to Desdemona."

BRIGHAM, Nicholas, brig'-ham, a lawyer and poet, who deserves to be noticed, if for nothing more than his admiration of Chaucer, the father of English poetry. He caused the remains of that poet to be removed to the south transept of Westminster Abbey, where he erected a monument to his memory. D. in Oxfordshire; D. 1559.—He wrote "Memoirs of Eminent Persons," "Memoirs by way of Diary," "Miscellaneous Poems."

BRIGHT, John, brite, a cotton-spinner and manufacturer of Rochdale, in Lancashire, who became an active member of an association called the Anti Corn-Law League, when it was formed in 1838, and in conjunction with Mr. Cobden, proved himself one of the warmest advocates of the repeal of the corn laws. In 1843 he unsuccessfully contested the representation of the city of Durham; but in the next election which took place, he was returned for that city, and sat for it till 1847, when he was elected member for Manchester. In 1854 he formed one of the deputation who made a journey to Russia for the purpose of persuading the emperor Nicholas to adopt a peace policy, his advocacy of which for a time impaired his popularity. In 1858 he was returned member for Birmingham, and again in the general election of 1859. By his warm and effective advocacy of an extended parliamentary representation of the people, he must be considered, in a great measure, to have been the means of defeating, in 1859, the Reform Bill of the Derby administration. B. 1811.

BRIGHTON, or BRIGHTHELMSTONE, brit'-ton, a fashionable watering-place of Sussex, 47 miles from London, situate at the bottom of a bay formed by Beachy Head and Worthing Point, in the English Channel. Brighton occupies an eminence declining towards a lawn called the Steyne, and to a wide and handsome road, more than two miles long, facing the sea, where are built fine shops and mansions, and which is frequented as a promenade. It consists of a number of streets, most of them composed of commodious and elegant houses, specially adapted for the accommodation of strangers, in addition to its permanent population. Besides the parish church, it has places of public worship belonging to almost every denomination of Christians, also a Jewish synagogue. It likewise contains several free schools, and a school of industry, where a number of indigent females are educated. A theatre was opened in 1807; and there are assembly-rooms, a suspension chain-pier, extending 1,014 feet into the sea, a large town-hall, and baths, besides several places of amusement. A building, with domes and minarets, called the Marine Pavilion, was erected here for the Prince of Wales, afterwards George IV., in 1784, near the N.W. corner of the Steyne; and it is the seat of the Sussex Literary and Scientific Institution, founded in 1836. From its various attractions, the town is usually crowded during the summer season. Pop. about 70,000. —It is a principal station on the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway.

BRIGHTSIDE BIERLOW, brite'-side beer'-lo, a township of the West Riding of Yorkshire, adjoining Sheffield. Pop. 12,042.

BRIGHTWELL, brite'-wel, the name of several English parishes, none with a population above 800.

BRIGNOLES, breen'-yol, a town of France, in the department of the Var, 20 miles from Toulon. In the neighbourhood are grown excellent plums. It has a trade in brandies, wines, prunes, and olives. Pop. 6,000.

BRINDISI, brin-de'-se, an ancient fortified city and seaport of Naples, on the Adriatic, in the Terra d' Otranto, 44 miles from Taranto. Its harbour was nearly choked up; but, since 1843, when a lighthouse was erected on the mole, it has been greatly improved. Pop. about 7,000. Lat. 40° 39′ 17″ N. Lon. 17° 58′ 21″ E.—This is the ancient Brundusium, and was the place whence the Roman generals almost invariably sailed in their wars with Greece, Macedonia, and Asia. In consequence of its situation, it has been the scene of many remarkable historical events. Virgil died in it. Horace, in one of his satires, has immortalized it. Octavius assumed the name of Cæsar in it, and Agrippina landed on its shores with the ashes of Germanicus, her husband. On the fall of the Roman empire, it shared in the general calamities which befell Roman cities. Steamers to the Ionian Islands and Malta now touch at it, and it has lately been made an entrepôt for foreign goods, with large warehouses for bonding them.

BRINDLEY, James, brind'-le, an eminent engineer, who, after serving his apprenticeship to the trade of a millwright, and discovering his skill in the erection of several mills, was employed by the duke of Bridgewater on his famous canal from Worsley to Manchester, which he afterwards extended to the Mersey. He was next employed to construct a canal from the Grand Trunk near Haywood, Staffordshire, to the river Severn, near Bewdley, by which means Bristol obtained a communication with Liverpool. In consequence of the success of his undertakings, his reputation stood very high, and he was engaged in a variety of similar plans in different parts of the kingdom. B. at Thornsett, Derbyshire, 1716; D. at Turnhurst, Staffordshire, 1772. (See BRIDGEWATER.)

BRINVILLIERS, Maria Margaret, marchioness of, brē-veel'-e-ai, a notorious poisoner. In 1651 she was married to the marquis, and formed an improper attachment to St. Croix, a young cavalry officer. The latter was imprisoned in the Bastille, and there learnt from Exili, an Italian, the composition of poisons, which art he afterwards taught to his mistress. They then commenced a series of poisonings, the first victim being the marquis's father, then his two brothers and his sister, with a view to the ultimate possession of their fortunes. These crimes were not discovered until the death of St. Croix, in 1676, when there were found on him some papers which cast suspicion on the marchioness. She fled, but was arrested at Liège, brought to Paris, and executed, 1676.

BRISBANE, bris'-bain, a county of New South Wales, with a capital of the same name, situate on a river also of the same name. It was formerly a penal settlement, which it ceased to be in 1842. Pop. of town, about 2,000. In the neighbourhood there are extensive pasture-lands called BRISBANE DOWNS, well adapted for sheep-walks. Lat. between 36° and 37° S. Lon. 149° E.

BRISEIS, bri-se'-is, a girl of Lyrnessus, called also Hippodamia. When her country was taken by the Greeks, she fell to the share of Achilles in the division of the spoils. Agamemnon afterwards took possession of her, and Achilles thereupon made a vow to absent himself from the field of battle at Troy. This incident Homer makes one of the chief features of his Iliad.

BRISSOT, John Peter, breess'-so, one of the leading men in the French revolution, the son of a pastry-cook, and bred to the law, which he never followed. An acquaintance with English books gave him a turn for politics; when, for a time, he settled at Boulogne, and edited the Courrier de l'Europe. On the suppression of this journal, he went to Paris, where he soon afterwards published his "Theory of Criminal Laws," 2 vols. 8vo. He began, also, a book entitled "A Philosophical Library of Criminal Laws," and wrote a volume on "Truth; or, Meditations on the Means of reaching Truth in all Branches of Human Knowledge." About this time he married Mademoiselle Dupont, who was employed as reader to the daughter of the duke of Orleans. Finding little encouragement in France, however, he went to London, where he conducted a periodical journal called "Universal Correspondence on all that concerns the Happiness of Men in Society." This journal was designed to disseminate in France such political principles as were based on reason. It therefore gave offence to the French government, and was seized and suppressed. On his return to Paris, in 1784, he was sent to the Bastille on the charge of having assisted in the publication of a libel; but obtained his release by the interest of the duke of Orleans, whose ambitious projects on the government he laboured, by his talents, to advance. His political pamphleteering activity forced him to flee from France, when he went to Holland, and thence to America. After a time he returned to France, and became a warm advocate of republican principles during the revolutionary period. By his exertions he created a party called Brissotines and Girondists, from the members of the department of Gironde, of which it chiefly consisted. He was, however, adverse to the execution of the king, which he proposed to be deferred till the perfection of the constitution. The ascension of Robespierre to power was the signal for the downfall of Brissot and his party. He and they were denounced and arrested, to expiate upon the scaffold their principles and opinions. B. near Chartres, 1754; guillotined, with twenty other Girondists, October 31, 1793.

Bristol, bris'-tol, a city, seaport, and county of England, situate in the counties of Gloucester and Somerset, on the river Avon, which is here joined by the Frome. The river is crossed by a bridge originally constructed 500 years ago, and rebuilt in 1768: it consists of three wide and lofty arches. The town is irregularly built, and part of a monastery founded by Stephen, in 1140, has been converted into a cathedral, which is the principal edifice in the city. The church of St. Mark, opposite the cathedral, was formerly collegiate; it is the mayor's chapel. All the churches are neat, beautifully decorated, and most of them have many handsome monuments. The muniment-room of St. Mary's, Redcliffe, is where the unfortunate Chatterton declared he had found the poems he attributed to Rowley. This city also contains many large alms-houses and charity-schools. The Exchange is a fine edifice of Grecian architecture, and there is a structure called the Commercial Rooms, for the use of the mercantile interest, which was erected in 1809. An elegant and convenient theatre was built in 1766, and in Princes Street is an assembly-room, with a fine front. Its other remarkable public buildings are the Merchants' Hall, Council-house, the new Guild-hall, a large and convenient custom-house, the gaol, Bristol Institution, the Victoria Rooms, the baths and pump-rooms at Clifton, and numerous bridges. It contains a vast number of dissenting meeting-houses, and places of worship for almost every kind of religion. Bristol has long been engaged in a very extensive foreign trade, chiefly with the West Indies, and its commercial connections with Ireland are very extensive. Pop., with suburbs, 140,158.—The city was erected into an independent county in 1372, by Edward III. It was constituted a bishop's see by Henry VIII., and has since been endowed with various privileges and immunities. In 1848 it was made a free port. About a mile west of Bristol, close to the river, stands the village of the Hot Wells, celebrated for a tepid spring, which has been found a powerful specific in various maladies. Bristol is the birthplace of Sebastian Cabot, the discoverer of Newfoundland, and Baily the sculptor, Chatterton the poet, Bowdich the African traveller, and Southey. It is connected by railway with all the principal towns of England.

Bristol, the name of several counties, ports, and townships in the United States. The counties are—1. In Massachusetts, with an area of 620 square miles, and a population of 77,000. 2. In Rhode Island, with an area of 96 square miles, and a population of 9,000. —None of the other places have a population above 5,000.

Bristol Bay, a large bay in the North Pacific Ocean, on the west coast of North America. Lat. 54° N. Lon. 160° W. Also, a river which empties itself into this bay.

Bristol Channel, a portion of the Atlantic Ocean, on the coast of Great Britain, lying between the S. coast of Wales and the counties of Somerset, Devon, and Cornwall. The Severn flows into it, and it contains, on the N., Milford Haven and the bays of Carmarthen and Swansea; on the S., the bays of Barnstaple, Bridgewater, and Porlock. The rapidity with which its tide flows forms the singular phenomenon called the "bore," when it meets with the currents of the Severn. Lat. between 50° and 51° 40′ N. Lon. between 3° and 5° 3′ W.

Brit, or Bride, brit, a river of England, which runs into the sea 2 miles from Bridport.

Britain, Great, brit'-an, the largest of the British isles, is bounded N. by the North Sea, E. by the German Ocean, S. by the English Channel, and W. by St. George's Channel and the Atlantic Ocean. Ext. From N. to S. 587 miles in length; its greatest breadth from E. to W. is about 300. Area, computed at 87,502 square miles. Desc. Its whole coast is deeply penetrated by bays, creeks, and estuaries, which afford many safe and commodious harbours, and which, under the heads of England, Scotland, and Wales, will be specifically mentioned. The form of the island has been compared to a triangle, but it may more appropriately be described as shaped like a wedge, the point of which is at the north, and the head at the south. Its surface is mountainous in the N. and the N.W., hilly in the centre, and in the S.E. level in general, and possessed of an alluvial soil. A considerable portion of the mountainous districts is barren, and appears irreclaimable by any efforts of the cultivator. The greater part, however, is fertile, and in favourable seasons abundant harvests are produced. Mountains. These consist of several ranges, one of which runs through Cornwall, Devonshire, and Somersetshire, and thence into Wales, where it attains its culminating point in Snowdon, 3,571 feet above the level of the sea. Another, branching from the Cotswold hills in Gloucestershire, runs through Derbyshire, and continues northward till it terminates in the lofty peaks of Cumberland, Westmoreland, and Northumberland. The next are the Cheviots, the Lammermoor, and the Grampians, which intersect Scotland, and which, in Ben Nevis on the W., and Ben Macdhui on the N.E., attain the respective heights of 3,910 and 4,300 feet above the level of the sea. Rivers. The Thames, Medway, Trent, Humber, Tyne, Forth, Tay, and Spey, on the E. coast, and on the W. the Severn, Dee, Mersey, and Clyde. Lakes. Those of Cumberland and Westmoreland in England, and many, called lochs, in Scotland. Climate. Cold and variable, but healthy and invigorating. Zoology. The badger, fox, martin, stoat, wild cat, squirrel, hedgehog, hare, rabbit, dormouse, and mole. The fallow deer and the stag are still to be found, as are the eagle, the bittern, and other birds of prey; but the wild animals of Britain are fast disappearing. Of domestic animals the horse, horned cattle, and sheep are of the best description. Pro. The vegetable productions of Britain exist in considerable variety, but they are chiefly the products of art, only a small proportion of them being indigenous. Every species of fruit requires the most careful culture to attain perfection; and as the eastern portion of the island is in general devoted to agricultural purposes, and the western to grazing, all the usual grains and grasses are grown. The average of land under cultivation and pasture in the island has been estimated at about 50,000,000 acres, 23,000,000 of which are supposed to be annually in crop and in gardens, &c. The amount of corn, deducting the seed, is taken at 54,500,000 quarters a year. Minerals. Granite, porphyry, schistus, limestone, and very beautiful marble; coal in abundance; lead, iron, copper, tin, and small quantities of silver. In the mountains of Scotland are found great variety of transparent and coloured crystals; real topazes have been found, as well as the beryl and garnet. The well-known spars which are produced in Derbyshire are well adapted for ornamental purposes; and fossil salt is extracted in large quantities from pits in Cheshire and Worcestershire. It was calculated that, in the year 1857, the coal-fields of Great Britain yielded 63,000,000 tons. Manf. These are various and extensive, comprehending every possible variety of fabric into which the rude material can be fashioned by the hand of art, aided by the most perfect machinery. The most important are those of wool, cotton, linen, silk, leather, paper, glass, pottery, the working of metals, such as iron, copper, and tin. The commerce of Great Britain consists, generally speaking, in the export of her own manufactured goods, for the raw material of less opulent and civilized countries. No better idea of the immensity of its manufacturing industry and trade can be formed than by stating the fact that, in 1859, in Manchester and its environs, a motive steam power equal to 1,200,000 horses was constantly maintained; to support which there were consumed 30,000 tons of coal per day, or 9,500,000 a year. In the manufacture of salt alone about 3,000 tons were consumed per day, or 950,000 a year. The Transatlantic steamers from Liverpool and other ports consume 700,000 tons per year, and the manufacture of gas absorbs at least 10,000,000 tons per year. The export of coal from England reached, in 1858, 6,079,000 tons; and notwithstanding this immense consumption, it is estimated that England alone could furnish enough coal for the consumption of the whole of Europe for the space of 4,000 years. Gov. A limited monarchy, consisting of King, Lords, and Commons. These different powers constitute the legislature, and their united consent is necessary to the passing of every law. Rev. about £60,000,000. Army. Inclusive of British troops engaged in India, from 220,000 to 230,000 men. Navy. The largest in the world, numbering about 600 ships of war, carrying 20,000 guns and 80,000 seamen, boys, and marines. Rel. Episcopacy in England, and Presbyterianism in Scotland. Pop. In 1851, it was 22,000,000. Lat. between 50° and 58° 40′ N. Lon. between 5° 45′ W. and 1° 45′ E.—According to Camden, the name of Britain is derived from the word Brit, which, in the language of the ancient inhabitants, signifies painted or stained; it being a common custom with the natives to paint their naked bodies, and to wear no clothes when they were engaged in any laborious employment, the chase, or the field of battle. Throughout the more populous parts of Great Britain, her canal, railway, and postal systems have been brought to the highest state of perfection. The distance over which mails are now (1859) conveyed within the United Kingdom by railways, mail coaches, &c., steamers, boats, and foot messengers, is about 133,000 miles per day, being 3,000 more than at the end of 1857: this increase is chiefly in railway conveyance. The number of letters delivered in the United Kingdom in 1858 was 523,000,000; and was in the ratio of 22 to each person in England, 7 in Ireland, and 16 in Scotland. The total shows an increase of 19,000,000 over the year 1857, and, as compared with 1839 (the year previous to the introduction of the penny postage scheme), one of 447,000,000. (See ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, and WALES.)

BRITAIN, NEW, an archipelago in the Eastern seas, consisting of several islands of different dimensions. Lat. 1° 30′ to 6° 50′ S. Lon. 148° 5′ W.

BRITANNICUS, bri-tăn'-i-kus, son of the emperor Claudius, by his third wife, Messalina. His original name was Tiberius Claudius Germanicus, which was subsequently changed to Britannicus, from the conquests which were made in Britain. B. 42; poisoned by Nero in his fourteenth year.

BRITISH EMPIRE, THE, is the most powerful on the face of the globe, embracing within its extent an immense aggregated area and population. It comprehends two great divisions; namely, the British Isles, or what is commonly called the "United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland," and her "Colonies and Dependencies." Its superficial extent and population will be best seen by being given in the following approximated tabular form:—

| States. | Area in sq. miles. | Population. |
|---|---|---|
| IN EUROPE. | | |
| The United Kingdom, Wales, Ireland, and Islands ..... | 122,493 | 30,000,000 |
| Malta, Gibraltar, and the Ionian Islands ..... | 1,325 | 400,000 |
| IN ASIA. | | |
| British India, Ceylon, Protected States in India, Labuan, and Hong-Kong | 1,236,318 | 180,000,000 |
| AUSTRALIA, Tasmania, and New Zealand..... | 1,500,000 | 3,561,000 |
| IN AFRICA. | | |
| Cape Colony, Port Natal, Mauritius, and Gold Coast | 150,000 | 967,000 |
| IN AMERICA. | | |
| The Canadas, Nova-Scotia, Cape Breton, New Brunswick, Newfoundland, Prince Edward's Island, Labrador, Hudson Bay Territory, and Honduras | 3,560,000 | 2,588,000 |
| The West Indies and Guiana | 89,414 | 947,000 |

(See ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, IRELAND, INDIA, CANADA, AMERICA (NORTH), &c.)

BRITISH ISLES, THE, include Ireland, Anglesea, Man, the Channel, Scilly, Orkney, and Shetland Islands, and the Hebrides, all of which will be noticed under their respective headings.

BRITTANY, or BRETAGNE. (See BRETAGNE.)

BRITTON, John, brit'-ton, an architectural, antiquarian, and topographical writer, who, from an humble compiler of street song-books, rose to attempt greater things, and succeeded in producing a large number of valuable illustrated works, which, at the time of their publication, had the effect, in no small degree, of improving the public feeling in reference to our national antiquities. B. near Chippenham, Wiltshire, 1771; D. 1857.

BRIVIO, bre'-ve-o, a town of Lombardy, about 20 miles from Milan, where, in 1799, the French were defeated by the Austrians.

BRIXEN, brix'-en, a fortified town of the Tyrol, 40 miles from Innspruck. Pop. 3,000.—This town lies in the route of the Brenner Pass, between Germany and Italy.

BRIXHAM, brix'-ham, a seaport and fishing-town of Devonshire, in Tor Bay, 24 miles from Exeter. The inhabitants are chiefly engaged in the fishing trade, and have a considerable number of vessels, which carry their cargoes to London, Bristol, and elsewhere. Pop. 6,000.—Here William III. landed in 1688. A monument with an inscription commemorates the event.

BRIXTON, brix'-ton, the name of several English parishes, the largest of which is in Surrey, 4 miles from St. Paul's. Pop. about 14,000.

BRIZO, bri'-zo, the goddess of dreams, worshipped by the women of Delos.

BROAD BAY, a bay on the coast of Maine, N. America. Lat. 43° 50′ N. Lon. 65° 19′ W.

BROAD CREEK, the name of several rivers in the United States.

BROADHAVEN, a bay of the Atlantic, on the W. coast of Ireland, 11 miles from Bangor; average length and breadth 4 miles.

BROAD KILL, a river of the United States, running into Delaware Bay.

BROAD RIVER, an arm of the sea, on the E. coast of N. America, which extends along the W. and the N.W. sides of Beaufort or Port Royal Island, on the coast of South Carolina, and receives the river Coosa from the N.W.—Another river in Georgia, running into Savannah river, between Petersburg and Lisbon.

BROADSTAIRS, a seaside village of Kent, in the isle of Thanet, much resorted to for sea-bathing, 2 miles from Ramsgate. It is a station on the South-Eastern Railway.

BROADWAY, the name of three parishes in England, none of them with a population above 2,000.

BROCKEN, brok'-ken, the culminating point of the Harz Mountains, in Prussia, in the province of Saxony, cultivated nearly to its summit, which is 3,740 feet above the level of the sea. The phenomenon called the Spectre of the Brocken is here occasionally seen at sunset and sunrise. It is caused by the perpendicular rising of the mists from the valley opposite to the sun, at the same time leaving the top of the mountain clear. The effect produced is a wonderful enlargement of every object reflected by this dense mass of vapour ascending from the valley.

BROCKLESBY, Richard, brok'-els-be, a physician, who settled in London, acquired considerable wealth, and became intimate with Dr. Johnson. When the proposal for the increase of the pension of that great man failed, he generously offered him £100 a year for life, which the doctor declined to accept. He next urged him to live with him, that he might have him continually under his care, and finally became "his physician in ordinary, and saw him almost every day." To Mr. Burke he bequeathed in his will £1,000; but finding that the affairs of the great statesman were embarrassed, he gave it to him in his lifetime. B. at Nunehead, in Somersetshire, 1722; D. 1797.—Apart from the pecuniary benevolence of such a man as Brocklesby, it is impossible not to admire the goodness and humanity with which his whole disposition seems to have been imbued. "You write to me," says Dr. Johnson, a few months before his own death, "you write to me with a zeal that animates, and a tenderness that melts me." In presenting Burke with the £1,000, he enhances its value a hundred-fold by the kind and handsome manner in which it is done. "That you may long live," he says, "for talent, an ornament to human kind, and for your country, your friends, and family, the same happy man in prosperity, as you have ever approved yourself whilst withdrawn from the sunshine of a court; this, with much more (if anything can be better), is the fervent wish of, my dear Burke, your sincere and ever affectionate humble servant, RICHARD BROCKLESBY." He published an essay on the "Mortality of the Horned Cattle," 8vo, 1746; "Economical and Medical Observations from 1738 to 1763, tending to the Improvement of Medical Hospitals," 8vo, 1764; and some papers in the Philosophical Transactions.

BROD, brod, a name common to many small towns in the south-eastern and central parts of Europe.

BRODERIP, William John, brod'-e-rip, was for 31 years a police-magistrate in the metropolis, but is noticed here on account of his merits as a naturalist. He is the author of by far the largest number of papers in the zoological department of the "Penny Cyclopædia," as well as of works entitled "Zoological Recreations," "Leaves from the Note-book of a Naturalist," and numerous papers in the "Quarterly Review." He had a splendid collection of shells, which have been purchased by the British Museum. B. at Bristol; D. at Richmond, 1859.

BRODIE, Sir Benjamin Collins, Bart., brō'-de, an eminent physician, whose practice is most extensive. In 1811 he was presented, by the Royal Society, with the Copley medal, for his papers on physiology; and in 1814 produced his "Experiments and Observations on the Influence of the Nerves of the Eighth Pair on the Secretions of the Stomach." His professional progress has been gradual, but sure; and, in 1832, he was appointed sergeant-surgeon to the queen. In 1834 he was created a baronet; and in 1850 received the degree of D.C.L. from the university of Oxford. He is a member of several scientific societies, and has produced various other works connected with his profession. B. at Winterslow, Wiltshire, 1783.—Sir Benjamin has a son, professor of chemistry in the university of Oxford, &c., F.R.S.

BRODY, brō'-de, a town of Austrian Galicia, in the circle of Brody or Zloczow, 60 miles from Lemberg. Pop. 18,000.—On account of the great number of Jews in this town, it has been nicknamed the German Jerusalem. It was made a free commercial town in 1779.

BROEK-IN-WATERLAND, brook, a village of Holland, 6 miles from Amsterdam, remarkable for its neatness and cleanliness, every part of the streets and the houses being almost spotless. No beast is permitted to come within its precincts, and the tiles with which its streets are paved are undergoing an almost constant ablution. Pop. 1,500.

BROGLIO, Victor Maurice, Count de, brō'-le-o, a French general, was born of a good family at Quercy, served with glory in the wars of Louis XIV., and was made a marshal of France. D. 1727.—His son Francis-Marie was also a marshal of France, and distinguished himself greatly in Italy, in the campaigns of 1733 and 1734.—His son, the celebrated Marshal de Broglio, commanded with great glory in the Seven Years' war. He quitted France in 1794, and, after residing in England some time, went to Russia, where he obtained a military rank equal to that which he had held in France.—His son, Claude Victor, prince of Broglio, became active on the side of the popular party at the commencement of the French Revolution, and was made maréchal-de-camp. Guillotined 1794.

BROMBERG, brom'-bairg, a town of Prussian Poland, 70 miles from Posen. Manf. Woollen and linen fabrics, tobacco, Prussian blue, and chicory. Pop. 10,000.—The Bromberg Canal, by uniting the rivers Netz and Brahe, connects the Oder and Elbe with the Vistula.

BROME, Adam de, brome, an English divine, who founded Oriel College, Oxford. Lived in the 14th century.

BROMSEBRO, broms'-bro, a hamlet in Sweden, 30 miles from Calmar, noted by the treaties of 1541, 1641, and 1645, made here between Denmark and Sweden.

BROMLEY, brum'-le, a market-town and parish of Kent, on the Ravensbourne, 10 miles from London. Pop. 4,300. It is the head of a poor-law union.—There are several more parishes of this name in England.

BROMPTON, brump'-ton, the name of several places in England, of which the principal are—1. A western suburb of London, 4 miles from St. Paul's. Pop. 11,000. 2. A chapelry in the N. Riding of Yorkshire, 2 miles from Northallerton, where, in 1138, the battle of the "Standard" was fought between the Scotch and English, and the former defeated. Pop. 1,500. 3. A hamlet in Kent, included within the fortifications of Chatham. Pop. 5,500.

BROMSGROVE, broms'-grove, a town of Worcestershire, situate near the rise of the river Salwarp, 15 miles from Worcester. Manf. Buttons, nails, needles, and lindseys. Pop. 11,000.—It is a station on the Birmingham and Bristol Railway.

BROMWICH, WEST, brum'-idg, a town and parish of Staffordshire, 3 miles from Wednesbury, with mines of iron and coal in the neighbourhood. Pop. 35,000.

BRONTE, or BRONTI, bron'-te, a market-town in the island of Sicily, in the Val di Demona, bestowed, with its territory and an income of £3,750, by the Neapolitan government, on Lord Nelson, in 1799, under the title of a duchy, in reward for his naval exploits.

BRONTË, Charlotte, was the daughter of the Reverend Patrick Brontë, curate of Haworth, in Yorkshire. She married her father's curate, the Rev. Arthur Bell Nicholls, and, with her two sisters, under the assumed names of Currer, Acton, and Ellis Bell, became widely known to the readers of light literature. Charlotte, as an authoress, was the most successful of the three, and, by the production of her "Jane Eyre," "Shirley," and "Villette," acquired a large reputation. B. 1824; D. a year after her marriage, 1855.—Anne wrote the "Tenant of Wildfeld Hall," and, in conjunction with her sister Emily, "Wuthering Heights" and "Agnes Grey." She died, 1848; and Emily, in 1849.—The three sisters also produced, in 1846, a volume of poems.

BROOKE, Sir James, brook, rajah of Sarawak, an enterprising Englishman, who early entered the Indian army, and served in the Burmese war. He was severely wounded at Rungpoor, and soon after quitted the service. On the death of his father, who had been in the East-India Company's civil service, he found himself possessed of a large fortune. Having in 1830 made a voyage to the Malay archipelago, he, in 1835, purchased a yacht of 140 tons, and, getting together an expert crew, set sail for the East, with the avowed purpose of destroying the Malay pirates. Landing at Sarawak, a province in the N.E. of Borneo, he gained the affection of Muda Hassim, uncle of the sultan of the island, and having assisted in suppressing a rebellion of the Dyaks, he received the title of rajah of Sarawak,—a title reluctantly confirmed in 1841 by the Bornean sultan. He now devoted all his energies to the extinction of piracy, in which he was very successful. But the sultan having caused Muda Hassim, and other supporters of the English, to be massacred, Sir James, with the assistance of Admiral Cochrane, led an expedition against the capital, defeated the sultan's army, and obtained the cession to England of the island of Labuan, destined by its position to become an important commercial station. On his return to Great Britain in 1847, the rajah was received with great honours, obtaining the decoration of the Bath, and the title of governor of Labuan, with a salary of £2,000 a year. He returned to the East, and went, in 1851, a second time to England, to defend himself against the fierce attack made in the House of Commons upon his pirate-killing propensities. The charges against him were not proved. In February, 1857, at Sarawak, an insurrection of the Chinese population broke out, threatening destruction to all the European settlers, who were obliged to fly and take refuge in the neighbouring swamps, until, aided by the Dyaks, they were placed in safety at Sabong. An English steamer entering the river Sarawak, it was placed at Sir James's disposal, and a severe retribution overtook the treacherous Chinese, nearly 3,000 perishing, principally in the guerilla contest carried on against them by the Dyaks. B. at Bandel, Bengal, 1803.

BROOKE, Henry, an Irish author, who, after a poetical effort on "Universal Beauty," which gained the approbation of Pope, produced his "Gustavus Vasa," which the government would not permit to be acted, on account of the boldness of its language. This opposition increased his fame, and the play had a great sale. The prince of Wales became his friend; but though every prospect of advancement was presented to him, he relinquished all and returned to his native country of Ireland, where he continued the remainder of his days in privacy. He wrote some pieces for the Irish stage, which were successful, and the novels known as the "Fool of Quality," and "Juliet Grenville." B. at Rantavan, Ireland, 1706; D. in Dublin, 1783.—Throughout the whole of the compositions of this writer there breathes a strong spirit of liberty.

BROOKFIELD, brook'-feeld, the name of several small townships in the United States.

BROOKHAVEN, a township of Long Island, United States, including twelve villages within its compass. Area, 215 square miles. Manf. Woollen and cotton factories. Pop. 10,000.

BROOKLYN, brook'-lin, a city and seaport of the United States, at the extremity of Long Island, opposite New York. It is separated from New York by the East River, which is here three quarters of a mile wide. It is a large city, standing on uneven ground, with a vast number of churches, a city-hall of white marble, reading-rooms, libraries, and literary institutions, several banks, a naval yard comprising 40 acres, dry docks, and geological and mineralogical museums. Its dock, called the Atlantic, is the largest in the U.S. Pop. about 100,000.—In 1776 this part of Long Island was the principal locality of the War of Independence. —There are several other towns of the same name in the U.S.

BROOKS, Shirley, brooks, a modern English author, who at first studied for the bar, but relinquished the law to write dramatic pieces and tales, which were received with favour. In 1854 he visited, for the Morning Chronicle newspaper, Southern Russia, Turkey, and Egypt. His letters were afterwards collected and published in one volume. B. 1816.

BROOME, William, broom, an English poet, who was employed by Pope in writing notes on the Iliad, and translating part of the Odyssey, for which he received £500 and one hundred copies. Afterwards, however, Pope gave him a place in the Dunciad. In 1728 he was created LL.D., and obtained the rectory of Pulham, in Norfolk, and the vicarage of Eye, in Suffolk. D. in Cheshire; D. 1745.—To Broome Dr. Johnson gives the credit of producing smooth and mellifluous lines, and a diction select and elegant.

BROOME, a county of the U.S., bordering on Pennsylvania. Area, 680 square miles. Desc. Fertile, and producing Indian corn and the usual cereals. It has both iron-foundries and woollen factories, and contains a great many churches. Pop. 32,000.

BROSCHI, Carlo, bros'-ke. (See FARINELLI.)

BROSELEY, brose'-le, a town and parish of Salop, on the Severn, 12 miles from Shrewsbury. It has extensive iron-works. Pop. 5,000.

BROTHERS, THE, a group of islets at the entrance of the Red Sea, 10 miles from Perim Island, varying from 300 to 350 feet in height.

BROTHERTON, broth'-er-ton, a part of the W. Riding of Yorkshire, where the second wife of Edward I. gave birth to a son. It is 4 miles from Pontefract. Pop. 1,600.

BROUGHAM, Lord Henry, broo'-ham, or bro'-ham, received his education at the High School and university of his native city of Edinburgh, early distinguishing himself by his mathematical studies. He was designed for the legal profession; but, previous to his settling down as a practitioner, he travelled for some time on the continent, storing his mind with such useful knowledge as came within the scope of his observation. On his return he was admitted a member of the Edinburgh Society of Advocates; and, having made the acquaintance of Horner, Jeffrey and several other talented young men, a "Speculative Society" was formed, in which Brougham soon distinguished himself as an extemporaneous debater. In 1802 the "Edinburgh Review" was started, and Brougham, after the third number, was admitted as a contributor to its pages. He was at this period only twenty-three years of age; but was fresh and vigorous in his intellect, hale and healthful in his body, and greatly ambitious of literary fame. He had for his coadjutors Horner and Brown, the metaphysician, neither of whom was more than twenty-four, Jeffrey, who was twenty-nine, Sydney Smith, who was thirty-one, and Allen, who was the oldest, yet not more than thirty-two. Brougham, however, was the largest and most versatile contributor; and although the pay was only £10 a sheet, it was soon more than doubled. Whilst he was devoting his energies to the "Review," he was also writing "An Enquiry into the Colonial Policy of the European Powers," which in 1803 was published in Edinburgh in two volumes, and was considered a remarkable work for so young a man to produce. Finding the practice of the Scottish bar but a limited field for such ambition as his, he went to London, where, in 1807, we find him qualifying himself for the English bar. In 1808 he began to practise as an English barrister at the court of King's Bench, and on the northern circuit. Here he soon became distinguished by his eloquence; and, as an ally of the Whig party, was returned for Camelford to the House of Commons, by the earl of Darlington, who was the patron of the borough. His maiden speech was delivered on the 5th of March, 1810; and although not remarkable for any quality beyond its general ability and appropriateness, still it was sufficiently striking to fix attention upon the man as likely to prove an able auxiliary to his party. He soon became accustomed to the new arena into which his abilities had called him. He measured the men with whom he had to contend. He took his stand upon the consciousness of the strength and variety of his own intellectual attainments. When he spoke, he delivered himself with a daring vehemence, and an unexampled fluency. There was no hesitation, no confusion, no timidity in his utterance. On rolled the stream of his eloquence, strong from conviction, vehement from passion, and burning with invective as the occasion demanded. He soon stood all but alone in the house, Canning being the only one, in the opposition lists, that dared to oppose him. From 1812 to 1816 he was out of parliament, but in that year was returned for Winchelsea, again under the patronage of the earl of Darlington. The splendour and versatility of his talents were now universally acknowledged, when, in 1820, he was called upon to undertake the defence of Queen Caroline against her husband, George IV.; and this trial greatly increased his popularity. In 1830 he became lord-chancellor, under the administration of Earl Grey. In 1834 a change of the ministry took place, Sir Robert Peel having come into office. In the following year another change occurred, when Lord Melbourne became premier, and Lord John Russell home secretary. From this government Lord Brougham was excluded, but upon what grounds has never been clearly ascertained. From that time his defection, if it can be so called, from the Whigs, dates. As an ex-chancellor, he has lived upon his pension of £5,000 a year, but by no means the life of an idler, or of one who is weary of well-doing in the affairs of his country. Throughout his whole career he has been on the side of reform, and into whatever question he has entered, he has pursued it with an ardour and a perseverance which could only have been sustained by the most powerful conviction of its necessity. In 1821 he took a prominent part with Dr. Birkbeck in the establishment of literary and scientific institutions throughout the country, and was the principal founder of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge. He has been the unwearied advocate of slave emancipation, and has strenuously laboured in the cause of popular education. Amid the multifarious and exciting duties which devolve upon the legal politician and statesman, he has ever remembered the sweets of literature and the pleasures of science, pursuing them both with the fervour of a devotee. In 1858 his speech at the inauguration of a monument to the memory of Newton, in Lincolnshire, was a masterpiece of its kind, and at the meeting of the British Association in the same year he delivered an address, which showed how well he was fitted to digest masses of materials into succinct forms, and to make subservient to his purposes every kind of knowledge, to the acquirement of which a long and industrious life enabled him to devote himself. B. at Edinburgh, 1778.

BROUGHTON, braw'-ton, the name of a great many places in England and Wales, with populations ranging from 200 up to 7,000 or 8,000, but with nothing particularly interesting to record of them.

Brown, General Sir George, broun, entered the army in 1800 as an ensign in the 43rd regiment of foot. In 1807 he was a lieutenant, and took part in the bombardment of Copenhagen. He served throughout the whole of the Peninsular war, from 1808 to 1814, during which he was wounded at Talavera, and led the forlorn hope at the storming of Badajoz. He was, in 1814, made a lieutenant-colonel, and served in the short American war. Rising through the various ranks of his profession, he was made a lieutenant-general in 1851, and in 1854 commanded the light division, which distinguished itself at the battle of the Alma, in the Crimea. On November 5, 1854, he was severely wounded at Inkermann, and was obliged to relinquish his command, and retire for a time to Malta. In the following year he returned to his command, and was created a Knight Commander of the Bath. He had the command-in-chief of the storming party which was unsuccessful in the first attack on the redan of Sebastopol, and shortly afterwards returned to England. In 1856 he was gazetted "General in the army for distinguished service in the field." B. near Elgin, Scotland, 1790.

Brown, Robert, the founder of the sect called Brownists, was descended of a good family, and educated at Cambridge. Having formed, about 1580, a religious society at Norwich, he was imprisoned, but by means of treasurer Burleigh, to whom he was related, he obtained his liberty. After a life of difficulties, on account of religious principle and zeal, he ended his days in Northampton gaol, where he had been imprisoned for an assault. B. 1550; D. 1630.

Brown, Thomas, M.D., one of the most distinguished of modern metaphysicians, who studied in Edinburgh, and who, in 1806, entered into co-partnership with Dr. Gregory. Dugald Stewart, professor of moral philosophy, being indisposed in the winter of 1808-9, engaged Dr. Brown to read lectures for him in his class. In this capacity his success was so complete that, in 1810, he was induced to resign his practice, and accept the appointment of colleague to Dugald Stewart in the chair of moral philosophy, in the university of Edinburgh. B. at Kirkmabreck, Kirkcudbrightshire, Scotland, 1778; D. at Brompton, London, whither he had removed for his health, 1826.—His lectures on the Philosophy of the Human Mind were published after his decease, and they have been pronounced masterpieces of their kind. His style is certainly the most captivating that has ever been employed to convey a knowledge of philosophy. He was the author of several poems which are now forgotten, and one of the young men whose talents contributed to the popularity and establishment of the Edinburgh Review. (See Brougham.)

Brown, Ulysses Maximilian, a field marshal, of Irish origin, in the Austrian army, who rendered great services to the empress Maria Theresa, gaining in 1746 the battle of Placentia, and taking Genoa. In 1758 he defeated the Prussians, who had invaded Bohemia, and won the battle of Losowitz. He was mortally wounded at the batte of Prague. B. at Bâle, 1705; D. 1757.

Brown, Captain Sir Samuel, R.N., a naval officer, who rose to the rank of commander, but in 1842 accepted a retired captaincy. He devoted much of his time to civil engineering, and may be regarded as the first to introduce the use of chain-cables and suspension-bridges. Telford adopted his principle in constructing the Menai Bridge. In 1821 Captain Brown constructed the Trinity suspension pier at Newhaven, near Edinburgh, and subsequently several other bridges and piers, especially the one at Brighton. He was knighted in 1835. B. in London, 1776; D. 1852.

Brown, Robert, D.C.L., F.R.S., an eminent botanist, was the son of a Scottish Episcopalian clergyman, and educated for the medical profession, accompanying, in 1795, a Scotch fencible regiment to Ireland. His peculiar aptitude for botanical study had, however, already developed itself; and on his friend Sir Joseph Banks's recommendation, he threw up his commission, and, in 1801, embarked as naturalist in the expedition under Captain Flinders, for the survey of the Australian coasts. Thence he returned to England, in 1805, bringing with him nearly 4,000 species of plants, a large proportion of which were entirely new to science, and also an inexhaustible store of new ideas in relation to the characters, distribution, and affinities of the singular vegetation which distinguishes the great continent of Australia from every other botanical region. To work out these ideas, both in relation to the plants of New Holland and in their comparison with those of other parts of the world, with wonderful sagacity, with the utmost minuteness of detail, and, at the same time, with the most comprehensive generalization, was the labour of many succeeding years. His memoirs on Asclepiadeæ and Proteaceæ, his "Prodromus Floræ Novæ Hollandiæ," vol. i., published in 1810, and his "General Remarks, Geographical and Systematical, on the Botany of Terra Australis," published in 1814, revealed to the scientific world how great a master in botanical science had arisen among us. The natural system of Jussieu, with important modifications, was adopted by him, and led to its general substitution in place of the Linnæan method. Honours were showered on him from all lands. His illustrious friend Alexander Von Humboldt justly called him "Botanicorum facile Princeps;" and after the death of Dryander, in 1810, he received the charge of the noble library and splendid collections of Sir Joseph Banks, who bequeathed to him their enjoyment for life. At a later period these were, with his assent, transferred to the British Museum, where, for 30 years, he was keeper of botany, receiving also a pension of £200 per annum, in recognition of his distinguished merits. B. at Montrose, Dec. 21, 1773; D. in London, June 10, 1858.—Robert Brown was a truthful, amiable, and humorous companion, and possessed of an uprightness of judgment which rendered him an invaluable counsellor. He was for several years president of the Linnæan Society, and was succeeded, as keeper of botany in the British Museum, by his friend and associate, John J. Bennett.

Brown, the name of several counties in the United States,—in Ohio, Indiana, Wisconsin, and Illinois.

Browne, Sir Thomas, an eminent physician, who having taken his degrees in arts, went to Leyden, where he became an M.D., and in 1642 published his famous book, the "Religio Medici," which excited uncommon attention at home and abroad. In 1636 he settled at Norwich as a physician, and acquired a good practice. In 1646 appeared his book on "Vulgar Errors," in folio. Charles II. honoured him with knighthood in 1671. B. in London, 1605; D. at Norwich, 1682.—His works were printed in one volume, folio, after his death, and Dr. Johnson wrote his life.

Browne, Sir William, an English physician, who left a sum for two prize medals, to be given annually at Cambridge for the best odes; and wrote several ingenious poems, miscellaneous tracts, speeches, and a work entitled "Opuscula." He also translated Dr. Gregory's "Elements of Catoptrics and Dioptrics," from Latin into English, with additions. D. 1774.

Browning, Robert, broun'-ing, a distinguished modern English poet. In 1836 he published "Paracelsus," which was favourably received; and in 1837 produced "Strafford," a tragedy, in which Mr. Macready, the actor, personated the hero. His other works are "Sordello,"—"Pippa Passes,"—"The Blot in the Scutcheon,"—"King Victor and King Charles,"—"Dramatic Lyrics,"—"Return of the Druses,"—"Columbe's Birth-day,"—and "Dramatic Romances," &c. Of all his writings, perhaps his "Pippa Passes" and "The Blot in the Scutcheon" are the best. B. at Camberwell, 1812.—In 1846 Mr. Browning married Elizabeth Barrett, one of the most learned of living poetesses.

Browning, Elizabeth, originally Miss Barrett, wife of the above, gave early indications of genius, and was educated with the utmost care. At the age of seventeen she published "An Essay of Mind, with other Poems;" and in 1838 appeared her "Seraphim," which was succeeded by "The Romaunt of the Page," —"The Drama of Exile,"—"Isabel's Child,"—"Casa Guidi Windows," and several miscellaneous pieces, all of which occupy a high place in our poetical literature. Besides those original works, she had translated the "Prometheus Bound," of Æschylus, and contributed a series of papers to the London Athenæum on the Greek Christian poets. In 1856 appeared her "Aurora Leigh," which has many admirers. B. in London.

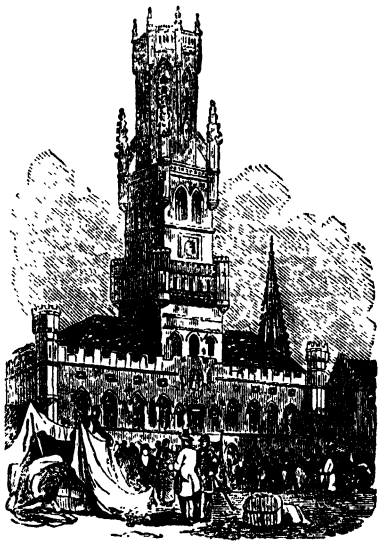
Bruce, Robert, broose, king of Scotland, one of the bravest and wisest of the Scottish monarchs. Through a long series of years he struggled against hardship and danger in endeavouring to recover the independence of his country, which, by the overthrow of the English at the battle of Bannockburn, in 1314, he achieved. This event established his sovereignty over his country, and the remainder of his life was passed in regulating his administration, and consolidating his power. B. 1274; D. in his castle at Cardross, on the shore of the Frith of Clyde, 1329.—The heart of Bruce was embalmed, and carried by Douglas to the Holy Land. His remains were interred in the abbey church of Dunfermline.

BRUCE, Michael, a Scottish poet, the son of a weaver. He died too early to have written much; but his descriptive poem of "Lochleven," based upon the model of Thomson, makes us regret that he was so early taken from us. His "Elegy," however, is his finest poem, describing in the most touching pathos his feelings in anticipation of his own early dissolution. B. at Kinneswood, Kinross-shire, 1746; D. 1767.

BRUCE, James, a celebrated traveller, descended from the royal house of Bruce, and educated first at Harrow, and next at Edinburgh, where he studied the law, which profession, however, he did not follow. On leaving Edinburgh he went to London, and entered into partnership with a wine-merchant, whose daughter he married; but after a few months she died, when he went on a journey through Portugal, Spain, France, and the Netherlands. Meanwhile his father dying, he returned to England, and took possession of the patrimonial estate. In 1761 he dissolved partnership with his father-in-law, and in 1762 was appointed consul-general in Algiers. In the following year he arrived there, but in 1765 was superseded in his office. He now set out upon his travels, and visited Asia Minor, where he made drawings of the ruins of Palmyra and Balbec. In 1768 he departed on his tour to explore the source of the Nile. From Alexandria he went to Cairo, and crossed the desert to the Red Sea, after which he spent a considerable time in Arabia Felix. In 1770 he arrived at Gondar, in Abyssinia, and in that country rendered himself a favourite by his skill in physic and his splendid horsemanship. In the same year he discovered the sources of the Ahawi, which was then considered the principal stream of the Nile. Having accomplished this object, he returned to Abyssinia, where he served in the army under the reigning king, and it was with difficulty he obtained leave to quit the country, after residing there two years. He was nearly thirteen months in travelling to Cairo, during which he endured many hardships. He returned to England in 1773, and retired to his seat at Kinnaird, where he again married. In 1790 he published the long-expected history of his travels, in five quarto volumes, which contained much curious information, though the veracity of the author in several instances has been called in question. B. at Kinnaird, Stirlingshire, 1730; D. from a fall down the stairs of his own house, 1794.

BRUCK, VON, Charles Louis, Baron, brook, an Austrian politician, who originally entered a commercial house at Bonn, and afterwards established himself at Trieste, where he married the daughter of a rich merchant. Called to the direction of the Austrian Lloyd's, he displayed great administrative powers, and in 1848 was elected a member of the National Assembly at Frankfort. When the Viennese revolution broke out, he remained faithful to the monarchy, and was subsequently engaged in various measures for the re-establishment of the authority of the emperor of Austria, and for the maintenance of order. In 1855 he was made minister of finance, and administered that when war between Austria and Sardinia was declared in 1859.



BRUCK, a 'bridge,' the name of many small towns in Germany, but none of them having a population above 3,000.

BRUEYS, Francis Paul de, broo'-ais, a rear-admiral in the French navy. He commanded the fleet which carried the French army to Egypt, in 1798; and, in the same year, was defeated by Nelson in the battle of Aboukir, in which he himself was killed. B. at Uzès, 1760.

BRUGES, broozh, a large and opulent city of Belgium, with a number of canals centering in it, about 6 miles from the German Ocean, and 55 from Brussels. It is encompassed by walls, and the principal public buildings are the Town-hall, the Exchange, and the Lycée, formerly the celebrated convent of the Downs de Dunes, and the beautiful Gothic church of Notre Dame, with its elevated spire, famous belfry, and peal of bells, of which the American poet Longfellow sings in his "Belfry of Bruges:"—

"In the market-place of Bruges stands the belfry old and brown, Thrice consumed and thrice rebuilded, still it watches o'er the town."

Besides these, there are an academy of painting and sculpture, a seminary of theology, a school of surgery, and a number of charitable institutions. Manf. Woollens, linens, cottons, lace, tobacco, soap; and several distilleries, tanneries, dye-works, sugar-refineries, and ship-building yards. Pop. about 55,000. Lat. 51° 12′ 30″ N. Lon. 3° 13′ 44″ E.—In the 13th century this was one of the greatest commercial cities in Europe; but when the cruel persecutions of Philip II. compelled its inhabitants to flee into England, it began to decline. In the church of Notre Dame are the tombs of Charles the Bold, and his daughter, Mary of Burgundy. Van Eyck, the painter, died here in 1441, and Charles II. of England lived here some time during his exile.

BRUN, Charles le. (See LEBRUN.)

BRUNDUSIUM, brun-du'-se-um, a city of Calabria, on the Adriatic Sea, where the Appian road was terminated, founded by Diomedes, or, according to Strabo, by Theseus. It is famous for being the birthplace of the poet Pacuvius, and the scene of the death of Virgil. (See BRINDISC.)

BRUNE, Marshal, broon, a French soldier, who was brought up to the law, but who, when the Revolution broke out, took up arms and served under Dumourier. He rose rapidly, and in 1795 became a general of brigade under Napoleon I. He was appointed commander-in-chief of the army which invaded Switzerland, after the peace of Campo Formio; and also of that of Italy after the fall of Berne. In 1805 he was made a marshal of the French empire, and in 1807 he became governor of the Hanseatic towns, but fell into disgrace for omitting the titles of Napoleon in the text of the convention which procured for France from Sweden the surrender of the island of Rugen. He now went into retirement till the first abdication of Napoleon, when he submitted to Louis XVIII., who gave him the cross of St. Louis. In the "Hundred Days," he joined Napoleon, but after the battle of Waterloo, proclaimed the king. Leaving his corps and proceeding to Paris, he entered an inn at Avignon, where he was attacked by an infuriated mob, who accused him of having been a terrorist, and taken part in the massacres of 1792. At that time, however, he said he was fighting on the frontiers of his country against the enemy. Nevertheless they immediately shot him, dragged his body through the streets, and threw it into the Rhone. D. at Brives, 1763; killed, 1815.

BRUNEL, Sir Mark Isambard, broo-nel', discovered from his boyhood a decided predilection for mechanical studies, and seized upon every opportunity of giving them a practical effect. His parents, who were respectable French agriculturists, discountenanced these pursuits; but the force of nature would not be restrained, and after passing some time with the family of a friend of his father, of the name of Carpentier, he was induced to enter the mercantile marine, in which he made several voyages to the West Indies. Whilst employed in this service, he continued to give specimens of his mechanical ingenuity, and actually constructed a pianoforte whilst his ship was lying at Guadaloupe. The French revolution of 1793 drove him from his country, and, landing in New York, he resolved to endeavour to turn his engineering skill to some account. Accordingly, he, conjointly with another, surveyed the ground for the canal which now connects the river Hudson at Albany with Lake Champlain. Desirous, however, of returning to Europe, he came to England, where he produced several inventions, and submitted to the government a plan for making block-pulleys for ships, by machinery. This was carried into execution in the dockyard at Portsmouth, and proved a wonderful success. Brunel was now a made man: he continued to exercise his talents in constructive works, and in 1825 commenced excavating for the Thames Tunnel. This extraordinary work was opened to the public in 1843; but in 1841 the honour of knighthood had been conferred upon him. B. at Hacqueville, near Rouen, 1769; D. 1849.

BRUNEL, Isambard Kingdom, son of the above, finished his education at the college of Henri IV. at Caen, in France, and commenced the study of civil engineering under his father. He was the resident engineer of the Thames Tunnel, and was the designer and civil engineer of the Great Western, which was the first steamship built to cross the Atlantic. He was also the constructor of the magnificent iron steam-ship the Great Eastern, which was built at Millwall. In 1833 he was appointed engineer to the Great Western Railway, and all the tunnels and works connected with that line and its branches were constructed under his direction. He also superintended the erection of many bridges; among which may be mentioned the Hungerford suspension-bridge across the Thames, now being removed to give place to a railway-bridge, and the bridge of the Cornwall Railway, crossing the Tamar at Saltash. This latter is supported by a central pier from a depth of 80 feet of water, which is the deepest yet achieved in civil engineering. It was opened in May, 1859, by Prince Albert, after whom it was named, and is the greatest undertaking of its kind in the world. (See SALTASH.) B. at Portsmouth, 1806; D. 1859.

BRUNELLESCHI, Philip, broo-nel-les'-ke, an Italian architect, who erected the dome of the cathedral at Florence, which Michael Angelo pronounced a work of uncommon beauty. He was patronized by the Medici family, for whom he built some magnificent structures. He was also an excellent engineer, and skilled in military architecture. B. at Florence, 1377; D. 1414.

BRUNN, broon, the capital of Moravia, strongly fortified, and the chief town in a circle of the same name, 116 miles from Prague. It has manufactures of fine cloth, silk stuffs, hair cloth, and soap. Among the public buildings are the parish church of St. James, the meeting-house of the States, the town-hall, the palaces of Kaunitz, Dietrichstein, and other nobles. It is the seat of the principal military and legal courts of Moravian and Austrian Silesia, and has several public institutions for amusement and instruction. Manf. Woollens, cottons, silk, soap, glass, tobacco, leather-factories, and machinery. It is the centre of a trade between Austria and Bohemia, and the countries to the N. and E. of the Carpathian mountains. Pop. about 50,000. Lat. 49° 11′ 39″ N. Lon. 16° 36′ 54″ E. —Brunn before the battle of Austerlitz was the head-quarters of Napoleon I.

BRUNNEN, broon'-nen, a village of Switzerland, near the mouth of the Muotta, on Lake Lucerne. Here the basis of the Helvetic republic was laid by the three original cantons, Uri, Schwytz, and Unterwalden, in 1315.—In Germany the name of the "Brunnens" is applied to watering-places collectively.

BRUNNOW, Ernest Philip, Baron, broon'-no, a modern Russian diplomatist, who assisted at the congress of Laybach and Troppau. After being engaged in various important positions in England, Turkey, Germany, and his own court, he was sent as ambassador to Great Britain in 1840, and remained in that post till the breaking out of the Russian war in 1854. In 1856 he was at the congress of Paris, and in 1858 returned to the court of St. James's.

BRUNSWICK, Duchy of, brunz'-wik, in the circle of Lower Saxony, is, since 1833, divided into six circles,—Brunswick, Helmstadt, Wolfenbuttel, Blankenburg, Gandersheim, and Holzminden. Area, 1,526 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, especially in the S. portion; and, on the whole, indifferently watered. It is partly traversed by the branches of the Harz mountains. Rivers. The Ocker, Leine, and Wesser. Pro. The usual cerealia, with flax, seed-oil, tobacco, chicory, hops, and fruits. Cattle-rearing is carried on to a great extent, and the sheep are esteemed as composed of excellent breeds. Minerals. Gold, silver, litharge, lead, sulphur, vitriol, and alum. Manf. Linens and woollens, paper, soap, lacquered wares, glass, and beer. Pop. about 100,000. Lat. between 51° 38′ and 52° 28′ N. Lon. between 9° 23′ and 11° 30′ E.—This duchy, with Hanover, belongs to the German Commercial Union.

BRUNSWICK, a large and fortified town, capital of the above, is situate on the river Ocker, 50 miles from Magdeburg. Its principal public buildings are its churches, large wine-cellars, Exchequer, meeting-house of the Diet, Mint, Opera-house, Town-hall, Arsenal, and Cathedral of St. Blasius, with the tombs of deceased members of the royal family. Manf. Wool, yarn, linen, porcelain, pasteboard, paper-hangings, and a variety of chemical preparations. Pop. about 70,000. This place is the nativity of the poet Lafontaine, the theologian Henke, and the historian Meibom. It is connected by railway with Magdeburg, Hanover, and Neustadt.

BRUNSWICK, a post township of Cumberland county, Maine, U.S., on the S.W. side of the Androscoggin. The falls of the Androscoggin furnish many valuable seats for mills and manufactories. Bowdoin College, one of the richest and most celebrated of American institutions, and so called from Governor Bowdoin, its most liberal patron, was founded in this town in 1794. Its library contains 20,000 volumes. Pop. 5,000.—This is the name of two counties, other two townships, and several villages in the United States.

BRUNSWICK, NEW, a British province in N. America, bounded S. by the Bay of Fundy, W. by the United States and part of Lower Canada, N. by Chaleur Bay, E. by the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Area, 28,000 square miles. Desc. Fertile in general, but much of it still lies in a state of forest, which supplies vast quantities of timber for exportation. This, in fact, constitutes the principal wealth of the colony. Rivers. The St. John, Miramichi, and Ristigouche. Pro. Wheat, oats, maize, barley, and potatoes. The fisheries are a considerable source of wealth, and the rearing of cattle is becoming more an object of interest. Minerals. Iron, coal, and manganese. Pop. 125,000. Lat. between 45° and 48° N. Lon. between 63° 48′ and 67° 30′ W.—This province, with Canada, was ceded to Great Britain by the treaty of Paris, in 1763.

BRUNSWICK, NEW, a city of New Jersey, on the south-west bank of the Raritan, 30 miles from New York, U.S. It contains a court-house, gaol, college edifice, and several places of public worship. The college edifice is of stone, three stories high. Pop. 14,000.—It is connected with Trenton by canal, and with New York and Philadelphia by railway.

Brunswick, House of, one of the oldest German families, deriving its descent from Albert Azo I., margrave of Este, in Italy, who died in 964. Her majesty Queen Alexandrina Victoria is a descendant of one of the branches of this family. Several distinguished commanders have sprung from this house; among whom may be noticed Charles William Ferdinand, who was educated a soldier, and who, after having fought in many campaigns, was defeated at Jena and Auerstadt, where he was wounded in October, 1806, and died the following month. His son, William Frederick, fell at Ligny, on June 16, 1815. It is to the gallantry of this prince that Byron, in the third canto of his "Childe Harold," dedicates a stanza in his description of the battle of Waterloo.

Brussa, or Broussa, broos'-sa, a city of Natolia, in Asia Minor, about 60 miles from Constantinople. It is one of the most flourishing commercial emporiums of the Turkish dominions, and, in all ages, has been celebrated for its thermal springs. Pop. 60,000.—Until Amurath removed his court to Adrianople, this was the capital and burial-place of the Turkish sultans. It was the place to which Abd-el-Kader was permitted to retire by Louis Napoleon, in 1853. (See Abd-el-Kader.)

Brussels, brus'-sels (Fr. Bruxelles, broox'-el), a large and important city, the capital of the kingdom of Belgium, situate in Brabant, on the river Senne, or Sienne, 20 miles from Antwerp. Its circumference is said to be 7 English miles, and its ramparts are planted with trees, and form most beautiful walks. It has extensive suburbs, consisting of various villages, joined to the city by a continuity of streets. It has, besides, several public squares, of great beauty and elegance. Its chief ornaments, however, are its public promenades; no city in Europe possessing one superior to that which is called the Allée Verte, or Green Alley, or to the great interior square called the Park, in which the chief struggle in the revolution of 1830 took place. In the great market-place stands the hôtel-de-ville, an old but handsome edifice in the Gothic style. Its turret is 364 feet in height, and surmounted by a gigantic figure of St. Michael, in copper, 17 feet high. The church of St. Gudule is a magnificent structure, containing no less than sixteen chapels, adorned in the interior with beautiful paintings and sculptures, and celebrated for its finely-carved pulpit. The chapel of Notre Dame is likewise an elegant building. There are, besides, within the walls, several elegant mansions, belonging to noblemen. The Opera-house is a stately edifice, in the Italian style, built in the year 1700. The public fountains are numerous, and are all embellished with sculptures. A statue to Godfrey de Bouillon was inaugurated in 1848. Belgium has many charitable foundations, and establishments for public instruction. There are, besides, a library, containing nearly 100,000 volumes, mostly saved from suppressed convents; an extensive and valuable collection of paintings, a cabinet of natural history, a polytechnic, an academy of painting, sculpture, and engraving, and numerous primary and industrial schools. There are several literary and scientific establishments, an academy of Belles-Lettres, and a botanical garden. Manf. Lace, camlets, carpets, carriages, ticking, various kinds of cotton and woollen stuffs, silk stockings, galoons, earthenware, &c. It carries on considerable trade by means of the canals which bring it into communication with the Scheldt. Pop. about 220,000. Lat. 50° 51′ 11″ N. Lon. 4° 21′ 10″ E.—This city is supposed to have been founded at the commencement of the 7th century. Otho II. held his court here in the 10th century, and it was fortified in the 11th century. In its palace, which was built in 1300, and had been the residence of the dukes of Brabant since the time of John II., Charles V. of Spain abdicated his crown in favour of his son, Philip II., on October 25, 1555; and, twelve years after, the tyranny of the duke of Alva, Philip's bloodthirsty governor, drove 10,000 of its citizens to seek refuge and to settle in England. Under the French empire, it was the capital of the department of the Dyle, and previous to 1830 it was one of the capitals of the kingdom of the Netherlands. In 1848 the first peace congress was held in it, and in 1853 a general European statistical congress also assembled here.

Brutii, broo'-ti-i, a people in the farthest parts of Italy. They received this name from their cowardice in submitting, without opposition, to Hannibal in the second Punic war, and were ever after held in the greatest contempt.

Bruton, broo'-ton, a market-town and parish of Somersetshire, in which are a number of silk-mills and manufactures in woollen and hosiery. Pop. 4,000.—Dampier, the navigator, was born here.

Brutus, L. Junius, broo'-tus, the son of M. Junius and Tarquinia, second daughter of Tarquin Priscus. His father, with his eldest son, having been murdered by Tarquin the Proud, he was called Brutus on account of his stupidity, which, however, was only feigned. He expelled the Tarquins from Rome, condemned to death his own sons Titus and Tiberius for conspiring against their country, and fell fighting for the liberties of the people, in the 6th century B.C.—His body was brought to Rome, and received as in triumph; a funeral oration was spoken over it, and the Roman matrons showed their grief by mourning a year for the father of the republic.

Brutus, M. Junius, the son of Servilia, Cato's sister, and Decimus Junius Brutus, was lineally descended from the above. At the battle of Pharsalia, Cæsar not only spared the life of Brutus, but he made him one of his most faithful friends. He however forgot the favour, because Cæsar aspired to tyranny. He conspired with many of the most illustrious citizens of Rome against the tyrant, and stabbed him in Pompey's Basilica. Antony having taken up arms to avenge Cæsar, Brutus retired into Greece, where he gained himself many friends by his arms, as well as by persuasion; but he was soon after pursued thither by Antony, whom young Octavius accompanied. A battle was fought at Philippi. Brutus, who commanded the right wing of the republican army, defeated the enemy, and even took the camp of Octavius; but Cassius, who had the care of the left, was overpowered by the persevering valour of Antony; and as he knew not the situation of his friend, and grew desperate, he ordered one of his freedmen to run him through. Brutus deeply deplored his fall, and in the fulness of his grief called him the last of the Romans. In another battle, the wing which Brutus commanded obtained a victory; but the other was defeated, and he found himself surrounded by the soldiers of Antony. He however made his escape; but hearing that many of his personal friends had deserted to the conquerors, and that their attempts to seduce his soldiers were incessant and too successful, he at last fell upon his sword exclaiming, "O virtue, thou art but an empty name; I have worshipped thee as a goddess, but thou art the slave of fortune." Fell 42 B.C.—Brutus is not less celebrated for his literary talents than his valour in the field. When he was in the camp, the greatest part of his time was occupied with reading and writing; and on the day which preceded one of his most bloody battles, while the rest of his army was under continual apprehensions, Brutus calmly spent his hours till the evening in writing an epitome of Polybius. Plutarch mentions, that Cæsar's ghost made its appearance to him in his tent, and told him that he would meet him at Philippi. He married Claudia, whom he afterwards divorced without assigning any reason, for which his conduct was deservedly reprehended, and he immediately took for his second wife, Porcia, the daughter of Cato, who killed herself by swallowing burning coals, when she heard the fate of her husband.—It is said that both Brutus and Cassius fell upon those very swords which they had raised against the life of Julius Cæsar.

Brutus, D. Jun. Albinus, also one of Cæsar's murderers, was distantly related to the above. It was he who prevailed upon the dictator to go to the senate-house, when he seemed doubtful, in consequence of the unfavourable appearance of the omens. He was betrayed into the hands of Antony, and put to death, B.C. 42.

Bruyere, John de la, broo'-yair, a French writer of eminence, whom Bossuet employed as a teacher of history to the duke of Burgundy. He was admitted a member of the French Academy. B. at Dourdan, in Normandy, 1644; D. at Versailles, 1696.—Bruyère's "Characters in the manner of Theophrastus" acquired great popularity, as they were drawn from real persons, and exposed the prevailing follies in a bold yet delicate style. The best editions are those of Amsterdam, 1741, and Paris, 1765.

BRYANT, William Cullen, bri'-ant, one of the best of the American poets. He was educated for the law; but having early enrolled himself under the banner of the Muses, he abandoned Themis, and devoted himself to the study of literature. This took place in 1825, when, in conjunction with Robert Sands, he founded the New York Review and Athenæum Magazine. He next began the publication of an annual called the "Talisman," which extended his popularity as a poet. Seeking, however, either a more extended sphere of usefulness or excitement, he resigned all connection with the Muses, and became editor of the New York Evening Post. To this paper he has devoted his energies for upwards of thirty years. B. at Cummington, Massachusetts, 1794.—The "Ages" is the longest and the best poem of Mr. Bryant, but his other effusions have very great merit.

BUCEPHALUS, bu-sef'-a-lus, a horse of Alexander, whose head resembled that of a bull, whence his name (Bous kephalos, 'bovis caput'). Alexander was the only one who could mount him. In an engagement in Asia, where he received a heavy wound, he hastened immediately out of the battle, and dropped dead as soon as he had set down the king in a safe place. Alexander built a city which he called after his name.

BUCER, Martin, boo'-sair, one of the Protestant reformers, who first united with Luther, but afterwards inclined to Zuinglius, though he laboured much to bring the two parties to a union. He came to England in 1549, and was made divinity professor at Cambridge. B. in Alsace, 1491; D. 1551.—In the reign of Mary, his body was taken up and burnt. His writings are very numerous.

BUCHAN, William, buk'-an, a physician, who, after studying medicine at Edinburgh, became physician to the Foundling Hospital at Ackworth, Yorkshire. He continued there till the institution was dissolved, and then returned to Edinburgh, where he practised several years with success. In 1770 he published his popular book, entitled "Domestic Medicine; or, a Treatise on the Cure and Prevention of Diseases," which attained to a sale of 80,000 copies during the author's lifetime. He now removed to London, where he obtained considerable practice, which was diminished by the preference he gave to society rather than to business. B. at Ancram, in Roxburghshire, Scotland, 1729; D. 1824. He published two other professional books, which went through three editions.

BUCHANAN, George, bu-kăn'-an, an eminent writer, who embraced the doctrines of the Reformation, and was employed by James V. as a tutor to his natural son, the earl of Moray. At the same king's command he attacked the Franciscans in a satirical poem, for which his life being threatened, he fled to England, and thence to France, where he obtained a professorship in the college of Guienne, in Bordeaux, and subsequently held the regency in the college of Cardinal Le Moine, from 1544 to 1547. He next went to Portugal, and became a teacher of philosophy in the university of Coimbra; but expressing some free opinions, he was confined in a monastery, in which he translated the Psalms of David into Latin. This is generally considered to be the finest Latin version of the book of Psalms. In 1551 he obtained his liberty, and after residing some time in France and England, returned to his native country, where he was appointed principal of the college of St. Leonard, in the university of St. Andrews. This favour he obtained from Queen Mary, which he ill requited by writing a book called a "Detection of her Doings," designed to prejudice the minds of her subjects against her. The Scottish nobility now nominated him tutor to James VI. In this capacity he laboured to imbue the Scottish Solomon with wisdom, but succeeded only in making him a pedant, because, as he said, he could make nothing else of him. B. at Kilbarn, Stirlingshire, 1506; D. at Edinburgh, 1582.

BUCHANAN, James, president of the United States for the years 1857 to 1861, was bred a lawyer, and at 25 years of age was elected a member of the Legislative Assembly of Pennsylvania, and kept his seat for eleven years. He then entered upon diplomacy, concluded an important commercial treaty with Russia, and was minister plenipotentiary at the court of St. Petersburg till 1833. Returning to America, he gained a seat in Congress, and was subsequently secretary of state under President Polk. In 1853 he was appointed by President Pierce ambassador to England, and remained there till 1856, when, being recalled, he was chosen by the democratic party as their candidate. In the struggle for the presidency, he represented the singular alliance between democratic progress and the retention of the "peculiar institution" of slavery. He beat his most formidable opponent, Colonel Fremont, by 163 votes to 125. B. at Stony Batter, Pennsylvania, 1795.

BUCHANNESS, buk-ăn-ness', the most eastern promontory of Scotland, situate in the district of Buchan, in Aberdeenshire, 3 miles from Peterhead. Lat. 57° 29′ N. Lon. 1° 26′ W. Between this promontory and the town of Peterhead is the place called the Bullers or Boilers of Buchan, a large oval cavity in the steep rocks on the coast, about 150 feet deep. Boats frequently fall into this awful pit, under a natural arch opening to the sea at the E. end, and resembling the window of some great cathedral.

BUCHAREST, BUKHAREST, or BUKHOREST, boo'-kar-est, the capital city of Wallachia, situate on the Dunbovetza, in a swampy plain. It has more the appearance of a country village than a city, the houses being encompassed by gardens, and partially concealed by the foliage of the trees. It has a great many churches and monasteries, besides several hospitals and a poor-house. Pop. 60,000.—Lat. 44° 25′ 39″ N. Lon. 26° 5′ 24″ E.—This is the entrepôt for the trade between Turkey and Austria. The treaty of peace, by which Turkey ceded Bessarabia and a portion of Moldavia to Russia, was, in 1812, concluded here. In 1854 the Austrians entered the principalities of Wallachia and Moldavia, and made Bucharest their headquarters. They thus placed themselves between the Turks on the one side and the Russians on the other. This arrangement was one of strict neutrality, and prevented any collision between the army of Prince Gortschakoff and that of Omar Pasha. But, unfortunately for the allies, it enabled the Russians to send immense reinforcements to Prince Menchikoff in the Crimea.

BUCKENHAM, or BOKENHAM, FERRY, bok'-en-ham, the name of four English parishes, none of them with a population above 1,500.

BUCKINGHAM, buk'-ing-ham, a town, borough, and parish of Buckinghamshire, situate on the Ouse, over which there are three stone bridges, 52 miles from London. The buildings, which are principally of brick, are scattered over a considerable surface. The church, which occupies an elevated site, was built in 1780. Its tower and spire are 150 feet high. It has a town-hall, prison, and workhouse. The principal occupation of the inhabitants is the making of bobbin lace. Pop. of the borough, 8,069; of parish, 4,020.—In 1644 this town was, for a few days, the head-quarters of Charles I.

BUCKINGHAM, a county in Lower Canada, chiefly in the district of Three-Rivers, on the S. side of the river St. Lawrence.

BUCKINGHAM, a county of Virginia, U.S., on James river. Area, 680 square miles. Desc. Undulating, producing the usual cerealia, tobacco, and live stock. Rivers. The Willis and Slate. Pop. 14,000, of whom more than one half are slaves.

BUCKINGHAM, Duke of, George Villiers, the profligate favourite of the pedant king James I., was the son of Sir George Villiers, a knight, who had lands in Leicestershire. He rose to the highest offices and honours, and conducted an attack upon the island of Rhé, in which he lost 2,000 men, displaying his incapacity for such enterprises, and returned to England discredited both as an admiral and a general, and bringing no praise with him, as Hume says, "but the vulgar one of valour and personal bravery." Being intrusted with the command of a large force to relieve La Rochelle, he went to Portsmouth to superintend the necessary preparations, previous to his departure, when he was stabbed by a half-madman of the name of John Fenton.

B. at Brookesley, Leicestershire, 1592; assassinated at Portsmouth, 1628.—His son, of the same name and title, was the favourite of Charles II., and was as distinguished by his wit as his profligacy. He was a man who had made "the whole body of vice" his study, and even had the heartlessness to propose the removal of the wife and queen of his sovereign to a West-Indian plantation, to quiet his apprehensions of her interfering with some of his infamous intrigues. His name contributes a letter in the anagram of the "Cabal" ministry, of which he was a member. B. in London, 1627; D. at Kirby Moorside, in the house of one of his tenantry, Yorkshire, 1688.—This is the nobleman who furnished Pope with a subject for a few satirical lines in one of his moral essays, and also sat for Dryden's portrait of Zimri, in his "Absalom and Achitophel." He himself was an author of considerable wit, and produced several pieces which, in their day, enjoyed some reputation. His "Rehearsal" especially was popular, on account of the severe ridicule which it bestowed upon Dryden, under the character of Bayes, as well as on account of the wit with which it sparkled.

BUCKINGHAM, James Silk, an enterprising traveller, a lecturer, and a social reformer, who, from humble circumstances, rose to represent in parliament the constituency of Sheffield from 1832 to 1837. The results of his travels he gave to the world at different times, and established in London the Oriental Herald, which was the precursor of the Athenæum, and several other publications. In 1816 he had established a journal in India; but, from the freedom of his criticisms upon the administration of public affairs, he was expelled from the presidency of Bengal, and ruined in his fortunes. To make some amends for this treatment, the Honourable East-India Company, a few years before his death, allowed him a pension. In 1843 he was the chief agent in establishing the "British and Foreign" Institute, of which he was appointed secretary, but which preserved a languid existence only for three years. He subsequently became a pensioner on the civil list to the extent of £200 a year. B. at Flushing, near Falmouth, Cornwall, 1786; D. in London, 1855.

BUCKINGHAMSHIRE, Duke of, John Sheffield, was the son of Edmund, earl of Mulgrave, and served under Marshal Turenne, and took an active part in the revolution of 1688. In 1703 he was created duke of Normanby and Buckinghamshire. Buckingham House, in St. James's Park, now the royal palace, was erected by him. B. 1649; D. 1720-1.—He wrote some poems, which, we imagine, in his time were presumed to evince genius, rather than to be in the actual possession of it, notwithstanding that he received the praises of Pope and Dryden.

BUCKINGHAMSHIRE, or BUCKS, buk'-ing-ham-sheer, a county of England, having Northampton on the N.; Bedford, Hertford, and Middlesex on the E.; Berks on the S.; and Oxford on the W. Ext. About 45 miles in length, by 18 in breadth. Area, estimated at 748 square miles. Desc. The south-eastern part of the county is hilly, but the other parts, particularly the vale of Aylesbury, are noted for fertility. Rivers. The Thames, Ouse, Thane, and Colne. Pro. Corn and cattle, for which it enjoys a high reputation; large plantations of beech are grown. Manf. Paper, lace, and straw-plait. Pop. about 165,000.—The revolution which brought Charles I. to the scaffold, had its commencement in this county. It is intersected by the Great Western and North-Western railways and the Grand Junction Canal.

BUCKLAND, the Very Rev. William, buk'-land, dean of Westminster, and a distinguished geologist and mineralogist. In 1813 he was appointed reader in mineralogy, and in 1818 reader in geology, at the university of Oxford. In 1822 the Royal Society awarded him the Copley medal for "An account of an assemblage of fossil teeth and bones of the elephant, hippopotamus, bear, tiger, hyæna, and sixteen other animals, discovered in a cave at Kirkdale, Yorkshire." He has published several works in connection with his favourite science, and it may safely be affirmed, that it is to his vigorous exertions more than to those of any other man, that geological science is so far advanced in this country as it is. In 1845 he was made dean of Westminster. He is a member of several scientific societies, and a trustee of the British Museum. B. at Axminster, Devonshire, 1784.

BUCKLAND, the name of a great number of parishes in England, but none with a population above 2,000. It is also the name of several hamlets, one of which is a considerable suburb of Portsmouth.

BUCKS, a county of Pennsylvania, U. S., on the Delaware. Area, 600 square miles. Desc. Fertile, producing the usual cerealia, and having a great many streams driving a considerable amount of mill-machinery. Minerals. Iron, limestone, sandstone, and plumbago. Manf. Paper and woollen fabrics. There are some foundries, distilleries, and several grist and saw mills. Pop. about 60,000.—This was one of the three original counties formed by William Penn.

BUDA, boo'-da, a city of the Austrian empire, and the capital of the lower division of Hungary, on the west bank of the Danube, opposite Pesth, with which it is connected by a suspension bridge. It is about 150 miles from Vienna. It is built in the form of an amphitheatre, on the side of a hill, and its castle was chosen by the emperor Louis I. as his place of residence. Here Matthias I. founded a celebrated library, which was destroyed by the Turks in 1526. It is a place of considerable trade, and is celebrated for its baths. Pop., with Pesth and the neighbourhood, about 130,000. Lat. 47° 29′ 12″ N. Lon. 19° 3′ 10″ E.—In 1526 this place was taken by Soliman the Magnificent, but retaken in the following year by Ferdinand I., king of Bohemia. In 1529 it was again taken by Soliman, and held by the Turks till 1680, when it was taken by the duke of Lorraine, who blew up the castle. During the civil war of 1849, it was bombarded by Georgey, on the 17th, 18th, and 20th of May, and suffered severely. On the 20th it was stormed. General Henzi, who had defended it with great bravery, died of his wounds on the 21st, and a colossal cast-iron monument, erected to commemorate his valour, and that of his companions in arms who fell on that occasion, was in 1852 inaugurated in presence of the emperor Francis Joseph. Since that time the fortifications of the city have undergone extensive repairs.

BUDGELL, Eustace, budj'-el, an English writer, who received his education at Christ-church, Oxford, whence he removed to the Middle Temple, for the purpose of following the profession of the law. Mr. Addison, to whom he was related, took him to Ireland as one of his clerks, when he was appointed secretary to the earl of Wharton, then lord-lieutenant of Ireland. He wrote several papers for the Tatler, Spectator, and Guardian; "Lives of the Family of the Boyles," and translated Theophrastus's Characters from the Greek. B. at Exeter, 1685; drowned in the Thames, 1736.

BUDWEIS, boot'-vise, a mining town of Bohemia, the capital of a circle of the same name, situate on the Moldau, 75 miles from Prague. Manf. Cloth and saltpetre. Pop. about 9,000. It is connected with Linz, on the Danube, by railway.

BUENAVENTURA, boo'-ai-na-vain-too'-ra, a Spanish settlement and mission on the coast of New California. Lat. 34° 16′ N. Lon. 119° W.

BUENAVENTURA, a seaport of S. America, 30 miles from Tampico. Lat. 3° 56′ N. Lon. 76° 42′ E.—Here, in 1847, an inferior force of United States troops repulsed an army of Mexicans.

BUENOS AYRES, boo-ai'-nose i'-ress, the principal province of the Argentine republic, S. America, is bounded N. by extensive tracts of desert country, E. by Brazil and the Atlantic Ocean, S. by Patagonia, and W. by Peru and Chili. Ext. Its length may be estimated at upwards of 1,600 miles, and its breadth at nearly 1,000. Area, estimated at 200,000 square miles. Desc. In the N. large portions of it are covered with swamps and lakes, and it is, in general, flat. In the S. and S.E. it is, for the most part, mountainous, the Sierra del Vulcan and the Sierra Ventana occupying large portions of its area. Rivers. The Quequin, Salta, and Saldana. Climate. Variable and moist. Some years the droughts are excessive; but usually the rains are sufficient to serve all the purposes of a healthy and productive vegetation. In the N. the dry kind of wind, characteristic of the sirocco in Italy, prevails; and in the S. the pamperos or hurricanes, accompanied by fierce peals of thunder, are sometimes terrific. Pro. Though an immense portion of the province is adapted for agriculture, yet is it affirmed that not one thousandth part of it is under cultivation. A considerable quantity of corn, however, is raised; but the inhabitants are averse to settled pursuits, and devote by far the greater portion of their lives to the rearing of cattle, horses, mules, and asses, and fishing and navigation. Immense flocks of sheep are raised, and the cattle-farms, or estancias, as they are called, are upon a vast scale. Many of the largest of them are the property of British subjects, who rear their stock for exportation. Exp. Horses, mules, and asses; hides, horns, hair, tallow, and jerked beef. Wool and wheat, to a limited extent, are also exported. Imp. Cotton, woollen, and silk goods; hardware, cutlery, iron, and glass from Britain; wines, lace, fine cloth, gloves, and fancy articles from France; and principally spirits, soap, candles, provisions, and coarse cloths from the United States. A large coasting trade in fruits is also done. Pop. 330,000. Lat. between 33° and 41° S. Lon. between 56° and 70° W.—In 1816 this province became independent of the Spanish government, and, along with the adjoining states, formed a confederated republic, called the Argentine, or La Plata. The form of government adopted on this occasion, however, did not long exist, but was broken up in 1853, and each state assumed a distinct and independent administration. The executive now consists of a governor, or captain-general, who is elected for five years, and who is assisted by a council of ministers chosen by himself. In religious matters there is a general toleration, although the recognized form of worship is the Roman Catholic. (See La Plata.)

Buenos Ayres, 'good air,' the capital of the above province, is situate in a plain about 200 miles from the mouth of the river La Plata, on its southern shore, where the river is 30 miles broad. Its streets are large, and are laid out according to a regular plan, being paved on each side, though not in the middle. Almost every house has a garden, both before and behind; and many have balconies with lattice-work, for the reception of odoriferous shrubs and flowers. The cathedral is spacious and elegant, and is surmounted by a large and lofty dome. The church of St. Francis and that of the Convent of Mercy are also worthy of notice. The church of St. John, which is on the skirts of the town, is appropriated to the Christian Indians. The town-hall, which stands on one side of the great square, or Plaza de la Vittoria, is a large and handsome building; and there are several convents and nunneries; also an hospital for men, and one for women; a foundling hospital, and an hospital for orphans. All these edifices are built of a fine white stone, which is found in a small plain not far from the town. The castle or fort is very insignificant as a military position: it contains a house for the military governor, and a royal chapel. The port of Buenos Ayres is a great outlet for the produce, not only of the extensive country which lies to the east of the Andes, but also for that of Peru and Chili. The most valuable commodities are sent here to be exchanged for European goods, such as vicunha wool from Peru, copper from the mines of Coquimbo, gold from Chili, and silver from Potosi. The finest tobacco, sugars, cotton, thread, yellow wax, and cotton cloth are imported, also Paraguay tea. The commerce carried on between Peru and Buenos Ayres is chiefly for cattle and mules to an immense value. Pop. about 100,000. Lat. 34° 36′ 29″ S. Lon. 58° 23′ 34″ W.—Buenos Ayres was founded in 1535 by Don Pedro de Mendoza, and was taken possession of by the British in 1806. It was retaken, six weeks after, by the inhabitants; and a new attempt to take it by the British, after they had received reinforcements, failed, with great loss.

Buet, le, boo'-ai, one of the Alps of Savoy, between Chamouni and Sixt, to the N. of Mont Blanc, with an elevation of 10,128 feet above the level of the sea.

Buffalo, buf'-a-lo, the capital of Niagara county, New York, at the outlet of Lake Erie, 16 miles from Niagara Falls, to which there is a railway. It was burnt by the British during the war of American Independence, but was subsequently rebuilt. Pop. 45,000.—This is the name of several other unimportant towns and villages in the United States.

Buffalo, a river of Niagara county, New York, running into Lake Erie, at Buffalo. Another in Pennsylvania, running into the W. branch of the Susquehannah, above Louisburg. Another, which runs into the Mississippi, 2 miles above Fort Adams. There are several other smaller rivers of the same name in the United States.

Buffalo Lake, the name of three lakes in British N. America, between Lat. 52° and 66° N. Lon. between 112° 10′ and 113° 45′ W.

Buffalora, boof'-fa-lor'-a, a town of Lombardy, in the province of Pavia, about 25 miles N.N.W. of Pavia. Pop. 1,300.—There is a bridge at this place crossing the Ticino, over which a division of the invading army of Austria marched on the 29th of April, 1859. This was the first overt act of hostility in the war between Austria and Sardinia. To unravel as briefly as possible the complications which led to this war, we may observe that it would seem to have been supposed by Austria that it was the object of some other powers, especially Sardinia and France, to wrest from her those territories in Venice and Lombardy which she possessed by virtue of the treaties of 1815. These possessions were hers by right. The judgment of Europe affirmed that she was entitled to keep them; but her system of governing them had been such as to excite great discontent among their populations. In 1815, after the great war, when Europe was resettled, statesmen looked to what had been the danger of the preceding period. That danger was the overwhelming power of France, and it was against the recurrence of that peril that almost all the European arrangements were then made. Austria was, at that time, supposed to be the power which could best oppose a barrier to France in Italy. Accordingly, territories were then given to Austria in Italy which she did not herself wish to have, and her possession of which was a source of infinite misery to the people of the whole of the Italian peninsula. This sprung from the evil policy which Austria pursued in conducting the administration of those territories. Unfortunately, she was not satisfied with ruling her own provinces in the manner which she doubtless conceived to be the most conducive to her own interests, but she entered into treaties, negotiations, and engagements, which exerted an influence over all the other states of Italy from the river Po to the Mediterranean Sea. These treaties gave rise to gross misgovernment on the part of the Italian rulers, with whom they were made. These abused their power, from the confidence which they felt that, should their subjects at any period rebel against the tyranny with which they were oppressed, Austria would move to their aid with an overwhelming force, and teach them submission at the point of the bayonet. This was the origin of the war of 1859, which it was believed by some of the ablest British statesmen at the time, might have been prevented if Austria had consented to confine herself for the future within the boundaries of her own lawful territories, and ceased longer to interfere, either by political influence or military force, with the internal affairs of those Italian provinces which lie to the south of the river Po.

Buffon, George Lewis le Clerc, boof'-fawng, an illustrious French naturalist, was the son of a counsellor of the parliament of Dijon, where he studied for the law. His inclination, however, led him into the paths of science, and he paid much attention to astronomy and geometry. At the age of 20 he made the tour of Italy, after which he visited England, and, in 1735, published some translations from the English. In 1739 he was admitted into the Academy of Sciences, and appointed superintendent of the royal garden and cabinet, which, by his care, were considerably enriched and improved. Profiting by the resources of the establishment over which he presided, he devoted himself entirely to the study of natural history. In 1749 appeared the first part of his great work, "Natural History, general and particular," which was not completed till 1767, when it amounted to 15 vols. 4to, and 31 vols. 12mo. To it were afterwards added several volumes more by way of supplement. In 1771 appeared his "History of Birds," and in the same year he was created a count. In 1773 he began his "History of Minerals." B. at Montbard, Burgundy, 1707; D. 1788.

Bug or Bog, boog, two rivers of Russian Poland.

The first, rising in Galicia, joins the Vistula 18 miles from Warsaw, after a course of 300 miles. It is connected by a canal with the Dnieper. The second is the ancient Hypanis, and after a course of 340 miles, falls into the estuary of the Dnieper, 30 miles from Kherson.

BUGEAUD DE LA PICONNERIE, Thomas Robert, boozh'-o, duke of Isly, a marshal of France, who, in 1804, entered the army as a private, went through all the campaigns of Napoleon I., and rose to the rank of colonel by his valour in the field. Even after the decisive defeat of the emperor at Waterloo, he held his ground in Savoy; and on the 28th June, 1815, at L'Hôpital-sous-Conflans, made the last stand against the allies, defeating with 1,700 men a body of 8,000 Austrians. After Napoleon's abdication, he busied himself with agricultural pursuits. In 1830 he was recalled from his retirement, and under Louis Philippe energetically repressed the insurrections in Paris. In 1836 he was sent to Algeria, where he defeated Abd-el-Kader on the Sikkah, but made a treaty with the Arab chief at Tafna, which unfortunately gave that formidable opponent of France many advantages. In 1840 he was made governor of Algeria, and displayed in that capacity considerable administrative talents. He was incessant in his pursuit of Abd-el-Kader, who was again in arms at the head of a large force; and after several minor successes, General Bugeaud, who was made a marshal in 1843, met the Arab army at Isly, and there gained, with 10,000 men against 40,000, a decisive victory. This battle gave him the title of duke of Isly. In 1847 he retired, discontented that his plans for colonizing Algeria were thwarted. Summoned to the aid of Louis Philippe on the night of the 23rd and 24th of February, 1848, the command of the army was, a few hours afterwards, taken from him, just as he had adopted decisive measures to save the monarchy. After the election of Louis Napoleon, in the December following, as president of the republic, Bugeaud was taken into favour, and received the command of the army of the Alps, but died soon after. B. at Limoges, 1784; D. at Paris, 1849.

BUILTH, bilth, a town of Wales, in Brecknockshire, 12 miles from S. Radnor, S. Wales. Pop. 1,100.—Here are the remains of an ancient castle, which seems to have stood on several acres of ground.

BUKHARIA, a large territory of Central Asia. (See BOKHARA, TURKESTAN.)

BUKKUR, or BUKHU, book'-koor, a fortress island of Scinde, in the Indus, about 800 yards long and 300 wide, and nearly wholly occupied by a fortress. Lat. 27° 41′ N. Lon. 68° 52′ E.—In 1839 the British army, destined for Afghanistan, here crossed the Indus on a bridge of boats.

BUKOWINE, boo'-ko-veen, a province of Austria, bounded N. by the Dniester, E. and S. by Moldavia, W. by Transylvania, Galicia proper, and Lodomeria. Area, 2,944 geographical square miles. It is a well-watered productive country, enjoying a trade in cattle, wool, hides, honey, and wax. Lat. between 47° 20′ and 48° 40′ N. Lon. between 24° 45′ and 26° 20′ E.—In 1777 this country was united to Galicia, and in 1849 was constituted a province.

BULGARIA, bool-gair'-e-a, a province of Turkey in Europe, extending from the Black Sea to Servia, from which it is separated by high mountains. The Danube, which discharges itself into the Black Sea, on the N. extremity, divides it from Bessarabia, Moldavia, and Wallachia; while the Balkhan mountains separate it on the S. from Macedon and Roumelia proper. Area, estimated at 34,000 square miles. Desc. In the S. it is, in general, well wooded, and rich in pastures; but in the N. it is mountainous. Rivers. The Danube, with its affluents the Isker, Vid, Jantra, and Osma; and the Pravadi and the Kamtchik. This last falls into the Black Sea. Lakes. Rassein. Pro. Hemp, flax, cattle, hides, horns, timber, and attar of roses. The usual cerealia of Europe are raised, but not in great quantities. Manf. Woollens, leather, and rifle-barrels; but as a large proportion of the inhabitants devote themselves to rural occupations, manufactures are not actively pursued. Pop. about 3,000,000. Lat. between 42° 8′ and 45° 20′ N. Lon. between 22° 15′ and 29° 35′ E.—Bulgaria was, in 1392, conquered by the Turks.

BULGRAD, or BOLGRAD, bol'-grad, a town, formerly of Bessarabia, situate not far from the river Yalpack, and memorable as the principal subject of dispute at the conference held, in 1857, at Paris, after the Russian war, to settle the boundary-line between Russia and Turkey.

BULL, John, Dr., bool, a famous musician, who, in 1591, was created doctor, and appointed organist of the royal chapel. He was the first professor of music in Gresham College. B. at Wells, Somersetshire, 1563; D. at Lubeck, 1622.—He is the composer of the national anthem "God Save the King."

BULL, Ole, a celebrated Norwegian violinist, whose father destined him for the church. He was educated at the university of Christiana, but made little progress until he had an opportunity of showing his great natural musical talents. He then became an object of enthusiasm with his countrymen, for he was the first musical genius Norway had produced. In spite of his ignorance of its theory, he filled, for some time, the office of director of music. In 1829 he set out for Germany; but neither here nor in France had he, at first, any success. After meeting with much misfortune, however, he achieved everywhere great triumphs, and performed in most of the cities of the continent, and England. He ultimately settled in the United States, where he founded a Scandinavian colony, called Olebullia. Whenever he wants money for this colony, he gives a concert. B. at Bergen, 1810.

BULLER, the Right Hon. Charles, bool'-ler, was the son of a gentleman in the civil service of the East-India Company, and was returned M.P. for West Looe, Cornwall, in 1830. In 1832 he became member for Liskeard, for which town he sat until his death. In 1847 he was appointed president of the Poor-law Commission, and was an extensive contributor to the Edinburgh and the Westminster Reviews, as well as to the newspaper press. B. at Calcutta, 1806; D. in London, 1848.

BULOW, Frederick William, boo'-lo, a distinguished Prussian general, who, in the campaign of 1813, saved Berlin by the victories he gained at Grossbeeren and Dennewitz, and from which latter he obtained the title of Count of Dennewitz. He took a prominent part in the battle of Leipsic, and also in the final defeat and pursuit of the French at Waterloo. B. 1755; D. 1816.

BULWER, Sir E. Lytton.—(See LYTTON, SIR E. BULWER.)

BULWER, Sir Henry Lytton Earle, bool'-wer, a privy councellor, a diplomatist, and an author. He has been connected with diplomatic missions to Berlin, Vienna, the Hague, Paris, Brussels, Constantinople, and in 1843 was dispatched to Madrid as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary. In 1848 he was dismissed from the Spanish court, on account of his opposition to the arbitrary conduct of the government of that country, but he was supported by his own government, and Spain was, for two years, without a British representative at her court. In 1849 he was appointed minister plenipotentiary to the United States, and in 1851 became envoy extraordinary to Tuscany. In 1851 he was made Knight Grand Cross of the order of the Bath, and, in 1858, succeeded Lord Stratford de Redcliffe as ambassador at the Ottoman Porte. His literary performances are "An Autumn in Greece,"—"France, Social and Literary,"—"The Monarchy of the Middle Classes." B. 1804.

BULWUDUN, bool-woo'-doon, a town of Asiatic Turkey, Natolia, 220 miles from Smyrna, containing many antiquarian remains. It is the ancient Polybotum.

BUNBURY, bun'-bur-e, a parish of Cheshire, 4 miles from Liverpool. Area, 17,600 acres. Pop. about 5,000. It is a station on the Chester and Crewe Railway.

BUNCOMBE, bun'-kum, a county of North Carolina, U.S. Area, 450 square miles. Pop. 14,000, of whom one seventh are slaves. In this county are Black, Bald, and Smoky mountains, lofty peaks of the Blue Ridge.

BUNDELCUND, boon-del-koond', an extensive district of Hindostan, in the province of Allahabad, and partly belonging to the British. Area, unascertained. Desc. Mountainous, crossed by the Vindhyan range, and watered by several tributaries of the Jumna. Pop. 2,500,000. Lat. between 24° and 26° 26′ N. Lon. between 78° and 81° 33′ E.—In this province are the diamond-mines of Pannah. This was one of the districts where the mutinous sepoys of 1857-8 held out for a long period, and to clear which gave the British much trouble.

BUNGAY, bun'-gai, a town of Suffolk, on the Waveney, 30 miles from Ipswich. It has two parish churches, an assembly-room, theatre, and bath-house; and there are also the ruins of a Benedictine monastery. Pop. about 4,000.

BUNKER'S HILL. (See BOSTON, U.S.)

BUNSEN, Christian Karl Josias, Chevalier de, boon'-sen, diplomatist, theologian, and philologist, was educated at the university of Gottingen, where he greatly distinguished himself as a classical scholar. He subsequently went to Paris, to study eastern languages under Sylvestre de Sacy, the orientalist, with a view of going to India. Having been introduced to the celebrated Niebuhr, he became his secretary at Rome, but soon obtained a higher position as secretary to the Prussian embassy in the Roman capital. Here he pursued his classical studies with Niebuhr, and, at the same time, took a deep interest in the hieroglyphical researches of Champollion. In 1822 the king of Prussia visited Rome, and soon became aware of the abilities of his secretary of legation. This was the prelude to his rise in the world of diplomacy. When Niebuhr retired from the embassy at Rome, Bunsen was appointed to fill his place. In 1839 he became ambassador to the Swiss confederacy, and, in 1841, was appointed Prussian ambassador to England. Here he remained, esteemed by all who had the pleasure of his acquaintance, till 1854, when his opinions of Prussian policy relative to the Russian war led either to his resignation or recall. He has written a great many works; but he is, perhaps, best known in England by the one entitled "Egypt's Place in History." B. at Corbach, in the principality of Waldeck, 1791.

BUNYAN, John, bun'-yan, one of the most celebrated English writers, was originally a travelling tinker, and, having neither been taught to read nor to write, led a profane kind of life for some years. At length his attention was happily drawn to higher subjects, and he began to study the Scriptures, of which he acquired a great knowledge. In the civil war he took the side of the Parliament, and was present at the siege of Leicester. About 1655 he became a member of, and was accustomed to address, a Baptist congregation at Bedford. On this account, he was, at the Restoration, confined in the gaol of that town for twelve years and a half, supporting himself and family by tagging laces. Here he wrote his esteemed "Pilgrim's Progress," a religious allegory, which has received universal praise and been translated into different languages. On his release from prison, he became teacher of the Baptist congregation at Bedford, often travelling into different parts of England to visit the people of that persuasion, and was consequently called Bishop Bunyan. B. at Elstow, 1628; D. in London, 1688.—His works have often been printed collectively, and, perhaps, are more widely known than those of any other religious writer in the language.

BUNZLAU, boonts'-lou, the name of several unimportant towns of Germany, none of them with a population above 7,000.

BUOL-SCHAUENSTEIN, Count de, boo'-ol, a modern Austrian diplomatist, who commenced his career as chargé d'affaires for Austria at the Hague. In 1792 he was appointed chamberlain; and, a short time after, was sent to Bâle as envoy extraordinary, and afterwards presided at the diet of Ratisbon, where his efforts were used to maintain the union of the allied princes against France. He was afterwards employed at Hamburg on a diplomatic mission. In 1815 he represented Austria at the diet of Frankfort; and, up to 1822, filled the high position of president of the Germanic confederation. He then retired from public affairs till 1850, when he again presided at Frankfort, and was afterwards prime minister of Austria. He was at the head of affairs when war was declared against Sardinia in April, 1859, but resigned in May following, being succeeded by Count Rechberg.

BUONAROTTI. (See MICHAEL ANGELO.)

BURBAGE, bur'-baj, the name of two English parishes, neither of them with a population above 2,000.

BURCKHARDT, John Lewis, boork'-hart, a Swiss traveller, who, in 1806, arrived in London with a letter from the celebrated Blumenbach to Sir Joseph Banks. Having succeeded in making an engagement with the African Association to endeavour to penetrate into the interior of Africa from the north, he sailed from Portsmouth in 1809. He passed two years and a half in Syria, and made two journeys through Nubia, which occupied him down to 1814. He next passed a considerable time in Arabia, visited the cities of Mecca and Medina, where he fell ill; but, on recovering, set out for Cairo, where he arrived after an absence of upwards of two years. The plague having broken out in 1816 at Cairo, he departed for the desert of Sensi. In 1817 we find him again in Cairo, where he was taken ill of dysentery, of which he never recovered. B. at Lausanne, Switzerland, 1784; D. at Cairo, 1817.—The works of this traveller comprise "Travels in Nubia," "Travels in Nubia and the Holy Land," "Travels in Arabia," and "Notes on the Bedoweens and Wahabees."

BURDETT, Sir Francis, Bart., bur-det', a distinguished political reformer, who, for nearly the first half of the nineteenth century, filled a large space in the public eye. B. 1770; D. 1844.

BURDWAN, boord'-wan, the capital of a district of the same name, in Bengal, on the N. bank of the Dummoodah. Lat. 23° 15′ N. Lon. 87° 57′ E. Pop. about 55,000.—The district is inclosed by Beerbhoom, Nuddea, Hooghly, and Bancoorah. Area, 2,224 square miles. Pop. estimated at 1,521,000.—The coal-fields of this district give an annual yield of nearly 50,000 tons.

BURFORD, bur'-ford, a town and parish of Oxfordshire, on the river Windrush, 17 miles from Oxford. The church is spacious, with a good spire. Manf. Saddlery and rugs. Pop. 2,000.—In the neighbourhood of this place is Edgehill, where, in 1649, the Parliamentarian troops, under General Fairfax, defeated the Royalists.

BURG, boorg, a town of the Prussian states, on the river Ihle, 13 miles from Magdeburg. Manf. Woollens and dyeing-works. Pop. 15,000.—There is another town of the same name in Rhenish Prussia, 16 miles from Cologne. Pop. about 2,000.

BURGH, the name of a great many English parishes, none of them with a population above 1,500.

BURGOS, boor'-gos, a city of Spain, the capital of a province of the same name, in Old Castile, 130 miles from Madrid. It is a place of great antiquity, standing on the right bank of the river Arlanzon, formerly defended by a strong castle, now in ruins. It is built in the form of a crescent, and the streets are for the most part narrow, winding, and gloomy. Of the squares, there is one of considerable elegance, with a fine piazza. The public fountains are numerous. It has a college, a school for the fine arts, and a surgical institution. Among the public buildings are the town-hall, the palace of Velascos, and several churches. The cathedral is of such extent, that divine service can be simultaneously performed in eight of its chapels, without causing confusion. In it are the tombs of the Cid and Don Fernando, celebrated throughout Spain for their achievements against the Moors. There are other churches containing splendid mausoleums. Manf. Woollen stuffs. Pop. 16,000. Burgos was taken by the French in 1808 and 1809. In 1812 it was unsuccessfully besieged by the British, but in the following year it surrendered, without resistance.—The province of Burgos has an area of 7,082 square miles, and is both fertile and productive, yielding corn, vegetables, and fruit, in abundance; whilst its mineral riches consist of gold, silver, iron, copper, lead, quicksilver, sulphur, marble, and stone. Its manufactures are cotton, woollen, and linen fabrics, earthenware, leather, paper, cutlery, and brandy. Pop. about 240,000.

Burgoyne, John, bur'-goin, an English general, who, after two severe engagements with the Americans during the War of Independence, was forced to surrender, with his whole army, in 1777, to General Gates, and to sign the capitulation of Saratoga, which decided France to recognize the independence of the United States. On his return to England, he devoted himself to pleasure and the muses; and, amongst other performances, produced the "Maid of the Oaks," "Bon Ton," the "Heiress," and the "Lord of the Manor," which had their day of success upon the stage. D. 1792.

Burgoyne, Sir John, early entered the army as one of the corps of Royal Engineers, and, in 1800, was made a lieutenant, and, in 1805, a captain. In 1845 he received the appointment of inspector-general of fortifications in England, and, in 1851, attained the rank of lieutenant-general, and the following year was created a Knight Grand Cross. In 1854 he was dispatched to Turkey, and was chief of the engineering department of the British army in the Crimea until recalled and replaced by Sir Harry Jones in 1855. In the same year the sultan bestowed on him the order of the Medjidie, and the university of Oxford conferred on him the honorary degree of D.C.L.

Burguete, el, boor-gai'-tai, a town of Spain, in Navarre, 20 miles from Pampeluna. It stands in the valley of Roncesvalles, where, in 778, the nephew of Charlemagne, the famous Roland, fell in a battle against the Moors, who cut to pieces the rear-guard of the French army.

Burgundy, or Bourgogne, bur'-gun-de, an old province in the E. of France, now divided into the departments of the Saône and Loire, the Côte d'Or, and the Yonne; part of it also lies in those of the Nièvre, the Aube, the Upper Marne, and the Ain.—The Canal of Burgundy joins the Yonne to the Saône.

Burias, boo'-re-as, one of the Philippine Islands, in the Asiatic archipelago, 20 miles from Luzon. Lat. 13° N. Lon. 123° E.

Burke, Edmund, burk, an illustrious writer and statesman, whose father was an attorney, and who received his education under Abraham Shackleton, a Quaker, at Ballytore, near Carlow. His first performance which brought him prominently into notice was the essay on the "Sublime and Beautiful," published in 1757. This philosophical piece of criticism, written in a fine and elegant style, procured the author a great reputation, and the esteem of the first literary characters of the age: the principal of whom was Dr. Johnson, who says "it is an example of true criticism;" although a critic equally acute has dissented from the theory it seeks to establish. In 1758 he suggested to Mr. Dodsley, the bookseller, the plan of the "Annual Register," the historical part of which he wrote for several years. In 1761 he went to Ireland as the companion of his friend Mr. Hamilton, secretary to the earl of Halifax, then lord-lieutenant. On his return, he was made private secretary to the marquis of Rockingham, first lord of the Treasury, who, in 1766, brought him into parliament for Wendover. He subsequently was returned for Malton, in Yorkshire, and gained great popularity by his introduction of a bill for a reform in the national expenditure, on which he spent prodigious labour, but it was unsuccessful. When the marquis of Rockingham returned to power, on the resignation of Lord North, in 1782, Mr. Burke obtained the post of paymaster-general of the forces, and a seat in the privy council; but on the death of his patron in the same year, Lord Shelburne became first lord of the Treasury, and Mr. Burke, with several of his friends, resigned their places. The principal acts of his political life after this were the share he took in the impeachment of Warren Hastings for his mal-administration in India; his opposition to Mr. Pitt's design of forming a limited regency on the king's illness, in 1788; and the strong part he took against the authors and defenders of the French revolution. In the house he avowed his detestation of the revolutionists with such force that a separation between him and Mr. Fox, and many more of his old friends, took place. In 1790 he published his famous "Reflections on the Revolution in France," which attracted great attention, and produced a surprising effect upon the public mind. After this, he published a variety of pamphlets in support of the positions he had taken up. His zeal on this occasion, as well as his extraordinary talents, recommended him to the royal favour, and he obtained a pension, which gave room for those who had been galled by his arguments to reproach him; and some illiberal animadversions were made upon him in the senate, which drew from him that admirable defence, his "Letter to a noble Lord" (Earl Fitzwilliam), in which he retaliates upon a celebrated duke (duke of Bedford) in a strain of keen irony and dignified remonstrance. Mr. Burke withdrew from parliament in 1794, leaving his seat for Malton to his son, an accomplished young man, who died shortly after. This melancholy event hastened his own end, as it left him alone, with none "to meet his enemies in the gate." B. in Dublin, 1728; D. at Beaconsfield, 1797.—Mr. Burke was an amiable man, and a faithful friend, charitable and pious. He had a fine taste for the arts, and was fond of gardening and architecture. Dr. Johnson considered him the greatest man in England, and Fox declared that he was indebted to him for all the fame he possessed. Gibbon said that he admired his eloquence, approved his politics, adored his chivalry, and almost forgave his reverence for church establishments. "That great master of eloquence, Edmund Burke!" exclaims Lord Macaulay, "in aptitude of comprehension and richness of imagination, superior to every orator, ancient or modern."

Burke, a county of North Carolina, U.S., on Catawba river, among the mountains of the Blue Ridge. Area, 450 square miles. Desc. Elevated, yielding wheat and live stock. Pop. 8,000, of whom one fourth are slaves.—2. A county in Georgia, on Savannah river. Area, 1,040 square miles. Pop. 17,000, of whom two thirds are slaves.——3. A post township in Caledonia county, Vermont, 45 miles from Montpelier. Pop. 1,200.

Burleigh, William Cecil, Lord, bur'-li, a secretary of state under Edward VI. and Elizabeth, and grand treasurer of England. In 1588 parliament was assembled, and, by his advice, a plan of religious reform was laid before it. In this he had a considerable share; and he also took the greatest part in the establishment of the Thirty-nine Articles of faith, which form the basis of the Reformed religion. To him is also due the regulation of the coinage, which had been altered since Henry VIII.'s time. He was created Baron Burleigh in 1571, and in 1588 concluded an advantageous treaty with the Netherlands. B. in Lincolnshire, 1520; D. 1598.—His son, Robert Cecil, minister under Elizabeth and James I., was sent to the court of Henry IV. of France to negotiate a treaty of peace with Spain. He was greatly instrumental to the death of the earl of Essex, and was loaded with honours by James I., and created marquis of Salisbury.

Burley, a township of the W. Riding of Yorkshire, on the Wharfe, 2 miles from Otley. Pop. 2,000.

Burlingham, bur'-ling-ham, three parishes adjoining each other in Norfolk. None of them has a population above 300.

BURLINGTON, or BRIDLINGTON, brid'-ling-ton, a seaport town and parish in the E. Riding of Yorkshire, situate on a bay called Burlington Bay, formed by Flamborough Head, which is about 5 miles distant. Area of parish, 12,410 acres. Considerable trade is carried on here; and that part of it called Burlington Quay, which is built on the coast, is much resorted to for sea-bathing. Pop. 7,000.

BURLINGTON, bur'-ling-ton, the name of several places in the United States.—1. A county in New Jersey, on the Atlantic, and extending N.W. to Delaware river. Pop. 24,000.—2. A city, port of entry, and capital of Burlington county, New Jersey, on Delaware river, 17 miles from Philadelphia. Pop. 6,000. The most populous part is on an island in the Delaware, to which there are four entrances by bridges. It was settled in 1677.—3. A town in Lycoming county, Pennsylvania. 4. A town in Belmont county, Ohio, on Ohio river, 4 miles above Wheeling, Kentucky.—5. Another in Licking county.—6. Another post township and capital of Lawrence county, Ohio, on Ohio river, 75 miles from Chilicothe.

BURMAH, or BIRMAH, bur'-ma, a state of Further India, distinguished as the Burmese empire, and formerly the most extensive and powerful in that peninsula. It is bounded on the N. by Upper Assam and the Nagos territory, E. by the Chinese province of Yun-nan and the Laos country, W. by Munipoor and Aracan, and S. by the Gulf of Martaban and the Bay of Bengal. Ext. Its length is estimated at 950 miles, with an average breadth of 220. Area, 254,000 square miles. Coast-line, 240 miles, extending from Cape Kyai-kami, near the British settlement of Amherst, in Martaban, to Cape Negrais, the S. extremity of the Aracan mountains. Desc. Burmah may be considered to be encompassed by mountains, attaining an elevation which ranges between 2,000 and 5,000 feet. Its centre forms the basin of the Irrawady, abounding in lagoons, but consisting of a soil fertile in the highest degree. Rivers. The Irrawady and its tributaries; the Pegu, and the Saluen. Climate. Healthy; from September to March the weather is delightful, the heat being moderate and agreeable; but in April and May the heat becomes excessive, and continues so until the commencement of the rainy season, which takes place in May, and continues till the middle of September. Zoology. The wild animals are the elephant, rhinoceros, tiger, leopard, wild cat, bear, otter, deer, hog, and buffalo. Elephants are numerous in the lower provinces, but they are often tamed and greatly in use as beasts of burden. There is a race of small white elephants, which are made use of by royalty. Of birds, parrots are numerous, and the woods teem with peacocks. The jungle-fowl is generally spread over the country, and pheasants, partridges, quails, geese, ducks, and snipes are plentiful. Many of the land-birds are remarkable for the splendour of their plumage, and the feathers of the blue jay are taken to adorn the state dresses of the Chinese mandarins. Of reptiles there are numbers, and serpents of nearly all kinds are used for food after their heads are cut off. Alligators are found in the deltas of the great rivers, and lizards, tortoises, and turtles are plentiful. Bees fly wild in the woods, and in such swarms that their wax makes a staple article of commerce. The domestic animals consist of elephants, horses, oxen, sheep, goats, dogs, and cats; of poultry, only a few common fowls and ducks are reared. Pro. Rice, Indian millet, pulses, maize, sesamum, yams, sweet potatoes, gourds, cotton, capsicums, indigo, tobacco, oil-plants, sugar, onions, garlic, a kind of tea, bananas, and other fruits. Notwithstanding the general fertility of the soil, much of the country is left to lie in a state of waste, or is very imperfectly tilled. The sesamum is largely grown, and its oil is employed as a substitute for butter. The forests abound with teak, oak, and other woods, whilst the palm and the bamboo attain a large size. It is in the Burman forests that the varnish is found which is generally used in the manufacture of lacquer-ware. Stick-lac is also obtained in large quantities, and of excellent quality. Minerals. Gold, silver, iron, copper, lead, tin, petroleum, amber, serpentine, marble, sapphires, and other gems; sulphur, nitre, antimony, and coal. Manf. In the useful as well as ornamental arts, the Burmese are very backward. They build boats, and cast bells; weave silk and cotton fabrics, and dye them in the most fanciful colours; work in gold and silver, and manufacture paper, coarse earthenware, lacquered goods, and other articles. Most of their manufactured wares are imported from other countries. Exp. Cotton, feathers, ivory, horn, birds-nests, gums, teak-wood, terra japonica, stick-lac, bees-wax, orpiment, gold, silver, rubies, sapphires, and horses. Imp. Cotton piece-goods, British woollens, areca, cocoanuts, hardwares, English glass, firearms, gunpowder, sugar, and spirits. Towns. Ava and Monchobo are alternately the capital; Amarapura, Bassain, Martaban, Rangoon, Sakaing, Setang, Patango, Yandabo, and Bhamo. Rel. Buddhism; neither the Mahometan nor the Christian religion has made much progress. Gov. A despotic and hereditary monarchy. Pop. 3,000,000. Lat. between 16° and 27° N. Lon. between 93° and 99° E.—By a proclamation in 1852, the governor-general of India annexed to British India the province of Pegu, containing an area of about 22,000 square miles, and comprising the whole of the Burmese coast and the delta of the Irrawady. The general insalubrity of this part of the country, however, has hitherto prevented a permanent occupation of Pegu by the British.

BURN, Richard, burn, an English divine, and celebrated law-writer, who, on taking orders, obtained the vicarage of Orton, in his native county, and became a justice of the peace. This circumstance led him to form a digest of the common law necessary to be known by magistrates. This work was published at first in 2 vols. 8vo; but its success was such, that every new edition received considerable additions; so that "Burn's Justice" became a standard book. He also compiled the "Ecclesiastical Law," a book of merit, for which he was made chancellor of Carlisle. Dr. Burn likewise wrote part of the history of his native county. B. at Kirby Stephen, Westmoreland, 1720; D. at his vicarage, 1785.—His only son, JOHN BURN, was bred to the law, which he did not follow, though calculated to shine in it, as appears from the additions made by him to his father's "Justice of the Peace." D. 1802.

BURNES, Sir Alexander, a Scotch officer, who served with distinction in India, and surveyed the mouths of the Indus and mapped the lower parts of its course. He made a journey by Balk and Bokhara across central India, full of peril, for which he received the gold medal of the Royal Geographical Society and the royal premium of fifty guineas. The French Geographical Society also awarded him their silver medal. These honours were conferred during a visit to this country in 1833-4. In 1835 he again embarked for India, and having been engaged in several missions of importance, he was knighted in 1838. In 1839 he was appointed political resident at Cabul, which office he held until the breaking out of the insurrection in that city, when, with his brother Charles and some others, he was slain. B. at Montrose, 1805; murdered at Cabul, 1841.

BURNET, Gilbert, bur'-net, an eminent divine, who, in 1664, went to Holland, where he studied the Hebrew language, and on his return was ordained and presented to the living of Saltoun. He subsequently became bishop of Salisbury, and is known principally by his "History of the Reformation," and by that of "His own Times." B. at Edinburgh, 1643; D. 1715. He was interred in the church of St. James, Clerkenwell. Besides the above, he published an excellent treatise on Pastoral Care, and several Sermons. The "History of his own Times" appeared in 1724, and is very entertaining, though far from being impartial. The bishop possessed many virtues, although somewhat vain and credulous.

BURNET, John, a Scotch engraver and writer on art, who was a student with Wilkie in the Trustees' Academy at Edinburgh, and who first was brought into notice by the excellent manner in which he engraved his friend's picture of the "Jew's Harp." His next picture was the "Blind Fiddler," which was followed by "The Rent-day,"—"The Rabbit on the Wall,"—"The Chelsea Pensioners," and several others. The writings of Mr. Burnet are a "Practical Treatise on Painting,"—"Hints on Composition,"—"On Light and Shade,"—"On Colour," and several other more elaborate works, which are illustrated by numerous engravings, drawn and executed by himself. B. at Fisherrow, near Edinburgh, 1784.

BURNETT, James. (See MONBODDO, LORD.)

BURNEY, Charles, burr'-ne, Mus. D., commenced his musical studies at Chester, under Mr. Baker, who was organist of the cathedral of that city. His talents were further developed under the instructions of the celebrated Dr. Arne, in conjunction with whom he subsequently composed the music of three pieces for the theatre of Drury Lane. These were entitled "Alfred," "Robin Hood," and "Queen Mab." He brought forward some other pieces on the stage, and, in 1769, received the degree of Doctor of Music from Oxford university. In 1770 he travelled on the continent to procure materials for his "General History of Music," which appeared in 4 volumes, between 1776 and 1789. He wrote several other works, and contributed most of the musical articles to Rees's Cyclopædia, for which he received £1,000. In 1806 he was granted a pension of £300 a year, and in 1810 was elected a member of the Institute of France. B. at Shrewsbury, 1726; D. at Chelsea College, 1814.

BURNEY, Frances. (See D'ARBLAY, MADAME.)

BURNHAM, burn'-ham, the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 2,500.

BURNHAM-THORPE, a parish and village of Norfolk, about 35 miles from Norwich. Pop. 500.—This place is celebrated as being the birthplace of Admiral Lord Nelson.

BURNLEY, burn'-le, a town of Lancashire. Manf. Woollen and cotton fabrics, and machinery.—There are iron and brass foundries, rope-walks, and tanneries. Pop. 15,000. It is connected by railway with Manchester, Blackburn, and Bury.

BURNS, Robert, burns, the national poet of Scotland, was the son of a small farmer settled in Ayrshire. He received a common education, during the progress of which he was employed in rustic labour. By application, however, he added to his mental acquirements some knowledge of the French language and the mathematics, besides cultivating an acquaintance with a few of the English poets. On the death of his father, he went into partnership with his brother Gilbert in a small farm, in which he was unsuccessful. An illicit amour at the same time rendered his circumstances still more perplexing, and he was about to emigrate to the West Indies, when the publication of a volume of his poems was suggested to him. This appeared in 1785, at Kilmarnock, and had a wonderful success. The poems were in the popular language of his country, and on subjects familiar to the common people. Dr. Blacklock, of Edinburgh, was charmed with the genius exhibited in them, and invited Burns to that city. His reception there was triumphant, and a new edition of his poems produced him £500. He then commenced again as a farmer, and obtained a place in the excise, before which, however, he married the young woman whose affections he had won, and whose personal charms he has celebrated in the beautiful song entitled "Bonnie Jean." The union of his occupations as excise-officer and farmer, however, only served to embarrass him, and at last he settled in Dumfries only as an exciseman. Here his habits of conviviality led him too frequently into excesses, as unworthy of his great genius as they were destructive of that independent manliness of character which he had ever endeavoured to cultivate, maintain, and advocate. He still continued to write, however, and kept up his correspondence with numerous friends and admirers. Many of his letters are as remarkable for the vigour of their style of composition as for the originality of the sentiments which they contain. B. in the parish of Alloway, near Ayr, 1759; D. 1796.—Byron, whose genius and history in many points have a striking resemblance to those of Burns, declares that the Scottish poet was the "very first of his art." An edition of his poems and letters appeared in 1800, in 4 vols. 8vo, under the management of Dr. Currie, of Liverpool, which produced above £1,000 for the benefit of his family.

BURNTISLAND, brunt'-i-land, a royal burgh and parish of Fifeshire, Scotland, on the N. shore of the Frith of Forth. It has a good harbour, and is shut in towards the N. by steep hills. Pop. about 3,000, principally employed in the fisheries. It is a station on the Edinburgh, Perth, and Dundee Railway.

BURRITT, Elihu, bur'-rit, an American linguist, whose father was a village shoemaker, and he himself a blacksmith. He had a great facility, however, in the acquirement of languages, and whilst serving his apprenticeship to his trade, he laboured at self-instruction, and made considerable progress in the Latin and French languages. When his term of apprenticeship had expired, he had six months' education at the school of his brother, where he made further advancement in these languages, and also gained some knowledge of the mathematics. On returning to his trade, he assiduously pursued his studies, and made himself acquainted with the Hebrew, Greek, Syriac, Spanish, Bohemian, Polish, and Danish languages. In 1842 he translated some of the Icelandic Sagas, and contributed to the "American Eclectic Review" translations from the Samaritan, Arabic, and Hebrew. In 1843 he commenced the study of the Persian, Turkish, and Ethiopic languages, and, in the following year, started a newspaper called "The Christian Citizen." Since then, he has edited several journals, and lectured throughout Europe and America, endeavouring to form a "League of Universal Brotherhood," and establish an ocean penny postage. He has also produced several works advocating these schemes, and others of a kindred nature. B. at New Britain, Connecticut, United States, 1811.

BURSA. (See BRUSSA.)

BURSLEM, burs'-lem, a town and parish of Staffordshire, 3 miles from Newcastle-under-Lyne. Manf. Principally earthenwares, for the production of which it has been celebrated since the early part of the 17th century. Its potteries are very extensive. Pop. about 16,000.—This is the birthplace of Josiah Wedgewood, the great improver of the manufacture of English pottery. It is a station on the North Staffordshire Railway.

BURTON, bur'-ton, the name common to a large number of parishes and townships in England and Wales, but none of them with a population above 1,500.

BURTON-ON-TRENT, an ancient town of Staffordshire, on the Trent, 21 miles from Stafford. It consists principally of one spacious street, parallel to the river, which is crossed by another at right angles. It has a neat town-hall, a free grammar-school, several charitable institutions, two churches, and numerous dissenting establishments. Manf. Cotton goods and hats. There are some iron-works, a large number of very extensive breweries, the water of the Trent being, it is said, exceedingly suitable for the brewing of ale. The India pale or bitter ale is made here in immense quantities. Pop. about 10,000. It is a station on the Midland Railway.—The Mersey and the Trent are connected by the Grand Trunk Canal, and the Trent is navigable up to this town from the Humber.

BURTON, Robert, an English writer, who became a student of Christ-church, and was presented first to the vicarage of St. Thomas's, Oxford, and next to the rectory of Seagrave, in Leicestershire. Here he wrote his "Anatomy of Melancholy," a work which those who have not read may felicitate themselves in having yet an intellectual feast in store for them. It is the only book that ever took Dr. Johnson two hours out of his bed before he wished to rise. It supplied Sterne with much of his wit, and Byron declares "it is the most amusing and instructive medley of quotations and classical anecdotes he ever perused." B. at Lindley, Leicestershire, 1576; D. at his rectory, 1640. Burton was a believer in astrology, and it is said that he predicted he would die on or about the day when that event occurred.

BURY, bur'-e, a town and parish of Lancashire, on the Irwell, 9 miles from Manchester. Besides the parish church, there are several places of worship for different denominations; public libraries, a mechanics' institution, horticultural society, and news-room. Manf. Cottons, woollens, and calico-printing. There are bleaching establishments and iron-works. In the neighbourhood there are extensive coal-mines. Pop. of parish, about 72,000; of town, 32,000.—It is connected by railway with Liverpool, Wigan, Bolton, Bury, Manchester, and Leeds. In the vicinity is Chamber Hall, where Sir Robert Peel was born.

Bury St. Edmund's, a town of England, county of Suffolk, on the Larke, 24 miles from Ipswich. It has two parish churches, St. Mary's and St. James's, both of which contain numerous monuments. There are other places of worship for dissenters of various denominations, a mechanics' institute, a botanic garden, an assembly-room, a theatre, a shire-hall, a guild-hall, and a wool-hall. Great quantities of wool are brought yearly, and exposed to sale in the hall; and it has a trade in corn, butter, and cheese. Pop. 14,000. It is a station on the Eastern Union Railway.—Here are the remains of an abbey, anciently one of the most wealthy and magnificent in Britain.

Busaco, boo-sa'-ko, a hamlet of Portugal, 20 miles from Coimbra. Here the duke of Wellington repulsed an attack of the French, on September 27th, 1810.

Buschetto, da Dulichio, boos-ket'-to, a Greek architect, who built the cathedral at Pisa, where he died, and had a monument erected to his memory. Lived in the 11th century.

Bushire, boosh'-ire, an important city of Persia, situate at the head of the Persian Gulf, on a sandy peninsula. It is protected on the land side by a wall, and has a good harbour. A large trade is carried on with India and Arabia, its principal imports being coffee and European manufactures, and its exports raw silk, wool, shawls, horses (for the British cavalry in India), carpets, &c. Pop. 20,000. Lat. 28° N. Lon. 50° 52′ E.—On the 10th December, 1856, Great Britain then being at war with Persia, this place surrendered, after a short bombardment, to the English fleet under Admiral Lecke.

Bute, Earl of, John Stuart, bute, an English statesman, who was indebted for the honours which were showered upon him rather to the dignity of his manners than the splendour of his talents. "But is a fine showy man," said Frederick, prince of Wales, who died in 1751, "and would make an excellent ambassador in any court where there is no business." On the accession of George III., in 1760, however, he became a privy councillor and groom of the stole. In the following year he was made a secretary of state. In 1762 he became first lord of the Treasury, and was made a knight of the Garter. After effecting the termination of the war by the peace of Paris, he resigned in 1763; so that his administration did not last a year; yet he had managed to render himself so unpopular in that time, that he thus wrote to a friend, stating his reason for drawing his reign of power so soon to a close:—"Single in a cabinet of my own forming, no soul in the House of Lords to support me except two peers (Lords Denbigh and Pomfret), both the secretaries of state silent, and the lord chief justice, whom I brought myself into office, voting for me, yet speaking against me,—the ground I tread upon is so hollow, that I am afraid of not only falling myself, but of involving my royal master in my ruin. It is time for me to retire." He went into the country, having built a house on the edge of a cliff at Christchurch, in Hampshire, overlooking the Needles and the Isle of Wight, "where," says Sir Egerton Brydges, "his principal delight was to listen to the melancholy roar of the sea;"—a strange delight, truly, to occupy the mind of an unpopular statesman. He, however, had a loftier pleasure in botanical pursuits, to which he devoted the days of his retirement, and which resulted in a work of 9 vols., of which only 12 copies were printed, at an expense of £10,000! Could the folly of exclusiveness carry itself further? B. 1713; D. in London, 1792.

Bute, an island of Scotland, lying at the mouth of the Frith of Clyde, and separated by a narrow channel from the coast of Argyleshire. Ext. 15 miles in length, and nowhere above 5 in breadth. Area, 60 square miles. Desc. Mountainous in the N., but fertile in the S., and with a climate so salubrious that it is the resort of many invalids. Pop. 11,000, mostly devoted to agricultural pursuits. Lat. between 55° and 56° N. Lon. between 4° 58′ and 5° 10′ W.

Buteshire, a county of Scotland, consisting of the islands Arran, Bute, the Cumbrays, Inchmarnock, the Holy Isle, and Pladda. Area, estimated at 257 square miles, of which only about one third is cultivated, another third being unprofitable. Pop. About 18,000. Lat. between 55° 32′ and 55° 56′ N. Lon. between 4° 52′ and 5° 17′ W.

Butler, Samuel, but'-ler, a celebrated English poet, who for some time resided with Sir Samuel Luke in Bedfordshire, a gentleman very zealous in behalf of the Covenant and puritanical principles. Here he became acquainted with the characters of the leading men of that party, and formed the plan of his famous poem "Hudibras," the principal person of which was, unquestionably, Sir Samuel. The idea of this inimitable production, which gives so faithful a picture of the cant and hypocrisy of his times, was taken generally from "Don Quixote;" but the humour and the poetry are wholly Butler's; and in these he stands unrivalled. After the Restoration, Butler became secretary to the earl of Carberry, who appointed him steward of the court held at Ludlow Castle. About this time also he married Mrs. Herbert, a lady of family, but whose fortune was lost to him by being invested in bad securities. It is said, that although Butler lived in good society, he was suffered to die in extreme indigence. B. at Strensham, Worcestershire, 1612; D. in London, 1680, and was buried in St. Paul's church, Covent Garden. In 1721, Alderman Barber, the printer, erected a monument to his memory in Westminster Abbey.

Butler, Joseph, a learned prelate, who, in 1736, was made clerk of the closet to Queen Caroline, who delighted much in his conversation. Two years afterwards he was preferred to the bishopric of Bristol, and, in a short time, made dean of St. Paul's, on which he resigned the rectory of Stanhope. In 1746 he was appointed clerk of the closet to the king, and, in 1750, translated to the see of Durham. B. at Wantage, Berkshire, 1692; D. at Bath, 1752.—The great work of Butler is entitled "The Analogy of Religion, Natural and Revealed, to the Constitution and Course of Nature." This treatise is a masterpiece of reasoning,—clear, profound, simple, yet grand.

Butler, but'-ter, the name of four counties in the United States. 1. In Pennsylvania. Area, 800 square miles. Pop. 31,000. 2. In Alabama. Area, 875 square miles. Pop. 11,000, of whom one third are slaves. 3. In Kentucky. Area, 500 square miles. Pop. 6,000, of whom a sixth are slaves. 4. In Ohio. Area, 455 square miles. Pop. 32,000.

Buttisholz, boot'-tees-holz, a village of Switzerland, 12 miles from Lucerne. Pop. 2,000.—In the vicinity is a mound which is said to indicate the grave of 3,000 Englishmen, who, as followers of De Coucy, fell here in 1376.

Buxar, boox-ar', a town and fortress of British India, 70 miles from Patna, where, in 1764, Sir H. Munro, with an army of 7,000, defeated 40,000 natives.

Buxton, bux'-ton, a market-town of Derbyshire, situate in a valley surrounded by hills, celebrated for its mineral waters, 30 miles from Derby. The chief ornament and pride of Buxton is the Crescent, a magnificent edifice, erected by a former duke of Devonshire, at a cost of £120,000. Pop. 1,500.—In the neighbourhood is Dismond Hill; so named from the great quantity of crystals exhibited in its structure.

Buxton, a post township of York county, Maine, U.S., on Saco river, 40 miles from York. Pop. 3,000.

Buz, bus, 'despised,' a nephew of Abraham. Elihu the Buzite is supposed to have been of his family.

Byng, George, bing, Viscount Torrington, and a brave English admiral, entered the navy early in life, and after passing through different ranks of his profession, was, in 1703, made a rear-admiral. In 1715, George I. created him a baronet. In 1717, an invasion being intended by Sweden, in favour of the Pretender, he was sent into the Baltic, where he remained till that project was abandoned. In 1718 he was appointed commander-in-chief in the Mediterranean, where he defeated the Spanish fleet, off Sicily. For this victory he had the honour to receive letters of thanks from George I., the emperor Charles, and the queen of Denmark. It was owing to his exertions that Sicily was saved from the Spaniards, and he displayed as much skill as a politician and negotiator as he did valour and prudence as a commander. In 1721 he was created Viscount Torrington, and knight of the Bath. He was afterwards appointed first lord of the Admiralty, which office he held till his death. B. in Kent, 1663; D. 1733.

BYNG, John, an English admiral, son of the above. He served under his father in most of his expeditions, and was always esteemed a good seaman and brave man. He was sent in 1756 to relieve Minorca, then besieged by the French, under the Marquis de la Galissonière; but after a partial action he was forced to bear away, and the place was taken. On this account the public clamour rose high against the ministry, who had not supplied him with a properly-manned fleet, but who, in order to save themselves, threw a great part of the blame upon Byng, and caused him to be tried by a court-martial. He was sentenced to be shot, though the court recommended him to mercy, which, however, was not granted, and he suffered with great fortitude at Portsmouth, March 14, 1757. B. in Kent, 1704.

BYRAM, bi'-ram, a river of N. America, which runs into Long Island Sound, between Connecticut and New York.

BYROM, John, bi'-rom, an English poet, who wrote the beautiful pastoral to Phœbe in the Spectator, and the letters in the same work signed "John Shadow." He supported himself chiefly by teaching short-hand, of which he wrote an improved system. In 1724 he was elected fellow of the Royal Society. B. at Kersal, near Manchester, 1691; D. at Manchester, 1763.

BYRON, the Hon. John, bi'-ron, a distinguished British admiral, and the grandfather of the illustrious poet. He sailed round the world in the years 1764, 1765, and 1766, and encountered some severe storms off the coast of Patagonia. In 1769 he was appointed governor of Newfoundland, and in 1778 commanded the fleet destined to serve in the West Indies. B. 1723; D. in London, 1786.—It is in allusion to the sufferings of this seaman in his enterprises, that the poet thus sings in the second canto of his "Don Juan:"—

"—— His sufferings were comparative
To those related in my grandad's narrative."

BYRON, George Gordon, Lord, was the only child of Captain John Byron, of the Guards, and Miss Catherine Gordon, of Gight, in Aberdeenshire. It was in the reign of Henry VIII., on the dissolution of the monasteries, that the church and priory of Newstead, with the lands adjoining, were conferred upon one of his ancestors. The fortunate recipient was "Sir John Byron the Little, with the great beard." The poet was weakly proud of his ancestry, and said that he would rather be the descendant of those Byrons who accompanied William the Conqueror into England than the author of "Childe Harold" and "Manfred." Such is the extent of human folly in its admiration of titles conferred without intellectual distinction! In 1807 he published his "Hours of Idleness," a volume of juvenile effusions, which were severely criticised in the "Edinburgh Review." Two years later appeared his reply, with the title of "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers," a satire, which obtained immediate celebrity, although its merit is far inferior to the efforts of both Dryden and Pope in the same path. Byron afterwards calls it himself "a miserable record of misplaced anger and indiscriminate acrimony," and did all he could to suppress it. He now went to the continent, and, in 1812, gave the world the fruits of his travels in the first two cantos of "Childe Harold's Pilgrimage." The effect of this poem was electric, and "Childe Harold" became the theme of every tongue. In 1815 he married Miss Anne Isabella, the only daughter of Sir Ralph Milbank, with whom he received £10,000. Dissipation on his part, and, perhaps, an utter absence of congeniality of feeling and sentiment between them, soon parted the poet and his young wife. She returned to her father's in the January of 1816. Ada, afterwards countess of Lovelace, was the only offspring of this unhappy union. In April, 1816, Byron left his country with the avowed intention of never seeing it again. After travelling through a great portion of the continent, he took up his abode in Venice, then at Pisa, and then passed a short time in Genoa. Meanwhile his pen was in continual exercise. Writing had become such a habit with him, that he could not be idle; and the activity as well as the splendour of his genius was such, that nothing could restrain the strength and magnificence of its flight. During this period he produced "The Corsair," "The Giaour," "The Siege of Corinth," "The Bride of Abydos," "Parisina," "Beppo," "Mazeppa," "Manfred," "Cain; a Mystery," "The Lament of Tasso," cantos III. and IV. of "Childe Harold," and many more effusions, as remarkable for the beauty of their diction as the originality by which they are all more or less characterized. He also continued to issue cantos of his "Don Juan," which, notwithstanding its moral defects, is the most wonderful of all his poems. At the end of December, 1823, he sailed for Cephalonia, to take part with the Greeks in the cause of their independence. He reached Missolonghi on January 10, 1824. On February 15 he was seized with a convulsive fit, which rendered him both senseless and speechless for some time. On April 9, he got wet, took cold, and fevered; on the 11th he got worse, on the 14th he was in danger, and on the 19th he died.

"So sinks the day-star in his ocean bed."

Byron was only thirty-six years and three months old. B. in Holles-street, Cavendish-square, London, 1788; D. at Missolonghi, 1824.

BYRON'S ISLAND, an island in the Pacific Ocean, about 12 miles in length. Lat. 1° 18′ S. Lon. 173° 10′ E.

BYRSA, bir'-sa, a citadel in the middle of Carthage, on which was the temple of Æsculapius. Asdrubal's wife burnt it when the city was taken. When Dido came to Africa, she bought of the inhabitants as much land as could be encompassed by a bull's hide. After the purchase, she cut the hide in small thongs, and inclosed with them a large piece of territory, on which she built a citadel, and called it Byrsa, bursa, 'a hide.'

BYZANTINE HISTORIANS, bi-zan'-tine, a name applied to a number of Greek writers who flourished under the Eastern or Byzantine empire, between the sixth and fifteenth centuries. Most of their writings were collected and published by order of and at the expense of Louis XIV., in 1645—1711.

BYZANTIUM, bi-zan'-ti-um, a town situate on the Thracian Bosphorus. The pleasantness and convenience of its situation were observed by Constantine the Great, who made it the capital of the eastern Roman empire, A.D. 328, and called it Constantinopolis, i. e., the city of Constantine. (See CONSTANTINOPLE.)

C.

CABAGAN, ka-ba-gan', a town at the N. extremity of the island of Luzar, Philippine islands. Pop. about 12,000.

CABARRUS, ka-bar'-rus, a county of the United States, in the S. of North Carolina. Area, 350 square miles. Desc. Undulating and fertile, yielding cotton, corn, and cattle. Pop. about 10,000, of whom one fourth are slaves.

CABEL, Adrian van der, ka-bail', an eminent Dutch painter, whose landscapes and cattle are held in high estimation. B. at Ryswick, 1631; D. 1695.

CABELL, ka-bel', a county of the United States, in the W. of Virginia, on the Ohio river. Area, 680 square miles. Pop. 8,000, of whom about one half are slaves.

CABENDA, ka-ben'-da, a seaport town on the W. coast of Africa, situate a little N. of the river Zaire. Lat. 5° 40′ S. Lon. 12° 30′ E.

CABES, kai'-beez, Gulf of, an inlet of the Mediterranean, on the N. E. of Africa. Lat. 34° N. Lon.

from 10° to 11° E. This is the ancient Syrtis Minor. —There is a town of the same name in this gulf.

CABESTAN, or CABESTAING, William de, ka'-bes-ta, a Provençal poet, whose fate was remarkable. He served the wife of Raymond de Scillans, and became so great a favourite of that lady as to excite the jealousy of her husband, who killed him, and tore out his heart. The barbarian caused this signal of his cruelty to be dressed and served up to his wife. After she had eaten it, he informed her what it was, on which she died of grief, about 1213. Lived in the 13th century.—This shocking incident has frequently been made the subject of ballads and legendary tales.

CABET, Etienne, ka'-bai, a leader of the French Communists, was trained to the bar, but failing to obtain sufficient practice, adopted the profession of a littérateur, and for several years conducted "The Journal of Jurisprudence." His ultra-democratic principles, however, led him into difficulties, and in 1834 he was condemned to two years' imprisonment for some strictures upon the conduct of the king. In 1842 he published his "Voyage en Icarie," in which he unfolded his socialist views, and found many to embrace them. He obtained a grant of land in Texas, and in 1847 a goodly number of his followers embarked for this land of promise, which their own fervid imaginations had too fondly pictured to themselves. It was soon found, however, that the new Canaan was not filled with milk and honey, and they were compelled to quit the country. They wandered through the United States, and hearing of the city of Nauvoo, which had been abandoned by the Mormons, on the banks of the Mississippi, Cabet took possession of it. In 1850 he returned to Paris, but Louis Napoleon's coup d'état of Dec. 2, 1852, caused him to again repair to America. B. at Dijon, 1788; D. at St. Louis, Missouri, 1856.

CABEZON DE LA SAL, ka'-be-zone, a town of Spain, on the Pisuerza, 7 miles from Valladolid, where, in 1808, one of the first battles of the Peninsular war was fought.

CABIRI, kă-bi'-ri, certain deities whose worship was held in the greatest veneration at Thebes and Lemnos, but more particularly in the islands of Samothrace and Imbros. Their number is uncertain. They are often confounded with the Corybantes, Anaces, Dioscuri, &c.; and, according to Herodotus, Vulcan was their father. The obscenity practised in their celebration has obliged all authors to pass it over in silence, and say it was unlawful to reveal it. They were supposed to preside over metals.

CABO FRIO, ka'-bo fre'-o, a seaport town of Brazil, about 80 miles from Rio Janeiro, with an insalubrious climate. Pop. about 4,000.

CABOT, Sebastian, kăb'-ot, a celebrated navigator, whose father was likewise a navigator and a mathematician, with whom, before he was twenty, he made several voyages. In one of their voyages for a north-west passage, they fell in with Newfoundland, the coasts of which Sebastian afterwards explored, when we hear little more of him for the next twenty years. In the early part of the reign of Henry VIII. he sailed again, with a design of proceeding to the East Indies; but owing to some disappointment, he went no farther than the Brazils, whence he shaped his course for Hispaniola and Porto Rico, and returned. In 1524 he entered the Spanish service, but, after one voyage to America, he returned to England, and settled in his native city. Edward VI., to whom he was introduced by the duke of Somerset, the lord protector, delighted in ca[illegible] conversation, and allowed him were [illegible]sion of £166. 13s. 4d., as taken [illegible]ilot of England. A new struggle [illegible] called Merchant Adventurers [illegible] been formed, and Sebastian was placed [illegible] Brittany; D. [illegible] it. By his means a voyage was made this resolute ch[illegible] 1552, and a trade commenced with Russia, which gave rise to the Russian Company. B. at Bristol, 1477; D. 1557.—In "Hackluyt's Collection" are his instructions for the direction of a voyage to Cathay. He was the first who noticed the variation of the compass, and wrote "Navigazione nelle Parti Settentrionali, Venice, 1583, folio.

CABRA, ka'-bra, a town of Spain, 30 miles from Cordova. It is clean and well paved, and has manufactures of linen, bricks, and soap. Its neighbourhood produces a superior quality of wines. Pop. about 12,000.—There are several other small towns of the same name in Spain.

CABRAL, or CABRERA, Pedro Alvares, ka'-bral, a Portuguese navigator, who, in 1500, commanded the fleet sent to the East Indies by Emanuel, king of Portugal. In this voyage he accidentally discovered Brazil, being driven by a storm on its coast, where he landed, and called the spot Santa Cruz. Thence he crossed to the coast of Africa, and afterwards proceeded to Calicut, where he engaged in a war with the Zamorin, whom he forced to comply with his terms. In 1501 he returned to Portugal richly laden, after which his history ceases to have any interest. Lived in the 16th century.

CABRERA, Don Ramon, ka-brair'-a, one of the most prominent Carlist leaders in the recent history of Spain, first became known to fame in 1834. In that year he concerted measures with Don Carlos for the promotion of his cause, to advance which he committed cruelties to a degree far beyond such as we have been accustomed to see exercised by the most stern of partisan chiefs. The opposite party, or the upholders of Queen Christina, were incensed to ungovernable wrath against him; and as they were unable to lay their hands on him, they seized his mother, and sentenced her to be shot. The sentence was carried into effect, when Cabrera commanded the wives of thirty officers to be massacred, and the war became one of the most atrocious kind. He continued it with success for several years. The political changes which subsequently took place drove him, in 1840, to seek refuge in France; but in 1848 he returned to recommence the war in Spain. In 1840 he was forced to fly to France again, after which he came to England, where he married, and removed to Naples. The last time he was publicly heard of was as a follower of the remains of Don Carlos at his funeral in Trieste. B. at Tortosa, 1810.

CABRERA, one of the Balearic islands, 10 miles from Majorca. It is used by the Spanish government as a place of exile. Ext. About 4 miles long by 3 broad.

CABUL, CAUBUL, or CABOOL, ka-bool' or kaw'-bul, a province of Afghanistan, situate between lat. 33° and 35° N. It comprises an area of 10,000 square miles, and has for its principal cities Cabul, Jellalabad, Ghuznee, and Istalif. Its chief river is the Cabool, which is a tributary of the Indus, and which, after a course of 320 miles, it joins nearly opposite Attock.

CABUL

CABUL, CAUBUL, or CABOOL, a very ancient and fortified city, the capital of Afghanistan. It stands on the Cabool river, which is here crossed by three bridges, at a distance of 80 miles from Ghuznee. The houses are built of rough stones and clay, and have but a mean appearance. There are, however, four good bazars or markets. The citadel, called Bala-Hissar, or the 'Palace of Kings,' contains the palace and other public buildings, the royal gardens, an inner fort, and a town of 5,000 inhabitants. It is a place of great traffic, and persons of every country of the East are here to be met with. The outer town has a circumference of three miles, and is subdivided into districts, with narrow intricate streets, lined with high houses, built of wood and sun-dried bricks. To those of the more opulent classes are attached extensive courts and gardens. Pop. 60,000. Lat. 34° 30′ N. Lon. 69° 6′ E. —(See AFGHANISTAN.)

CACCIA, Guglielmo, katch'-e-a, a celebrated Piedmontese artist, and the best painter of his time, in fresco. His finest efforts in fresco are shown in the church of Sant' Antonio Abate, at Milan, and in San Paolo, at Novara. In San Gaudenzio, at Novara, is to be seen his "Descent from the Cross," which is considered his master-piece in oil. B. at Montabone, near Casale, in 1568; D. 1625.—Caccia was usually called Moncalvo, from the place where he resided. He had two daughters, who excelled in painting, the elder of whom, Orsola, was the founder of the Conservatorio delle Orseline or Urselines, in Moncalvo. Her paintings are marked with a flower. Those of Francesca, the younger daughter, are indicated by a bird.

CACERES, kă'-tha-raise, a town of Spanish Estremadura, 25 miles from Truxillo. It is the capital of a province of the same name, and is divided into an old and new town. Manf. Linen, cloth, hats, baize, ropes, leather, and earthenware. It has, besides, a considerable trade in oil, wine, pigs, bacon, and merino wool. There are also some dyeing and wool-washing establishments. Pop. about 12,000.—The province is bounded on the N. by Salamanca, W. by Portugal, E. by Avila, Ciudad Real, and Toledo, and S. by Badajoz. Area, 10,917 square miles. Desc. Mountainous and well wooded, with fertile valleys, but little attended to by the agriculturist. Minerals. Abundant, consisting of iron, copper, lead, slate, and granite. Pop. 265,000.—Cortez and the two Pizarros were natives of this province.

CACHAO, or KACHEO, katch'-o, a city of Anam, and the capital of the province of Tonquin, on the river of the same name, about 80 miles from the sea. It is of great extent, and is an open and defenceless place. Many of the houses are built of brick, though the larger proportion are constructed of mud and timber, and thatched with leaves, straw, or reeds. It is a city of great commercial resort. Gold is obtained in abundance; many beautiful silks are manufactured; and the lacquered ware, which, together with these, is exported, is deemed superior to any in the East. The imports are long cloths, chintz, arms, pepper, and other articles. Both English and Dutch factories were formerly established here. Pop. estimated at 100,000. Lat. 22° 36′ N. Lon. 105° 15′ E.

CACHAR, katch'-ar, anciently Hairumbo, a territory of British India, in the presidency of Bengal. Area, 4,000 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, and mostly uncultivated. In some parts, however, it is relieved by fertile plains. Pro. Cotton, sugar, and rice; and it exports iron ore, ivory, and limestone. Its principal river is the Barak. Lat. between 24° and 26° N. Lon. between 92° and 93° 30′ E.

CACUS, kaï'-kus, a famous robber, son of Vulcan and Medusa. He is represented as a three-headed monster, and as vomiting flames. Hercules strangled him in his arms, and this combat forms one of the finest passages in the eighth book of Virgil's "Æneid."

CADDER, kăd'-der, a parish of Lanarkshire, Scotland, 5 miles from Glasgow. Pop. about 6,000.—Wallace was betrayed at Robroystone, in this parish, and captured, August 5, 1305.

CADE, John, kaid, an Irishman, commonly called "Jack Cade," who, in 1450, headed an insurrection in Kent, and on the 17th of June, with many followers, encamped at Blackheath. He assumed the name of Mortimer, and gave out that he was the rightful heir to the throne, pretending that he was a bastard relation of the duke of York. He defeated a detachment of the king's forces which had been brought against him at Sevenoaks, and re-encamped on Blackheath. On the 1st July he entered London, and with his sword struck the old London stone and exclaimed, "Now is Mortimer lord of this city." His followers, on the third day after his entrance, began to plunder the city, and he, himself, it is said, robbed the very house in which he had dined. Measures were now taken to expel the rebels, and a pardon offered to those who would return to their homes. This had the desired effect. The followers of Cade melted away, and he fled on horseback to Lewes, in Sussex. Here he was killed by one Alexander Iden, on the 11th July, and his head transported to London, and stuck upon the old bridge.—Lived in the 15th century. For a humorous scene suggested by the adventure of "Jack Cade," we refer the reader to the second scene in Act 4, of the Second Part of Shakspeare's "King Henry VI."

CADEMOSTO, Lewis, ka-de-mos'-to, a Venetian navigator, engaged in the service of the king of Portugal. In 1455 he sailed to the Canary Islands, and thence the coast of Africa, where, it is said, he discovered Cape Verd Islands. B. 1422; D. at Venice, 1464.—He left an account of his voyages, which was afterwards published.

CADER IDRIS, kaï'-der i'-dris, a mountain in Merionethshire, 5 miles from Dolgelly, 2,914 feet high.

CADIZ, kaï'-diz (Sp. kă'-deeth), anciently GADES, a fortified city of Spain, in Andalusia, the principal trading port in the south of that country. It is situate at the extremity of a long tongue of land projecting from the island of Leon, the isthmus of which forms a vast bay, one of the finest in the world, and affording excellent anchorage for shipping. Its lighthouse of St. Sebastian is 172 feet high. The town is surrounded by the sea on the north-east and west, and its form is nearly a square of 1¼ English mile. The houses are high, the streets in some parts narrow, which, with the smallness of the windows, gives them a gloomy appearance. The chief buildings are the hospital, custom-house, the churches, convents, and a bull-ring. The private houses are, in general, white-washed and painted yellow. The trade of Cadiz has fluctuated greatly, but there are few large seaports in Europe that are not occasionally connected with it. In the adjoining country, linen is manufactured in considerable quantities, and there are productive salt-pits; whilst its dependency, St. Mary, is the centre of the trade in sherry wine. Pop. about 60,000 [illegible] 70,000. Lat. 36° 31′ 41″ N. Lon. 6° 17′ 13″ W.—The city was taken and pillaged in 1596 by the English, by Lord Wimbledon, an unsuccessful attempt was made on it [illegible] bledon; and in 1702 by the duke of Ormond and Sir George Rooke. In 1800 it was bombarded by the British, and in 1808 the French fleet off Cadiz surrendered to the Spaniards. It was afterwards blockaded by the French, who did not leave it till after the battle of Salamanca, in 1812. In 1829 it was made a free port, but it did not enjoy this advantage till 1832.—Byron, in his "Childe Harold," thus contrasts Cadiz with Seville:—

"Fair is proud Seville; let her country boast
Her strength, her wealth, her site of ancient days;
But Cadiz, rising on the distant coast,
Calls forth a sweeter though ignoble praise;—
Ah, vice! how soft are thy voluptuous ways!"

CADIZ, a province of Spain, in Andalusia, bounded N. by the provinces of Seville and Huelva, S. and W. by the Straits of Gibraltar and the Atlantic, and E. by Malaga. Area, 3,905 square miles. Desc. Traversed by the Ronda mountains in the E., but fertile in general, and yielding the usual cereals, with fruits of almost every kind. Rivers. The Guadiaro and the Guadalete, with their tributaries. Pop. about 360,000.—This province is one of the three into which the ancient kingdom of Seville has been divided.

CADIZ, BAY OF, an immense inlet of the Atlantic, on the S.W. coast of Spain. On its E. side is the islet of Caracca, where are the most important shipbuilding-yards and arsenals in the kingdom. Lat. 36° 30′ N. Lon. 6° 15′ W.

CADMEA, kăd-me'-a. (See THEBES.)

CADMUS, kăd'-mus, son of Agenor, king of Phœnicia, was ordered by his father to go in quest of his sister Europa, whom Jupiter had carried away, and he was never to return to Phœnicia if he did not bring her back. His search led him into Bœotia, where, although unsuccessful in the object of his journey, he founded the city of Thebes. He is believed to have been the first to introduce the use of letters into Greece from Phœnicia. D. about 1432 B.C.

CADMUS, the Milesian, was the first Grecian who wrote history in prose. He composed the history of Ionia, which is lost. Lived in the 7th century B.C.

CADOG, kad'-dog, son of Brychan, a saint and founder of some churches in Wales in the 5th century. He died in France.

CADOG, commonly called the Wise, a bard, and the first who collected the British proverbs together. There are some churches dedicated to him in South Wales. Flourished in the 6th century.

CADOGAN, William, ka-dug'-an, the first earl of Cadogan, was trained to a military life, and rose, by merit, to the rank of brigadier-general, in which capacity he greatly distinguished himself at the battle of Blenheim, fought 1704. He took part in most of the battles in which the duke of Marlborough gained his renown; and succeeded that great general as commander-in-chief, and master of the ordnance. D. 1727.

CADORE (PIAVE DI), ka-dor'-ai, a town of Austrian Italy, 24 miles from Belluno. Pop. about 2,000. This place stands on the Piave, and is distinguished as the birthplace of Titian. In 1797 the French here obtained a victory over the Austrians.

CADOUDAL, Georges, ka-doo'-dal, a distinguished Chouan chief, who, after vainly endeavouring to restore the Bourbons, made his peace, in 1800, with General Brune, dispersed his troops, and went to London. Having declared a strong personal hatred to the First Consul of France, he was accused by the French government of being the planner of the infernal machine. About the same time the count d'Artois, afterwards Charles X., gave him, with his own hand, the cordon rouge, in the king's name. In 1802 he united himself with Pichegru to overthrow the French government, and, in the following year, made his way secretly to Paris, where he lay concealed for six months, waiting the denoûment of events that would enable him to carry out his design. Meanwhile, the police of Paris were on his track, and on the 4th March, 1804, he was taken in a cabriolet near the Luxembourg. In the struggle which ensued at his capture, he wounded one man and killed another. B. 1769, near Auray, Lower Brittany; D. on the scaffold, 1804.—The character of this resolute chief was highly estimated by Napoleon I. "In my hands," said he, "Cadoudal would have done great things."

CADOXTON, kăd'-ox-ton, the name of two parishes in Glamorganshire. One, ½ mile from Neath. Pop. 8,000. Another, 5 miles from Cardiff. Pop. 272.

CADWALADYR, kăd-wal'-a-dir, son of Cadwallon ab Cadvan, succeeded to the nominal sovereignty of Britain in 660; but, disheartened with the progress of the Saxons, he went to Rome in 680, where he died in 708. With him ceased the title of king of the Britons. He was called one of the three blessed kings, on account of his charity to distressed Christians.

CADWALADYR CRÉAIL, a Welsh poet, many of whose pieces yet remain in manuscript. There was another of the same name and age, whose works are to be met with, but unpublished. Both flourished in the 16th century.

CADWALLON, kăd-wal'-lon, prince of North Wales, who, being defeated by Edwin, king of Northumberland, went to Ireland in 620, and remained there several years. On his return he assumed the title of king of the Britons, which he supported through a series of years of continual warfare against the Saxons. He was a great patron of the bards, and in his youth had been admitted among them. Lived in the 7th century.

CADWGAN, kăd'-gan, son of Bleddyn ab Cynvyn, became prince of a part of Powys in 1073, and, for some time, had part of South Wales. In 1107 he gave a banquet at Aberteivi, which almost ruined him, on account of his son Owain being captivated with the charms of Nest, the wife of Gerald, whom he carried off. In consequence of this, both he and his father were obliged to fly to Ireland. He returned the year after, but was assassinated by his nephew in 1110.

CAEDMON, seed'-mon, the reputed father of English song, and the first metrical author in our vernacular language. His composition is a kind of religious hymn, celebrating the praises of the Creator, and is preserved in the translation of Bede by Alfred. Besides this, there is a long Saxon poem attributed to him, but upon doubtful authority. It is supposed to be a later production, and was published by the Society of Antiquaries, in 8vo, 1832. It consists of a paraphrase of some parts of the Scriptures. Flourished in the 5th century.

CAEN, ka, a large and well-built town of France, situate at the junction of the small river Odon with the larger stream of the Orne, 10 miles from the English Channel. Its streets are less narrow and crooked than in most towns of France; and the houses, being generally built of a white stone, have a fine appearance. It contains a number of parish churches, amongst which, the most remarkable is the Abbaye aux Hommes, built by William the Conqueror, and in which is the tomb of him and his wife Matilda. The cathedral of St. Etienne is also worthy of notice, as being one of the finest in Normandy. Besides these, there are several hospitals, a palace of justice, an hôtel-de-ville, a museum, public library, a botanical garden, and a custom-house. The inhabitants manufacture quantities of linen, serges, lace, stockings, caps, and Angora gloves. In these commodities, as well as in cider, dye-stuffs, skins, and in the cattle and horses reared in the surrounding country, an active trade is carried on. Pop. 46,000.—This town was greatly adorned by William the Conqueror and his wife Matilda, and became the capital of Lower Normandy. In 1346 it was taken and plundered by Edward III. of England. It was again taken in 1417, and held till 1450, when it was retaken by Dunois. On this occasion, the duke of Somerset, with 4,000 troops, were made prisoners. Till 1793, Caen was the seat of a university founded by Henry VI. of England. It is the birthplace of Malherbe, the father of French poetry, and Auber the composer.

CAER, the Celtic word for 'castle,' employed as a prefix to several places in Wales and Scotland.

CAERLAVEROCK, kar-laiv'-rok, a parish of Dumfriesshire, Scotland, containing the ruins of an ancient castle of the same name, famous for its warlike associations. Pop. 1,300.

CAERLEON, kar'-le-on, a town of Monmouthshire, on the Usk, which is here crossed by a handsome modern-built stone bridge, 3 miles from Newport. Pop. 1,300.—The name of this place signifies 'Castle of the Legion,' and is the ancient Isca Silurum. It was the capital of Britannia Secunda (modern Wales), and was a place of importance, until ruined by the wars between the Welsh and the Anglo-Normans.

CAERMARTHEN, or CARMARTHENSHIRE, kar-mar'-then, a county of S. Wales, bounded N. by Cardiganshire, E. by Brecknock and Glamorgan shires, S. by the Bristol Channel, and W. by Pembrokeshire. Ext. About 45 miles in length, by 20 in breadth. Area, 974 square miles. Desc. Consisting of alternate hills and valleys; the former being generally of black and dreary aspect. Rivers. The Towy, Cothy, and Taff. Pro. Quantities of oats and barley are raised; but wheat, except partially, is not successfully cultivated. Numbers of black cattle and horses are bred on the hills. These, together with grain, oak bark, coals, tinned iron plates, and lead, are exported. Minerals. Iron, lead, coals, and lime. Manf. Principally woollen stockings and tinned iron plates. Pop. 111,000.

CAERMARTHEN BAY, a large inlet of the Bristol Channel, lying between St. Goggan's Point, Pembrokeshire, and Worm's Head, Glamorganshire. The Taff, Towy, and Llychwr rivers fall into it. There is an island in it, called Caldby, with a lighthouse 210 feet above the sea.

CAERMARTHEN, or CARMARTHEN, a seaport-town of South Wales, situate on the river Towy, which is here crossed by a fine stone bridge, 11 miles from Llanelly. The town is of considerable extent, but the streets are steep and irregular. The church is spacious, and the town-hall, a neat edifice. There is a county gaol, built on the site of an ancient castle. It is the seat of the county assizes. There are some shipbuilding-docks, and an active trade is carried on in timber, bark, corn, and slates. Pop. 11,000.—It is connected with Llanelly by railway.

CAERNARVON, or CARNARVONSHIRE, kar-nar'-von, a county of N. Wales, bounded N. by the sea, E. by Denbighshire, S. by the county of Merioneth and the sea, and W. by the Irish Sea and the Menai Strait. Ext. About 45 miles in length, by 13 in breadth. Area, 544 square miles. Desc. The most mountainous county of Wales, being traversed by some of the loftiest ranges in Britain. Many lakes and pools are seen among their recesses, and the climate, owing to the elevation of the ground, is cold and piercing. Rivers. The Conway is the principal. Pro. Oats and barley; but cattle is the chief feature in the rural industry of the county. A diminutive breed of sheep is pastured upon the mountains. Minerals. Lead and copper mines are wrought, and there are extensive slate-quarries. Yellow ochre, excellent hones, and other minerals, are also found. The exports consist chiefly of oats, barley, butter, cheese, and cattle. Herrings, lobsters, and oysters are plentiful on the coasts. Pop. about 88,000. —The mountains Snowdon and Penmaen-Mawr are in this county.

CAERNARVON BAY washes the W. coast of the counties Caernarvon and Anglesea. Its entrance is about 35 miles wide, and it communicates through the Menai Strait with the Irish Sea.

CAERNARVON, or CARNARVON, the chief town of the above county, on the shore of the Strait of Menai, about 8 miles from Menai Bridge. The town is well built, and the streets, which are narrow, are at right angles, corresponding with the position of the gates. The church stands half a mile distant, and there are chapels for various denominations. It has both hot and cold baths. Considerable trade is carried on with London, Bristol, Liverpool, and Ireland. Copper ore and slates are exported. The imports are for the most part Irish cloth, fine wool, hides, tallow, and groceries. Pop. about 9,000.—The remains of the castle constructed by Edward I. extend over an oblong space of between two and three acres. Edward II., the first prince of Wales, was born in the Eagle tower of this fortress, which was besieged during the civil war by the Parliamentarians, and surrendered in June, 1646.

CAERPHILLY, kar-fil'-le, a market-town of South Wales, in the county of Glamorgan, 7 miles from Cardiff. Manf. Shirting, checks, and linsey-woolseys. In its neighbourhood are iron-works and collieries. Pop. about 3,000.—Here are the ruins of a castle, which belonged to the younger Spencer, the favourite of Edward II., and which he defended against the nobles in 1326.

CAERWYS, or CAER AR WYS, kar'-wis, 'the Fort over the Waters,' a town of N. Wales, in the county of Flint, 5 miles from Holywell. It stands on a rising ground, and consists of four spacious streets, intersecting each other at right angles. Pop. 917.—Here met for many centuries the Eisteddfod, or sessions of the Welsh bards and minstrels.

CÆSAR, se'-sar, the family name of the distinguished house of Julian. It came to be adopted by several Roman emperors, as being previously marked out to be in the line of succession to the imperial purple.

CÆSAR, Caius Julius, was descended from the Julian family, and lost his father when young. He married the daughter of Cornelius Cinna, and was designed for the office of high priest to Jupiter, but was deprived of it by Sylla, who was Cinna's inveterate enemy. Sylla carried his revenge so far as to confiscate the property of Cæsar, and even issued a proscription against him, when he retired from the capital and went to reside with Nicomedes, king of Bithynia. On the death of Sylla he was recalled to Rome, when he distinguished himself as an orator in impeaching Dolabella for misgovernment in the affairs of Greece. He now joined the party of Marius, and united with Cicero in promoting the Manilian law, which gained him the friendship of Pompey. The first dignity he obtained was that of military tribune, after which he served the offices of quæstor and ædile. In these offices his profusion procured him great popularity, but at the sacrifice of the independence of his circumstances, which were much embarrassed by them. On the death of his wife Cornelia, he married Pompeia, from whom he obtained a divorce on account of her receiving Clodius into her house at the time of celebrating the rites of the bona Dea. He did not, however, prosecute Clodius, and when asked why he had dismissed Pompeia, his answer was, that "Cæsar's wife should be above suspicion." On the expiration of his prætorship, he was appointed governor of the farther Spain, where he realized sufficient property to pay his debts, which are said to have amounted to a million and a half sterling. He now formed the first triumvirate with Pompey and Crassus; the former of whom married his daughter Julia, and he himself married Calpurnia, daughter of L. Calpurnius Piso, and shortly afterwards set out for Gaul. Here he distinguished himself as a military commandor, and, in the fourth year of his government, crossed over to Britain, but did little more than reconnoitre the coast. On his next expedition he entered the Thames, and ravaged a great part of the country, taking several of the inhabitants as hostages. Having completely reduced Gaul to the condition of a Roman province, and acquired prodigious wealth, Pompey became jealous of him, and the senate deprived him of his government. This being considered by him as a declaration of war, he crossed the Rubicon, a small river which parted Cisalpine Gaul from Italy, with a determination of revenging himself upon his enemies. His army was zealously attached to him, and success attended him everywhere on his march. Rome was filled with fear and confusion. Pompey and the magistrates withdrew on his approach, when Cæsar entered the metropolis without his troops, in an affected style of moderation; yet he seized the public treasury, which enabled him to complete the subjugation of the people. The civil war which had begun, now raged with fury throughout the empire. Cæsar, however, by himself or his lieutenants, was everywhere triumphant, except in his blockade of Dyrrachium, where Pompey gained an advantage, and whence he retired to Macedonia, followed by that general, whom he defeated on the plains of Pharsalia. He next embarked for Alexandria, where the head of Pompey being brought to him, he burst into tears, and caused it to be solemnly interred. Here he entered into a war with Ptolemy, in which the famous Alexandrian library, containing 400,000 volumes, was accidentally destroyed. This war was attended with various success, but Cæsar's good fortune prevailed; the Egyptians were defeated, and Ptolemy was drowned. On the news of the death of Pompey, the Roman senate proclaimed Cæsar consul for five years, and created him dictator; thus placing the executive power in his hands. He next conquered Pharnaces, the son of Mithridates the Great, in Asia Minor; on which occasion he wrote his well-known laconic letter, "Veni, vidi, vici,"—I came, I saw, I conquered. After settling the affairs of Greece, he proceeded to Rome, where he showed his clemency by pardoning all who had conspired against him in his absence. He next made an expedition into Africa, in the course of which he displayed his usual address in quelling a mutiny which had broken out in his favourite legion. In this war he defeated Scipio, Labienus, and Juba, and drove Cato to the extremity of putting himself to death at Utica. On his return to Rome he behaved with great liberality to the people, and enacted several good laws. Among other reforms which he introduced, was that of the calendar, which bears the name of the Julian calendar. The two sons of Pompey having excited a revolt in Spain, Cæsar marched against them, and after a bloody battle, succeeded in completing the subjugation of that country. His return to Rome was crowned with a triumph. He now assumed the imperial dignity, which roused the jealousy of several of his friends, who joined with the republicans in a conspiracy against his life. It is recorded of him, that a soothsayer bade him beware of the ides of March, and that his wife, Calpurnia, was so apprehensive that danger awaited him, as to dissuade him from going to meet the senate. The remonstrances, however, of Decimus Brutus, one of the conspirators, overruled his reluctance, and Cæsar went to the senate-house, where he was assassinated, 43 B.C. B. 100 B.C. —Thus fell Julius Cæsar, one of the greatest men of antiquity. His talents were of the first order; and he might have shone as an orator if he had devoted himself to that profession, as Cicero himself acknowledges. His literary powers appear to great advantage in his Commentaries, written in the true spirit of historical dignity and faithfulness. Some of his epistles are extant among those of Cicero.

CÆSAREA, ses-a-re'-a, an ancient place in Palestine, formerly called Strabo's Tower, on the east coast of the Mediterranean Sea, 62 miles from Jerusalem. It is celebrated as being the scene of several events recorded in the New Testament. Here King Agrippa was smitten for neglecting to ascribe to God the glory, when flattered by the people; and here Paul continued a prisoner for two years before he was conducted to Rome, after he had appealed to Nero. Here, also, Cornelius the centurion was baptized by Peter; and here, also, the prophet Agabus foretold to the apostle Paul that he would be bound at Jerusalem. It received its name in honour of Augustus, 22 B.C., and, under the Romans, was the residence of a proconsul. It was ruined during the Crusades, and its remains still bear testimony to the greatness of its former extent.

CAFFA, or KAFFA, kaf'-fa, now THEODOSIA, a town of European Russia, in the Crimea, at the end of a large bay on the northern shore of the Black Sea, 100 miles from Perekop. Pop. about 9,000.—In 1770 the Russians took this place by assault, and in 1774 it was ceded, with the rest of the Crimea, to the khan of Tartary, who made it his residence. The consequence of this was, the emigration of the Turkish part of the population, which proved a death-blow to its prosperity. With a view to revive its fallen commerce, it was declared, in 1798, a free port for 30 years.

CAFFA, Melchior, kaf'-fa, an able sculptor and designer. He adorned many churches at Rome with his works, which occasioned him to be compared to the celebrated Bernini. B. at Malta, 1631; D. at Rome, 1687.

CAFFIAUX, D. Joseph, kaf'-fe-o, a Benedictine of the congregation of St. Maur, who wrote, in conjunction with Grenier, the "History of Picardy;" and an essay towards a "History of Music," 4to; but his principal work is the "Genealogical Treasure," full of curious researches. B. at Valenciennes, 1712; D. at St. Germain des Près, 1777.

CAFFRARIA, KAFFRARIA, or KAFIRLAND, kaf'-frair'-e-a, an extensive region of S. Africa, bounded on the E. and S. by the Indian Ocean, on the W. by the Kieskama, the Chumie, and the Kliss Plaat rivers, and on the N. by a range of mountains running E. and W., but not accurately defined. Area, unascertained. Desc. Mountainous, well watered, and the soil, in many parts, fertile, producing maize, millet, and water-melons; but as the inhabitants chiefly live on the produce of the chase, the cultivation of the earth is little attended to. Lat. between 32° and 34° S. Lon. between 27° 30′ and 29° 30′ E.—Between 1835 and 1853 the Kaffirs made frequent inroads upon the Cape Colony, which finally led to an appropriation of a large portion of their territory, now called British Caffraria, and more recently the new divisions of Victoria and Albert. The capital of British Caffraria is King-William Town.

CAFIRISTAN, or KAFIRISTAN, ka'-fir-is-tan', a country of Central Asia, inclosed by Afghanistan, Koondooz, Badakshan, and Chitral. Area, estimated at 7,000 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, with narrow and fertile valleys, and producing fruits in abundance, with some millet and wheat. The principal wealth of the country consists of cattle, sheep, and goats. It is chiefly watered by the affluents of the Cabool river. Lat. between 35° and 36° N. Lon. between 69° 20′ and 71° 20′ E. Comparatively little is known of this country, but its inhabitants are a primitive and fierce people, hostile to the Mahometans, and distinguished from surrounding tribes by drinking wine. They claim to be brothers of the Feringhi, or Europeans, and they have both the Caucasian features and complexion.

CAGAYAN, ka-ga'-yan, a province in the island of Luzon, in the Eastern seas, comprising 20 towns and villages. Pop. about 60,000.

CAGAYAN-SOOLOO, ka-ga'-yan soo'-loo, an island of the Asiatic archipelago, in the Sooloo [illegible], with a circumference of 20 miles. Lat. 6° 58′ 5″ N. Lon. 118° 28′ 11″ E.

CAGLIARI, kal-ye-ar'-e, the capital of the island of Sardinia, situate on the S. coast, in the Gulf of Cagliari. Its streets are narrow and miserably paved. It has a great many monasteries, nunneries, and churches, a handsome theatre, and a spacious and secure harbour with a road. The old town comprises the citadel, cathedral, and vice-regal palace. Manf. Gunpowder, soap, furniture, leather, cotton fabrics, and cake-saffron. Pop. about 30,000. Lat. 39° 13′ 14″ N. Lon. 9° 7′ 48″ E. This place is the seat of a royal court, and the residence of the viceroy and the archbishop-primate of Sardinia.

CAGLIARI, BAY OF, is on the S. coast of the island of Sardinia, between capes Carbonara and Pula, in the Mediterranean Sea. At its entrance it is about 30 miles broad.

CAGLIARI, an Italian family, which has produced several painters. The most famous is Paul Cagliari, known as Paul Veronese, whom see.

CAGLIOSTRO, kal'-ye-os-tro, a famous impostor, whose real name was Joseph Balsamo; but he assumed the name of Cagliostro from his godmother. He left his native country and went to Rome, where he married a young woman as full of deception as himself. His first adventure was the cheating a goldsmith of Palermo out of a considerable sum, under the pretence of discovering to him some hidden treasure. On this occasion he was obliged to quit Sicily. At Messina he became acquainted with a Greek, named Altotas, who pretended to a knowledge of chemistry. With him he visited the Archipelago and Egypt, and, on their return, touched at Malta, where they worked in the laboratory of the grand master, Pinto. Here Altotas died, and Balsamo going to Naples, assumed the title of Marquis Pelligrini. He now visited some other countries of Europe, and, in France, called himself the Marquis Cagliostro; but being implicated with the Cardinal Rohan in the affair of the diamond necklace purchased for the Queen Marie Antoinette, he was sent to the Bastille. In England he met with greater success, pretending to wonderful skill in medicine, and to a knowledge of the occult sciences. At last he returned to Italy, and was seized at Rome, where he was condemned to perpetual imprisonment, and died in the castle of St. Leon, near Rome, 1795. B. at Palermo, 1743.—Balsamo's deceptions were mostly played upon the opulent and noble, whose credulity he excited by pretensions the most extravagant, and, in several cases, the most impious.

CAGNALA, Luigi, Marquis, kan-ya'-la, an eminent Italian architect, who was intended for the profession of the law, but whose tastes led him to devote himself to quite an opposite kind of study. In 1812 he was engaged by the government of Milan to check the progressive ruin of the sixteen Corinthian columns which form the chief remains of the ancient baths of Maximian. Previous to this, however, he had signalized himself by several designs. In 1807 the first stone was laid of the Arco della Pace, a beautiful arch, originally constructed of wood, to celebrate the marriage of the viceroy, Eugène Beauharnais, with the Princess Amelia of Bavaria, in 1806. Political changes put a stop, for some time, to the progress of this work; but it was finally completed by Francis I. of Austria. With the exception of the Arc de l'Etoile at Paris, it is the most magnificent structure of the kind of which modern times can boast. A great many other works, evincing a high order of genius and taste, were executed by Cagnala, who also held some official post in the civil government of Milan. B. at Milan, 1762; D. 1833.

CAGNANO, kan-ya'-no, a town of Naples, province of Capitanata, 25 miles from Foggia. Pop. 4,500.

CAGSANA, kag-sa'-na, a town of the Philippines, near the S. extremity of the island of Luzon. Pop. with district, 13,000.

CAHAWBA, KAHAWBA, or CABO, ka-haw'-ba, a river of the United States, in Alabama, which, after a southerly course, joins the Alabama, 120 miles below its forks, at the village of CAHAWBA, 70 miles from Tuscaloosa.

CAHIR, or CAHIR, ka'-her, the name of several unimportant places in Ireland.

CAHIRCIVREN, ka'-her-ki-veen, a town of Kerry, Ireland, 3 miles from Valentia. Pop. about 2,000.—Here Daniel O'Connell was born, 1775.

CAHOOS FALLS, ka-hoos', in Mohawk river, U.S., 3 miles above its mouth. The river is here about 1,000 feet wide; and the rock over which it pours extends across, in a direct line, from S.W. to N.E., and is 70 feet high. From the bridge, three quarters of a mile below, the falls are in full view.

CAHORS, ka'-or, a town of France, department of Lot, on the river Lot, here crossed by three bridges, 60 miles from Toulouse. It contains several manufactures, partly ratteens and other woollen stuffs, and partly fine linen; brandy and oil are also prepared. Pop. about 14,000.

CAHUSAC, Lewis de, ka-hoo'-sak, a French writer, who, in 1736, produced his tragedy of "Pharamond," which obtained great success. He was made secretary to the count de Clermont. B. at Montauban, 1700; D. at Paris, 1759.

CAIAPHAS, kai'-ă-fus, high priest of the Jews, who condemned Christ, and was afterwards dismissed his office by Vitellius, on which he put an end to his life.

CAICOS, kai'-kos, a small cluster of islands in the Atlantic, between the island of St. Domingo and the Bahamas. Lat. 21° N. Lon. 72° W. Pop. about 2,000, principally freed negroes, and engaged in the cultivation of sugar and cotton.

CAIFA, CAIPHA, or HAIFA, kai'-i-fa, a seaport-town of Palestine, situate on the S. side of the Bay of Acre, and 13 miles from Acre. It is irregularly built, and is defended by walls on the land side. Lat. 32° 44′ N. Lon. 35° 10′ E.

CAILLE, Nicholas Lewis de la, kail, an eminent mathematician, who became the friend of Cassini, and was associated with M. de Thury in projecting the meridian line. In 1739 he was appointed professor of mathematics in the college of Mazarine, and, in 1741, elected a member of the Academy of Sciences. In 1750 he went to the Cape of Good Hope, to examine the stars of the southern hemisphere. B. at Rumigny, 1713; D. at Paris, 1762.—His writings amount to several volumes, and are greatly esteemed, particularly his "Elements of Astronomy."

CAILLIAUD, kail'-le-o, a celebrated French geologist, who spent a considerable portion of his time in travelling. After visiting Holland, Italy, Greece, Turkey, and Sicily, he passed into Egypt, and, under the auspices of Mahomet Ali, explored a portion of the Nile. He afterwards went into Nubia, and discovered, on Mount Zabarah, the emerald-mines which had been worked in the reigns of the Ptolemies, and was enabled, by his own exertions, to transmit to the pasha ten pounds weight of the precious stones which he found in the vast excavations of the mountain. He visited Thebes, and returned to Paris in 1819; but, before the expiry of the same year, he once more set out for Egypt, to prosecute his travels. He now visited the remains of the temple of Ammon, other oases in the desert, and subsequently discovered Assour, above the confluence of the Tuccazze with the Nile. In 1822 he returned to Paris, and afterwards took up his residence in Nantes. The results of his travels and discoveries have been given to the world in various volumes. B. at Nantes, 1787.

CAIN, kain, the eldest son of our first parents, who slew his brother Abel and became an outcast, travelling east of Eden, where he built a city, and had a son, named Enoch. The Jewish tradition is, that he was slain by Lamech. There was a sect of Gnostics in the 2nd century, called Cainites, who entertained great respect for this murderer, and for another of equal reputation,—Judas Iscariot. Lived 130 A.M.—The murder of Abel suggested to Byron his "Mystery" of Cain, which he inscribed to Sir Walter Scott.

CAINAN, kai'-năn, or kai-i'-năn, 'possession' or 'purchaser,' a son of Enos; also a son of Arphaxad.

CAIRNAPLE, kairn'-a-ple, a mountain in the parish of Torphichen, Linlithgowshire, Scotland, 1,498 feet high.

CAIRNGORM, kairn'-gorm, a mountain of Scotland, 30 miles from Fort Augustus, and remarkable for its beautiful topazes, called "Cairngorm stones." Height, 4,095 feet.

CAIRO, or GRAND CAIRO, ki'-ro, the El Kahireh, 'the victorious,' of the Arabs, is the metropolis of modern Egypt. It is situate on the right bank of the Nile, 5 miles from the origin of the Delta, 120 miles from Alexandria, and 81 from Suez. The new city, which is properly called Cairo, stands at about a mile from the river, and is built on a slope of one of the lowest ridges of the mountain-chain of Jebel Mokkatam. It occupies an area of about 3 square miles, but its streets are, in general, winding and narrow. The widest street is one which goes the whole length of the city, but would be looked upon only as a lane in Europe. The others are so narrow, that a slight covering is frequently thrown across them, to exclude the rays of the sun. The city is divided into several distinct quarters, appropriated to the different races or religious sects who make up the inhabitants; and each has a gate, which is shut as soon as it is dark. There are several small streets, or squares, consisting wholly of shops. The interior of the houses is generally elegant and commodious. One of the features is a large hall, rising the whole height of the house, and covered with a small dome. Here everything is arranged with a view to coolness, as rain very seldom falls, although there are abundant dews. The floor is inlaid with coloured stone and earthenware, and fountains spring up into marble basins. The floor and walls are also suitably adorned. Of the public edifices, the mosques are the chief objects of architectural decoration. In the minarets, of which several are attached to every mosque, the Arabian architecture is preserved almost pure. These edifices are always neat, and generally elegant. The tombs of the Mamelukes, which are on the outside of the walls, are also beautiful. They are of white marble, and, for the most part, have carved, painted, or gilded domes. The obelisk of Heliopolis lies to the N.E. of the city; and in the island of Rhodah is the Nilometer, a column which indicates the height of the water during an inundation of the river. The castle of Cairo, built on a hill to the south of the city, is about a mile in circumference, but the greater part of it is in a dilapidated state. The grand saloon, now partly unroofed, is called Joseph's Hall; it is adorned with large and beautiful pillars of red granite. Above it, is a terrace, commanding a most delightful prospect of Cairo, the Pyramids, and all the surrounding country. One of the objects which has most attracted the attention of travellers, is the well in the castle, commonly called Joseph's Well. It is about 270 feet deep, and sunk in the solid rock. The passage down is by steps carried round the well, which have about two feet thickness of rock interposed between them and the well. The water never fails, and is raised by a wheel turned by oxen. On the whole, no city presents a greater variety of population than Cairo. It exhibits, as it were, an epitome of both the continents at whose limits it is placed. From Asia are seen Turks, Arabians, Persians, Jews, and Armenians; from Africa, Moors, Arabs, Berbers, Abyssinians, and negroes of every description. The commerce of Cairo is very extensive. Through it the various productions of Asia and the East Indies, and, partly also, those of Europe, are transmitted into the vast regions of interior Africa. Its communication in this direction is chiefly maintained by three caravans, which go to Sennaar, to Darfur, and to Mourzouk. From these places, particularly the last, it is extended to Nigritia and the other regions in the interior. The returns are made in gold, ivory, senna, gums, hides, and above all, in slaves. Specimens of almost all the native tribes of the continent are to be seen in the slave-market of Cairo. Boulac is the lower part of Cairo. Pop. including the suburbs of Old Cairo and Boulac, estimated at 250,000; comprising Mahometans, Copts, Jews, and foreigners. Lat. 30° 2′ 4″ N. Lon. 31° 15′ 36″ E.—Cairo was founded by the Arabs in 970, and its fortress was erected by Saladin in 1176. Till 1507 Cairo was the capital of the Egyptian sultans, but since that time, it has only been the residence of governors or pachas of the province in which it is situate. In 1798 it was taken by the French, and in 1801 by the British, who restored it to the Porte. Within its walls, on the 1st March, 1811, the massacre of the Mamelukes took place. Travellers by the overland route to India proceed by rail from Alexandria to Cairo and Suez, and thence by steamer down the Gulf of Suez and the Red Sea.

CAIRO, OLD, is situate about 2 miles to the south of New or Grand Cairo. It is mostly inhabited by Copts. The Jews have a synagogue in it, said to have been built 1,600 years ago. In Old Cairo are the granaries, which, like many other ancient buildings, are dignified with the name of Joseph's. They are merely square courts, surrounded by walls, 15 or 20 feet high, and without any roof. They are used for depositing the grain collected as tribute in Upper Egypt.

CAIRO, formerly CANTON, a post township of the United States, in Green county, New York, 10 miles from Catskill. Pop. about 3,000.—There is a village of the same name in Illinois, at the junction of the Mississippi and Ohio.

CAIRO, ka'-e-ro, a town of Piedmont, duchy of Montferrat, on the Bormida, 18 miles from Acqui. Pop. 3,500. —Here the French defeated the Austrians in 1794.

CAISTOR, kais'-tor, a town of Lincolnshire, 11 miles from Grimsby. Pop. 2,500.—It is near the Manchester and Lincoln Railway.—There are two parishes of the same name in the county of Norfolk.

CAITHNESS, kaith'-ness, the most northern county of Scotland, bounded on the N. by the Pentland frith, E. by the Murray frith and the German Ocean, and S. and W. by Sutherlandshire. Area, 616 square miles. Desc. Rugged and mountainous. There are many bays and promontories on the coast; and in some parts the shore is penetrated by deep caverns, which afford shelter to numerous seals. It contains a great number of small lakes, and its rivers are the Thurso, the Water of Wick, Water of Forss, and Water of Wester, none of which are navigable. The coast and the salmon river fisheries employ a great proportion of the inhabitants, and are the principal branch of trade. Cattle-rearing is pursued to a considerable extent, and agriculture has recently improved. Minerals. Limestone, shale, sandstone; and lead-ore has been found. Manf. Inconsiderable. Pop. about 40,000.—The early inhabitants of Caithness are supposed to have been Celts, who gave way to the Danes and Norwegians, whose sovereigns held dominion over this part of the country in the middle ages. There are many ruins of castles to be seen, and the traditions of war and bloodshed are still numerous amongst the inhabitants of the various localities in which these are to be found.

CAIUS, or KAY, John, kai-us, a physician, who was educated at Gonville-hall, Cambridge, but took his degree of M.D. at Padua, in 1541, where he was Greek lecturer and reader in physic. On his return to England, he was appointed physician to Edward VI., and continued to serve Queen Mary and Queen Elizabeth in the same capacity. B. at Norwich, 1510; D. at Cambridge, 1573. He left his estate for erecting Gonville-hall into a college, now called Gonville and Caius, and wrote the "History of Cambridge," and some medical works, which do honour to his learning.

CALABAR, OLD, kăl-ă-bar', a territory of Western Africa, situate on Cross river, which is of considerable magnitude, and forms, at its mouth, a species of estuary, opening into the Bight of Biafra. The principal towns on its banks are Acoono, Coono, and Omun, or Bosun, on an island of the same name. There are also places called Duke Town and Creek Town, the seats of missions, which have been greatly instrumental in promoting the civilization of the inhabitants.

CALABAR, NEW, a river and town, situate about 80 miles to the west of Old Calabar. The town of New Calabar is the centre of Dutch commerce in this country. It is situate on an island formed by two branches of the river. Lat. 4° 30′ N. Lon. 6° 30′ E.

CALABRIA, kă-lā'-bre-a (It. ka-la'-bre-a), the south part of the kingdom of Naples, forming a peninsula, separated from the island of Sicily by the Strait of Messina. It is bounded on the N. by the interior of the kingdom of Naples, N.E. by the Gulf of Tarento, and E. and S. by the Mediterranean. Ext. Its greatest length is about 165 miles, with a varying breadth of from 18 to 70. Area, 7,200 square miles. Desc. It is traversed in its whole length by the last ridge of the Apennines, which attain an elevation of from 3,000 to 4,000 feet above the level of the sea. A branch of the chain crosses the province in the direction of east and west, dividing it into Calabria Citra or Inferiore, to the north, and Calabria Ultra, or Alta, to the south. Both divisions are extremely fertile. Pro. Abundant; consisting of fruit, oil, wine, grain, rice, hemp, cotton, flax, wood, saffron, manna, honey, and silk. Minerals. Salt, sulphur, alabaster, talc, and rock crystal, with a few mines of lead, iron, and even of gold and silver. Pop. of Calabria Citra, 436,000; of Calabria Ultra, 320,000: united, 756,000. This country is subject to be visited by frightful earthquakes. In 1783, 40,000 of the inhabitants of the Calabrias and Sicily perished by one; and 20,000 more by causes resulting from it. To Francis II., son of Ferdinand II., king of Naples, Calabria gave the title of duke, previous to his accession to the throne, in May, 1859.

CALAH, kaï'-la, 'favourable,' or 'humility,' a city of Assyria.

CALAIS, kăl'-ais (Fr. kă'-lai), a seaport-town of France, situate in the department of the Pas-de-Calais, 19 miles from Boulogne, and 26 from Dover, to which it is opposite. It is surrounded with a moat and wall, defended by a very large citadel, and by means of sluices, the neighbouring country can be laid under water. The streets are wide and regular. Its form is that of an oblong square, and it has two gates, one towards the sea, the other towards the land. Most of the houses are built of brick. The harbour, which is not large, is defended by several small forts, and consists of a large quay, terminated by two long wooden piers which stretch into the sea. Manf. Hosiery, tulle, and bobbin-net. It has distilleries, carriage-factories, and shipbuilding-docks, and carries on a considerable traffic in brandy, Bordeaux wine, and cured fish. To England it exports eggs in considerable quantities. Pop. 11,000. Lat. of lighthouse, 50° 57′ 45″ N. Lon. 1° 51′ 18″ E.—Calais surrendered to Edward III. of England in 1347, and in 1558 was retaken by the duke de Guise. It has communication with Dover by submarine telegraph, also by steam with London, Ramsgate, and Dover. With St. Omar it is connected by canal.

CALAIS, two post-townships of the United States.—1. In Washington county, Vermont, 9 miles from Montpelier. Pop. about 2,000.—2. In Maine, on the river St. Croix, opposite St. Andrew's, in New Brunswick. Pop. 5,000.

CALAMIANES, kă-lai'-me-ai-nees, a group of islands in the Asiatic archipelago, situate N. and N.E. of Paragoa, the most westerly of the Philippines. Lat. 12° N. Lon. 120° 20′ E.

CALANUS, ka-lai'-nus, a celebrated Indian philosopher, one of the sect of the Gymnosophists. He followed Alexander in his Indian expedition, and having fallen ill in his 83rd year, ordered a pile to be raised, upon which he mounted, decked with flowers and garlands, in the presence of the whole Macedonian army. An officer asking him if he had nothing to say to Alexander, "No," answered he, "I shall meet him again in three months at Babylon." Alexander died within the time. Lived in the 4th century B.C.

CALAS, John, ka'-la, a Protestant merchant of Toulouse, who was accused, in 1761, of strangling his eldest son, Mark Antony, on account of his having secretly embraced the Roman Catholic religion. The young man was of an impatient and gloomy disposition, and in a fit of melancholy had hanged himself. His unfortunate father was put to the torture to make him confess, and finally, without any evidence, broken on the wheel, declaring his innocence to the last. The widow and children found a friend in the philosopher Voltaire, and, through his talent and energy, the proceedings were considered in the council, when Calas, in 1765, was pronounced innocent. B. 1698; suffered 1762.

CALATAGIRONE, ka-la'-tazh-e-ro'-nai, a town of Sicily, in the Val di Noto, 35 miles from Catania. Manf. Chiefly earthenware. Pop. 22,000.

CALATANAZOR, ka-la'-ta-na-thor, a town of Spain, in the province of Soria, and 10 miles from the town of the same name. Pop. 1,200. This place is celebrated as the scene of the defeat of Almanzor by the Christians, in 1001, when 50,000 Moors perished.

CALATAYUD, ka-la'-ta-yood, a town of Spain, in the province of Aragon, on the Xalon, 50 miles from Saragossa. It contains several squares and streets, some handsome edifices, and there are agreeable promenades in the skirts of the town. Manf. Leather, woollens, paper, and soap. Pop. 7,300.—Ayoub, a Moorish captain, founded this place in the 8th century, and from him it takes its name, cal-a't Ayoub,—'the castle of Ayoub.' Alphonso of Aragon drove out the Moors in 1118, and finally, in 1362, the king of Castile took possession.

CALAUREA, or CALAURIA, kăl-au-ree'-a, an island near Trœzene, in the Bay of Argos, where was the tomb of Demosthenes, who fled hither from the persecutions of Antipater, and poisoned himself, 322 B.C.

CALAVERAS, kăl-u-veer'-as, a county of the United States, in the N. of Central California. Area, 3,000 square miles. It has extensive gold-mining works. Pop. about 25,000.

CALCA, kal'-ka, a province of Peru, in the department of Cuzco, and a few miles from the town of that name. Desc. Undulating, with a fertile soil, yielding wheat, maize, and sugar, and watered by the Beni or Paro, the Urubamba, and the Yambari.

CALCAGNINI, Celio, kal'-kan-ye'-ne, a learned Italian, who served in the imperial army some time, and was employed in several embassies and other honourable commissions. At last he became professor of belles-lettres at Ferrara, and wrote several works, particularly on the Roman antiquities, which show great erudition. He also asserted the motion of the earth, before Copernicus published his system. B. at Ferrara, 1579; D. 1640.

CALCAR, John de, an eminent painter, a disciple of Titian. His pictures are hardly to be distinguished from those of that master. B. at Calcar, Prussia, 1499; D. at Naples, 1547. The portraits in Vasari's "Lives of Painters and Sculptors" are by him.

CALCASIU, kal'-ka-she(r), a river of Louisiana, U.S., entering the Gulf of Mexico. Also a parish of the United States, in Louisiana. Pop. 1,000, of whom a fourth are slaves.

CALCHAS, kăl'-kăs, a celebrated soothsayer, son of Thestor. He accompanied the Greeks to Troy, in the office of high priest, and prophesied the principal events which were destined to take place regarding that doomed city. He had received the power of divination from Apollo, and was informed that as soon as he found a man more skilled than himself, he must perish. This happened near Colophon, after the Trojan war. He was unable to tell how many figs were on the branches of a certain tree; and when Mopsus mentioned the exact number, Calchas died through grief. Lived in the 12th century B.C.

CALCUTTA, kăl-kut'-ta, a city of Bengal, and the capital of British India, standing on the E. bank of the Hooghly river, at the distance of 100 miles from the Bay of Bengal. It takes its name from Caly, the Hindoo goddess of time, and Cutta, 'a house or temple,' which stood in the village of Caly Cutta. In the vicinity of the villages of Chuttanutty and Gobindpore, in the year 1690, the English founded a factory, by virtue of a firman granted by Aurungzebe; and in the year 1696, in consequence of a rebellion in Bengal, they were allowed to fortify it. In 1698, Prince Azeen Ooshan, grandson of the emperor Aurungzebe, granted the company a perpetual lease of these villages with Caly Cutta, and in the subsequent year, the factory was named Fort William, in compliment to William III. This is the largest fortress in India, and was constructed at a cost of £2,000,000. It is an irregular octagon, and contains handsome barracks, mounts 620 guns, and has an armoury of 80,000 stand of arms. Opposite the fort, at the distance of three quarters of a mile, stands the government-house or palace, built by Lord Wellesley; in a line with which runs a row of superb houses, inhabited by the principal civil servants. At right angles from this, and eastward of the government-house, there have been erected a number of handsome houses, with colonnaded fronts and flat roofs, each house being surrounded by a garden or grass-plot, and commanding a view of the fort, esplanade, and race-grounds. On the right hand of the government-house are the treasury and court of justice. The town, which comprises two sections, a native and a European, is inhabited by merchants of all the countries of the world. It has an extensive square, with a large tank or pond of fresh water, called the Lall Diggy, and sixty feet deep. One side of this square is occupied by the writers' buildings, where all the junior civil servants of the company have apartments, whilst on the other side stands the college. On the third side of the square, there are some handsome shops and houses, occupied by merchants and others engaged in business. At the N.W. corner of the square is the obelisk, which commemorates the capture of the fort; and the apartment known as the "Black Hole of Calcutta" is now used as a store-room. The principal public buildings, besides those mentioned, are the town-hall, the mint, a cathedral, numerous Protestant churches, Roman Catholic chapels, an Arminian church, a Mahometan college, several mosques, and a number of Hindoo temples. Opposite to the town, the Hooghly is a mile wide, and there is good anchorage for ships of 500 tons burden, but the larger vessels are obliged to stop at Diamond Harbour, about 50 miles down the river. There are several shipbuilding-docks, and its trade is very extensive, as it monopolizes nearly the whole of the interior commerce of Bengal. It is the seat of the metropolitan, who has the title of bishop of Calcutta, with a salary fixed by act of parliament at £5,000 per annum. Pop. 700,000. Lat. of Fort William, 22° 35′ N. Lon. 88° 30′ E.—The mutiny of the sepoys, which broke out in 1857, and was finally suppressed in 1859, imparted to Calcutta, as the capital of the Indian empire, an interest much greater than it had ever before obtained in the eyes of the civilized world. The consequence of this was innumerable descriptions of it from writers of every variety; and among these, one from the special correspondent of the Times newspaper. In one of the letters of this authority we find it stated, that "you must go to the top of the Auchterlony monument to have any notion of the size of this city. It is quite five miles long, and in some parts three miles broad; nor can the population—I speak after talking the matter over with those best able to form a judgment—be less than 700,000 souls. There is Fort William, to be sure; but in all other respects it is the most defenceless city in the world." Although it is incompatible with the design of this work to admit descriptions which are not consistent with the greatest possible brevity, still the following, from the same writer, may be admitted to show the nature of the attention which an Englishman must be prepared to receive the moment he sets foot in the capital of a land where his countrymen have carried all before them by their courage and their genius:—"When you land at Calcutta, you are in another world. You may fancy yourself, if you please, a grand seigneur, reigning in the hearts of a devoted people, whose affections you have secured by a lifetime of beneficent acts. You are scarcely housed before you are waited upon by a deputation of your subjects, with their hands upon their lips and their bodies bent in lowly obeisance. Their highest aspiration is to have the honour of becoming your highness's domestic slaves. That Hindoo, whose large deep eyes are cast earthwards, and who, in his dress of irreproachable whiteness, is waiting patiently till your notice shall warm him into life, desires only to be your bearer, the keeper of your wardrobe, and your tireman. The rather taller Mussulman, whose salaam is a little less lowly, has placed all his hopes upon becoming your kitmutgar,—to wait upon you at table, to bring you cow's flesh, aye, and even swine's flesh, if your grace should delight in such uncleanliness. The three more loosely-clad lords of creation who are adoring you, hesitate to promise themselves the happiness of swinging your punkah. Relieving each other every four hours, they will employ all their energies day and night, while you sleep and while you wake, in passing cool air over your heated brow. Four other men, whose costume is still more scanty, express their devotion by the humility of their prostrations. Their ambition is to carry about your honoured corporation; say you are 20 stone weight, still they will bear you about under the hot sun at a smart trot, your honour reclining all the while in a huge box, like a midshipman's chest, with sliding panels to it, reading, smoking, or sleeping, as you list,— and you may gratify the whole of these expectants at the expense of something less than £2 per week."

CALDAS, kal'-das, several small towns of Portugal, celebrated for baths and medicinal springs. Also two small towns of Spain.

CALDECOT, or CALDECOTE, kăl'-de-kot, the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 500.

CALDER, kal'-der, two rivers of England; one rising near Burnley, on the borders of Lancashire, and falling into the Aire, 2 miles from Pontefract; the other rising near the former, and falling into the Ribble, near Whalley.

CALDER, the name of several unimportant parishes and places in Scotland.

CALDERON DE LA BARCA, Don Pedro, kal'-dai-rone, a celebrated Spanish soldier, priest, and dramatic writer, who wrote his first piece at the age of fourteen. He was a private soldier at twenty-five, but continued to pursue poesy with great success. Philip IV. recognizing his great talents, called him to the court, bestowed on him his patronage, and provided the necessary funds for the representation of his plays. He subsequently entered the church, becoming canon of Toledo. His plays were printed at Madrid, in 9 vols. 4to, 1689. B. at Madrid, 1600; D. 1681.

CALDERONE, kal'-de-ro'-nai, three small islands in the Mediterranean, 15 miles from Crete.

CALDEWGATE, kăl'-du-gait, a suburb of Carlisle, in the county of Cumberland. Pop. about 8,000.—It is intersected by the Carlisle and Newcastle Railway.

CALDIERO, kal'-de-air'-o, a village of N. Italy, 7 miles from Verona, once celebrated for its thermal springs. Pop. 1,600.—Here, just before the battle of Arcola, the French, under Napoleon I., were repulsed by the Austrians under Alvinzi, in 1796, and in 1805 were beaten under Massena, by the archduke Charles.

CALDWELL, kawld'-well, the name of four fertile counties in the United States. 1. In North Carolina. Area, 150 square miles. Pop. 7,000, of whom a fourth are slaves. 2. In Kentucky. Area, 700 square miles. Pop. 14,000, of whom a fourth are slaves. 3. In Missouri. Area, 435 square miles. Pop. 3,000, of whom one third are slaves. 4. In Central Texas. Area, 540 square miles. Pop. 1,000, of whom a fifth are slaves.

CALDY, kal'-de, an island off the coast of N. Wales, 2 miles from Tenby. Area, 611 acres. Pop. 100.—It has a lighthouse 210 feet high.

CALEB, kai'-leb, one of the Hebrews sent by Joshua to view the land of Canaan, of which he gave a faithful description, and thereby raised the spirits of the people. He possessed the country of Hebron, and died at the age of 114. Lived in the 15th century B.C.

CALED, or KHALED, kai'-led, one of the bravest of Mahomet's captains. He had at first taken part against him, and had contributed to the victory of Ohod, where the prophet had been defeated. In 630, however (the 8th year of the Hegira), he embraced the new religion, and was chiefly instrumental in the conquest of Syria, Mahomet conferring on him the title of the Sword of God. D. 642.

CALEDONIA, kăl-e-do'-ne-a, the ancient name of that part of Great Britain now called Scotland. Various etymologies have been assigned to it. Camden derives it from the Celtic caled, 'hard,' as allusive to the uncivilized state of the country; Buchanan obtains it from the Scottish calden, 'a hazel-tree;' and others compound it of the two British words Cail dun, 'Gauls of the mountains,' or Gael doch, 'Gaul district.' Caledonia comprehended all those countries which lay to the north of the Forth and Clyde. The large limbs, red hair, and blue eyes of its inhabitants, according to Tacitus, seemed to assert a Germanic extraction. It was never reduced to subjection by the Romans, although Agricola penetrated to the river Tay, and Severus into the very heart of the country.

CALEDONIA, a county of Vermont, bounded N. by

Essex county, E. by Connecticut river, S. by Orange county, W. by Washington and Orleans counties. Area, 650 square miles. Desc. Fertile and well watered, yielding oats, potatoes, and maple sugar. Minerals. Limestone and granite, and it has sulphur-springs. Pop. 25,000.—Several villages in the United States have this name.

CALEDONIA, a post-township of the United States, in Genesee county, New York, on Genesee river, 17 miles from Batavia, chiefly settled by emigrants from Scotland. Pop. 2,000.—The Big Springs here are a curiosity. They discharge water enough, at all seasons, to supply numerous mills.

CALEDONIA, NEW, an island of the S. Pacific Ocean, supposed to be called Balade by the inhabitants. Ext. About 220 miles long, by about 30 broad. It is inhabited by Papuan savages. Lat. between 19° 37′ and 22° 30′ S. Lon. between 163° 37′ and 167° 14′ E.—In 1774 this island was discovered by Captain Cook. The French took possession of it and its dependency, the Isle of Pines, in 1853.

CALEDONIAN CANAL, THE, connects the North and Irish seas, extending from the Moray Firth to Loch Eil. Length, 60 miles.—This canal was begun in 1805, and opened in 1822. It passes through lochs Ness, Oich, and Lochy.

CALENTIUS, Elisius, kă-len'-she-us, an Italian writer, who was tutor to the son of Ferdinand II., king of Naples. B. in Apulia, about 1450; D. 1503.—He is known to fame by his poem of "The Battle between the Frogs and Mice," in imitation of Homer, which was printed in 1738, at Rouen.

CALEPINO, or DA CALEPIO, Ambrose, kal'-lai-pe'-no, a learned Italian, descended from a noble family. He embraced the monastic habit of the Augustines, and spent all his life in the compilation of a dictionary of the Latin, Italian, and other languages. The first edition of this appeared in 1503, and became very famous; and, after passing through a great number of editions, swelled, in 1681, to two volumes folio. B. at Bergamo, 1435; D. blind, in 1511.

CALF OF MAN, a small island in the Irish Sea, near the Isle of Man. Pop. 40. Lat. of lighthouse, 54° 3′ N. Lon. 4° 49′ W.

CALHOUN, kal-hoon', two counties of the United States. 1. In Michigan. Area, 720 square miles. Desc. Fertile, and intersected by the Michigan Central Railway. Pop. 20,000.—2. In Illinois. Area, 260 square miles. Pop. 4,000.

CALHOUN, John Caldwell, a distinguished American statesman, who, during a period of forty years, rendered faithful services to the Union, in the various capacities of representative, secretary of war, vice-president, and senator. B. in Abbeville district, South Carolina, 1782; D. at Washington, 1850.—The works of this statesman were published in 1853-4, in 6 vols. 8vo.

CALI, or SANTIAGO DE CALI, ka'-le, a city of Popayan, in Quito, founded in 1537. Pop. 4,000. Lat. 3° 24′ S. Lon. 76° 23′ W.

CALIANO, kal'-e-a'-no, a town of the Tyrol, Austria, 10 miles from Trent. It stands on the left bank of the Adige, where the Venetians were defeated by the Austrians, in 1487.

CALICUT, kil'-i-kut, a district of Hindostan, in the province of Malabar. It extends 60 or 70 miles along the coast, but its breadth is inconsiderable. Its principal town is of the same name, and was formerly a magnificent and extensive city, but it is now comparatively inconsiderable. It stands on the Indian Ocean, about 100 miles from Seringapatam. The port is frequented by vessels from Arabia and the Red Sea. Exp. Teak, sandal-wood, cocoa-nuts, cordage, pepper, and wax. Pop. estimated at 25,000. Lat. 11° 15′ N. Lon. 75° 52′ E.—This was the first place in India at which Vasco de Gama touched, in 1498.

CALIDASA, kal'-le-da'-sa, a much-admired Indian poet. Tradition pronounces him one of the nine gems who lived in the court of King Vicramaditya. He wrote several poems, which display a remarkable genius. His "Sacuntala" was translated by Sir William Jones, and was the first work which made his name known to Europeans. Supposed to have flourished under the reign of Vicramaditya II., in the 5th century.

CALIFORNIA, LOWER, or OLD, kăl'-i-for'-ne-a, a province of Mexico, or New Spain. It is united on the N. to the continent of N. America, from which it is separated on the E. by the Gulf of California, and is bounded on the W. by the Pacific Ocean. Ext. Nearly 750 miles long, and in different places 30, 60, 90, and 120 miles broad. Area, 60,000 square miles. Desc. A chain of mountains runs through the centre of this peninsula, whose greatest elevation is from 4,500 to 4,900 feet above the level of the sea. Wherever the soil is watered by springs, it is of singular fertility; but in general the ground is uneven, rough, and barren, full of mountainous ridges, and stony and sandy places, and deficient in moisture. It abounds with mules, horses, cattle, swine, goats, and sheep. Pop. probably 8,000, of whom one half are Indians. Lat. extending from Cape San Lucas, 22° 45′ N., to the northern extremity of the gulf, 32° N. Lon. 109° 53′ W. This country was discovered by Hernando de Grixalva in 1534, but was not known to be a peninsula till 1541.

CALIFORNIA, UPPER, or NEW, formerly a province of Mexico, or New Spain, but now one of the United States of N. America. It is bounded on the N. by Oregon, on the E. by Utah, on the S. by Lower California, and on the W. by the Pacific Ocean. Area, 188,981 square miles. Bays. The San Francisco, Humboldt, Monterry, Pelican, and San Diego. The San Francisco is 70 miles long, with an average breadth of 8. Desc. The soil is well watered and fertile, and it is one of the most picturesque countries which can well be imagined. Two ranges of mountains, the Sierra Nevada and the Coast Range, traverse it from north-west to south-east, and have, between them, the magnificent valley of the Sacramento and the Joaquin. The loftiest known peak is the Shasta, which attains an elevation of 14,400 feet, and is covered with perpetual snow. Rivers. The Sacramento and the San Joaquin, with their tributaries. The Sacramento has its rise in the northern extremity of the valley of the same name, the principal of its streams issuing from Mount Shasta, or some of its spurs. Lakes. Bonpland, Clear, Owen, Keru, and Tulare. Climate. Genial and mild. The seasons may be considered as consisting of two, a dry and a wet, there being no frost, and rarely snow, except on the mountains. Zoology. Bears, wolves, foxes, otters, wild cats, beavers, antelopes, hares, and rabbits. There are large herds of wild horses, cattle, deer, and elks browsing on the slopes of the hills; mules, goats, sheep, and hogs also are plentiful. Of birds, the turkey, quail, buzzard, and woodpecker are common; whilst ducks, geese, and cranes are numerous. There are many varieties of snakes; among which the rattlesnake may be mentioned. Lizards and scorpions are found, and mosquitoes are innumerable. Forests. Extensive; consisting chiefly of the pine and the oak. Pro. Rice, maize, the usual cereals, tobacco, and, with the exception of cotton, nearly all the plants which grow in the warmer parts of the United States; grapes, peaches, and mostly all the kinds of fruit which belong to a moderately warm climate. Onions, tomatoes, melons, and olives are largely cultivated. Minerals. Important; comprising gold, silver, quicksilver, lead, iron, copper, coal, granite, marble, and diamonds. Gold is found in great abundance, and was, in 1848, accidentally discovered in New Helvetia, on the banks of the Sacramento. Manf. Unimportant. Pop. The "California State Register" for 1859 gives the following distributive estimate:—Americans, 365,315; French, 15,000; English, 2,000; Irish, 10,000; Germans, 10,000; Mexicans, 15,000; various, 15,000; Chinese, 38,000; negroes, 2,000; Indians, 65,000; total, 538,000. Lat. between 32° and 42° N. Lon. Eastern boundary, 120° W. In 1850, California was admitted into the union of the States of N. America. (See ALBION, NEW.)

CALIFORNIA, GULF OF, a gulf of the Pacific Ocean, on the W. coast of N. America, formerly celebrated for its pearl-fisheries, which, however, have greatly fallen off. It is 700 miles long, with a breadth varying between 45 and 150. Lat. between 23° and 32° 30′ N.

CALIGULA, C., kă-lig'-u-la, a Roman emperor, who received this surname from his wearing in the camp the caliga, a kind of shoe in use among the common soldiers. He was son of Germanicus, by Agrippina, and grandson to Tiberius. During the first eight months of his reign, Rome was governed with mildness; but he soon displayed his true character, and became proud, wanton, and cruel. He built a temple to himself, and ordered his head to be placed on the images of the gods, while he wished to imitate the thunders and powers of Jupiter. The statues of all great men were removed, and he appeared in public places in the most indecent manner, encouraged roguery, committed, himself, the worst of crimes, and established public places of prostitution. He often amused himself with putting innocent people to death, and attempted to famish Rome, by a monopoly of corn. He was pleased with the greatest disasters which befell his subjects, and often wished the Romans had but one head, that he might strike it off at a blow. Wild beasts were constantly fed in his palace with human victims; and, as if to insult the feelings and the dignity of fallen Rome, a favourite horse was made high priest and consul, and kept in marble apartments, adorned with the most valuable trappings and pearls which the Roman empire could furnish. In consequence of his numerous acts of tyranny, a conspiracy was formed against him, and he was murdered, 41. B. 12. It has been said that Caligula wrote a treatise on rhetoric; but his estimate of learning may be rather obtained from his attempts to destroy the writings of Homer and Virgil.

CALIPPUS, kă-lip'-pus, a mathematician of Cyzicus, famous for having corrected the cycle or period of nineteen years, invented by Meton, for the purpose of showing the correspondence in point of time between the revolutions of the sun and moon, and which is sometimes called the Calippic period. Lived 330 B.C.

CALIXTUS I., kă-lix'-tus, pope and saint, succeeded Zephyrinus in 219, and suffered martyrdom in 222.

CALIXTUS II. was the son of the count of Burgundy, and became archbishop of Vienna in 1083, and pope in 1119. D. 1124.

CALIXTUS III. was a native of Xativa, in Spain, elected pope in 1455. D. 1458.—His character was respectable for learning, moderation, and piety.

CALLAN, kăl'-lan, a town and parish of Kilkenny, Ireland. Area of parish, 5,631 acres. Pop. of parish, about 7,000; of town, 2,500. The church, once a stately fabric, is now nearly in ruins.

CALLANDER, kăl'-an-der, a village and parish of Perthshire, Scotland, 16 miles from Stirling. Pop. 2,300.—This village stands nearly at the foot of the mountain Benledi, and is about 10 miles from the romantic scenery of the Trossachs, through which the tourist passes en route from Stirling to Loch Katrine, the scene of Sir Walter Scott's "Lady of the Lake."

CALLAO, kal-la'-o, or kal-ya'-o, a fortified seaport of Peru, situate on a river of the same name, 6 miles from Lima. The houses are generally built of slight materials; for, from the fact of its never raining in this country, stone houses are unnecessary. Pop. 20,000. Lat. 12° 8. Lon. 77° 13' 7" W.—Earthquakes are frequent here. The most remarkable happened in 1746, when three fourths of Lima was laid in ruins, and Callao was entirely demolished. Three thousand persons perished in the catastrophe.

CALLAO, a small island of further India, in the China Sea. It is 16 miles from the mouth of the Fai-Fo river. Area, 10 square miles. Lat. 15° 48' N. Lon. 108° 30' E.

CALLAS, kal'-la, a town of France, in Provence, 5 miles from Draguignan. Pop. 2,300.

CALLAWAY, kăl'-la-wai, two counties of the United States.—1. In Kentucky. Area, 450 square miles. Pop. about 9,000, of whom 100 are slaves. 2. In Missouri. Area, 743 square miles. Pop. about 15,000, of whom a fourth are slaves.

CALLCOTT, Sir Augustus Wall, R.A., kăl'-kot, an eminent landscape-painter, and brother of the illustrious musical composer. In 1810 he was elected a member of the Royal Academy, and, for his diploma picture, presented a fine painting called "Morning." He subsequently produced "Evening," "Italy," "The Ferry," "Returning from Market," "Waiting for the Passage-Boat," and several others, which are generally known from their having been engraved. He also executed several marine subjects, and, in 1833, exhibited his beautiful picture called "Harvest in the Highlands," which was engraved by Wilmore for the subscribers to the Art Union for 1836. In 1837 he exhibited his "Raffaele and Fornarina," and, in 1840, "Milton dictating to his Daughters." This was a failure. Indeed, Callcott was not calculated to excel in figure-painting, of which, perhaps, he himself was fully aware, as he allowed E. Landseer to paint the figures in his "Harvest in the Highlands." In landscape, however, he was great; and, by his friends, has been called the English Claude. B. at Kensington, 1779; D. in the same place, 1844.—He was knighted by Queen Victoria in 1837.

CALLCOTT, John Wall, one of the most distinguished composers in the British school of music. In 1785, when only nineteen years of age, he carried off three out of the four gold medals offered as prizes by the Catch Club. Among his compositions in this competitorship, was his fine piece, "Oh, sovereign of the willing soul!" In 1790 he became musical doctor at Oxford; and, in 1805, produced his "Musical Grammar." Subsequently, his mind gave way under excess of study, and the excitement which musical composition often creates; not, however, until he had produced an immense number of original and highly-esteemed works. B. at Kensington, 1766; D. 1821.—He left many MS. volumes, intended as materials for a comprehensive musical dictionary.

CALLE, LA, kal, a seaport on the coast of Algiers, 75 miles from Tunis. Pop. 400.—This is the seat of the French coral-fishery.

CALLICRATIDAS, kăl'-li-krăt'-i-das, a Spartan general, who succeeded Lysander in the command of the Lacedæmonian fleet. He took Methymna, and blockaded Conon, in Mitylene, but was conquered and killed the same year by the Athenians, at Arginusæ. Lived in the 4th century B.C.

CALLIMACHUS, kăl-lim'-ă-kus, a Greek poet and historian, who had the charge of the library of Ptolemy Philadelphus. He was tutor of Apollonius, the author of the "Argonautica." B. at Cyrene, and flourished in the 3rd century B.C.

CALLIMACHUS, an architect, who invented the capital so much admired in the Corinthian order of Grecian architecture. The occasion of the discovery is said to have been this:—A plant of acanthus being placed upon the tomb of a Corinthian lady, spread its leaves over the basket in so graceful a manner, that the architect adopted it as a suitable ornament for his pillars. Lived in the 6th century B.C.

CALLINGER, kal'-lin-jer, a strong and celebrated fortress of Hindostan, and capital of a district of the same name, in the presidency of Bengal. It is built of stone, on the top of a mountain, 1,200 feet above the neighbouring plains. It is 5 miles in circuit, and contains several good ponds of water, a number of Hindoo temples, and in 1812 was captured by the British. Lat. 24° 58' N. Lon. 80° 25' E.

CALLINGTON, or KELLINGTON, a town and parish of Cornwall, 10 miles from Launceston. Area of parish, 2,600 acres. Pop. 2,200.—In its neighbourhood are tin and copper mines.

CALLINICUS, kăl-lin'-i-kus, an ancient architect, who invented the Greek fire, and communicated his secret to the emperor Constantine Pogonat, who made use of it to burn the Saracen fleet at Cyzicus, in 673. B. at Heliopolis, Egypt.—The knowledge of this composition was afterwards lost; but a Frenchman, in Louis XV.'s reign, again discovered it; and the king, in 1756, bought the secret, in order to bury so frightful a knowledge in oblivion.

CALLINUS, kal-li'-nus, an orator of Ephesus, who is said to have invented elegiac poetry. Flourished about the 8th century B.C.

CALLIOPE, kăl-li'-o-pe, the muse of eloquence and heroic poetry. The poets call her the mother of Orpheus, and of the Corybantes and Sirenes. She was represented as a young girl, with a majestic appearance, crowned with laurel, holding in one hand a trumpet, and in the other an epic poem.

CALLIRRHOE, kal-lir'-ro-e, a name common in classic fable. The best known is the daughter of the river Achelous. She married Alcmæon, and became the involuntary cause of his death, in asking for the fatal necklace of Eriphyle. (See ALCMÆON.)

CALLISTHENES, kăl-lis'-the-nees, a Greek philosopher, disciple and grandson of Aristotle, who followed Alexander in his Asiatic expedition. He refused to acknowledge the alleged divinity of this hero, and even had the misfortune to displease him by his railleries. He was afterwards accused of conspiracy, and confined, it is said, in an iron cage. Put to death at Cariatæ, in Bactriana, 328 B.C. B. 365 B.C.—None of his writings are extant.

CALLOT, Jacques, kal'-lo, a celebrated draughtsman, painter, and engraver. He learnt his art at Rome, whither he went against the wishes of his family, who were noble. He acquired a great reputation, and his engravings are highly valued. B. at Nancy, 1593; D. at Florence, 1635.—After the taking of his birthplace by Louis XII., in 1633, he refused to commemorate the event with his graver. Callot's works show his great genius in the representation of popular and grotesque subjects, and in caricaturing the vices and follies of mankind.

CALMAR, or KALMAR, kal'-mar, a fortified town of Sweden, and the capital of a province, on the sound or strait of the same name, in the Baltic, opposite the island of Oland. Outside the town stands the castle. It is mostly built of wood, and is deemed one of the strongest in Sweden, but is now converted into a house of correction. The harbour is small, but secure. The commerce consists in the export of timber, alum, tar, and hemp. Pop. 6,000.—Calmar is the see of a bishop, has a fine cathedral church, an academy, and a dockyard. In 1397, the treaty of Calmar, by which Denmark, Norway, and Sweden were united, was signed here.

CALMAR, or KALMAR, a maritime province of Sweden, extending along its eastern coast, and bounded by the Baltic on the E., and by the provinces of Linkoping, Jonkoping, Carlskrona, and Wexio on the land side. Area, including the island of Oland, 4,258 square miles. Desc. Undulating, especially in the N., with numerous lakes. Its coasts are indented with many bays, and the country produces corn, flax, timber, and iron. It also rears numerous herds of cattle. Pop. about 205,000. Lat. between 56° 20′ and 58° 20′ N. Lon. between 15° 30′ and 17° E.

CALMET, Augustin, kal'-met (Fr. kal'-mai), a learned and laborious French Benedictine, who wrote a "Literal Commentary upon all the Books of the Scripture," 23 vols. 4to; a "History of the Old and New Testament," 4 vols. 4to; an "Historical, Critical, and Chronological Dictionary of the Bible;" a "Universal History," 15 vols. 4to; and other learned works. B. in Lorraine, 1672; D. abbot of Senones, 1757.

CALMINA, kal-me'-na, a large town of Dahomey, in Africa, 15 miles from Abomey. Pop. 15,000.

CALMUCKS, KALMUCKS, or ELANTHES, kal'-mucks, a people of Mongol extraction, inhabiting various portions of Central Asia, but more especially the W. part of Mongolia, extending from Asiatic Russia to China proper. Our knowledge both of the people and the country is still imperfect.

CALNE, kan, a town and parish of Wiltshire, 7 miles from Devizes. The church is a large structure, with a handsome square tower at the north-east end; and there are places of worship for other denominations. It has, besides, a free-school, town-hall, union-workhouse, and woollen manufactories. Pop. 5,300.—The town is reached by a branch of the Wiltshire and Berkshire Canal.

CALNEH, kal'-ne, 'our consummation,' a city in the land of Shinar.

CALOMARDE, Francisco Tadeo, kal'-o-mar'-dai, the leading Spanish minister for ten years under Ferdinand VII., studied for the law, and, through his marriage with the daughter of Beltran, physician to Godoy, the favourite of Ferdinand, he was immediately brought into prominent notice. He has the blame of most of the tyrannical measures which passed in Spain between 1823 and 1833, although, no doubt, many of them belong to Ferdinand, whose malignant passions stimulated him to the adoption of absolutist principles in their sternest form. On the expected death of Ferdinand, he paid his court to Don Carlos; but his attentions were too precipitate, and he was forced to flee his country in disgrace. He made his escape in disguise to France, but returned to Spain on the death of the king. He then offered his services to Don Carlos, but they were rejected, when he returned to France, where he passed the remainder of his life, principally at Toulouse. B. at Villel, in Lower Aragon, 1773; D. at Toulouse, 1842.

CALONNE, Charles Alexander de, ka'-lon, a French statesman, who succeeded Necker, in 1783, as comptroller general of the finances, and found not a single crown in the treasury. In this office he continued till 1787. During this period he maintained the public credit by a punctuality, till then unknown in the payments of the royal treasury, though he found it drained to the lowest ebb. He laboured with unwearied assiduity to restore the equipoise between the annual income and expenditure, and to provide a supply for the emergencies of the state, without increasing the burthens of the people. For this purpose he advised the king to revive the ancient usage of convening national assemblies of the "notables," to whom he proposed the bold project of suppressing the pecuniary privileges and exemptions of the nobility, clergy, and magistracy. This measure alarmed those powerful bodies, and M. de Calonne found it necessary to retire to England, where he wrote two elegant defences of himself,—his "Requête au Roi," and "Réponse à l'Ecrit de M. Necker." He subsequently returned to Paris, but did not long survive that event. B. at Douay, 1734; D. at Paris, 1802.—Besides the above, he wrote several other works; among which was his essay entitled "De l'État de la France présent et à venir," 1790, 8vo, in which he predicted the disasters which afterwards befell his unhappy country.

CALPE, kal'-pe, a lofty mountain in the most southern part of Spain, opposite to Mount Abyla, on the African coast. These two mountains were called the Pillars of Hercules. It is the modern Gibraltar.

CALPENTYN, kal-pen'-tin, a long narrow peninsula on the W. coast of Ceylon, with a fort near its northern extremity. Lat. 8° 14′ N. Lon. 79° 53′ E.—During the N.E. monsoon this peninsula becomes an island.

CALPURNIA, kal-pur'-ne-a, a daughter of L. Piso, and the fourth wife of Julius Cæsar. The night previous to her husband's murder, she dreamed that the roof of her house had fallen, and that he had been stabbed in her arms. On that account she attempted, but in vain, to detain him at home. Lived in the first century B.C.—It is to Calpurnia that Shakspeare makes Cæsar say, when she would dissuade him from going to the Capitol,—

> "Cowards die many times before their deaths;
> The valiant never taste of death but once."

CALSTOCK, kal'-stok, a parish of Cornwall, 5 miles from Callington. Area, 5,450 acres. Pop. 4,600.

CALTANISETTA, kal'-ta-ne-set'-ta, a city of Sicily, situate in a valley of the same name, 28 miles from Girgenti. The neighbouring country is highly fertile, and near the town are sulphur-works and mineral springs. Pop. about 17,000.

CALTONICA, kal-to'-ne-ka, a town of Sicily, 15 miles from Girgenti. Pop. 7,300. In its vicinity are sulphur-works.

CALVADOS, kal-va'-dos, a maritime department of France, forming an important part of Lower Normandy, and taking its name from a dangerous ridge of rocks on the coast. It is bounded on the E. by the department Eure, W. by La Manche, S. by Orne, and N. by the English Channel. Area, 2,200 square miles. Desc. Undulating, and varied with fertile valleys and beautiful plains. The department is well watered, and fruitful in the highest degree; producing corn and fruit in abundance, besides hemp and lint, and large quantities of timber. Pasturage being abundant, cattle, sheep, and horses are reared. The trade of fish-curing is pursued along the coast. Minerals. Coal, gray marble, and freestone are mined and quarried. Manf. Woollen and cotton stuffs, lace, yarn, jewellery, cutlery, porcelain, and paper. Pop. about 500,000.

CALVART, Denis, kal'-var, a Flemish painter, who opened a school for artists at Bologna, where he had amongst his pupils, Guido, Albano, and Domenichino. B. at Antwerp, 1565; D. at Bologna, 1619.

CALVARY, kal'-vā-re, 'the place of a skull,' a hill near Jerusalem, where criminals were crucified, and the spot where Christ suffered.

CALVENTURA ISLANDS, kal-ven-too'-ra, two groups of small islands in the Bay of Bengal, off the E. coast of Burmah. Lat. 16° 55′ N. Lon. 94° 14′ E.

CALVERLY, kal'-ver-le, a parish in the W. Riding of Yorkshire, 6 miles from Leeds. Area, 8,390 acres. Pop. including the township of Pudsey, 24,500.

CALVERT, kal'-vert, a county of the United States, in Maryland, on the west shore of the Chesapeake. Area, 2,039 square miles. Pop. about 10,000, of whom one half are slaves.

CALVERT ISLAND is situate on the W. coast of British North America. Lat. 51° 30′ N. Lon. 128° 10′ W. —There is a group of islands of the same name in the Pacific. Lat. 8° 55′ N. Lon. 172° 10′ E.

CALVERT, George. (See BALTIMORE, Lord.)

CALVI, kal'-ve, a fortified town in Corsica, in the Gulf of Calvi, about 40 miles from Bastia. Pop. about 2,000. It was taken by the English in 1794, after a siege of 51 days.

CALVIN, John, kăl'-vin, an eminent reformer, the founder of the religious sect called Calvinists, was educated at Paris, under Corderius, with a view to the church. Two benefices were procured for him, but he had become dissatisfied with the tenets of the Church of Rome, and changed his opinions with respect to the ecclesiastical state. He was now induced to study the law, in which he made considerable progress; but his open avowal of the Protestant faith rendered his stay in France dangerous, and he retired to Basle, where he published, in 1535, his "Institution of the Christian Religion," to which he prefixed an elegant dedication to Francis I. This work rendered his name famous, and it was translated into several languages. In the following year he settled at Geneva, as minister and professor of divinity, having Farel for his colleague. Both he and Farel, however, were in a short time compelled to leave Geneva, for refusing to administer the sacrament indiscriminately to the people. Calvin now went to Strasburg, where he officiated in a French church of his own establishment, and was also chosen professor of divinity. The divines of this town appointed him their deputy at the Diet of Worms. In the mean time, the citizens of Geneva requested his return to their city, and after repeated solicitations, he, in 1541, complied, and resided there, actively engaged both as a writer and a preacher, until his death. B. at Noyon, Picardy, 1509; D. 1564.—The moral disposition of Calvin was inestimable, and whatever may be the opinions of the creed he professed and promulgated, there can be no doubt as to the greatness of his character. Of his unparalleled industry, Dr. Hoyle says,—"It may be the truest object of admiration, how one lean, worn, spent, and wearied body could hold out. He read, every week of the year through, three divinity lectures; every other week, over and above, he preached every day; so that (as Erasmus said of Chrysostom), I know not whether more to admire his constancy, or theirs that heard him. Some have reckoned his yearly lectures to be 186, and his yearly sermons 286. Every Thursday he sat in the presbytery; every Friday, when the ministers met to consult upon difficult texts, he made as good as a lecture. Besides all this, there was scarce a day that exercised him not in answering, either by word of mouth or writing, the doubts and questions of different churches and pastors, yea, sometimes more at once, so that he might say with Paul, 'the care of all churches lieth upon me.' Scarcely a year wherein, over and above all these former employments, some great volume in folio, or other, came not forth." His works have been published in 9 vols. folio.

CALVISANO, kal-ve-sa'-no, a town of Austrian Italy, in Lombardy, 15 miles from Brescia, situate in a beautiful and fertile plain, rich in grain and pasture, and containing numerous mulberry-plantations. Pop. about 3,000.

CALVITIUS, Sethus, kăl-vish'-e-us, a learned chronologer, whose principal work is the "Opus Chronologicum," the last edition of which was that of Frankfort, in 1685. Scaliger speaks highly of it. B. in Thuringia, 1556; D. 1615.

CALYDON, kăl'-i-don, a city of Ætolia, celebrated as the place where the wild boar was hunted by all the princes of the age. This boar-hunt, under the name of the chase of Calydon, has been much celebrated by the poets. (See MELEAGER.)

CALYPSO, kă-lip'-so, one of the Oceanides, the goddess of silence, who reigned in the island of Ogygia. Ulysses being shipwrecked on her coasts, she became enamoured of that hero, and succeeded in detaining him in her island seven years: after that, however, Ulysses quitted her to rejoin Penelope. This incident forms a considerable portion of the Odyssey of Homer.

CAM, or GRANTA, kăm, a river of England, rising in Essex, and flowing through the north-east part of the county of Cambridge, until it falls into the Ouse, 4 miles from Ely. It is navigable from the Ouse to Cambridge, and has a course altogether of 40 miles.—Another, which rises in Gloucestershire, and runs into the Severn.

CAM, a village and parish of Gloucestershire. Pop. about 2,000, chiefly employed in the cloth manufacture.

CAMAMU, ka'-ma-moo, the name of an island, a flourishing town, and a bay, of Brazil. The bay is 75 miles from Bahia, and the town has a trade in timber, rum, and rice. Pop. 2,000.

CAMANA, ka-ma'-na, the capital of a province of the same name, in Peru, situate on the river Camana, about 6 miles from the sea. Pop. 1,500.

CAMARGUE, LA, ka-marg', an island of France, in the department of the Mouths of the Rhone, and divided into 9 parishes. It is quite flat, and mostly composed of mud-banks and arid sand, yielding, on the banks of the Rhone, wheat, and affording pasture to wild horses, cattle, and sheep. The phenomenon of the mirage is here frequently to be seen during the heats of summer.

CAMBACERES, Jean Jacques Regis, kam-las'-a-rai, came prominently into notice during the first great revolution of France. He commenced life as a lawyer, and by his talents succeeded in attracting the notice of the Convention, who employed him in various official situations. In the discussion on the conduct of Louis XVI. he declared the monarch guilty, but disputed the authority of the Convention to judge him; he, therefore, voted only for his provisionary arrest, and his death in case of a hostile invasion. The management of foreign affairs was, for some time, committed to his hands, and when Napoleon was made First Consul, Cambacérès was chosen Second. When Bonaparte rose to the throne, Cambacérès became a great favourite, and had several honours conferred upon him. Subsequently he was created duke of Parma, and appointed to the presidency of the Chamber of Peers. Devotedly attached to Napoleon, he adhered to him throughout his reign. On his final fall, he was banished from France, but was afterwards permitted to returnto Paris. B. at Montpellier, 1753; D. at Paris, 1824.

CAMBAY, kam'-bai, a seaport town of Hindostan, at the head of the Gulf of Cambay, nearly 80 miles from Surat: a great portion of it is in ruins. Its trade has greatly declined, but it is still celebrated for the taste with which it produces articles of carnelian and bloodstone. Pop. 10,000. The gulf is 72 miles long, 2 miles wide at its entrance, and receives from the E. the rivers Dhadar, Narbada, and Mahi; from the N. the Sabarmati, and from the W. the Bhadar. Lat. between 21° 5′ and 22° 17′ N. Lon. between 72° 19′ and 72° 51′ E.

CAMBERT, Robert, kam'-bair, a French musician, who was the first to exhibit operas in France; but being rivalled by Lulli, he went, in 1672, to England, where he became master of the king's band. D. 1677.

CAMBERWELL, kăm'-ber-wel, a parish and suburb of London, in the county of Surrey, 2 miles from St. Paul's cathedral. Area, 4,570 acres. Pop. 55,000.

CAMBIASO, Luca, kam'-be-a'-so, sometimes called Luchetto of Genoa, a distinguished Italian painter in fresco and oil. After becoming eminent in Genoa, he went to Spain, where he was commissioned by Philip II. to paint for the Escurial; accordingly, he executed several works; among which is an immense fresco of Paradise, crowded with figures, on the ceiling of the choir of the church of San Lorenzo. This, however, is considered both stiff and formal in its execution. He also painted in oil, for the Escurial, "John the Baptist preaching in the Wilderness," which is esteemed as the best of his Spanish works. The best of his Genoese works are, "The Martyrdom of St. George," in the church of San Giorgio; and "The Rape of the Sabines," at Terralba, near Genoa. B. near Genoa, 1527; D. at the Escurial, Spain, 1585.

CAMBIS-VELLERON, Joseph Lewis Dominic, Marquis de, kam'-be-vel'-le-rawng, a learned French nobleman, who diligently collected a library, which was among the largest and most select in his country. He published, 1. A Catalogue Raisonné of the MSS. in his cabinet, 2 vols. 8vo, a curious work; 2. "Mémoires historiques de la Vie de Roger de Saint-Lary de Bellegrade," 1767, 12mo; and gathered materials for a history of his native province. B. at Avignon, 1706; D. 1772.

CAMBODIA, CAMBOJA, or CAMBOGE, kăm'-bo'-de-a, a country of Asia, formerly of considerable extent, but now reduced to a small tributary state of Siam. It is bounded on the N. by Assam, W. by the river Me-kong, S. by the China Sea, and E. by Cochin-China. Desc. The soil is exceedingly fertile, producing abundance of rice, legumes, and fruits, as well as many medicinal plants. Pop. estimated at 500,000.

CAMBODIA, or CAMBOJIA, one of the provinces of Cochin-China, comprising nearly the whole of the above, and still called by the same name. Desc. As far as it is known, distinguished by its fertility, being formed by the alluvia of its large rivers, and almost a level. Zoology. Elephants, buffaloes, horned cattle, hogs, wild and tame goats, hares, cranes, and all kinds of poultry. Pro. Rice, areca-nuts, betel, spices, gamboge, sandal-wood, sapan-wood, and ivory. Mats make a large portion of its exports. (See ANAM and COCHIN-CHINA.)

CAMBODIA, CAPE, the S. extremity of Cambodia. Lat. 10° N. Lon. 106° E.

CAMBOJA, or MARKHAUM, kăm-bo'-ja, a river of Asia, which rises among the mountains of independent Tartary. It passes through the province of Yunan, in China, the countries of Laos and Cambodia, and falls into the Chinese Sea by several mouths. Lat. 10° N. Lon. 104° 10' E.

CAMBORNE, kăm'-born, a town and parish of Cornwall, 4 miles from Redruth, and the centre of a mining population. Area of parish, 6,900 acres. Pop. 12,887. —The copper-mine of Dalcoate, in this parish, is 1,000 feet in depth.

CAMBRAY, or CAMBRAI, kăm'-brai, a fortified town of France, in the department of the North, on the Scheldt, which divides it into two parts. It is 17 miles from Valenciennes, and is entered through four gateways. Its citadel is one of the strongest in Europe. Manf. Cambrics, which take their name from the town, thread, lace, leather, and soap. It has a trade in wool, flax, butter, and hops. Pop. about 22,000.—In 1508 the league of Cambray was concluded here. It was formed by Maximilian I. of Germany, Louis XII. of France, the king of Aragon, Ferdinand of Spain, and Pope Julius, against the Venetian republic. In 1529 peace between Francis I. and Charles V. was also concluded here. This was called the Ladies' Treaty, being negotiated by Margaret of Austria, Charles V.'s aunt, and Louise of Savoy, Francis I.'s mother. In 1536 this treaty, which was disadvantageous to France, was broken.

CAMBRIA, kăm'-bre-a, a post-township of Niagara county, New York, 22 miles from Buffalo. Pop. 2,500. —2. A county of Pennsylvania. Area, 670 square miles. Desc. Fertile, with coal and iron in abundance. Pop. 18,000.—This county is traversed by the Pennsylvania Canal and Portage Railway, and by the Central Railway.

CAMBRIDGE, George William Frederick Charles, duke of, kaim'-bridj, cousin-german to Queen Victoria, early entered the army, and in 1837 was a colonel of infantry, and successively commanded a regiment of dragoons and the Scots fusiliers. In 1852 he was appointed inspector-general of the army, and in 1854 became lieutenant-general, with the command of a division, with which he proceeded to the Crimea. He fought at the battles of Alma and Inkermann, and in 1855 returned to England. On the death of Lord Hardinge, in 1856, he became commander-in-chief of the British forces. In 1857 he was presented by the citizens of London with a sword of honour, accompanied with the freedom of the city. B. at Hanover, 1819.

CAMBRIDGE, anciently GRANTA, the capital of Cambridgeshire, is situate on the river Cam, by which it is intersected unequally. The town is about a mile in length, and half a mile in breadth, decreasing towards each extremity; and most of the streets, as well as the buildings, are irregular. Cambridge is chiefly celebrated for its university; the first public instrument relating to which does not ascend higher than an act of parliament of Henry III.'s reign, A.D. 1229, though it must have subsisted a considerable time before. The university consists of thirteen different colleges, four halls, the schools, the public library, calculated to contain 100,000 volumes, and the senate-house. The colleges have been founded at different periods during the six preceding centuries, and are very unequal in extent and decoration. 1. St. Peter's, or Peter House, in 1257, and consisting of two small courts. 2. Clare Hall, erected originally in 1326. 3. Pembroke Hall, in 1347. 4. Corpus Christi, Benit, or Benedict College, in 1351. 5. Trinity Hall, in 1350. 6. Gonville and Caius College, in 1348. 7. King's College, in 1441. The chapel of this college, said to be the most magnificent structure of the kind in Europe, was founded by King Henry VI., but not completed before the reign of Henry VIII. It consists of several detached piles of building, of which the chapel is the most admired. 8. Queen's College, founded in 1446. 9. Catherine Hall, founded in 1475. 10. Jesus College, originally a monastic edifice, converted, in 1496, into a college. 11. Christ College, in 1505, by Margaret, countess of Derby. 12. St. John's College was also founded by the same Margaret, in 1511. 13. Mary Magdalen College, founded by Thomas, Baron Audley, in 1519. 14. Trinity College, founded by King Henry VIII. in 1546; here there is a library, which ranks among the first in Great Britain, for its collection of printed books, manuscripts, Roman antiquities, and natural curiosities. The structure containing is was erected by Sir Christopher Wren. 15. Emmanuel College, founded by Sir Walter Mildmay in 1584. 16. Sidney Sussex College, founded in 1596. 17. Downing College, founded in the year 1800, in pursuance of the will of Sir George Downing, made 1717. The total number of members on the boards may be between 7,000 and 8,000. Each college has its own statutes, by which it is governed; but the government of the colleges, as a confederation, rests with a senate composed of two houses, the members of which amount to 4,000, and have the degree of Doctor or M.A. The university sends two members to the House of Commons, who are chosen by this senate. No manufacture of consequence is carried on in Cambridge; its chief trade consists in oil, corn, and iron. Pop. 28,000.

CAMBRIDGE, a post-town of Massachusetts, U.S., on Charles river, 3 miles from Boston. It contains a court-house, county gaol, state arsenal, and several churches for different sects. It also contains Harvard College, or the University of Cambridge, the oldest and most wealthy literary institution in the United States. It was founded in 1638, in less than twenty years after the first settlement of New England. It possesses a library, a laboratory, museum, and botanical garden. Pop. 16,000.—Many of the most eminent literary men of the United States have resided in Cambridge; amongst others, Longfellow, the poet, who occupied a house which George Washington formerly inhabited.—Another, in Washington county, New York, 12 miles from Salem. Pop. 3,000.—The name of several other townships.

CAMBRIDGESHIRE, kaim'-bridj-sheer, an inland county of England, bounded N. by Lincolnshire, N.W. by Northamptonshire, N.E. by Norfolk, E. by Suffolk, S. by Essex and Hertfordshire, S.W. by Bedfordshire, and W. by Huntingdonshire. Ext. 50 miles long, by 30 broad. Area, 857 square miles. Desc. The N. part is occupied by the isle of Ely, which is fertile, and produces luxuriant crops of wheat, oats, and cole-seed. On the dairy farms, butter of the finest quality is made; and the vicinity of Cottenham is noted for new cheese of delicious flavour. By far the most agreeable districts are to the S. and S.W., consisting chiefly of elevated land. The S.E. division, reaching from the Gogmagog hills to Newmarket, is bleak and heathy. Rivers. The Great Ouse, the Cam or Granta, and the Nene. Pop. 186,000.

CAMBUSLANG, kăm-bus-lăng, a parish of Scotland, in Lanarkshire, on the Clyde, 8 miles from Glasgow. Pop. 3,500.

CAMBUSNETHAN, kăm-bus-ne'-than, a village and parish of Lanarkshire, on the Clyde, 15 miles from Glasgow. Area, 26,000 acres. Pop. about 9,000.

CAMBYNA, kăm-bi'-na, an island of the Asiatic archipelago, 15 miles from Celebes. Ext. 20 miles long, by 15 broad. Lat. 5° 21' S. Lon. 121° 57' E.

CAMBYSES, kăm-bi'-sees, king of Persia, was the son of Cyrus the Great, whom he succeeded 529 B.C. He conquered the Egyptians, killed their god Apis, and plundered their temples. Cambyses afterwards sent an army of 50,000 men to destroy the temple of Jupiter Ammon; but they were lost in the deserts of Libya. In his Ethiopian war he was not more successful, a horrible famine reducing his soldiers to live one on the other. He died of a small wound he had given himself with his sword as he mounted on horseback, 521 B.C. —All historians represent this monarch as a furious tyrant; he caused his brother Smerdis to be killed, and also his sister Meroë and her husband.

CAMDEN, William, kăm'-den, a learned antiquary, who, in 1586, published, in elegant Latin, "The History of the Ancient Inhabitants of Britain; their Origin, Manners, and Laws." A third edition of this work appeared in 1590, at which time the author had a prebend in Salisbury Cathedral, but without being in orders. In 1598 he became head master of Westminster School, and, next year, published an enlarged edition of his "Britannia." In 1597 he printed his Greek Grammar for the use of Westminster School, and, the same year, was made Clarencieux king at arms. Three years later his "Catalogue of the Monuments in Westminster Abbey" appeared, and also a new impression of his "Britannia." In 1603 he published at Frankfort "A Collection of our Ancient Historians," in Latin; and, in the following year, his "Remains Concerning Britain," in 4to. In 1615 he printed his "Annals of Queen Elizabeth." B. in London, 1551; D. at Chiselhurst, in Kent, 1623, his remains being interred in Westminster Abbey.—He founded a history professorship at Oxford, and bequeathed all his books and papers to Sir Robert Cotton.

CAMDEN, Charles Pratt, earl of, was a younger son of Sir John Pratt, chief justice of the court of King's Bench in the reign of George I. He was trained to the law, and, in 1738, was called to the bar. For several years he had little success; but, in 1752, he was engaged as junior counsel in defence of Owen, a bookseller, who had been prosecuted by the attorney-general for publishing a libel upon the House of Commons. In this case he greatly contributed to the success of his client in gaining a favourable verdict. From that time his fortune and fame were fixed. In 1757 he was made attorney-general, and, almost immediately, was returned member of parliament for Downton, a borough, since abolished, in Wiltshire. In 1761 he was raised to the bench as lord chief justice; and, in 1765, was created a peer, with the title of Baron Camden, of Camden Place, in the county of Kent. On the breaking up of the Rockingham administration, in 1766, he became lord chancellor. It was as a judge in the court of Chancery, however, that he earned the praise of his countrymen. Only one of his decisions was reversed, and that reversal, Lord Eldon said, was probably wrong. B. 1714; D. 1794.

CAMDEN, a county on the coast of Georgia, U.S., separated from Florida by St. Mary's river. Area, 765 square miles. Pop. 7,000, of whom nearly two thirds are slaves.—Another, in North Carolina. Area, 280 square miles. Pop. 6,500, of whom a third are slaves.—Also the name of several other cities and townships in the United States.

CAMDEN, a maritime county of New South Wales, inclosed landward by the counties of Cork, Cumberland, Westmoreland, Argyle, and St. Vincent; and bounded on the E. by the Pacific.—Also, a village, in the same county, 30 miles from Sydney.

CAMDEN, a bay of Russian America, in the Arctic Ocean. Lat. 70° N. Lon. 115° W.

CAMEL, kăm'-el, a small river of England. (See ALAN.)

CAMELFORD, a town of Cornwall, on the river Camel, 18 miles from Launceston. The streets are broad and well paved, but the houses are indifferent. Pop. 800.

CAMEL'S RUMP, a mountain of Vermont, United States, and one of the highest peaks of the Green Mountains. Height, 4,188 feet.

CAMERARIUS, Joachim, kăm'-e-rair'-e-us, a learned German writer, who embraced the doctrines of the Reformation, and formed a friendship with Melancthon, whose life he wrote. On the establishment of a college at Nuremberg, he was made professor of belles-lettres, and afterwards removed to Leipsic to superintend the university of that city. He aided Melancthon in drawing up the famous "Confession of Augsburg," wrote some good books, and translated a great number of the Greek authors. B. at Bamberg, 1500; D. at Leipsic, 1574.—His son Joachim devoted himself chiefly to medicine and botany, on which last subject he wrote some pieces. D. at Nuremberg, 1598.

CAMERON, kăm'-e-ron, a county of Texas, U.S., on the Gulf of Mexico. Area, 5,460 square miles. Pop. about 9,000, of whom a few are slaves.

CAMERON, Rev. Richard, the founder of a sect known in the religious history of Scotland as the Cameronians. He was one of the boldest opponents of the measures of Charles II., and, with twenty others, in 1680, entered armed into the town of Sanquhar, Dumfriesshire, and, at the market cross, renounced his allegiance, and pronounced Charles a tyrant and a traitor to the civil and religious principles of the people. His party kept in arms for a month in the hill districts of Ayrshire and Nithsdale; but, in a skirmish with the king's troops, they were defeated at Airdsmoss, where Cameron was slain. Fell July 20, 1680.—A monument marks the spot where this event occurred.

CAMEROONS, kăm'-e-roons, a river of Africa, falling into the Bight of Biafra, near lat. 4° N.; lon. 9° 40' E. —CAPE CAMEROONS is on an island in the estuary of this river.—CAMEROONS PEAK, the highest point of a range of mountains of the same name. Lat. 4° 13' N. Lon. 9° 10' E. Height, estimated at 13,000 feet.

CAMESA, kam'-ai-sa, a town of Brazil, on the bank of the Tocantins, 85 miles from Belem. Pop. 20,000.— A fertile district was assigned to this town in 1839.

CAMILLA, kă-mil'-la, queen of the Volsci, daughter of Metabus and Casmilla, is mentioned in the Æneid. Being, from her infancy, bred to the sports of the chase and war, she was famous for her extreme agility and skill with the bow. Whilst assisting Turnus against Æneas, she was treacherously killed by Aruns.

CAMILLUS, Marcus Furius, kă-mil'-lus, an illustrious Roman, who obtained four triumphs, and was five times dictator. This great man, whose virtues were equal to his talents, was prosecuted on a charge of peculation, on which he went into voluntary banishment. While he was absent, Brennus, at the head of an army of Gauls, took Rome, and besieged the senate in the Capitol. Camillus, forgetting his wrongs, flew to the relief of his country, defeated the barbarian, and was created dictator. D. of the plague, 365 B.C.

CAMISANO, ka-me-sa'-no, a town of Lombardo-Venetia, 6 miles from Crema. There is an ancient Gothic castle here, with a large tower. Pop. 2,050.—Another, in the same territory, 10 miles from Vicenza. Pop. 3,700.

CAMŒNÆ. (See MUSES, THE.)

CAMOENS, Lewis, kam'-o-ens, the most celebrated poet of Portugal, who entered the army, and served with great reputation in Africa against the Moors. Soon after his return to Portugal, he engaged in an expedition to the East Indies, where he wrote a great part of his famous poem entitled the "Lusiad." On his passage home he suffered shipwreck, but preserved the MS. of his poem, which was published in 1569. B. at Lisbon, 1527; D. 1579.—The people of Macao are still proud of showing a cave where Camoens amused himself in writing his "Lusiad." It has been translated into English both by Sir Richard Fanshaw and Mr. Mickle.

CAMOGHE, kam'-og, a mountain of Switzerland, 7 miles from Lago Lugano. Height, 8,800 feet.

CAMOGLI, kam'-o-gle, a maritime town of Sardinia, built in the waters of the Gulf of Genoa, 13 miles from Genoa. Pop. about 6,000.

CAMONICA, or VALLE CAMONICA, ka-mo'-ne-ka, a well-cultivated valley of Austrian Italy, extending for 50 miles, and terminating at the Lake of Isco. It is watered by the Oglio, and is the route from Italy to the Tyrol. It has marble and slate quarries, and lead, iron, and copper mines. Pop. about 60,000.

CAMOU, General, ka'-moo, a military commander, who, at the head of the voltigeurs of the French Guard, distinguished himself at the battle of Magenta, against the Austrians, June 4, 1859.

CAMPAGNA, kam-pan'-ya, a town of Naples, situate amid high mountains, 20 miles from Salerno, in the province of Principato Citra. It has a cathedral, and is a bishop's see. Pop. about 9,000.—There is a village of the same name 12 miles from Venice.

CAMPAGNA DI ROMA, de ro'-ma, an old province of the States of the Church, Italy. It is bounded on the N. by Il Patrimonio di San Pietro and Sabina, N.E. and E. by the kingdom of Naples, S. and W. by the Tuscan Sea. Ext. It comprehends the greater part of ancient Latium, and is from 60 to 70 miles in length, and from 40 to 60 in breadth. On account of malaria, this region is but little inhabited.

CAMPAGNAC, kam-pan'-yak, a town of France, in the department of the Aveyron, 24 miles from Rodez. Pop. 1,300.

CAMPAN, kam'-pa, a town of France, in the department of the Upper Pyrenees, 12 miles from Bagnères-en-Bigorre. Pop. 4,000. In its neighbourhood there are marble-quarries.

CAMPAN, Madame, in her fifteenth year was appointed reader to the daughters of Louis XV. of France, and in 1770 married, and became first lady of the bedchamber to Marie Antoinette, the dauphiness. With this princess she remained till the Revolution parted them, when she opened a boarding-school at St. Germaine-en-Laye. She subsequently became superintendent of the establishment at Ecouen, founded by Napoleon I. for the daughters and sisters of the officers of the Legion of Honour. This establishment was, after the Restoration, suppressed, when she retired to Mantes, where she passed the remainder of her days, enjoying a reputation for many virtues and accomplishments. B. 1752; D. at Mantes, 1822. She wrote "Memoirs of the Private Life of Marie Antoinette," and "Historical Anecdotes of the Reigns of Louis XV. and XVI."

CAMPANA, kam-pa'-na, an island off the W. coast of Patagonia. Ext. 55 miles long, with an average breadth of 10. Lat. 48° 30′ S. Lon. 75° 30′ W.

CAMPANELLA, Thomas, kam'-pa-nel'-la, an Italian philosopher, and a monk of the Dominican order. His sagacity enabled him to discover the falsity of the Peripatetic system, when he formed one of his own, which attracted attention, and procured him many enemies. In 1599 he was seized at Naples, and committed to prison on suspicion of being engaged in a conspiracy against the Spaniards, who were then masters of his country. He was imprisoned 27 years, and was several times tortured, five times brought to trial, and finally sent to Rome at the request of the pope. In 1634 he escaped and went to France, where Cardinal Richelieu allowed him a pension. B. at Stello, Calabria, 1568; D. at Paris, 1639. His principal works are "De rectâ Ratione studendi," in which are some excellent rules for philosophizing, "Aphorismata Politica," and "De Monarchiâ Hispanicâ."

CAMPANIA, kam-pai'-ne-a, the ancient name of that part of the present kingdom of Naples which is now called Terra di Lavoro.

CAMPANO, John Antonio, kam-pa'-no, a learned Italian, who was originally a shepherd-boy. In this capacity he attracted the notice of a priest, who took him home, and gave him a liberal education. Acquiring considerable knowledge of the Greek language, he subsequently became professor of rhetoric at Perugia. Pius II. made him a bishop, and sent him to the congress at Ratisbon. Sixtus IV. appointed him governor of Citta da Castello; but Campano, having resisted an arbitrary act of his against the inhabitants, incurred the pope's displeasure; on which he withdrew to his bishopric of Terrano, where he died. B. in Campania, 1429; D. at Terrano, 1477.—He wrote the history of Andrew Braccio, a famous commander; several moral and political treatises, letters, orations, and Latin poems; all of which were published together in 1707 and 1734, at Leipsic.

CAMPANUS, John, kăm-pai'-nus, of Novara, sometimes called Novarese Campano, an Italian mathematician, the first translator of Euclid from the Arabic, flourished about the 13th century. Some authorities say before this.—Although his works, which consisted of writings on astronomy and geometry principally, are long exploded, yet he deserves praise, as one of those studious men who, though few, laboured zealously at the exact sciences, and did their best to extend the knowledge of them.

CAMPASPE, kăm-păs'-pe, the wife of Apelles.

CAMPBELL, John, Lord, kam'-bel, lord chancellor of England, was the second son of the Rev. Dr. George Campbell, minister of Cupar, Fifeshire. He received his education at the university of St. Andrew's, and in 1800 was entered a student at Lincoln's Inn, London. In 1826 he was called to the bar, and in 1827 became a bencher. In 1830 he was elected member of parliament for Stafford, and in 1832 was appointed solicitor-general. In 1834 he was attorney-general, and in 1841 became lord chancellor of Ireland, when he was raised to the peerage as Baron Campbell. The same year he resigned the chancellorship, and in 1846 became chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster. In 1850 he attained the position due to his industry, and became lord chief justice of the court of Queen's Bench, with a salary of £8,000 a year. In June, 1859, he was appointed, under the Palmerston administration, lord chancellor. As a member of parliament he represented first, Stafford, then Dudley, and then Edinburgh; for which he sat till 1841. In 1846 he produced his "Lives of the Lord Chancellors, &c.," and in 1849 the "Lives of the Chief Justices,"—works which, in a literary point of view, added to his reputation. B. near Cupar, Scotland, 1779.

CAMPBELL, John, an ingenious Scotch writer, who in his fifth year was brought to Windsor, and never after visited his native country. He was designed for the law, but renounced that profession on the expiration of his clerkship, and devoted himself to literature. His first performance was the "Military History of Prince Eugene and the Duke of Marlborough," in 2 vols. folio, published in 1736. This work was well received, and occasioned the author to be employed in writing the "Universal History," of which the cosmogony is known to be his. While he was engaged in this work, he published several books, the principal of which was the "Lives of the Admirals," 4 vols. 8vo; a performance of great merit. In 1743 he published a curious tract, entitled "Hermippus redivivus; or, the Sage's Triumph over Old Age and the Grave." The year following appeared his improved edition of Harris's collection of Voyages and Travels, 2 vols. folio. He next engaged in that great undertaking the "Biographia Britannica," which began to be published in numbers in 1745, and was completed in seven volumes folio. In 1750 he published his "Present State of Europe," which went through six editions; and in 1754, the university of Glasgow conferred on him the degree of LL.D. He wrote a vindication of the peace in 1763, for which he was appointed king's agent for the province of Georgia. His greatest work, in the composition of which he spent many years, is his "Political Survey of Britain," which appeared in 2 vols. 4to, 1774, and abounds in speculative projects and political schemes. He wrote, besides, a great number of pamphlets and anonymous books, and contributed to a variety of compilations. B. at Edinburgh, 1708; D. 1775.

CAMPBELL, Rev. George, an eminent Scotch divine, who in 1759 was appointed principal of Marischal College, Aberdeen. In 1763 he answered Hume's Essay on Miracles; and subsequently had the degree of D.D. conferred on him by King's College, Aberdeen. In 1771 he was appointed professor of divinity, and in 1776 published his "Philosophy of Rhetoric," which, with the exception of Whateley's, is, perhaps, the ablest work on the subject. Campbell undoubtedly possessed a highly philosophical mind, of great depth, acuteness, and critical power. He wrote several other works of a theological kind. B. at Aberdeen, 1709; D. 1796.—Some years previous to his death he had resigned his professorship, when King George III. granted him a pension of £300 year.

CAMPBELL, Thomas, one of the most chaste of modern poets, was the youngest of a family consisting of eleven sons and daughters. After passing through the university of Glasgow, in which he excelled as a Greek scholar, he went to Edinburgh, where, in 1799, he published his "Pleasures of Hope," which Byron, who ought to be a judge, pronounces "one of the most beautiful didactic poems in the language." It, however, has some of the faults of a juvenile performance, notwithstanding the splendour of its diction, and the fervour with which it is throughout imbued. The profits arising from this performance enabled him to visit the continent. During this tour he had a view from a distance of the battle of Hohenlinden, which he afterwards celebrated in his epic poem of that name. On his return to Edinburgh he continued to write, but in 1803 removed to London, where he began to pursue literature as a profession. In 1806 he received from the Fox ministry a pension of £200 a year, which he enjoyed for life. In 1809 he published his "Gertrude of Wyoming," which Lord Jeffrey pronounced "a polished and pathetic poem in the old style of English pathos and poetry." It is unquestionably superior to the "Pleasures of Hope" in purity of diction, and, in every other quality, its equal. In 1820 he became the editor of the "New Monthly Magazine," which post he held till 1830. In 1824 appeared his "Theodoric," a poem of great sweetness, though deficient in power. In 1831 he established the "Metropolitan Magazine," which he managed only a short time. In 1842 he published his "Pilgrim of Glencoe," which did not raise his poetical character above the point it already had attained. During his intervals of repose from severer duties, he occasionally produced smaller effusions, which, from their strength and beauty, have long kept possession of the popular mind. His lyrics are, perhaps, the noblest bursts of poetical feeling, fervour, and enthusiasm, that have ever flashed from any poet. B. at Glasgow, 1777; D. at Boulogne, 1844.—Campbell also wrote several prose biographies and other works. He was elected twice to the lord rectorship of Glasgow, and took an active part in forming the London University, now University College, which he indeed claimed the merit of originating. His body rests in Westminster Abbey, where, near the centre of the Poets' Corner, there is a marble statue of him by Marshall.

CAMPBELL, Rev. John, a Scotch clergyman, who took an active part in almost every Christian work. In 1801 he was appointed pastor of the Independent church at Kingsland, and greatly assisted in the formation of the British and Foreign Bible Society. In 1812 he made a voyage to Africa, for the purpose of visiting the stations of the London Missionary Society, and returned in 1814. He revisited that country in 1818-21. Of these voyages he published accounts, and founded the "Youth's Magazine," of which he acted as editor for eighteen years. He also published numerous other works of a religious tendency. D. at Edinburgh, 1766.

CAMPBELL, Sir Alexander, a lieutenant-general in the British army, who aided in the defence of Gibraltar, and assisted in the destruction of the enemy's floating batteries. After serving abroad nearly 20 years, principally in the East, where he was present at the siege of Seringapatam, and all the great conflicts from 1793 to 1808, he returned in the latter year to England. Shortly after he went to the Peninsula, where, in 1809, at the battle of Talavera, he commanded the right wing, and was dangerously wounded. Recovering from this, he again joined the army, and fought at Busaco and other places. The last appointment he received was commander-in-chief of Madras. D. in Perthshire, 1759; D. at Fort St. George, 1824.

CAMPBELL, Lords of Argyle. (See ARGYLE, Lords of.)

CAMPBELL, Sir Colin. (See CLYDE, Lord.)

CAMPBELL, the name of several counties in the United States. 1. In Virginia. Area, 570 square miles. Pop. 24,000, of whom nearly a half are slaves. 2. In Kentucky, on the Ohio. Area, 120 square miles. Pop. 14,000, of whom a few are slaves. 3. In Tennessee. Area, 450 square miles. Pop. 6,000, of whom a half are slaves. 4. In Georgia. Area, 360 square miles. Pop. 7,500, of whom 1,500 are slaves.—All these counties have a fertile soil, and yield grain and tobacco.

CAMPBELL ISLAND lies in the South Pacific, and is 36 miles in circumference. Its coast is indented with bays, and it is said to have an interesting flora. Lat. 52° 33′ S. Lon. 169° 8′ 41″ E.

CAMPBELTOWN, a seaport-town of Argyleshire, Scotland, situate on the coast of Cantire, 30 miles from Ayr. The inhabitants are chiefly employed in distilling, and in the herring-fishery. Pop. 10,000.—Also a village in Inverness-shire, on Beauley Firth, 10 miles from Inverness.

CAMPDEN, or CAMDEN, kăm'-den, a town and parish of Gloucestershire, 24 miles from Gloucester. Area of parish, 4,660 acres. Pop. about 3,000.

CAMPEACHY, kăm-pe'-che, the chief seaport-town of Yucatan, Central America, 90 miles from Merida. Its houses are well built of stone. There is a good dock and fort, which commands both the town and harbour. It has, besides, churches, convents, a college, and shipbuilding-docks. Cotton and wax are its principal exports, and it is the centre of the Campeachy wood or logwood trade. Pop. 15,000. Lat. 20° 50′ N. Lon. 90° 33′ W.

CAMPEGGIO, Lorenzo, kam-pej'-e-o, a cardinal, who was originally a professor of civil law at Bologna, and had married; but losing his wife, entered the church, and was made a bishop. Leo X. created him a cardinal while he was nuncio at the imperial court. In 1519 he was sent legate to England, to collect the tithes for the war against the Turks; and, while there, he was nominated bishop of Salisbury. In 1524 he was sent into Germany, as the delegate of the pope, to oppose the progress of Lutheranism, in which he met with no success. The subject of the separation between Henry VIII. and Catharine of Aragon brought him once more to England; but he was so unsuccessful in his mission, that he incurred the blame of all parties. He was recalled in 1529, and the pope sent him again to Germany, where he attended the diet of Augsburg. B. at Milan, 1474; D. at Rome, 1539.—He was a learned man, and the friend of Erasmus and other eminent scholars. Some of his letters are in a collection printed at Bâle in 1550. He had a brother, called Thomas, who was also a bishop. He published several works on the canon law, and died in 1564.

CAMPEGINE, kam'-pai-je'-nai, a town of the duchy of Modena, on the Enza, 8 miles from Reggio. Pop. 2,000.

CAMPER, Peter, kăm'-per, an eminent German physician and naturalist, who studied under Boerhaave, Muschenbroek, Gravesande, and other great men in Leyden university. Having lost his parents at the age of twenty-six, he visited England, France, and Germany where he cultivated the acquaintance of men of letters. At Berlin he met with a flattering reception from Frederick the Great. To the study of medicine he united that of many other sciences, and cultivated a taste for the fine arts. He designed, painted, and modelled with exactness and elegance; but he excelled in the study of philosophy and natural history. His works on these subjects are in 6 vols. 8vo, enriched with above 100 folio plates of the most curious objects. He wrote also on the physiognomies of men of different countries, a work of considerable ingenuity, though necessarily not altogether to be relied on. B. at Leyden, 1722; D. 1789.

CAMPERDOWN, kăm'-per-down, a village of the Netherlands, in the North Sea, 27 miles from Amsterdam. It gives its name to the victory of Admiral Duncan over the Dutch fleet, October 11, 1797.

CAMPHUSEN, Dirk, kamp-hoo'-sen, an eminent painter, whose landscapes and moonlight-pieces are extremely beautiful. B. at Gorcum, 1586.

CAMPI, kam'-pe, a town of the kingdom of Naples, in the province of Terra di Otranto, 9 miles from Lecce. Manf. Straw hats. Pop. 4,101.

CAMPI, a district in the grand duchy of Tuscany, in the Val d'Arno, below Florence. It contains several villages of the same name, and the inhabitants are chiefly engaged in the preparation of the fine Tuscan straw for hats and bonnets.

CAMPISTRON, John Galbert de, kam-pees'-frawng, a French poet, who, at an early age, went to Paris, and there was fortunate enough to acquire the friendship, and receive the advice of the poet Racine. Through him he became secretary to the duke of Vendôme. His plays possess many beauties, and are formed on the model of those of Racine. B. at Toulouse, 1656; D. 1723.—He also wrote some operas, of which the best known is "Acis and Galatea."

CAMPO, kam'-po, the name of a number of unimportant villages and towns in Spain.

CAMPO BASSO, kam'-po bas'-so, a fortified town of Naples, in the province of Molise, about 60 miles from Naples. Manf. Cutlery and arms. Pop. 3,000.

CAMPO BELLO, kăm'-po bel'-lo, an island of New Brunswick, with a lighthouse 60 feet high. It has several excellent harbours. Ext. 9 miles long, and from 5 to 3 broad. Lat. 44° 57′ N. Lon. 66° 55′ W.

CAMPO FORMIO, kam'-po for'-me-o, a town of Lombardo-Venetia, 4 miles from Udine. Pop. 1,800. It is remarkable as the place where a treaty of peace was signed between Austria and France, on the 17th October, 1797. By it, Austria ceded the Low Countries and the territory of the empire as far as the Rhine, she recognized the Cisalpine republic, and received in return the Venetian territories.

CAMPO SANTO, kam'-po san'-to, a town of the duchy of Modena, Italy, situate on the Pavaro, 15 miles from the town of Modena. Pop. 2,500.—In 1743, a sanguinary battle was fought here, between the Spanish and Austrian forces.

CAMPOS DOS GOITACAZES, kam'-pos dos goi'-ta-ka'-zais, a city of Brazil, on the Parahiba, about 160 miles from Rio Janeiro. Pop. 4,000. There is a district attached to this city containing a population of 40,000, and producing considerable quantities of sugar-cane.

CAMPRODON, kam'-pro-done, a fortified town of Catalonia, Spain, 28 miles from Gerona. Pop. 1,200. This town was taken by the French in 1794.

CAMPSIE, kămp'-se, a village and parish of Stirlingshire, Scotland, 15 miles from Stirling. Area, 22,400 acres. Pop. 7,000, chiefly employed in calico-printing, cotton factories, and chemical works. In its picturesque neighbourhood are CAMPSIE FELLS, which attain a height of 1,500 feet.

CAMPUS MARTIUS, kăm'-pus mar'-she-us, a large plain at Rome, without the walls of the city, where the Roman youths performed their exercises, wrestled, hurled the javelin, threw the discus, rode the horse, and drove the chariot. Here the public assemblies were held, the officers of state chosen, and audience given to foreign ambassadors. It was called Martius, because dedicated to Mars; and was sometimes called Tiberinus, from its closeness to the Tiber.

CAMROOP, kam'-roop, an old subdivision of British India, now broken up, and distributed under other names. Area, 2,783 square miles. Pop. 300,000.

CAMTOOS, kăm'-toos, a considerable river of S. Africa, in the E. part of the Cape Colony. It rises in the Niewveld mountains, and, after a course of 200 miles, falls into the sea, 20 miles from Uitenhage.

CAMULOGENUS, kăm'-u-lo-je'-nus, a general of the Gauls, chief of the Parisii (Parisians), who defended Lutetia (Paris) against the Romans under Labienus, one of Cæsar's lieutenants, and perished in a battle outside the walls, on the spot now called the Plain of Vaugirard. Lived in the 1st century B.C.

CANA, kai'-na, a ruined town of Palestine, 12 miles from Acre. It is supposed to be the scene of the miracle of changing water into wine, recorded in St. John. There are two other villages of this name in Palestine.

CANAAN, kai'-năn, 'a merchant,' the wicked son of Ham, whose posterity, the Amorites, Hivites, and others, suffered, in accordance with the prophetic curse of Noah.

CANAAN, a country which bordered the eastern coast of the Mediterranean Sea, where the Supreme Being announced most of his holy oracles after the death of Moses, and where many of the principal events recorded in Scripture took place. It has been, from this circumstance, commonly called the Holy Land.

CANAAN, a name common to several townships in the United States. 1. In Somerset county, Maine. 2. In Grafton county, New Hampshire. 3. In Essex county, Vermont. 4. In Lichfield county, Connecticut.

CANADA, kăn'-a-da, the most extensive and important British colony in America. It is divided into Canada East, or Upper Canada, and Canada West, or Lower Canada. It is bounded on the N.W. and E. by other British territories, but the lines of demarcation are not positively determined; on the S. and partly on the E. it is bounded by the United States. Ext. From Lake Superior to the island of Anticosti, about 1,000 miles, with an average breadth of 300. Area, variously stated at 300,000 and 350,000 square miles.—Approximating to this latter extent, 90,000 are given to the Upper province, 205,863 to the Lower, and 52,500 square miles to the St. Lawrence and its estuary. Desc. The Upper province may be viewed as possessed of a generally even surface, having few great elevations. It has a table ridge running S.E. and N.W., and forming a watershed between lakes Huron and Superior: but there are no physical features sufficiently striking to require particular description. The Lower province may be viewed as mountainous when compared with the other. The principal ranges run parallel with each other, and stretch from S.W. to N.E. They are called the Green, the Mealy, and the Wotchish mountains. The first commences at Quebec, and, on the S. side of the St. Lawrence, follows the course of that river to where the range ends, between the Bay of Chaleur and Gaspe Point. The second stretches along the N. side of the river, and ends at Sandwich Bay; and the third, in the form of a crescent, lies between the Gulf of St. Lawrence and Hudson's Bay. Rivers. The St. Lawrence and its tributaries, the Ottawa, Seguenay, St. Maurice, or Three Rivers, Richlieu, Chaudiere, and St. Francis. Lakes. The largest in the world, and extremely numerous, the sizes of most of which are already noticed in the article on AMERICA, NORTH, which see. Climate. Excessive. In Upper Canada the winter is considerable shorter than in Lower, and is also milder, on account of its nearer proximity to the great lakes. The skies of Canada are celebrated for their purity and transparency, fogs being hardly known. Zoology. Bears, wolves, beavers, foxes, otters, martens, racoons, minks, muskrats, and squirrels. Deer were at one time plentiful, but they have become scarce, and the lynx and the wild cat have almost disappeared before the axe of the settler. Wild turkeys, swans, woodcocks, and snipes are frequently met with; whilst ducks and geese abound. The sky is sometimes darkened by flights of wild pigeons and jays. Woodpeckers and blackbirds are found in many and beautiful varieties. Besides these, there are eagles, hawks, kites, owls, crows, bitterns, and herons. Among reptiles, the rattlesnake and adder are found; but, although snakes are numerous, they are not so abundant as they are in the United States. Of insects, the bee and the mosquito are plentiful, and both the lakes and the rivers are well supplied with fish. The domestic animals are the same as those of this country. Forests. Immense; indeed, the greater part of the country is still covered with wood, chiefly consisting of the red and white pine, mingled with various kinds of ash, black and white birch, beech, elm, hickory, the butternut-tree, black walnut, cherry, bird's-eye-maple, sugar-maple, lime-tree, white sycamore, and button-wood. In moist places, the alder, the willow, and several varieties of thorn appear; whilst the tamarack and the red and white cedar spread their green foliage over the swamps. A profusion of flowers paint the earth, and wild fruits of the choicest description are gathered from the fruit-bearing bushes and trees. Among these may be noticed, currants, gooseberries, raspberries, cranberries, cherries, grapes, plums, strawberries, figs, &c. Pro. Wheat, rye, oats, pease, maize, buckwheat, and potatoes; nearly all kinds of vegetables thrive with proper cultivation, and pumpkins and squashes grow to an enormous size in the open fields. A considerable portion of ground is laid out for pasture and cattle, and sheep and hogs are raised. Minerals. Iron, copper, lead, tin, silver, marble, and lithographic stones. Exp. Timber is the principal article; but large quantities of barrelled beef, pork, flour, wheat, butter, pease, pot and pearl ashes, are also exported. There is a considerable trade carried on in lumber, fur, and wool, and a vast capital is invested in sawmills and log-ponds. Imp. Wines, spirits, molasses, tobacco, tea, coffee, and refined sugars. Manf. Unimportant. Gov. Resembles that of Great Britain. The executive is vested in a governor-general, appointed by the Crown, and assisted in his administration by an executive council, the members of which hold their seats for life, unless forfeited by crime. The Legislative House consists of members elected by the people, and the mode of proceeding in the provincial parliament is precisely the same as that followed by the parliament of Great Britain. Pop. about 2,000,000, the inhabitants of each province being pretty equally divided. Lat. between 42° and 53° N. Lon. between 64° 15′ and 90° 14′ W.—The name of Canada is taken from the Indian word kanata, which signifies a collection of huts. In 1499 the country was discovered by J. and S. Cabot, and, in 1535, was taken possession of by Jacques Cartier, in the name of Francis I., and called New France. In 1542, La Roque of Roberval, at no great distance from Quebec, founded the fort of Charlebourg; and, in 1608, Samuel Champlain laid the foundation of Quebec. In 1617 a French expedition was formed to explore the colony, on which the English made several attempts between 1689 and 1711, without much success. In 1754 the war between France and England broke out, and continued till between 1759-60, when Canada was conquered by the British, and definitively ceded to them by the treaty of Paris in 1763. One of the chief events of this war was the taking of Quebec, in 1759, where the French general, Montcalm, and the British leader, Wolfe, both fell, mortally wounded. During the American war of independence, Canada, in 1775, was invaded, but without success. In 1791 an act of parliament divided Canada into two provinces,—an Upper and Lower. In 1793 it was made an English bishopric; and there are now bishops of Quebec, Montreal, and Toronto, besides Roman Catholic bishops and Protestant ministers of all denominations. In 1812, during the second American war, Lower Canada was the scene of frequent combats between the British and Americans. In 1838 and 1839 the Lower province was shaken by a violent insurrectionary movement, which was successfully quelled by the firmness of the British power. In the latter year the Canadas were re-united under one governor-general.

Canadian River, after a course estimated at 800 miles, joins the Arkansas, in the state of Arkansas, North America, near lat. 37° N., and lon. 106° W.

Canale, ka-na'-lai, a town of Piedmont, 10 miles from Alba. It has mineral waters. Pop. 3,200.

Canandaigua, kăn'-in-dai'-ga, a post-township and village in the county of Ontario, U.S., 208 miles from Albany. Pop. about 7,000.—The town stands on a lake of the same name, 15 miles long, with an average breadth of about 2 miles.

Cananore, kan'-a-nor, a seaport-town of Hindostan, on the coast of Malabar, in the presidency of Madras, and 100 miles from Seringapatam. It was the capital of a territory long ruled over by female sovereigns, and is the chief military station of the British in Malabar.—In 1501 a small fort was built here by the Portuguese, which was, in 1664, taken by the Dutch. These were driven out by Tippoo Sahib, and, in 1790, the British took possession.

Canar, ka'-nar, a small town of New Grenada, S. America, 150 miles from Quito, celebrated for its numerous ruins, and for a palace of the Incas, in an extraordinary state of preservation.

Canara, kan'-a-ra, a province on the Malabar coast of Hindostan. It is bounded on the N. by the province of Bejapore, E. by the Mysore and Balaghaut district, S. by Malabar, and W. by the sea. Ext. 180 miles long, by 30 to 70 broad. Area, 7,720 square miles. Pop. about 1,000,000.—This province was ceded to the British government in 1799.

Canaries, or Canary Islands, kă-nair'-es, a group in the Atlantic, near the W. coast of Africa, the largest of which are Teneriffe, Grand Canary, Fuerteventura, Palma, Hierro or Ferro, Gomera, and Lancerote. They were celebrated in antiquity, under the appellation of the Fortunate Islands. United Area, estimated at 4,000 square miles. Desc. The whole have a mountainous character, some of their peaks attaining a great height, and Teneriffe culminating in 12,182 feet above the level of the sea. The sides of the mountains, which incline towards the west and north, are covered with vegetation, and exhibit, rising above each other, the plants of the torrid, the temperate, and even the frigid zone. The most verdant and fertile islands are Grand Canary and Teneriffe; Lancerote and Fuerteventura are dry and sandy; but they are all more or less volcanic. Climate. Hot, though greatly moderated by Atlantic breezes. Zoology. There are many dogs, and the goat is of great service, as also the camel and ass, which are used as beasts of burden. The principal birds are the vulture, bustard, pheasant, wood-pigeon, and the canary-bird, so well known throughout the civilized world. Pro. The most valuable production of the Canaries is wine, of which Teneriffe yields a great quantity; wheat, maize, potatoes, and French beans. The other articles of trade are brandy, archil, and soda. Pop. perhaps 205,000. Lat. between 27° 40′ and 29° 25′ N. Lon. between 13° 25′ and 18° 16′ W.—These islands were first discovered about 1330, when a Spanish or French vessel was driven upon them by stress of weather. In 1402 the Spaniards took possession of some of the islands, and, in 1512, their government was supreme throughout the group, and they have since retained possession of them.

Canary, Grand, the largest and most fertile of the group of the Canaries. Ext. About 35 miles long, by 28 broad. Area, 758 square miles. Desc. The whole island consists in a manner of one mountain, the culminating point of which is El Cumbre, which rises to 6,648 feet above the level of the sea, with its summit capped in perpetual snow. The lofty central parts of the island contain copious springs of pure water, which flow down in rivulets through the valleys, and preserve almost uninterrupted verdure and fertility. There are two, sometimes even three, harvests in the year, of wheat and maize. Pop. about 60,000.

Cancale, kan'-kal, a seaport-town and parish of France, in the department Ille-et-Vilaine, 3 miles from St. Malo. Pop. 6,000.—The rocks around Cancale furnish large quantities of oysters.

Cancellara, kan-sail-la'-ra, a town of the kingdom of Naples, 9 miles from Potenza. Pop. 3,140.

Canche, kansh, a river of France, in the department of Pas-de-Calais, which rises near Estrées, and falls, after a course of 50 miles, into the British Channel.

Candace, kăn-dai'-se, the designation conferred on the warrior queens of Æthiopia, in the later period of the kingdom of Meröe. The most distinguished in history invaded Egypt 22 B.C., but was defeated by the Romans, and compelled to sue to Augustus for peace. This she obtained, with a remission of the tribute imposed on her by Petronius, one of the generals of the Roman army. Lived in the 1st century B.C.

Candahar, or Kandahar, kan'-da-har', a fortified city of Afghanistan, and one of its capitals. It stands in a fertile plain, 200 miles from Cabool, and about 3,500 feet above the level of the sea. Pop. unascertained; but variously stated from 30,000 to 100,000. Lat. 32° 37′ N. Lon. 66° 20′ E.—This city is supposed to have originally been founded by Alexander the Great. (See Afghanistan.)

Candeish, or Khandesh, kan'-dish, an old province of Hindostan, now belonging to the presidency of Bombay, inclosed by the districts Surat and Ahmednuggur, and the Indore, Gwalior, and Nizam's territories. Area, about 9,400 square miles. Desc. Fertile, nearly encompassed by mountains, and watered by the Nerbudda, the Tuptee or Taptee, and other considerable streams. Pro. Grain, indigo, and cotton. Pop. 800,000. Lat. between 20° and 22° N. Lon. between 73° and 76° E.—Taken by the British in 1819.

Candelaro, kan'-dai-la'-ro, a river of Naples, in the province of Capitanata, rising in Mount Liburno. After receiving the Triolo, Salsola, and Celone, during a course of 40 miles, it falls into the Adriatic Sea. At its mouth are salt-works.

Candia, or Crete, kăn'-de-a, an island belonging to Turkey, in the Mediterranean, situate to the south of the Grecian archipelago. Ext. 150 miles long, with a breadth ranging from 6 to 35. Desc. Mountainous, being traversed by a high range throughout its entire length. Mount Ida, renowned in classic story, rises, near its centre, to a height of 7,674 feet. Upon it Jupiter is said to have been educated by the Corybantes. The coasts are indented with caverns, and the soil of the valleys is fertile and productive. Climate. Genial and healthy. Pro. Oil, oranges, lemons, silk, wine, raisins, carobs, honey, cotton, and corn. Manf. Leather, soap, spirits, sacking, and coarse cloths. Pop. estimated at 160,000, of whom 50,000 are Turks, the rest Greeks. Lat. between 34° 55′ and 35° 43′ N. Lon. between 23° 30′ and 26° 20′ E.—This island has been, at different times, ruled by different powers. After a war of twenty years, it was finally taken by the Turks from the Venetians in 1669.

Candia, the capital of the above island, is situate in an elevated plain on the N. coast, and is strongly fortified. The houses are mean and ill-built. The harbour, once capacious, is now available only for vessels of light draught. The soap-works here are the largest in the island. Pop. 12,000. Lat. 35° 16′ N. Lon. 25° 4′ E.—This town fell before the arms of the Turks in 1669. It was besieged for three years, during which 29,000 Christians and 70,000 Turks were slain. The Turks made 69 assaults, and the Venetians 80 sorties, and 1,364 mines were exploded on both sides.

CANDIA, kan'-de-a, a town of Piedmont, 20 miles from Novara. Pop. 2,300.—Another in the province of Ivrea. Pop. 2,300.

CANDLISH, Robert Smith, D.D., kăn'-dlish, one of the most eminent ministers of the Free Church of Scotland. He was educated for the ministry of the established Church of Scotland, and held the parochial charge of St. George's Church, Edinburgh. At the disruption of the Establishment in 1843, Dr. Candlish took a leading part, and assisted, with other eminent clergymen, to form the Free Church. He afterwards became the pastor of Free St. George's, in the Lothian-road, Edinburgh. He published numerous pamphlets and sermons, besides some works on religious subjects.

CANDY, or KANDY, kăn'-de, a kingdom of Ceylon, formerly occupying the central parts of that island, and extending outward, so as to leave a narrow ring around the whole coast. The Dutch were formerly masters of Ceylon; but being expelled by the English, the latter entered into a war with the Candians, and obtained possession of their capital, in which only a detachment of troops was left. These now suffered so much by the climate, that, being attacked by the Candians, they were compelled to retreat. Afterwards, though they surrendered on terms, all were put to the sword, with the exception of Major Davie, the commander, who was detained prisoner by the Candians, among whom he died. Candy, the capital, was again taken possession of by the British, and abandoned. In 1815 the country was again invaded with 3,000 men, and the sovereign being formally deposed in 1816, the kingdom of Candy was annexed to the British dominions.

CANDY, or KANDY, a town of Ceylon, formerly the capital of the above, situate in a plain, amidst mountains covered with wood, 62 miles from Colombo. It consists mostly of mud huts with European barracks, the residence of the British governor, several missionary schools, an hospital, and many small temples. It now belongs to the British. Pop. unascertained. Lat. 7° 23′ N. Lon. 80° 47′ E.

CANEA, or KHANIA, a fortified seaport of the island of Candia, on the north coast, 65 miles from Candia. It is a neat town, the buildings being almost all Venetian. Its harbour is the best in the island; it has a lighthouse, and is defended by a fort. Manf. Chiefly soap. Pop. 8,000, of whom about two thirds are Mahometans.

CANELLI, ka-nell'-le, a town of the Sardinian states, Piedmont, 12 miles from Asti. Pop. 3,500.

CANGA ARGUELLES, José, kan'-ga ar-gail'-yais, a Spanish author and statesman. In 1823 he became an exile in England, where he produced a "Dictionary of Finance" and "Observations on the Histories of the Peninsular War." These are his most important works, although he is the writer of several others. After passing seven years in London, he suddenly became an apologist for the measures of Ferdinand, and was permitted to return to his country. He subsequently became a member of the Cortes for the third time. B. in the Asturias, 1770; D. 1843.

CANGE, Charles du Fresne du. (See DUCANGE.)

CANGIAGO, or CAMBIGI, Ludovico, kan-ja'-go, a Genoese painter, who executed some admirable works in Italy and Spain. B. 1527; D. 1585.

CANICATTI, kan'-e-kat'-te, a town in Sicily, on the Naro, 15 miles from Girgenti. It is well built; and most of its inhabitants are connected with agriculture. Pop. 16,500.

CANIGOU, kan'-e-goo, a mountain of France, 25 miles from Perpignan. Height, 9,137 feet; being one of the culminating points of the Pyrenees.

CANINO, ka-ne'-no, a town in the States of the Church, Italy, 40 miles from Viterbo. Here is a fine palace, given by Pius VII. to Lucien Bonaparte, who also took the title of prince of Canino.

CANNÆ, kăn'-ne, a small village of Apulia, 8 miles from Barletta, near the Ofanto (formerly Aufidus), where Hannibal defeated the Roman consuls P. Æmilius and Terentius Varro, with immense slaughter, on the 21st of May, 216 B.C. The present inhabitants still call the place where the battle occurred, "the field of blood."

CANNES, or CANES, kan, a small seaport of France, in Provence, on the Mediterranean, 25 miles from Draguignan. It trades in fruit, corn, and anchovies. Pop. about 6,000.—Here Bonaparte landed on 1st March, 1815, on his return from Elba. Lord Brougham had a residence here, where he annually went, to avoid the rigours of the English winter.

CANNING, the Right Honourable George, kăn'-ning, was, on the paternal side, of Irish extraction. His father came to London, entered himself of the Middle Temple, and was called to the bar. Meeting with little practice, he abandoned the law for literature, but being unable to maintain himself in this new vocation, became a wine-merchant, in which capacity he failed, and died of a broken heart. His mother became an actress, and married an actor. He also dying, she was now married to a Mr. Hunn, a linen-draper of Exeter, and lived long enough to see her son attain the eminence to which his distinguished abilities entitled him. George was educated first at Hyde Abbey School, Winchester, then at Eton, and then at Oxford, where he was recognized as a high-class man. He then entered Lincoln's Inn, to follow the law as a profession, but being introduced by Mr. Pitt to the House of Commons, he abandoned the bar, and devoted himself wholly to the study of politics. This was in 1793. In 1796 he was appointed under-secretary of state, and in 1800 received a fortune of £100,000 by his marriage with Joanna, the daughter of General Scott. In 1801 he was appointed treasurer of the navy; and in 1807, a year after the death of Pitt, he was appointed, for the second time, secretary of state for foreign affairs. In 1809 he fought a duel with Lord Castlereagh; and in 1812 became member for Liverpool, which again elected him in 1814, 1818, and 1820. In 1816 he became president of the Board of Control, and in 1822 was named governor-general of India, and was about to embark for that country, when Lord Castlereagh, then marquis of Londonderry, committed suicide. This circumstance led to Mr. Canning relinquishing his appointment, and again accepting that of secretary of state for foreign affairs. In 1827 he became premier, the great object of a long and arduous political life. The last time he spoke in parliament was on the 20th of June, 1827. B. in London, 1770; D. at the villa of the duke of Devonshire, Chiswick, 1827.—Mr. Canning had great oratorical ability, with considerable poetical power, and much brilliancy of wit. He was a firm supporter of the cause of Catholic emancipation, and the main promoter of the independence of Greece.

CANNING, Charles John, Earl, was the only son of the Right Honourable George Canning, and on the death of his mother, in 1828, became Viscount Canning. In 1841 he was appointed secretary of state for foreign affairs, and under Sir Robert Peel became commissioner of woods and forests, and afterwards postmaster-general. In 1856 he succeeded Lord Dalhousie as governor-general of India, which appointment he held throughout the whole of the mutiny of the sepoys of 1857, 1858, and part of 1859. For his conduct during this trying period he was, in 1859, created an earl. B. 1812; D. 1862.

CANNINGTON, kăn'-ning-ton, a village and parish of Somersetshire, 3 miles from Bridgewater. Area, 3,970 acres. Pop. 1,600. In the neighbourhood is Kit-hill, with an elevation of 1,060 feet.—A station on the Great Western Railway.

CANNOCK, kăn'-nok, a parish of Staffordshire. Area, 11,970 acres. Pop. 3,000.—CANNOCK CHASE, a bleak tract of 25,000 acres, is in this neighbourhood.

CANO (Alonzo), kă'-no, is called the Michael Angelo of Spain, from the greatness of his talents in painting, statuary, and architecture. He studied architecture under his father, sculpture under Pacheco of Seville, and painting under Juan del Castillo. His two colossal statues of St. Peter and St. Paul were considered very fine, and many foreign artists came to copy them. He was soon taken notice of by Philip IV., and created first royal architect, king's painter, and instructor to the prince Don Balthazar Carlos. He adorned the palaces and churches with elegant pieces both in sculpture and painting; but a singular misfortune occurred while he was in the career of glory. Coming home one evening, he found his house robbed, his wife murdered, and his Italian man-servant fled. Notwithstanding the strong presumption against this man, the magistrates fastened their suspicion on Cano, who was known to be of a jealous temper. Fearful of the consequences, he fled; but afterwards returned to Madrid, where he was racked to extort confession. He endured the torture without uttering a word to criminate himself, when the king caused him to be delivered, and took him again into favour. After this he entered the church as an asylum from further persecution, but still continued his professional pursuits. In his last moments, when the priest held to him a crucifix, wretchedly executed, he told him to take it away, for that it was so badly done he could not bear the sight of it. B, at Grenada, 1600; D. 1676.

CANO, Sebastian del, the first seaman who sailed round the globe. He accompanied Magellan to the East Indies, and, after the death of that famous sailor, sailed to the isles of Sunda, and doubled, after many attempts, the Cape of Good Hope. He returned to Spain in 1522, after a voyage of more than three years. B. in Biscay, and lived in the 16th century.—There was also a JACQUES CANUS, a Portuguese navigator, who, in 1481, discovered the kingdom of Congo.

CANOPUS, kä-no'-pus, a god of the water, amongst the Egyptians, represented under the form of a vase, surmounted with a man's or animal's head.

CANOPUS, a city of Egypt, 12 miles from Alexandria, celebrated for the temple of Serapis. It received its name, it is said, from Canopus, the pilot of the vessel of Menelaus, who was buried in this place. Some affirm that the modern Aboukir stands here.

CANOVA, Antonio, ka-no'-va, the eminent Italian sculptor, who, at fourteen years of age, was received into the studio of Bernardi Torretti at Venice, and subsequently into that of Ferrari. His first imaginative group was "Orpheus and Eurydice;" his next, "Dædalus and Icarus," which immediately brought him prominently into notice. Through the interest of Falliero, a senator of Venice, he was enabled to exhibit his work among the leading artists of Rome; and their judgment was so satisfactory that it stimulated him to higher efforts in his beautiful art. He returned to Venice for a short time, but afterwards went back to Rome, with a pension of 300 ducats, settled by his own government upon him for three years. He now produced his "Theseus and the Minotaur," and gave such strong evidences of a graceful yet simple talent, that he was chosen to execute the monument of Ganganelli (Pope Clement XIV.), for the church of the SS. Apostoli at Rome. This exquisite performance was exhibited in 1787, and it, at once, raised him to the highest rank in his profession. He next executed Rezzonico's (Clement XIII.) monument, which, if possible, surpassed the other. This work is in St. Peter's, at Rome. His fame being now established, he employed himself in the production of imaginative subjects. His genius was classical, yet in the highest degree pure and natural. "The Graces," "Cupid and Psyche," "Endymion," "Statues of Nymphs," "Hercules hurling Lycas from the Rock," are all evidences of the originality, as well as of that refined and exalted taste by which he was distinguished. Besides such works, he executed a large number of monumental groups, as well as portrait statues; among which we may mention his Napoleon I., and Letitia, the mother of that emperor. After his fame may be said to have travelled to the ends of the earth, he visited England, where he was highly gratified with his reception. The object of this visit was chiefly to see the Elgin marbles, the sight of which, he said, was sufficient to recompense him for his journey from Rome. On his return to Rome he received a patent of nobility, with the title of marquis of Ischia, which he never assumed, but, to the last, had his cards engraved with plain Antonio Canova. B. at Possagno, a village in the Venetian territory, 1757; D. at Venice, 1822.

CANROBERT, François Certain de, kan'-ro-bair, a French marshal, who, in 1830, entered the army as a private. By attention to his duties and considerable quickness of talent, he rapidly rose through the successive ranks of his profession, and, in 1835, was sent to Africa as a sous-lieutenant. Here he rose to a captaincy; but, on entering the breach at the storming of Constantine, was severely wounded, and afterwards received the decoration of the Legion of Honour. In 1846 he became lieutenant-colonel, and was soon afterwards appointed to the command of a regiment of Zouaves. In 1850 he was made a brigadier-general, in 1852 aide-de-camp to Napoleon III., and, in 1853, a general of division. In 1854 he had the command of the first division of the army of the Crimea, under Marshal St. Arnaud; and, at the battle of the Alma, was slightly wounded by the splinter of a shell. On the death of St. Arnaud, he rose to be first in command; but the rising star of Bosquet burned with greater brilliancy in the eyes of the French. On the 5th of November he was wounded at Inkermann, and had his horse shot under him. The siege of Sebastopol, however, languished; dissatisfaction with the leaders of the allied army began to be expressed; and Canrobert, in 1855, resigned his chiefship. He did not, however, leave the Crimea, but resumed the command of his old division, and continued to serve with his usual zeal under the orders of Marshal Pélissier, who had superseded him. If this was done voluntarily, we cannot sufficiently admire the excellent temper which could submit to what most men, in his position, would have felt to be a galling humiliation. Ill health compelled him to quit the Crimea and return to Paris, where, on the birth of an heir to the imperial throne, in 1856, he was created a marshal. In 1859 he was appointed to the command of a division destined to operate against the Austrians in Piedmont; and at the battle of Magenta, fought on the 4th of June, shared in the honours of that field with General MacMahon. B. in Brittany, 1809.

CANSO, kan'-so, an island, cape, and small fishing bank, on the S.E. coast of Nova Scotia, in lat. 45° 20′ N. —The GUT OF CANSO leads from the Atlantic Ocean into Northumberland Straits, between Nova Scotia and Cape Breton.

CANSTADT, or CANNSTADT, kan'-stat, a well-built town of Wurtemberg, on the Neckar, 4 miles from Stuttgart, of the inhabitants of which it is a favourite resort. Pop. 1,500.—In the vicinity a battle was fought in 1796, between General Moreau and the Archduke Charles of Austria.

CANTA, kan'-ta, a province and government of Peru, said to contain 62 towns. Ext. 100 miles long, by 72 broad. Desc. Intersected by the Andes, on the sides of which fruits and vegetables are cultivated. Cattle, sheep, and wild goats are numerous; but little is known of the country. Pop. of province, about 13,000. Its capital, of the same name, is in lat. 11° 10′ S.

CANTABRIAN MOUNTAINS, kăn-tai'-bre-an, the W. continuation of the system of the Pyrenees, in Spain, extending as far as Cape Finisterre. Some of their summits attain an elevation of 10,000 feet.

CANTAL, kan'-tal, a department of France, which comprises the greater part of the old province Auvergne. Area, 2,000 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, with its surface almost entirely covered with the débris of extinct volcanoes. There is, consequently, no great fertility, except in the valleys. Rivers. The Alagnon, the Lot, and Dordogne, with their affluents. Pro. Buckwheat, corn, potatoes, and chestnuts; cattle are depastured on the slopes of the hills, and the manufacture of cheese is considerable. The best quality of that article is called Roquefort. Pop. 254,000.

CANTARINI, Simon, kan'-ta-re'-ne, called the "Pezarese," a disciple of Guido, whose paintings are often taken for those of his master. D. at Verona, 1648.

CANTELEUX, kan'-te-lu(r), a town of France, in the department Seine-Inférieure, on the Seine, 3 miles from Rouen. Pop. 3,500.

CANTEMIR, Demetrius, känt-e'-mir, a Moldavian prince, of Tartarian extraction. Early in life he served the grand seignior, who appointed him governor of Moldavia, which he surrendered to Peter the Great, and obtained from him the title of prince. B. 1673; D. 1723.—He wrote a "History of the Rise and Fall of the Ottoman Empire," in Latin; "The System of the Mahometan Religion;" "The Present State of Moldavia," &c.

CANTEMIR, Antiochus, son of the preceding, was educated at St. Petersburg. He was raised to several important offices, and sent ambassador to Paris and London. B. 1710; D. 1744.—He wrote poems in the Russian language, and translated Anacreon and other authors.

CANTERBURY, kăn'-ter-ber'-re, a city, borough, and county of itself, in Kent, on the Stour, 53 miles from London. Area, 3,240 acres. The town consists of four principal streets, disposed in the form of a cross, and was formerly environed by walls, many portions of which remain. The dignity of being the metropolitan archiepiscopal see of all England belongs to it, and its spacious and magnificent cathedral, composed of the architecture of different periods, was, in the 12th century, erected on the site of the first Christian church built in Saxon England. It is in the form of a double cross, 514 feet in length, and 71 at its greatest breadth. The height of the vaulted roof is 80 feet, and that of the great tower 235. Many of the windows are superbly adorned with painted glass. Besides the cathedral, there are many parish churches within the walls of the city, and three in the suburbs. There are likewise places of worship for other denominations, several charitable institutions, a handsome and commodious court-hall or guild, a philosophical institution, with a library and museum, a gaol, a theatre, and barracks both for cavalry and infantry. A high mound, known by the name of "Dane John Hill," and encompassed by the city wall, is supposed to have been thrown up by the Danes. It forms the chief promenade of the citizens, as the old ramparts have been turned into terraces, and new ones added. There are two mineral springs, which are much resorted to. Manf. Silk and cotton. Pop. 18,500.—This city is very ancient, and was called Durovernum by the Romans. The archbishop of Canterbury is the first peer of the realm, next to the royal family, and crowns the sovereign in Westminster Hall. Here is the Old Chequers Inn, celebrated by Chaucer, and here Thomas à Becket was assassinated in 1171. (See BECKET, Thomas à.)

CANTERBURY, a village and township of the United States, in New Hampshire, 8 miles from Concord. Pop. 1,700.—Another in Connecticut, 12 miles from Norwich. Pop. 1,800, chiefly engaged in cotton and woollen factories.

CANTERBURY, a settlement on the north part of the island of New Zealand, founded by a committee of Episcopalians. The district is fertile, and is calculated to embrace an area of 2,400,000 acres.

CANTIRE, or KINTYRE, kin'-tire, a peninsula running between the Firth of Clyde and the Atlantic Ocean. It forms the S. extremity of Argyleshire, Scotland. Ext. 40 miles long, with an average breadth of 6½.—The MULL is the S.W. point of the peninsula, and has a lighthouse 297 feet high. Lat. 55° 19′ N. Lon. 5° 49′ W.

CANTON, John, kăn'-ton, an experimental philosopher, who, after obtaining a common education, was apprenticed to the trade of broadcloth-weaving. His leisure hours were devoted to mathematical studies, in which he succeeded so well as to make a dial upon stone, which not only gave the hour of the day, but the rising of the sun, his place in the ecliptic, and other particulars. This was fixed against the front of his father's house, and so pleased many gentlemen of the neighbourhood, that he found, by access to their libraries, great helps in his favourite pursuits. In 1739 he went to London, and was engaged as assistant to Mr. Watkins, master of an academy in Spitalfields, whom he afterwards succeeded. About 1746 he made some discoveries in electricity, and in 1750 presented to the Royal Society a method of making artificial magnets, for which he was elected a member, and received the gold medal. In 1751 he was honoured with the degree of M.A. by the University of Aberdeen, and chosen one of the council of the Royal Society. His communications to that learned body, upon astronomical and philosophical subjects, were numerous and important, but he never published any separate work. B. at Stroud, Gloucestershire, 1718; D. 1772.

CANTON, the name of numerous townships in the United States, none of them with a population above 5,000.

CANTON, a city and seaport of China, in the province of Quang-tong, of which it is the capital. It is situate on a river of the same name, at a distance of about 70 miles from its mouth, and is surrounded by walls about six or seven miles in circuit, mounted with several cannon, and entered by twelve gates. The suburbs are very extensive, and the streets are long, straight, and narrow, some of the principal not exceeding 15 or 20 feet in width. The houses are built of brick, one story high, with two or three courts behind, for warehouses, or apartments for the females of the family. All the streets are well furnished with shops. The factories of the different European powers extend along the banks of the river, having their respective flags displayed. They usually consist of four or five houses; and the factory belonging to the British surpasses the others in size and elegance. A broad parade, called Respondentia Walk, extends along the river in front of the factories, where the Europeans resort to enjoy the cool of the evening. It is a place of very great trade, and several canals, crossed by stone bridges, intersect it in different parts. A large portion of the population live on the water and the banks of the river, and canals are lined with mud huts, in which the poorer classes take up their abodes at the rate of from 12 to 20 persons in one apartment. The principal exports are tea, nankeen, silks, mother-of-pearl, tortoise-shell, tutenag, China-ware, and many other articles. The imports from Great Britain and her eastern settlements are woollen cloths, cotton, opium, betel-nut, furs, and watches. Pop. estimated at upwards of 1,000,000. Lat. 23° 6′ 9″ N. Lon. 113° 15′ E.—In October, 1856, a serious misunderstanding arose between Great Britain and China, out of the Chinese boarding the Arrow, a small vessel with a British colonial register, lying in the Canton river. For an account of the proceedings connected with this, and of the operations of the naval and military authorities, see ELGIN, Lord; SEYMOUR, Sir Michael; TIEN-TSIN, and CHINA.)

CANTON, the name of numerous townships with small populations in the United States of America.

CANTON RIVER, the Choo-Keang, or "Pearl River," of the Chinese, is the lower part of the Pe-Kiang. It has a navigable course of 300 miles, and 40 miles below Canton is called the Bocca Tigris. It is studded all round Canton with numerous islands, upon which rice is cultivated, and many forts are placed.

CANTU, Cesare, kan'-too, an Italian historian, whose liberal opinions drew upon him, in 1812, the vengeance of the Austrian government, who condemned him to a year's imprisonment. His principal work is his "Storia Universale," which was published at Milan, and extends to 20 vols. 8vo. It has passed through several editions, and has also been translated into French. He has written several other works; among which we may notice his "Reformation in Europe," which was translated into English and published in 1817. In poetry and poetic criticism he has, likewise, exercised his pen. B. at Brescia, 1805.

CANUTE, or KNUD, kăn'-ute, the Great, king of Denmark and England, succeeded his father Sweyn in the former kingdom about the year 1014. Coming to England at the commencement of his reign in Denmark, he landed on the southern coast, where he committed dreadful ravages. Edmund Ironside, however, opposed him with such bravery that Canute agreed to divide the kingdom between them. On the murder of Edmund by Edric, in 1017, Canute obtained the whole kingdom, in an assembly of the states, conciliating the people by his espousal of Ethelred's widow. He then put to death Edric and several of the English nobility who had basely deserted their sovereign. He likewise levied heavy taxes, particularly on the inhabitants of London, but distributed justice with an even hand, and showed no partiality to the Danes in preference to the English. The king of Sweden having attacked Denmark, he embarked on an expedition against him, and slew the Swedish monarch in battle. Great now as was his power, he did not suffer it to inflate him with vanity. He returned to England, where it is said some of his flatterers praised him beyond the limits of even parasitical adulation. Shocked at the extravagance of his courtiers, whilst at Southampton, he caused a chair to be placed on the seashore. In this he seated himself, and commanding the waves not to approach nearer, calmly awaited his mandate to be obeyed. The heedless tide, however, rolled nearer and nearer, until it touched his royal feet. "See," said he to his flatterers, "how regardless of my power are these waves;" and bade them remember that no one should be called sovereign but the Great Being whom the waters and the winds alike obey. He subsequently made a pilgrimage to Rome, and on his return founded the monasteries of St. Benuet, at Holme, and St. Edmund's Bury. D. 1035.

CANUTE III. (See HARDICANUTE.)

CANUTE IV., called the Pious, king of Denmark, succeeded his brother Harold in 1080. He undertook an expedition to England, which failed. He made such extraordinary grants of land to the Church, that it excited his subjects to rise against him, and he was slain in a tumult, 1087. On this account he was canonized by Pope Alexander III. in 1164. There were some other princes of the same name, but their history contains nothing of importance.

CAPE, properly a small portion of land jutting into the sea; although the term is also used to define a promontory. For all capes, not given below, see their respective names.

CAPE CHARLES, a headland of British North America. Lat. 52° 25′ N. Lon. 55° 10′ W.

CAPE CLEAR, the most southern headland of Ireland, on an island, with a lighthouse 455 feet above the sea. Lat. 51° 26′ N. Lon. 9° 29′ W.

CAPE COAST CASTLE, the capital of the British settlements on the coast of N. Guinea, Africa. Desc. Wooded in the neighbourhood, but deficient in water. Climate. Humid and unhealthy. Pro. Palm-oil and maize, which, with gold-dust and tortoiseshell, are exported. Lat. 5° 5′ 25″ N. Lon. 1° 12′ 45″ W.

CAPE COD, a peninsula of North America, in the Atlantic. Lat. 42° 2′ 23″ N. Lon. 70° 3′ 55″ W.—It is so called from the great number of codfish found in Massachusetts Bay.

CAPE-DA-ROCA, da-ro'-ka, the most western headland of Portugal, with a lighthouse and fort, 30 miles from Lisbon.

CAPE FEAR, a headland forming the S. point of Smith's Island, North America. Lat. 33° 48′ N. Lon. 78° 9′ W.

CAPE FRIO, fre'-o, a headland on the coast of Brazil, 80 miles from Rio Janeiro. Lat. 22° 59′ 9″ S. Lon. 41° 57′ 2″ W.

CAPE GIRARDEAU, je'-rar-do, a county of the United States, in Missouri. Area, 864 square miles. Pop. 14,000, of whom about 2,000 are slaves.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE, or CAPE COLONY, commonly known as "The Cape," a tract of country in Southern Africa, colonized by the British, and taking its name from the cape which forms its southern extremity. It is bounded on the N. by the Orange and Val rivers; on the E. and S. by the Indian Ocean, Caffraria, Natal, and the Drakenberg mountains; and on the W. by the Atlantic Ocean. Ext. 900 miles in length, with a breadth of 400. Area, about 170,000 square miles. Bays. St. Helena, Table, False, St. Sebastian, Mossel, Plattenberg, and Algoa. Divisions. The colony is divided into 21 districts, of which Stellenbosch is the principal wine, and Zwellendam the principal corn districts; the others are chiefly devoted to cattle-grazing. Desc. The Cape territory consists of three successive ranges of mountains, running parallel to each other and to the southern coast. Each of these, as it ascends above the other, is proportionably barren. The last range attains a height of 10,000 feet, and the table-land or plain, from which it takes its rise, is considerably more elevated than either of the two other ranges. Thus Southern Africa forms a succession of mountain terraces, rising above each other. The plain, next the sea, has a deep and fertile soil, is watered by numerous rivulets, well clothed with grass, and exhibits a rich variety of trees and shrubs. The second terrace contains a considerable proportion of well-watered and fertile lands; whilst the third, called the Great Karoo, is about 200 miles long, and 50 broad, and consists of an impenetrable soil, nearly destitute of every trace of vegetation. What is called the Cape District consists chiefly of a peninsula formed by the ocean on the W., by Table Bay on the N., and False Bay on the S. It is connected with the continent by an isthmus, low, flat, and sandy, of considerable breadth, while the peninsula itself is entirely composed of mountains. Of these the most conspicuous is Table Mountain, forming its N. extremity, immediately above Cape Town, and rising to the height of 3,582 feet. Rivers. Great Fish, Keiskamma, Bushman, Sunday, Camtoos, Briede Berg, Oliphant, and Orange. Although the streams are numerous, in the summer they are mostly dry. Zoology. The wild animals, such as wolves, hyenas, elephants, hippopotami, tigers, antelopes, &c. have almost disappeared from every part of the settlement. In place of these, cattle and sheep have multiplied, and their breeds have been much improved. The merino sheep thrives admirably, and large quantities of its wool are sent to England. The ostrich is found in the plains, and the eagle in the mountains, whilst snakes abound. Climate. Excessive; the country is deluged with rain during the cold season; while in the hot months scarcely a shower falls to refresh the earth. Notwithstanding these disadvantages, however, the grain of the Cape is said to be equal in quality to any in the world. Pro. Nowhere, perhaps, are produced plants and flowers more distinguished by the elegance of their forms and the brilliancy of their colours, yet the cultivation of the useful cereals has not progressed to a great extent. The culture of the vine, which grows here freely, although the fruit, perhaps, is rather abundant than of first-rate quality, receives considerable attention. There is a large exportation, principally to the mother country, of the wines known as Cape and Constantia, and a kind of port wine is also manufactured. Minerals. Gold has been found in the basin of the Orange river, and there are copper-mines at work, yielding, it is said, 60 to 70 per cent. of pure metal. Pop. 286,000. Lat. between 26° 30′ and 34° 51′ S. Lon. between 17° 10′ and 29° 20′ E.—The Cape of Good Hope, which was long a barrier to the progress of Europeans eastward, was discovered in 1486 by Barthélemy Diaz, a Portuguese navigator. He called it the "Cape of Tempests," on account of the storms which he had there experienced. John II., of Portugal, however, altered its title to that of "Good Hope," as he justly thought that it would open the road to the Indies. It was doubled in 1497, by the Portuguese navigator Vasco de Gama; then European ships were seen, for the first time, in the Indian seas. The Dutch, in 1600, in the infancy of their Indian trade, fixed upon it as a station for their vessels to take in water and provisions, and at last began to colonize it. The Hottentots were either reduced to slavery, or driven beyond the mountains, and the Cape settlement was gradually extended. It 1795 it was reduced by the British naval force, but restored to Holland by the peace of Amiens. It was again reduced in January, 1806, and was permanently confirmed to Britain at the congress of Vienna.

CAPE HATTERAS, hät'-te-ras, in the United States, at the angle of a long reef which lines the coast of N. Carolina. Lat. 35° 14′ N. Lon. 75° 30′ W.

CAPE HAYTIEN, hai'-ti-en, a seaport-town of Hayti, 40 miles from Port au Prince. Pop. perhaps 14,000. Lat. 19° 40′ N. Lon. 69° 54′ W.

CAPE HORN, or HOORN, horn, the most southern point of America, named by Schouten, its discoverer, after the place of his nativity in the Netherlands. Lat. 55° 58′ 40″ S. Lon. 67° 16′ W.

CAPE LA HAGUE, haig, a promontory of France, in the English Channel, opposite the island of Alderney, 16 miles from Cherbourg. Lat. 49° 43′ 22″ N. Lon. 1° 57′ 6″ W.—CAPE LA HOGUE is on the opposite side of the same peninsula, off which the united Dutch and English fleets, under Admiral Russell, defeated the French naval force under Tourville, May 19th, 1692.

CAPE MAY, a county and headland of New Jersey, in the United States. Area, 240 square miles. Desc. Fertile. Pop. 7,000.

CAPE MOUNT, a river of W. Africa, falling into the Atlantic Ocean in lat. 6° 44′ N.; lon. 11° 25′ W.

CAPE RIVER, or VAUNKS, vawnks, a river of Central America, which, after a course of 300 miles, falls into the Caribbean Sea, at Cape Gracios a Dios. Its course is through the Maragua and Mosquito country, and it is navigable to a considerable distance inland.

CAPE TOWN, a fortified seaport-town in S. Africa, agreeably situate at the head of Table Bay, on a plain sloping downwards from Table Mount, and 32 miles from "the Cape." The streets are built with great regularity, being all parallel to, and intersecting each other at right angles; they are open and airy, watered by canals, which are walled in, and planted with oaks on each side. There are a great many churches and chapels, an exchange, an observatory, a college, the South African Institution, a public library, and a botanic garden. Cape Town is defended by a castle of considerable strength, to which numerous batteries were added by Sir James Craig. Lat. 33° 56′ S. Lon. 18° 28′ 7″ E.—On the 1st July, 1854, the first parliament elected by the colony was here opened.

CAPE VERD, verd, the most W. cape of Africa, called from a group of baobab trees, which crown its summit. Lat. 14° 43′ N. Lon. 17° 31′ W.

CAPE VERD ISLANDS, a Portuguese group in the Atlantic Ocean, 320 miles W. of the above cape. They consist of ten islands and four islets. Their names are Bonavista, Sal, Mayo, Santiago, Brava, Fogo, Grande, Rombo, S. Nicolao, and S. Luzia; Branco, Razo, S. Vialente, and S. Antao. United Area, estimated at 1,680 square miles. Desc. Mountainous in general, with some of the peaks rising to a considerable height. The volcano of Fogo attains an elevation of 9,157 feet above the level of the sea. Pro. Maize, rice, French beans, coffee, cotton, indigo, tobacco, orchil, and an abundance of the usual tropical fruits. Cattle are reared, and pigs and goats are numerous. Mules and asses are the beasts of burden, and fowls are plentiful. Fish abound in the neighbouring seas, and amber is found along the coasts. The scarcity of fresh water, however, is a great drawback, and is the occasion of frequent and severe distress. The principal branches of industry are the preparation of salt and agriculture. Manf. Leather, linen, soap, and pottery. Pop. estimated at about 70,000, of which there are some slaves. Lat. between 14° 45′ and 17° 13′ N. Lon. between 22° 45′ and 25° 25′ W.—The province of CAPE VERD comprises these islands and the Portuguese possessions near Cape Roxo, on the African continent, the capital of which is Mindello, in the island of St. Vincent. The only worship is the Roman Catholic.

CAPE WRATH, rawth, is the N.W. extremity of Scotland, and is formed by a pyramid of gneiss, topped by a lighthouse 400 feet above the sea. Lat. 58° 38′ N. Lon. 4° 58′ 5″ W.

CAPE YORK, the extreme point of the N.E. coast of Australia. Lat. 10° 38′ S. Lon. 142° 33′ E.

CAPEFIGUE, Baptiste Honoré Raymond, kap'-feeg, a French historian and periodical writer, who studied for the law; but becoming a contributor to the newspapers in Paris, adopted literature as a profession. For a time he was editor of the "Quotidienne," and subsequently devoted the energies of his pen to the columns of most of the Parisian leading papers; besides writing for the "Revue des Deux Mondes." Whilst supporting himself by this means, he was labouring in the mine of history, and has produced upwards of one hundred volumes, most of which have relation to some period in the annals of his own country. B. at Marseilles, 1801.

CAPEL, Arthur Lord, kai'-pel, an English nobleman, who, in the parliament of 1640, voted for the attainder of the earl of Strafford, a measure which he afterwards sincerely repented. Finding that the Parliament went farther against the king than he wished, he began to oppose their violent measures, for which he was created Lord Capel of Hadham. In the war which followed, his zeal in the royal cause induced the Parliament to confiscate his estates. In 1648 he, with the earl of Norwich and Sir Charles Lucas, defended Colchester against the parliament forces, but was obliged at last to surrender, upon promise of quarter. He was, however, committed to the Tower, whence he made his escape, but being soon taken, was tried and executed, March 9, 1649.

CAPELL, Edward, an editor of Shakspeare, who obtained the place of deputy-inspector of plays, with a salary of £200 a year. He spent 20 years on his edition of Shakspeare; but his comments are rather suggestive than solid. His style is obscure, pedantic, and crippled; so much so that it drew from Dr. Johnson the remark that "the man should have come to me, and I would have endowed his purpose with words; as it is, he doth gabble monstrously." He wrote and edited other works, but with as little ability as he did those of Shakspeare. B. near Bury St. Edmund's, 1713; D. 1781.

CAPELLEN, Goderd Alexander Gerard Philip, Baron Van der, ka-pel'-len, governor-general of the Dutch East Indies, was, in 1809, appointed minister of internal affairs under King Louis Bonaparte, with whom, in 1811, he went to his retreat at Gratz, in Stiria. On the emancipation of Holland from the French yoke, Capellen was, in 1814, made governor-general of the Dutch East Indies; but he did not set out for the scene of his administration till after the battle of Waterloo, when he proceeded to Java. In 1826 he was recalled in disgrace, notwithstanding the many excellent reforms which he effected among the people he had been sent to govern. For a long time the prejudice against him was great; but justice, though tardy, came at last and vindicated his conduct in the eyes of his countrymen. He rose once more into favour, and was appointed ambassador to England on the occasion of the coronation of Queen Victoria. B. at Utrecht, 1778; D. at his seat at Vollenhoven, 1848.

CAPELLO, Bianca, ka-pel'-lo, a Venetian lady, who, from the mistress became the wife of Francis, son of the grand duke Cosmo de Medici. She possessed considerable talents for intrigue, and deceived her lover, who was desirous of offspring, by pretending that she had had a child born to her. She and her husband died within a few days of each other, in 1587, not without strong suspicion of being poisoned by the cardinal Ferdinand, brother of Francis. D. at Venice, about 1542.

CAPERNAUM, kă-per'-nă-um, 'the field of repentance,' or 'city of comfort,' the capital of Galilee, on the Sea of Tiberias, and the chief residence of Christ while exercising his ministry.

CAPESTERRE, LA, or LE MARIGOT, kaps'-tair, mar'-e-go, a town of Guadaloupe, 13 miles from Basseterre. Pop. 4,000, of whom upwards of 3,000 are slaves.

CAPET, Hugues, ka'-pai, the founder of the Capet dynasty of French princes, of whom very little is known. He is said to have been of plebeian origin, and to have usurped the throne in the 10th century. D. 996.—On the accession of the house of Bourbon, the name of Capet was either given to them or taken by them, and all the processes in the trial of Louis XVI. were made against Louis Capet.

CAPHTOR, kif'-tor, 'a sphere,' 'a buckle,' or 'a hand,' supposed to be the island of Crete. Its people are designated Caphtorims.

CAPITANATA, ka'-pe-ta-na'-ta, a province of Naples, extending from the Gulf of Venice to the province of Principato Citra. Desc. Fertile, and producing fruit, wine, saffron, and salt. The pastures are rich, and numerous herds are reared. Pop. about 320,000.

CAPITOLIUM, kăp-i-to'-le-um, 'the Capitol,' a celebrated temple and citadel at Rome, on the Tarpeian rock, the plan of which was drawn by Tarquin Priscus, the building commenced by Servius Tullius, finished by Tarquin Superbus, and consecrated by the consul Horatius, after the expulsion of the Tarquins from Rome. It stood upon four acres of ground; the front was adorned with three rows of pillars, and the other sides with two. The ascent to it from the ground was by a hundred steps. The magnificence and richness of the Capitol were immense, all the consuls successively giving donations to it. Its thresholds were of brass, and its roof of gold, and, throughout, it was adorned with vessels and shields of solid silver, golden chariots, &c. It was destroyed three times,—once during the civil wars, and twice under the emperors; but it rose again, more magnificent than ever, under Domitian. When its foundation was sunk, the head of a man called Tolus was found in it, and the hill was, from the circumstance, called Capitolium; a capite Toli. The consuls and magistrates offered sacrifices there when they first entered upon their offices; and, in triumphs, the procession was always conducted to the Capitol.

CAPIZ, ka'-peeth, a city of the Philippines, on the coast of the island of Panay, of which it is the capital. It is the residence of the governor of a province. Pop. 12,000.

CAPO D'ISTRIA, Count of, ka'-po dees'-tre-a, a Greek, who began life as a student of medicine, but who entered the service of Russia, and was attached to the embassy at Vienna. In 1813 he became the plenipotentiary of Russia to Switzerland, and gained the favour of the Swiss by advocating the restoration of all the territory which the French had taken from them, and the re-establishment of Helvetian independence. In 1814 he was at the congress of Vienna, and, in the following year, was the plenipotentiary of Russia in the final treaty of peace with France. For the next ten or twelve years he laboured to undermine Turkey; and, on the separation of Greece from that power, he was, after the battle of Navarino, in 1828, installed president of the Greek government. In this capacity, however, he acquired little credit, being constantly at variance with the people over whom he presided. B. in Corfu, 1780; assassinated at Napoli di Romania, 1831.

CAPO D'ISTRIA, a fortified seaport of Austria, in the circle of Istria, and on a small island in the Gulf of Trieste. It communicates with the mainland by a drawbridge nearly half a mile long, and has a cathedral, a great many churches, a gymnasium, and a prison. Manf. Soap and leather. Pop. about 7,000.

CAPPADOCIA, kap'-pa-do'-she-a, a country of Asia Minor, between the Halys, the Euphrates, and the Euxine. It received its name from the river Cappadox, which separated it from Galatia. Its inhabitants were vile and superstitious, and addicted to every vice, according to the ancients. They reared sheep and beautiful horses.

CAPPAGH, kăp'-pa, a parish of Ireland, in the county of Tyrone, 5 miles from Omagh. Area, 37,671 acres. Pop. 12,000.

CAPPEL, kap-pel', a village of Switzerland, 10 miles from Zurich. Here, in 1531, Ulrich Zwinglius was killed in a skirmish against the papists.

CAPRAJA, ka'-pra-e-a, a small island of Sardinia, in the Tuscan Sea, 18 miles from Corsica. Area, 3½ miles long, by 1½ broad. Desc. Mountainous, and productive in wine and oil. There is a small fortified port of the same name on the island. Pop. about 3,000.—It takes its name from the numerous wild goats found upon it.

CAPRERA, ka-prair'-a, an island in the Mediterranean Sea, off the N. coast of Sardinia. Length, 5 miles.

CAPRI, ka'-pre, a small island in the Mediterranean, at the entrance of the Bay of Naples, and 20 miles from the city of Naples. Ext. 5 miles long, by 3 broad. Desc. Mountainous, with a rocky soil, but producing fruit, grain, oil, and wine. Pop. 2,300.—The PORT OF CAPRI is a small fortified town on its S. side.

CAPRICORN ISLANDS, kăr'-pri-korn, a small group on the tropic of the same name, off the E. coast of Australia.

CAPUA, ka'-poo-a, a town of Naples, in the Terra di Lavoro, on the Volturno, 20 miles from Naples. It contains, besides the cathedral, a collegiate church, several parish churches, and a number of convents. Capua has a strong citadel, and is considered to be the key of Naples on the N. Pop. about 8,000.—In ancient times this city rivalled Rome, being called altera Roma, another Rome; and possessed so many pleasures and luxuries, that it enervated the soldiers of Hannibal, and rendered them unfit for the severities of war.

CARACALLA, Marcus Aurelius Antoninus, kăr'-a-kăl'-la, a Roman emperor, who, with Geta his brother, succeeded his father Severus; but, desirous of reigning alone, he slew his brother whilst in the arms of his mother. After gaining over the soldiers, he wantoned in cruelty, and married his mother-in-law. The people of Alexandria, having uttered some sarcasms on the murder of Geta, he entered it with his army, and put all the inhabitants to the sword. Slain by one of his guards, at Edessa, in 217.

CARACCAS, ka-rak'-kas, a province of Venezuela, bounded on the N. by the Caribbean Sea, on the S. by Venezuela proper and Guiana, on the E. by Barcelona, and on the W. by Varinas and Carabobo. Area, about 46,000 geographical square miles. Desc. Varied with hill and dale, but flat along the coast. Pro. Indigo, coffee, and cocoa. Pop. 243,000. Lat. between 7° 38' and 10° 26' N. Lon. between 65° 30' and 68° W.

CARACCAS, the capital of Venezuela, in the above province. It is built on a declivity, nearly 300 feet above the level of the sea, at a distance of about 16 miles from the coast of the Caribbean Sea. Its situation is healthy, and it is plentifully supplied with water. Pop. from 40,000 to 50,000.—In 1812 an earthquake destroyed 12,000 persons in this place.

CARACTACUS, or CARADOC, kă-răk'-ta-kus, a British king, celebrated for his magnanimous deportment when brought before the emperor Claudius, in 52. He had been betrayed by Cartismandua. Claudius was so touched on the occasion as to take him into his favour, and to give him his liberty. There were some other British princes of the same name.

CARADOG, kăr'-a-dog, a British historian, who wrote the chronicle of Wales from 636 to his own time. Of this work several copies remain. D. 1156.—One copy of his chronicle has been continued to 1196, and another to 1280. They are all in MS.

CARAFFA, ka-raf'-fa, an eminent Neapolitan family, divided into many branches, and all descended from Filippo Caraffa, lord of Spinalonga, who died in 1220.

CARA HISSAR. (See AFIOM-KARA-HISSAR.)

CARAMANIA, or KARAMAN, ka-ra-mai'-ne-a, an extensive province of Asiatic Turkey, bounded N. and W. by Natolia, and S. by the Mediterranean, with Sinas and Marash on its other sides. Its boundaries here, however, are not exactly defined. Desc. Mountainous, but intersected with beautiful valleys, in which cotton, sesamum, fruits, and tobacco are raised. Silk is also produced; but the rearing of cattle is the principal branch of industry. It is watered by the Sihon and Kizil Irmak, besides being supplied with numerous small lakes. Pop. 2,500,000, perhaps. Lat. between 37° and 40° N. Lon. between 31° and 37° E.

CARANACA, ka'-ra-na'-ka, a town of Spain, 40 miles from Murcia. Near it is a mountain, in which is the stalactitic cavern of Barquilla. Pop. 10,000.

CARAUSIUS, kă-raw'-si-us, a Roman captain, a native of Belgic Gaul, whom Maximian employed to defend the coasts of Gaul against the piratical Franks and Saxons. Here he acquired so much wealth by his prizes, as to excite the jealousy of the emperor. Carausius, foreseeing the results of this, sailed for Britain, where, in 287, he caused himself to be proclaimed emperor by the Roman legions. He now maintained a formidable fleet, and was enabled to resist all attempts to expel him, the Romans being obliged to acknowledge his independence in a treaty. Assassinated by Allectus, one of his principal officers, 293.

CARAVAGGIO, kar'-a-vaj'-e-o, a town of Northern Italy, 15 miles from Bergamo. Pop. about 7,000. —Here Francis Sforza defeated the Venetians in 1448. The painters Polidoro Caldaro and Michael Angelo Merigi, both surnamed Caravaggio, were natives of this town.

CARBLT, LE, kar'-bai, the capital of Martinique, 2 miles from Saint-Pierre. To the S. of this town is a volcanic mountain, estimated above 5,000 feet high. Pop. about 4,000, of whom two thirds are slaves.

CARBON, kar'-bon, a county of Pennsylvania, in the United States. Area, 400 square miles. Desc. Rough and barren, but the most extensive coal-mining district in the United States. It has a great number of saw, flour, grist, and powder-mills, and several local railways in operation to facilitate the trade of the county. Pop. about 20,000.

CARCASSONNE, kar-kas-son', an ancient city and parish of France, divided into the Upper and Lower towns by the river Aude, 55 miles from Toulouse. The former contains the castle and cathedral church, but the latter is better built, being comparatively modern. It is the see of a bishop, has a college and a tribunal of commerce. Manf. Cloth, paper, leather, linen, soap, and nails. It also trades in grain, fruit, flour, wine, and brandy. Pop. 21,000.—The old town is very ancient, and suffered greatly in the wars against the Albigenses. The river, where the town stands, is crossed by a bridge of 10 arches.

CARCHEMISH, kăr'-ke-mish, 'a lamb carried off,' a city of Mesopotamia, on the river Euphrates.

CARDAN, Jerome, kar'-dan, a celebrated Italian physician, who, in 1552, went to Scotland, and cured the archbishop of St. Andrew's of an asthma which had baffled the skill of numerous physicians. He was next admitted to the court of Edward VI., and cast the nativity of that prince. Thence he rambled through various countries, and at Bologna was committed to prison. On recovering his liberty he went to Rome, where he ended his days. B. at Pavia, 1501; D. at Rome, 1576.—As a physician he was empirical, and in philosophy fanciful and extravagant, but in mathematical knowledge he was eminent. He was so addicted to astrology, that, having foretold the time of his own death, it is said, he starved himself to prove the truth of his prediction. His works were printed at Lyons in 1663, in 10 vols. folio.

CARDIFF, kar-dif, a seaport-town of Glamorganshire, on the Taff, which is here crossed by a bridge of five arches, 11 miles from Newport. A navigable canal, 25 miles long, constructed among the mountains, communicates with the Merthyr Tydvil works, whence a great quantity of cast and wrought iron is brought. Its public buildings are a church, a new town-hall, a county gaol, law-courts, and a theatre. Pop. 18,500.—Cardiff is an ancient place, and is surrounded by walls, in which were four gates. Its castle, once large and strongly fortified, was erected about the year 1079. Robert, duke of Normandy, was confined in it for 26 years after the battle of Tinchebrai. This fortress was afterwards taken and partially demolished by Cromwell, but still forms an interesting object, much of its ancient grandeur having been preserved or restored. It is a station on the Taff Vale and Aberdare Railway.

CARDIGAN, earl of, James Thomas Brudenell, kar'-di-gan, entered the army in his 27th year, and in 1830 became a lieutenant-colonel of hussars. The death of his father brought him into possession of a large fortune, and he devoted a considerable sum to the service of his regiment. In 1841 he was tried and acquitted by the House of Lords for having fought a duel, in which he had wounded his adversary. In 1854 he commanded the 11th hussars, and, in the same year, was appointed a major-general of the light cavalry despatched to serve in the Crimea. On the 25th October he led the celebrated charge at Balaclava against upwards of 5,000 Russian cavalry. In 1855 he was created a commander of the Bath, and in the following year was made a commander of the Legion of Honour by Napoleon III., and appointed inspector-general of cavalry. D. in London, 1797.

CARDIGAN, the capital of Cardiganshire, situate about two miles from the mouth of the river Tivey, which is here crossed by a bridge of seven arches. It was formerly surrounded by a wall, and defended by a castle, now in ruins. It is about 35 miles from Aberystwith, has a church, a town-hall, a poor-house, and the county gaol. There is a good trade in slates, oats, butter, coal, limestone, and timber. Pop. 4,000.

CARDIGAN BAY, an inlet of St. George's Channel, encompassed by the counties of Pembroke, Cardigan, Caernarvon, and Merioneth. Near its N. extremity is the island of Bardsey.

CARDIGANSHIRE, kar'-di-gan-sheer, a maritime county of Wales, bounded N. by the counties of Merioneth and Montgomery, E. by those of Radnor and Brecknock, S. by Caermarthenshire, and W. by the Irish Sea. Area, 675 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, interspersed with plains and mosses. Plinlimmon, 2,463 feet high, is its greatest elevation. There are many valuable mines in Cardiganshire, which afford silver, lead, and copper. Cattle, sheep, and wool are the staple commodities of the county; and a large proportion of the latter is manufactured for home use. Rivers. The Tivey, Arth, Cledon, Wirrai, Ystwith, Rheidol, Towy. Pop. 71,000.

CARDINGTON, kar'-ding-ton, a village and parish of Bedfordshire. Area, 5,050 acres. Pop. 1,500.—Howard the philanthropist lived here, and there is a tablet to his memory in the church.

CARDONA, kar-do'-na, a town of Spain, 45 miles from Barcelona. Pop. 2,500.—In its vicinity there is a mountain of rock salt, 500 feet high, yielding an inexhaustible supply of the article of which it is composed.

CARDROSS, kar'-dross, a village and parish of Dumbartonshire, Scotland, 4 miles from Dumbarton, on the Clyde. Pop. 4,500.—Smollett the historian and novelist was born in this parish in 1720.

CARDUCCIO, kar-dootch'-o, the name of two brothers, Florentine painters, who resided principally in Spain, and attained great distinction in the service of Kings Philip II., III., and IV. Lived in the 16th century.

CARDWELL, Edward, kard'-wel, a modern English statesman, belonging to the party known as Peelites, who studied for the bar, and in 18— became a member of the Inner Temple. In 1842 he was elected member for Clitheroe, and in 1847 and 1853 represented Liverpool and Oxford successively. His principles attaching him to the policy of Sir Robert Peel, he held the office of secretary for the Treasury in 1845-46. Under the administration of Lord John Russell, 1852, he was president of the Board of Trade, which he resigned on the accession of the ministry of Lord Palmerston in 1855. In 1852 he was made a privy councillor, and, under the administration of Lord Palmerston, in 1859, was appointed secretary for Ireland. D. in Liverpool, 1813.

CAREME, Marie Antoine, ka-raim', a celebrated French cook, who, abandoned by his parents when quite a child, filled the commonest situations in the kitchen. By his study and labour, however, he raised the culinary art almost to a science, and made his name celebrated at all the courts of Europe. He wrote several works, where he has laid down the principles of his art. The chief of these is, "The Art of Cookery in the 19th Century." B. at Paris, 1784; D. 1833.

CAREW, George, ka-roo', a learned English nobleman, who entered upon a military life, and served with reputation in Ireland and at Cadiz. James I. made him governor of Guernsey, and created him Lord Carew of Clopton. He afterwards became master-general of the ordnance, and a privy councillor. Charles I. created him earl of Totness. B. in Devonshire, 1557; D. 1629.—He wrote a "History of the Wars in Ireland," printed in 1633, folio.

CAREW, Thomas, an English poet, educated at Corpus Christi College, Oxford. He was appointed gentleman of the privy chamber, and sewer (taster) in ordinary to Charles I. B. in Gloucestershire, 1589; D. 1639.—His masque entitled "Cœlum Britannicum" was performed before the king and nobility at Whitehall, 1633; and the beautiful airiness of his effusions places him equal, if not superior, to Waller.

CAREW, Richard, an English topographer, known by his "Survey of Cornwall," printed first in 1602, 4to, again in 1723, and lastly in 1769. Of this county he was, in 1586, appointed high sheriff. B. at Anthony, Cornwall, 1555; D. 1620.

CAREW, Bampfylde Moore, "king of the gipsies," an Englishman of roving habits, and the son of a clergyman. He became acquainted with some gipsies located in the neighbourhood of his native town, and was so fascinated by the romantic carelessness of their mode of life, that he abandoned his friends and linked himself to the fortunes of this strange people. The exploits into which his adoption of their wandering habits led him, have been related with a kind of incredible wonder. He would impose upon the same company three or four times a day under different disguises, and with new tales of distress. Sometimes he was a distressed clergyman, ruined because he could not take the oaths; at others, a Quaker, who had met with severe losses in trade. Now a shipwrecked mariner; and the same day, a blacksmith whose house and family had perished by fire. Proteus would hardly seem to have been a greater adept in the variety of his changes, and he had a method of enticing away people's dogs, for which he was twice transported from Exeter to America, but made his escape. On one of these occasions he travelled from Virginia through the woods, and swam across the Delaware upon a horse, with only a handkerchief for a bridle. He was a man of strong memory and pleasing address, and could assume the manners of a gentleman with as much ease as those of any other character. The fraternity to which he belonged, elected him their king; and he remained faithful to them to the last. D. at Bickley, Devonshire, 1693; D. about 1770.

CAREY, Harry, kair'-e, an English musician, who wrote several excellent songs, the best known of which is "Sally in our Alley." He was also the author of several farces, and was supposed by some to have composed the national anthem. Put an end to his existence 1774.

CAREY, William, a distinguished English orientalist, who, in 1793, went to India for the purpose of disseminating the principles of Christianity. His labours were originally mostly confined to Bengal, and, in 1801, he became professor of Sanscrit, in Calcutta. He acquired a great facility in many of the eastern dialects, and published of them several grammars and dictionaries, which have been the means of greatly extending the knowledge of the oriental languages. B. at Pau-lersbury, Northamptonshire, 1762; D. at Serampore, 1834.

CAREY, Alice, an American authoress, who has acquired a wide popularity by her contributions to light literature. In 1850, in conjunction with her sister, she published a volume of poems, which were much admired, and, in the following year, appeared her romance of "Clovernook," which immediately brought her prominently into notice. Her next work was "Hagar," which was followed by several other performances, by no means inferior to their predecessors. B. near Cincinnati, in Ohio, 1822.

CARIA, ka'-re-a, an ancient country of Asia Minor, whose boundaries have been different in different ages. Generally speaking, it was at the south of Ionia, at the east and north of the Icarian Sea, and at the west of Phrygia Major and Lycia. It has been called Phœnicia, because a Phœnician colony first settled there. It afterwards received the name of Caria, from Car, one of its kings, who first invented the auguries of birds. Its chief town was Halicarnassus.

CARIACO, ka'-re-a'-ko, a city of South America, in E. mana, on a river of the same name, 40 miles from w mana. Pop. about 7,500. Lat. 10° 30' N. Lon. di 40' W.—GULF OF CARIACO, on the coast of the ince of Cumana, extends 35 miles from W. to E., be is 68 miles broad.—CARIACO, the river, runs ough the province of Cumana, and enters the gulf.

CARIBBEAN SEA, kă'-rib-be'-an, a part of the Atlantic, bounded N. by Jamaica, St. Domingo, Porto-Rico, and the Virgin Islands, S. and W. by the continent, and E. by the Caribbean Islands. Its principal inlets are Darien, Honduras, and Maracaybo. (See ANTILLES.)

CARIGNANO, ka'-reen-ya'-no, a very old town of Piedmont, on the Po, 12 miles from Turin. Manf. Silk. Pop. 8,000.

CARIMATO ISLANDS, ka'-re-ma'-to, a group in the China Sea, between Borneo and Billiton. The largest is named Carimata, and has a circumference of 15 miles. They have no settled population. Lat. of their highest peak, 1° 36' S. Lon. 108° 54' E.—The passage between Billiton and Borneo is 120 miles wide.

CARIMON JAVA, ka'-ri-mon, a cluster of 10 or 12 small islands in the Indian Sea. Lat. 5° 45' S. Lon. 110° 15' E.—Another group in the Strait of Malacca, 30 miles from Singapore. Lat. 1° 5' N. Lon. 103° 30' E.

CARINI, ka-re'-ne, a town of Sicily, 12 miles from Palermo. Pop. 7,000.

CARINOLA, ka-re-no'-la, a town of Naples, 20 miles from Gaeta, in the neighbourhood of which excellent wine is produced. Pop. about 5,000.

CARINTHIA, ka-rin'-the-a, a province of the Austrian empire, bounded N. and E. by Salzburg and Styria, S. by Carniola and Friuli, and W. by Tyrol. Area, 3,800 square miles. Desc. Covered with mountains over its whole surface. The soil is by no means fertile, except in the valley of Lavant and other favoured spots, which abound in the fruits of the south. Rivers. The principal is the Drave. Lakes. The Klagenfurth, Leopoldstein, and Ossiach. Pro. Wheat, oats, millet, buckwheat, rye, and barley. Although the valleys of the Alps furnish excellent pasture, the breeding of cattle is very little understood. The chief wealth of Carinthia lies in its metallic mines, its beautiful white marble, and, in certain situations, its precious stones. Pop. 350,000.

CARIPE, ka'-re-pai, a town and valley of Venezuela, S. America, 40 miles from Cumana. Pop. 5,000.

CARISBROOK, kăr'-is-brook, a village of the Isle of Wight, formerly of large extent, and still remarkable for its church and castle, both of which are of great antiquity. It is about 1 mile from Newport. Pop. 1,000.—Here Charles I. was confined 13 months previous to his execution.

CARISSIMI, J. J., ka-rees'-se-me, an eminent Italian musical composer, who, at the beginning of the 17th century, effected a great reformation in the modern music of Italy. In 1649 he was appointed master of the pontifical chapel, and introduced into the church instrumental accompaniments. He composed masses, oratorios, motets, and cantatas, of which the most remarkable are "Jephtha's Sacrifice" and "Solomon's Judgment." D. at Venice, 1582; D. about 1672.

CARLA DE ROQUEFORT, kar'-la rok'-fort, a parish and village of France, in the department Ariège, 9 miles from Foix. Pop. 404. Bayle, the philosopher, was born here, in 1647. (See BAYLE.)

CARLEE, kar'-lee, a village of British India, in the Bombay presidency, 35 miles from Poona, remarkable for its Buddhic cave temples.

CARLEN, Emilie, kar-len', a Swedish novelist, whose works have procured for her both an English and an American reputation. She is the authoress of a great many novels, most of them, if not all, illustrative of Swedish scenery and character. Her best known in England is "The Rose of Tistelön," which appeared in an English dress in 1844, and which has been followed by several other performances in the same manner, and with various success. The rapidity with which her productions have succeeded each other has, by some, been considered to have a damaging effect on her reputation; but to this opinion we demur. Even a bare enumeration of the titles of her performances, however, would occupy a considerable space. B. at Bohusland, near the Norwegian frontier, 1807.

CARLENTINI, kar-len-te'-ne, a town of Sicily, 20 miles from Syracuse. Pop. about 1,600.—This place was founded by Charles V. to be the head-quarters of his army of Sicily, but it was never completed, and an earthquake, in 1693, may have had some effect in preventing its ever rising into importance.

CARLETON, William, karl'-ton, an Irish romance-writer of considerable genius and power. The first work which fixed the attention of the public upon him was his "Traits and Stories of the Irish Peasantry," which was published in 1832, and received by the general public with great favour. This was followed by several other works, which fully sustained the reputation he had already received, as one of the happiest delineators of Irish character. In 1840 appeared his "Fawn of Spring Vale;" in 1845, "Valentine Macclutchy;" and in 1847, the "Black Prophet," in which some of the appalling features connected with the famine of 1846 are graphically depicted. These were followed by "Rody the Rover," the "Tithe-Proctor," "The Clarionet," and "Willy Reilly," which came out in 1855. For his services to the national literature, Mr. Carleton enjoyed a pension from government. B. at Clogher, in Tyrone, 1798.

CARLI, Gian Rinaldo, kar'-le, an Italian, who, in 1824, was appointed to a new professorial chair of astronomy and navigation in Padua. He subsequently was made president of the new council of commerce at Milan. In 1769 he became the privy councillor of Joseph II., and induced that sovereign to abolish the tribunal of the Inquisition, which had existed in Milan for centuries. B. at Capo d'Istria, 1720; D. 1795.—Carli wrote many works on archæology and other subjects; among which we may mention his "History of the Coins and Currency," and on "The Institution of the Mint of Italy."

CARLINGFORD, kar'-ling-ford, a seaport town and parish of Ireland, county of Louth, in a bay to which it gives name, 50 miles from Dublin. Pop. of parish, 9,500; of town, about 1,000. The bay is about 12 miles long and 3 broad, and is connected with Lough Neagh by the Newry Canal.—CARLINGFORD MOUNTAINS, on the S. side of the bay, rise to a height of nearly 2,000 feet.

CARLISLE, Sir Anthony, kar'-lile, an eminent surgeon, who, after finishing his studies in York, where, for some time, he had received instructions from Mr. Green, the founder of the hospital in that city, went to London, and, in 1793, was appointed surgeon to Westminster Hospital. He now rose rapidly in his profession, and became surgeon extraordinary to George IV. when Prince Regent, who knighted him on the first levée he held after his accession to the throne. In 1808 he became professor of anatomy in the Royal Academy, an appointment which he held for sixteen years. His contributions to medical literature were varied and extensive. He was the first to point out the fact that water might be decomposed by the galvanic battery. B. near Durham, 1768; D. in London, 1840.

CARLISLE, a city of Cumberland, near the confluence of the rivers Eden and Caldew, 60 miles from Newcastle. In former times it was a military post of great strength, having a citadel and a castle, the latter situate so as to command the passage of the river Eden. It is still kept in repair. Mary, queen of Scotland, was imprisoned in it in 1568. The place of her promenade preserves remembrance of her, under the appellation of the Lady's Walk. The castle is said to have been first built in the 7th century, by Egfrid, king of Northumberland, and the walls are ascribed to William Rufus. The principal streets diverge from the market-place as a centre, and the city contains some good houses, with a town-hall, guildhall, gaol, council-chamber, infirmary, news-room, theatre, assembly-rooms, libraries, and philosophical and mechanics' institutions. The cathedral is a venerable structure, partly of Saxon and partly of Gothic architecture; and it has five other churches, besides chapels for various denominations. An abbey, attached to the cathedral, was completed by Henry I. There is a very large and handsome bridge over the Eden, nearly a quarter of a mile in length. Considerable trade and manufactures are carried on, consisting of cotton in all its branches, woollens, linen, leather, hats, hardware, and various other commodities. There are several foundries, and also breweries, which produce a large quantity of malt liquor. Pop. 26,500.—Carlisle suffered severely in the civil wars, for its having espoused the cause of Charles I. In 1745 it surrendered to Prince Charles Stuart, but was retaken by William, duke of Cumberland.

CARLISLE, a post-township of the United States, in Schoharie county, New York, 8 miles from Schoharie. Pop. 1,800.—Another, in Pennsylvania, 24 miles from Harrisburgh. Pop. 5,000.

CARLISLE BAY,—1. On the western coast of Barbadoes. 2. In the island of Antigua. 3. On the south coast of Jamaica.

CARLO, kar'-lo, a small island in the Gulf of Bothnia, 18 miles from Utenborg, in Finland. Lat. W. point beacon, 65° 2′ N. Lon. 24° 33′ E.

CARLOMAN, kar'-lo-man, the eldest son of Charles Martel, whom he succeeded as king of Austrasia in 741. He and his father Pepin united in defending their dominions against the encroachments of their neighbours, and defeated the Germans in 743. Carloman then entered Saxony, took its duke prisoner, and, after several successful expeditions, became a monk of the order of St. Benedict. He assembled a famous council in 742, the acts of which bear his name. Lived in the 8th century.—There were three others of the same name; the first was the younger brother of Charlemagne, with whom he had some contention about the kingdom, but, on his death, in 771, left him in full possession.—The second was the son of Lewis II., whom he succeeded in 879, in conjunction with his brother Lewis III. On the death of the latter, he was declared sole king of France, and was killed in hunting, by a wild boar, in 884.—The third Carloman was the eldest son of Lewis I., king of Germany, whom he succeeded in 876, in the kingdom of Bavaria. He made some partial conquests in Italy. D. 880.

CARLOS, Don, kar'-los, son of Philip II., king of Spain, was deformed in his person, and so perverse in his temper, that he endeavoured to kill his tutor for gently reproving him. A match was negotiated between him and the Princess Elizabeth, of France, but Philip, becoming a widower, married her himself. He was then desirous of marrying his cousin, Anne of Austria; but being crossed by his father, he endeavoured to excite discontent among the nobles. For this he was arrested, and condemned to death. Shortly afterwards he was found dead in prison, not without suspicions of violence. D. 1545; D. 1567.

CARLOS, Don Count de Molina, was the second son of Charles IV. of Spain. He was educated by Catholic priests, and was little heard of until the accession of his brother, Ferdinand VII., when he was sent to meet Bonaparte, who had announced his intention of paying a visit to the Spanish sovereign in his own dominions. Don Carlos, however, was made a prisoner, and his brother Ferdinand was soon compelled to abdicate all claims to the Spanish kingdom, in favour of his ally, the emperor of the French. Both the brothers were kept prisoners till 1813, when they were restored to liberty, and Ferdinand once more ascended the Spanish throne. Don Carlos now plotted, in conjunction with the absolutist party, against his brother, and in 1825 shared in an insurrectionary movement in Catalonia. In 1830 a daughter, Isabella, was born to Ferdinand, and she was declared the heir to the throne of Spain, which set aside the Salic law in her favour. In 1833, however, this law was restored by Ferdinand, when so ill as to be in expectation of death, and from an apprehension of the evils which would arise to his people from the exclusion of Don Carlos from the throne. He, however, recovered, when the evidences that were to secure the succession of Don Carlos were destroyed, and Isabella, on the death of her father, ascended the throne. A civil war now commenced between the Carlists and the adherents of Isabella. For five years the country was desolated by the most savage cruelties that ever marked the progress of a civil conflict. It terminated in favour of Isabella, when, in 1839, Don Carlos took refuge in France. In 1845 he formally relinquished his claim to the crown, and in 1847 went to live at Trieste, where he spent the remainder of his days. B. 1788; D. 1855.

CARLOS, SAN, a handsome city of South America, province of Venezuela, on the Aguerre, 30 miles from Caracccas. The wealth of the inhabitants consists chiefly in cattle. Pop. 9,509.—The name of various other inconsiderable settlements in South America.

CARLOTA, LA, kar-lo'-ta, a town of Spain, 18 miles from Cordova. It is one of the German colonies founded in the Sierra Morena in 1767. Pop. 3,300.

CARLOW, or CATHERLOGH, kar'-lo, a county of Ireland, bounded N. and N.W. by Kildare and Queen's county, E. by the counties of Wicklow and Wexford, and S.W. by Kilkenny. Area, 214 square miles. Desc. Undulating, but, in general, flat. Rivers. The Barrow and the Slany. Manf. Unimportant; but it has a trade in corn, flour, butter, bacon, and malt. Granite is found throughout the county. Pop. 70,000.

CARLOW, the capital town and a parish of the above county, situate on the Barrow, where it is joined by the Burrar, 44 miles from Dublin. It consists of a main street, intersected by two others at right angles. Its public buildings are a market-house, court-house, gaol, barracks, a college for divinity students, a lunatic asylum, and a venerable old church. There are also two nunneries, and the ruins of a very fine abbey, supposed to have been founded about the year 634. On an eminence commanding the river stands a strong castle, supposed to have been erected by King John, which is now in ruins. Manf. Coarse woollen cloths; and it supplies the adjacent country with stone-coal. Pop. of parish, 10,300; of town, 7,200.

CARLOWITZ, or KARLOWITZ, kar'-lo-vitz, a town of the Austrian empire, on the Danube, below Peterwardein. Pop. 7,000.—Here, in 1699, a treaty was concluded between Turkey and Austria; and here Prince Eugene defeated the Turks in 1716. It is a station for steam-vessels navigating the Danube.

CARLSBAD, or KARLSBAD, karls'-bat, 'Charles's bath,' a town of Bohemia, on the small river Tepl, near its junction with the Eger, 70 miles from Prague. Pop. about 3,000; but, during summer, this is doubled by strangers. It is one of the most celebrated watering-places in Germany, and its springs are the hottest in Europe. It was the favourite residence of Hoffman, Gothe, and Werner.

CARLSBURG, or KARLSBURG, karls'-boorg, a fortified town of Austria, on the Maroo, about 30 miles from Hermanstadt. It consists of an upper and lower town, and is defended by a walled citadel, built by Charles IV. Pop. 12,500.—This place occupies the site of the ancient Apulum.

CARLSCRONA, CARLSCROON, or KARLSCRONA, karls-kro'-na, a strongly fortified seaport of Sweden, the capital of a county of the same name, on the Baltic, and the principal depôt of the Swedish navy. It is built on five small islands, connected by bridges with each other and the mainland, 55 miles from Christianstadt. It has a commodious harbour, defended by forts. The town, however, is constructed chiefly of wood, and is separated by a wall from its dockyard and naval arsenal. Manf. Linen cloths, tobacco, sugar-refineries, and whatever is necessary for fitting out a navy. Pop. 12,500. Lat. 56° 9′ 5″ N. Lon. 15° 35′ 2″ E.

CARLSCRONA, or KARLSCRONA, a laen or county, of which the above is the capital, is bounded on the N. by Wexio, N.E. by Kalmar, W. by Christianstadt, and S. and E. by the Baltic. Area, 1,132 square miles.

Pop. about 105,000. Lat. between 56° and 56° 30′ N. Lon. between 14° 30′ and 16° E.

CARLSHAMN, karls'-ham, 'Charles's harbour,' a fortified seaport-town of Sweden, on the Baltic, 25 miles from Carlscrona. Manf. Sail-cloth, hats, and tobacco. It has both shipbuilding-docks and dye-works, with an active trade in timber, pitch, tar, and potash.

CARLSLO, karls'-lo, a small island in the Baltic, lying to the W. of Gothard. Lat. 57° 19′ 39″ N. Lon. 18° E.

CARLSRUHE, or KARLSRUHE, karls'-roo, 'Charles's rest,' the capital of the grand duchy of Baden, standing in a fine plain, 4 miles E. of the Rhine, and 40 miles from Stuttgart. It is built almost entirely of stone. In the middle of the Schloss or ducal palace is a spire, and in the left wing stands the chapel. In the right wing is the valuable library of the grand duke, with a cabinet of minerals and medals, and a philosophical apparatus; the whole surrounded by a botanic garden. Among the other public edifices are the Lutheran, Calvinist, and Catholic churches, the Jewish synagogue, the chancery, the town-house, the workhouse, the barracks, a polytechnic school, in the style of the middle ages, and several hospitals, one of them endowed by the London tailor, Stultz, who on account of his humanity was created a baron. Besides these, there are a number of literary institutions, a lyceum, medical and veterinary schools, and academies of painting, music, and architecture. Manf. Carpets, cabinet-work, carriages, chemicals, and jewellery. Pop. 25,000. Lat. 49° 0′ 50″ N. Lon. 8° 24′ 44″ E. —Carlsruhe is a modern city, having been founded in 1715 by Charles William, margrave of Baden, in a hunting locality. Its connection with the Rhine, and an extensive railway system, give it great facilities for trade.

CARLSTAD, karl'-stat, an island of Sweden, near the N. shore of Lake Wener, 160 miles from Stockholm. It exports copper, iron, salt, timber, and corn. Pop. 3,000.

CARLSTAD, a county of Sweden, of which the above is the capital. Area, 9,000 square miles. Desc. Mountainous; interspersed with numerous lakes, and abounding in streams and rivers. It is rich in iron-mines. Pop. 196,000. Lat. between 59° and 61° N. Lon. between 12° and 14° 30′ E.

CARLSTADT, karl'-stat, the capital of Austrian Croatia, seated near the conflux of the Dobra and Kulpa, 34 miles from Agram. Pop. about 5,000.—There is another town of the same name in Bavaria, 14 miles from Wurzburg. Pop. 2,200.

CARLTON, karl'-ton, a name common to numerous parishes and small places in England.

CARLTON, a township of the United States, on Lake Ontario, 220 miles from Albany. Pop. 3,000.

CARLUKE, kar'-look, a town and parish of Lanarkshire, Scotland, 5 miles from Lanark. Area, 15,360 acres. Pop. 7,000, chiefly engaged in cotton, coal, iron, and lime-works.

CARLYLE, Thomas, kar-lile', a writer of great power and originality, who, after passing through the university of Edinburgh, with a view to entering the Scottish Church, abandoned that intention, and prepared to devote himself to a literary life. In 1823 he acted as tutor to Charles Buller, who became distinguished in the political history of his country; and, whilst acting in that capacity, he occupied his leisure in translating from the German. The works which he produced between his 26th and 32nd years were "A Life of Schiller," "Legendre's Geometry," to which he prefixed an Essay on Proportion; the "Wilhelm Meister" of Goethe, and "Specimens of German Romance," all of which were received with approbation by those who were best qualified to judge of the difficulties with which he had to contend, in imbuing his translations with the true spirit of the originals which he had chosen to render into an English dress. He had now made himself well known in the world of letters, and became a contributor to the "Edinburgh Review," in which he wrote many masterly critical articles. Among these may be noticed his "Essay on Burns" and on "German Literature." In 1833-4 appeared his "Sartor Resartus," in "Fraser's Magazine." From that time he commanded a large circle of admirers, and afterwards produced many works of sterling merit. In 1837 he delivered a course of lectures on "German Literature," in Willis's Rooms, in London, which he followed up by lecturing on other subjects, down to 1840, when he lectured on "Heroes, Hero-Worship, and the Heroic in History." This, we believe, was the most popular of his course. In 1845 appeared "Oliver Cromwell's Letters and Speeches," which added considerably to his reputation. In 1850 he published the "Latter-Day Pamphlets," which were more remarkable for the singularity of their style than the soundness of their doctrines. In 1851 appeared his "Life of John Sterling," and in 1859, his "Life and Times of Frederick the Great." B. near Ecclefechan, Dumfriesshire, Scotland, 1795.

CARMAGNOLA, kar-man-yo'-la, a town of Piedmont, on the Po, 16 miles from Turin. Manf. Jewellery. An active trade is carried on in corn, cattle, flax, and silk. Pop. 13,000.

CARMEL, MOUNT, kar'-mel, a celebrated mountain of Palestine, on the N. side of the Bay of Acre. On its summit are oaks and pines, and, lower down, laurels and olives. It is celebrated as being the place where Elijah destroyed the priests of Baal. Near its top is a monastery, occupied by some of the monks called Carmelites. Height, 1,500 feet. Lat. 32° 51′ 10″ N. Lon. 34° 57′ 42″ E.

CARMEL, a post-township of Putnam county, New York, U.S., 26 miles from Poughkeepsie. Pop. 2,100.

CARMEN, kar'-men, an island in the Gulf of California, opposite Loreto, containing a large salt lake.

CARMEN, EL, or PATAGONES, kar'-main, a town of Buenos Ayres, on the Rio Negro, 20 miles from its mouth in the Atlantic. It has an export trade in skins, oil, beef, salt, and Patagonian mantles. Pop. 2,000. Lat. 40° 36′ S. Lon. 63° 18′ W.—Another town in New Grenada, in the department Canca, and province of Antioquia.

CARMOE, or KARMOE, kar'-moo, an island of Norway, 20 miles from Stavanger, in the North Sea. Ext. 21 miles long, with an average breadth of 5. Pop. 6,500. Lat. 59° 20′ N. Lon. 5° 15′ E.

CARNATIC, kar-nät'-ik, a division of Southern India, extending along its E. coast from Cape Comorin to the river Gondegam. Ext. 550 miles long, with an average breadth of about 90. Desc. The general division of the country is into an Upper and a Lower Carnatic; but a more specific division gives a Southern, a Central, and a Northern Carnatic. In the upper, or high grounds, the soil is poor, but grain of all kinds is cultivated. In the lower, the soil being well watered and fertile, rice, sugar, and indigo are raised. Cotton of the dwarf kind is grown, but few trees will spring spontaneously, from the poverty of the soil. Madras is situate near the centre of Central Carnatic, where the soil is stricken with a stern sterility, and where there is little vegetation of any kind. Climate. In the Lower Carnatic, the hottest in India; but, along the coast, for 10 or 12 miles inland, the excessive heat is moderated by the sea-breezes. Rivers. The principal are the Pannair, Palair, Colerun, and Vaygaru. Inhabitants. Mostly Hindoos. The Mahometans are not numerous, the Sudras being the chief cultivators of the soil which they dig with their own hands. Pop. about 7,000,000. Lat. between 8° and 16° N. Lon. between 77° and 81° E.—The Carnatic was conquered by the British in 1783, but was not definitively ceded to them till 1801.

CARNE, or CARNA, karn, two parishes and a hamlet in Ireland, none of them with a population above 800.

CARNEADES, kar-ne'-a-des, of Cyrene, in Africa, the founder of the third academy at Athens. His eloquence was dreaded by his adversaries. It is recorded of him, that when the Athenians sent him, with other ambassadors, to Rome, to get a fine, which had been imposed upon them, mitigated, Cato the elder pressed the senate to dismiss them, lest the oratory of Carneades should corrupt the Roman youth. D. 128 B.C.

CARNEILLE, LA, and CARNET, kar'-nail, two unimportant towns in France, neither of them with a population above 1,600.

CARNEW, kar'-nu, a township and parish of Ireland, in the county of Wicklow, 7 miles from Gorey. Pop. of parish, 6,000; of town, 1,000.

CARNICOBAR, kar-nik-o-bar', the most northern of the Nicobar Islands, in the Bay of Bengal, with a circumference of 40 miles. It is fertile and well wooded, but unhealthy. Lat. 9° 10′ N. Lon. 92° 48′ E.

CARNIOLA, or KRAIN, kar'-ne-o'-la, a province of Austria, with the title of duchy, bounded N. by Carinthia, N.E. by Styria, E. and S.E. by Croatia, S. by Dalmatia and the Adriatic, and W. by Istria, Friuli, and the county of Goritz. Ext. About 120 miles in length, and 100 in breadth. Area, 2,903 geographical square miles, divided into the circles of Laybach, Neustadt, and Adelsberg. Desc. Fertile in some portions of the south, and producing oil and excellent wine; but the north and north-west parts, where the province is separated from Carinthia by lofty mountains, are cold, bleak, and barren. On the whole, however, Carniola is one of the least productive regions of the empire. Rivers. The principal are the Save, the Laybach, the Gurk, and the Kulpa. Pro. Wheat, barley, fruits of various kinds, and flax. Bees are numerous; therefore honey is plentiful; and silkworms are reared. Minerals. This province contains a number of iron-mines, the most ancient and noted of which is the one in the mountain of Eisenberg. Quicksilver is found near Ostraga; and the famous mines of that metal at Idria may likewise be considered as belonging to this province. Coal and marble are also abundant. Manf. Woollens, linens, lace, stockings, leather, wooden articles, and iron. Exp. Steel wares, quicksilver, linens, hats, wax, glass, wine, and flour. Imp. Salt, fruit, oil, coffee, sugar, tobacco, cloths, and cattle. Pop. about 500,000. Lat. between 45° 10′ and 46° 20′ N. Lon. between 13° 50′ and 16° 25′ E.—Carniola in the 12th century became a duchy under the counts of Tyrol. In 1809, by the treaty of Vienna, it was ceded to France, and incorporated with the kingdom of Illyria. In 1814 it passed into the possession of Austria. (See ILLYRIA.)

CARNOT, Lazare Nicholas Marguerite, kar'-no, a French engineer, who entered the army in 1771, and became war minister to Napoleon I. As a member of the Convention, he voted for the death of the king, and in 1793 became a member of the Committee of Public Safety. The most successful period of the republic, in a military sense, was during the time that he had the organization of its military affairs. It was accordingly said of him that he had "organized victory." In 1797 he was forced into exile, from being suspected of having become favourable to royalty; but, on Napoleon becoming first consul, he was recalled. He was then appointed minister of war, but was deprived of that office, with all his other posts, for voting against the consulate for life. After the Russian campaign, he again offered his services to Napoleon, and received the command of Antwerp, which he kept till the abdication of 1814. On the return of Napoleon from Elba, he was once more appointed minister of war, but, on the fall of the emperor, he retired, first to Warsaw and then to Magdeburg, where he passed the remainder of his days. B. at Nolay, in Burgundy, 1753; D. at Magdeburg, 1823.—As a writer, Carnot is favourably known by his "Essai sur les Machines en Général;" his "Geometry of Position," and several other scientific treatises.

CARNWATH, karn'-wath, a parish and village of Lanarkshire, Scotland, 25 miles from Edinburgh, near the Caledonian Railway. It has extensive iron-works. Area of parish, 35,190 acres. Pop. 3,600.

CAROLINA, LA, kar-o-le'-na, a town of Spain, in Andalusia, 36 miles from Jaen. Pop. about 2,000.—This is one of the principal places established in 1776, in the Sierra Morena, for German colonists.

CAROLINA, NORTH, kăr-o-lī'-na, one of the United States, bounded N. by Virginia, E. by the Atlantic, S. by South Carolina, and W. by Tennessee. Ext. 430 miles long, and 180 broad. Area, 45,000 square miles. Desc. Along the whole coast is a ridge of sand, separated from the mainland, in some places by narrow sounds, in others by broad bays. The coast is indented by numerous inlets, the principal of which are Pamlico and Albemarle sounds. Between these is the Great Alligator Swamp; and N. of it, extending into the state of Virginia, is the Dismal Swamp. At a distance of 60 or 80 miles inland from the shore, the country swells into hills, and, in the most western part, rises into mountains. Rivers. The Chowan, Roanoke, Neuse, Cape Fear, Catawba, Pamlico, and Yadkin. These are generally navigable for small vessels from 60 to 100 miles, and still farther for boats. Westward of the Alleghany mountains, the Tennessee flows through part of this state in its progress to the Ohio, and there are various smaller streams which it receives in its course. Climate. Unhealthy, especially on the low grounds and in the neighbourhood of the swamps. Pro. Cotton and rice in the low lands: and on the higher grounds, wheat, rye, oats, barley, maize, flax, tobacco, and various fruits are cultivated. Minerals. Iron and gold. Pop. 870,000, of whom about 250,000 are slaves. Lat. between 33° 50′ and 36° 30′ N. Lon. between 75° 45′ and 84° W.—Carolina was the last part of America which was planted by the English, after Sir Walter Raleigh's unfortunate attempts to colonize it, in the latter end of the reign of Queen Elizabeth. This country seems to have been entirely overlooked till after the restoration of King Charles II. The ministry were then informed that it would produce wine, oil, silk, and almost every article of trade which Britain wanted; when they obtained a patent from the king, in 1663, which was granted to the Lord Chancellor Clarendon, the Duke of Albemarle, Lord Craven, Lord Berkeley, Lord Ashley Cooper, Sir George Carteret, Sir William Colleton, and others.

CAROLINA, SOUTH, one of the United States, bounded N. and N.E. by North Carolina, S.E. by the Atlantic, and S.W. by Georgia, from which it is separated by Savannah river. Ext. 200 miles long, and 125 broad. Area, 24,000 square miles. Desc. The coast is bordered with a chain of islands, and the mainland is divided into the Lower and Upper country. The low country runs from 80 to 100 miles inland from the coast, and is covered with extensive forests of pitch-pine, called pine barrens, interspersed with swamps and marshes of a rich soil. This part is succeeded by a region of little sand-hills, resembling the waves of the ocean in a high sea. It is sometimes called the Middle country, and continues for 50 or 60 miles, where it is bounded by a ridge of high ground, which, in its turn, is succeeded by a fine healthy, undulating country, terminating at the western extremity of the state, in the lofty Appalachian mountain-chain, which in Table Mountain attains an elevation of 4,000 feet. Rivers. The principal are the Pedee, Santee, Cooper, Ashley, Edisto, and Savannah. Climate. The climate of the Upper country is healthy at all seasons of the year. In the Low country, the summer months are sickly, particularly August and September; and at this season the climate frequently proves fatal to strangers. Pro. Rice, maize, wheat, and other cerealia, tobacco, indigo, sugar, silk, cotton, and other crops. A great quantity of rice is annually raised, and the islands which line the coast, produce the famous sea-island cotton. Great numbers of live stock are also reared. Pop. about 700,000, of whom about one half are slaves. Lat. between 32° and 35° N. Lon. between 78° 24′ and 83° 30′ W.—Carolina was discovered in 1512, by Ponce de Leon, a Spaniard. In 1562, Jean de Ribault, a French navigator, was commissioned by Charles IX. to form a colony on the coast of Florida, and he gave the name of Caroline to a fort which he erected, in honour of the reigning queen. It is doubtful, however, if this gave the name to the present state. In 1565 the Spaniards surprised this colony, and massacred the French settlers. In 1663 the English established themselves here, and retained possession until the declaration of American independence in 1776.

CAROLINE, kăr'-o-line, the name of several places in the United States. 1. A county in Maryland, on the eastern shore, bounded N.W. by Queen Anne county, E. by Delaware, S. by Dorchester county, and W. by Talbot. Area, 310 square miles. Pop. 10,000, of whom 1,000 are slaves. 2. In the E. part of Virginia. Area, 580 square miles. Pop. 19,000. 3. A township in New York state, 12 miles from Ithaca. Pop. 2,500.

CAROLINE, Amelia Elizabeth, wife of George IV. (See GEORGE IV.)

CAROLINE ISLANDS, or NEW PHILIPPINES, a chain of islands in the Pacific Ocean, extending over a space estimated at 2,000 miles. They include various groups; as the Pelew, the Yap, the Egoi, and others. The Ulalan is the most E. of the group, and has a circumference of 24 miles. Desc. Many of the various groups are mere coral reefs, but little elevated above the surface of the ocean. Those, however, which are capable of bearing vegetation, produce palms, bananas, and breadfruit-trees. Lat. between 3° and 12° N. Lon. between 132° and 172° E.—The inhabitants of these islands comprise various races, and live mostly by fishing. A great portion of them are Malays, and make excellent seamen. The islands were discovered in 1543, by Lopez de Villalobos, a Spaniard; and although they nominally belong to Spain, the Spaniards have no settlement upon them.

CAROLINE ISLAND, one of the Marquesas group, lying to the north of Erineo, in the South Pacific Ocean. It is 5 miles in circumference, and is covered with verdure, but has a very little elevation above the surface of the sea. Lat. 9° 57′ S. Lon. 150° 25′ W.

CARONY, ka'-ro-ne, a river of South America, rising in the Sierra Pacaraima, and, after a course of 400 miles, joining the Orinoco at about 150 miles from its mouth. It has for its affluents the Paragua and the Acamon, but its cataracts render it unfit for the purposes of navigation.

CARORA, kar-or'-a, a city of South America, in the province of Venezuela, on the river Morera, 270 miles W. of the Caracccas. The inhabitants rear oxen, mules, horses, sheep, goats, &c., and contrive, by their industry, to live in great comfort, although the surrounding country is parched and barren. Pop. about 7,000. Lat. 9° 50′ N.

CAROUGE, kar-oozh', a town of Switzerland, on the Arve, 2 miles from Geneva. Manf. Leather, clay pipes, thread, and matches. Pop. 5,000.

CARPANE, or CARPANEDO, kar-pa'-nai, a village of N. Italy, on the Brenta, 2½ miles from Vicenza. Pop. about 2,000.—Here, in 1796, the French were defeated by the Austrians.

CARPATHIAN MOUNTAINS, or KRAPACKS, kar-pai'-the-an, an extensive chain, which reaches from the Black Sea to the borders of Saxony, having a semi-circular form, and covering a space of 800 miles long and 250 broad. They may be divided into two great sections, the E. and the W.; the former extending from the mouth of the Nera to the source of the Theiss, and marking the boundary-line between the principalities of Moldavia and Wallachia, and Austria. The latter may be viewed as bounding Galicia and Hungary, having its commencement at the sources of the Theiss, and its termination on the Danube, near to Presburg. These are divided into various groups, with different names, presenting numerous peaks and summits, of higher or lower degrees of altitude. The loftiest points of the E. Carpathians are Ruska-Poyana and Garluvipi, which, respectively, attain an elevation of 9,009 and 9,587 feet above the level of the sea. In the W. Carpathians, the highest is the Latra range, in which the Eisthalerspitze culminates at 8,521 feet. Minerals. Abundant; comprising gold, copper, quicksilver, iron, mercury, silver; salt is found in beds, with a thickness of 600 or 700 feet, and is apparently inexhaustible. Pro. Corn and fruit grow to the height of 1,500 feet, and forests of pine ascend to 5,500. At 6,000 feet the limit of vegetation is attained, where a few lichens may be seen clinging to the bare and rugged rocks, but nothing more to clothe their naked conical forms, which apparently bid defiance alike to time and the elements.

CARPENTARIA, GULF OF, kar'-pen-tair'-e-a, on the north coast of Australia, between Capes York and Arnhem. Ext. Averaging, in both length and breadth, 350 miles. It contains several islands, among which may be mentioned Wellesley and Groote. Lat. between 11° and 17° 30′ S. Lon. between 135° and 142° E.—The first authenticated discovery of any part of the Australian continent was on the E. coast of this gulf. It was made by the Dutch captain Carpenter, in 1606, from whom it took its name.

CARPENTER, Benjamin, M.D., kar'-pen-ter, one of the most eminent physiologists of modern times, passed his examination at the Royal College of Surgeons and Apothecaries' Society in 1835, and subsequently pursued his studies in the university of Edinburgh. Whilst here he made himself popular by the publication of several scientific treatises, and, in 1839, published his "Principles of General and Comparative Physiology, &c.," which at once drew upon him the attention of the most distinguished physiologists of the day. He now went to reside in Bristol, where he became lecturer on medical jurisprudence, and produced several other works in connection with his profession. Indeed, his contributions to physiological science have been of the most important kind, and have been very extensive. A bare enumeration of their titles would occupy a considerable space, and his works would form, in themselves, a large encyclopædia. He became lecturer on medical jurisprudence in University College, London, as well as an examiner in physiology and comparative anatomy. He was, also, lecturer on general anatomy and physiology at the London Hospital School of Medicine, and in 1844 was admitted a Fellow of the Royal Society. In 1849 he gained the prize of 100 guineas for his essay on "Alcoholic Liquors," which was published in 1850. B. at Bristol.

CARPENTRAS, kar'-pen-tra, a town of France, in Provence, on the river Auson, 15 miles from Avignon. Its principal edifices are a palace of justice, cathedral, and an hospital. There is also an aqueduct over the river. As an entrepôt for the south of France, its trade is considerable in silk, wool, madder, honey, wax, olive-oil, and saffron. Manf. Cotton and woollen-spinning, chemicals, leather, and dyes. It has some dye-works. Pop. about 11,000.

CARPI, kar'-pe, two towns of N. Italy; one, on the canal of Carpi, 19 miles from Modena, with a citadel and a cathedral. Pop. about 5,000. The other, on the Adige, 28 miles from Verona. Pop. 1,300.—In 1701 Prince Eugene here defeated the French.

CARPI, Ugo da, an artist, who discovered the secret of painting in chiaroscuro, with two pieces of boxwood, one of which marked the outlines and shadows, and the other impressed any colour laid upon it. In this manner he executed several prints after great pictures; among which we may notice "David killing Goliath" and the "Massacre of the Innocents." B. in Rome, about 1486.

CARPINI, John de Plano, kar-pe'-ne, a Dominican friar, who, in 1245, formed one of an embassy from Pope Innocent IV. to the descendants of Zenghis Khan. The object was to induce them to turn their arms against the Turks and Saracens, instead of invading Europe. There is great obscurity as to the exact place and time of his birth; but it is supposed that he was born in the kingdom of Naples, about 1210.

CARPINO, kar-pe'-no, a town of Naples, in the province of Capitanata, on Monte Gargano, 20 miles from San Severo. Pop. 5,500.—Also the name of a mountain in Calabria, near Cosenza, and of an affluent of the river Tiber, in the States of the Church.

CARR, John, kar, an English architect, who gained considerable celebrity in his native county of York, where, and in the adjoining counties, he erected a number of stately mansions. He was twice lord mayor of York, and died worth, it is said, £150,000. B. at Horbury, near Wakefield, 1721; D. at his residence, Askam Hall, Yorkshire, 1807.

CARR, Robert. (See SOMERSET, Duke of.)

CARRA, John Louis, kar'-ra, a French political revolutionist, distinguished for his violence in the first great revolution. He joined the party of Brissot, and fell with his leader. B. at Pont-de-Veslo, 1743; guillotined, 1793.

CARRACCI, or CARACCI, Lewis, kar-ratch'-e, the founder of a famous school of painting at Bologna, was the son of a butcher, who gave him an indifferent education; but his taste for drawing was so strong that he was induced to become a disciple of Prospero Fontana. He afterwards pursued his studies in the academy of Passignano, at Florence, and improved himself by visiting the principal cities in Italy. On his return to Bologna his merits became conspicuous, and he was considered as superior to his old master. Being greatly attached to his cousins, Augustin and Annibal, he formed, in conjunction with them, that school and style of painting which has rendered their names celebrated throughout the civilized world. Lewis was great in landscapes as well as in figures, and his private character was held in high estimation. B. at Bologna, 1555; D. 1619, and was interred with much ceremony in the church of St. Mary Magdalene, a Bologna.—Speaking of this artist, Sir Joshua Reynolds says: "His breadth of light and shadow, the simplicity of his colouring, and the solemn effect of that twilight that seems diffused over his pictures, is better suited to the grave and dignified subjects he generally treated than the more artificial brilliancy of sunshine which enlightens the pictures of Titian." Many of his pictures have been engraved, and some by himself.

CARRACCI, Augustin, the elder of the two cousins of Lewis, was the son of a tailor at Cremona. He was placed in the school of Fontana, and afterwards under Passerotti, whilst, at the same time, he studied the art of engraving, which acted detrimentally on his powers as a painter. Having painted his celebrated picture of Jerome, its success roused the jealousy of his brother Annibal, and caused a separation between them, although they were both engaged in producing important works for the palazzi Magnani and Zampieri. Augustin, for a time, led a free course of life, but at last the contemplation of a Madonna of his own painting, struck him with remorse, and he retired to a convent, where he passed the remainder of his days. B. at Bologna, 1558; D. 1602.—He was an accomplished scholar, and, as an engraver, ranks among the first artists of Italy.

CARRACCI, Annibal, younger brother of the above, studied under his cousin Lewis, by whom he was sent to Rome, where he worked for the pope. He invented a manner so excellent that both Lewis and Augustin adopted it. The Farnese gallery immortalized his name, though he received only the petty sum of 300 crowns of gold (about £200 sterling) for the labour of eight years. B. at Bologna, 1560; D. 1609.—With the death of these three Carracci, the period which may be designated as the golden age of Italian painting, closed.—ANTONY, a natural son of Augustin, was a pupil of Annibal, and painted some fine pieces in fresco at Rome. B. 1585; D. 1618.

CARRAN-TUAL, kăr-ran-tu'-al, the loftiest mountain of Ireland, in the county of Kerry, 5 miles from Killarney. It belongs to the MacGillicuddy Rocks range, and has an elevation of 3,410 feet.

CARRARA, DA, kar-ra'-ra, the name of an Italian family, the members of which, in the middle ages, held considerable sway over Padua and the neighbouring provinces. It became extinct in 1435.

CARRARA, a town of Italy, on the Avenza, 2 miles from where it falls into the Mediterranean Sea. Its port is at L'Avenza. Pop. about 6,000.—In its vicinity are the celebrated marble-quarries which produce the Carrara statuary marble.

CARREIRA ISLES, kar-ri'-ra, a group off the E. coast of Galicia, about 20 miles from Vigo. They belong to Spain. Pop. 1,200.

CARREL, Armand Nicholas, kar'-rel, the principal editor of the French National newspaper, and a distinguished political writer. Opposed alike to the extremities of absolutism in royalty or democracy, he attained a high position as a French journalist; but, being led into a quarrel with Emile de Girardin, editor of the Presse, a fatal duel was the consequence. B. at Rouen, 1800; D. of a pistol-shot at St. Mandé, 1836.

CARRICK, kăr-rik, the south division of Ayrshire, Scotland.

CARRICK, the name of several parishes with small populations in Ireland.

CARRICK-ON-SHANNON, the capital town of the county of Leitrim, Ireland, about 20 miles from Longford. It stands on the Shannon, and communicates with a small suburb by a bridge. Pop. 2,000.

CARRICK-ON-SUIR, a market-town and parish in Tipperary, Ireland, 12 miles from Waterford. Area of parish, 2,126 acres. Its public buildings are a church, a Roman Catholic chapel, a monastery, nunnery, school-house, a prison, an hospital, and a barracks. The river has been made navigable to the town, which has an export trade of corn and cotton. Pop. of parish, about 8,500; of town, about 6,300.

CARRICKFERGUS, kăr'-rik-fer'-gus, a seaport-town and parish of Antrim, Ireland, on a bay called Belfast Lough, or Carrickfergus Bay, 8 miles from Belfast. Area of parish, 16,700 acres. It has an ancient church, and a castle situate on a rock. Manf. Linen and cotton fabrics. Pop. of town, about 3,600.—Here William III. landed in 1690. In its neighbourhood extensive salt-mines were discovered in 1852.

CARRICKMACROSS, kăr'-rik-mă-kross', a market-town and parish of Ireland, in the county of Monaghan, 12 miles from Dundalk. Area of parish, 16,702 acres. Pop. about 11,000; of town, about 3,000.

CARRIDEN, kăr-ri-den, a maritime parish of Scotland, on the Firth of Forth, 15 miles from Edinburgh. Pop. about 2,000.—The terminating point of the wall of Antoninus seems to have been in this parish.

CARRIER, John Baptist, kar'-re-ai, one of the most ferocious of the French revolutionists, who became deputy of the department of Cantal, in the national Convention. In 1793 he was despatched on a mission to the departments in the west, where the civil war was raging. The cruelties of Carrier at Nantes recalled to mind the times of Nero. He caused to be constructed covered barges, in which he sunk 100 persons at once. He also invented those horrible executions, which went by the name of "republican marriages," and which consisted in fastening together, by the neck, a man and woman, who were then thrown into the Loire. By his means 15,000 individuals are said to have perished, and the water of the Loire was so polluted with dead bodies, that it was prohibited to be drunk. On the fall of the party called the Mountain, he was tried before the revolutionary tribunal, which condemned him to the scaffold. B. at Aurillac, 1756; guillotined 1794.

CARRIERA, Rosa Alba, kar'-re-air'-a, known also as ROSALBA, an Italian female painter, who learnt the rudiments of the art from her father. She was afterwards placed under an eminent artist, and her progress was so great, that her full-length portraits became famous throughout Italy. She went to Paris, and in 1720 was admitted a member of the Academy of Painting. After executing portraits of the royal family of France, she proceeded to Vienna, where she received distinguished honours. B. at Venice, 1672; D. blind, 1757. Her miniatures are very highly esteemed.

CARRIGALINE, or BEAVER, kăr'-ri-gă-line', a maritime parish of Ireland, in Cork harbour, 8 miles from the city of Cork. Area, 14,498 acres. Pop. 6,000, partly engaged in slate and marble quarries in the neighbourhood.

CARRIGALLEN, kăr'-ri-găl'-len, a barony of Ireland, in the county of Leitrim, Connaught. Area, 63,501 acres. Pop. 21,000. Also a parish in the same county, 12 miles from Mohill. Area, 18,104 acres. Pop. 6,000.

CARRIONE, kar'-re-one, several unimportant towns in Spain, none of them with a population above 3,500.

CARROLL, kăr'-roll, the name of several counties in the United States. 1. In New Hampshire. Area, 560 square miles. Pop. 21,000.—2. In Maryland. Area, 500 square miles. Pop. 21,000, of whom 11,000 are slaves.—3. In Virginia. Area, 410 square miles. Pop. about 6,000, with a few slaves.—4. In Mississippi. Area, 950 square miles. Pop. 11,000, of whom a half are slaves.—5. In Georgia. Area, 800 square miles. Pop. about 10,000, of whom one tenth are slaves.—6. In Tennessee. Area, 960 square miles. Pop. 34,000, of whom 2,500 are slaves.—7. In Kentucky. Area, 140 square miles. Pop. 6,000, of whom one sixth are slaves.—8. In Ohio. Area, 400 square miles. Pop. about 20,000.—9. In Indiana. Area, 380 square miles. Pop. 12,000.—10. In Illinois. Area, 416 square miles. Pop. 5,000.—11. In Arkansas. Area, 1,038 square miles. Pop. about 5,000, of whom a few are slaves.—12. In Missouri. Area, 700 square miles. Pop. about 6,000, of whom 700 are slaves.—There are several parishes and small towns, besides, of the same in the United States.

CARRON, [illegible]ron, a village of Stirlingshire, [illegible]ream of the same name, falling into the river Forth 3 miles from Falkirk. It is noted for its extensive iron-works, in which a great number of persons are employed. All kinds of iron goods are manufactured here;—heavy ordnance, cylinders, steam-engines, pumps, boilers, flies, wheels, and pinions, together with other ponderous apparatus used either in war or the arts. The carronade, a peculiar kind of gun, derives its name from this place, the first having been manufactured here.

CARRON, a river of Scotland, which falls into the sea in the county of Kincardine.

CARR ROCK, kar, a portion of a reef in the North Sea, 12 miles from the Bell Rock lighthouse. Lat. 56° 17′ N. Lon. 2° 35′ W.

CARRU, kar'-roo, a town and parish of Piedmont, in the province of Mondovi, 6 miles from Mondovi. Pop. with parish, about 4,000.

CARSE, kars, a term in Scotland, applied to low and fertile land, generally adjacent to a river.—1. The CARSE OF GOWRIE is in Perthshire, and extends for 15 miles between the Sidlaw Hills and the river Tay.—2. The CARSE OF FALKIRK runs along the Firth of Forth from Bo'ness to Airth.—3. The CARSE OF STIRLING lies between the E. extremity of Stirlingshire and Bucklyvie, and comprises an area of 30,000 acres of great fertility.

CARSPHAIRN, or CARSFERN, kars'-fern, a parish of Kirkcudbrightshire, Scotland, 12 miles from New Galloway. Area, 128,000 acres. Pop. about 1,000.—It contains several lead-mines.

CARSTAIRS, kar'-stairs, a parish of Lanarkshire, Scotland, 5 miles from Lanark. Area, 12,000 acres. Pop. 1,066.

CARSTENS, Asmus Jacob, kars'-tens, a Danish painter, was the son of a miller, and had his mother for his first drawing-master. In 1789 he went to Berlin, where he was named professor of drawing, and in 1792 to Rome, where he died, 1798. B. near Schleswig, 1754.—Amongst his best paintings are "The Death of Achilles" and "The Fall of the Angels."

CART, kart, two rivers in Renfrewshire, Scotland. They unite and enter the river Clyde 6 miles below Glasgow.

CARTAGO, kar-ta'-go, the name of a town, mountain, river, and bay of Central America, in the state of Costa Rica. In 1841 the town, formerly the capital, was almost entirely destroyed by an earthquake. The mountain, once volcanic, attains a height of 11,500 feet. The river falls into the Gulf of Nicoya, 50 miles from Cartago. The bay, a large lagoon, communicates with the Caribbean Sea.—There is also a town of this name in New Grenada, S. America, on the Vieja. It is a well-built, thriving place, and its trade consists principally in pigs, dried beef, fruits, coffee, and tobacco. In the neighbourhood minerals abound. Pop. 5,500.

CARTE, kart, Thomas, an English historian, who entered the church, and published a defence of Charles I. in the matter of the Irish massacre. On the accession of George I. he refused the oaths, but afterwards became secretary to Bishop Atterbury. When that prelate was committed to the Tower, a reward of £1,000 was offered for apprehending Carte, who escaped to France, where he remained till Queen Caroline obtained permission for him to return to England. In 1736 he published his "Life of James, Duke of Ormond," in 3 vols. folio. Soon after this, he issued proposals for a history of England. He met with great encouragement, and this work, completed in four volumes, has been highly praised. His MSS. are in the Bodleian library. Besides those mentioned, he published a "Collection of Original Letters and Papers relating to the Affairs of England," in 2 vols. 8vo; a "History of the Revolutions of Portugal," and some other pieces. B. at Clifton, Warwickshire, 1686; D. 1754.

CARTEAUX, Jean Francois, kar'-to, a French brigadier-general, who entered the service as a private, and rose from grade to grade, until he received the command of a brigade. His principal success was the taking of Toulon in 1793, then held by the British. Here he was ably seconded by Napoleon Bonaparte, at that time a simple artillery captain.

CARTER, Elizabeth, kar'-ter, an English lady, who became an excellent Greek and Latin scholar, besides acquiring a knowledge of the German, French, Spanish, Portuguese, Italian, Arabic, and Hebrew. She executed several translations, and contributed a paper to the "Rambler" of Dr. Johnson. It was of her attainments in Greek that the distinguished lexicographer said "that he understood that language better than any one he had ever known, except Elizabeth Carter." B. at Deal, Kent, 1717; D. 1806.

CARTER, Thomas, a distinguished Irish musician and composer of vocal music. Amongst many others, he composed the melodies, "Oh, Nannie! wilt thou gang wi' me?" and "Stand to your guns, my Hearts of Oak." D. 1804.

CARTER, two counties of the United States. 1. In Tennessee. Area, 350 square miles. Pop. 7,000, of whom about 400 are slaves.—2. In Kentucky. Area, 550 square miles. Pop. about 7,000, of whom about 300 are slaves.

CARTERET, John. (See GRANVILLE, Earl of.)

CARTERET, Philip, kar'-te-ret, a distinguished naval officer, who, in conjunction with Captain Wallis, in 1766, commanded an expedition to the South Seas. Dr. Hawkesworth, in his Introduction to his narrative of Cook's voyages, gives an account of their discoveries. Lived in the 18th century.

CARTERET, an island in the Pacific, in the Solomon archipelago. Lat. 8° 50′ S. Lon. 160° 48′ E.—Named after Carteret, its discoverer in 1767.

CARTERET, a maritime county of North Carolina, U.S., on Core and Pamlico sounds. Area, 450 square miles. Pop. 7,000, of whom 1,500 are slaves.

CARTHAGE, kar'-thage, a celebrated city of Africa, the rival of Rome. The precise time of its foundation is unknown. Some writers say that it was first built by Dido, about 869 years before the Christian era; others, 72 or 93 years before the foundation of Rome. It and its republic flourished for 737 years; and the time of its greatest glory was under Hannibal and Hamilcar. It maintained three famous wars against Rome, called the Punic wars, and was at last totally destroyed by Scipio, the second Africanus, B.C. 147. In circumference it was 23 miles; and when set on fire by the Romans, it burned incessantly during seventeen days. Cæsar planted a small colony on its ruins, and Adrian rebuilt a part of it, which he designated Adrianopolis. Carthage was conquered from the Romans by the arms of Genseric, A.D. 439; and it was, for more than a century, the seat of the Vandal empire in Africa, falling into the hands of the Saracens in the 7th century. The Carthaginians were governed as a republic, and had two persons yearly chosen among them with regal authority. They bore the character of a faithless and treacherous people, and the proverb Punica fides is well known. In 1859 excavations were carried on by both English and French archæologists on the site of this ancient city; and several discoveries, further revealing the social and moral character of its former inhabitants, were the result.—Carthage is the name of some places in the United States.

CARTHAGENA.

CARTHAGE CAPE, a headland in the Mediterranean. Lat. 36° 52′ 22″ N. Lon. 10° 21′ 49″ E.

CARTHAGENA, or CARTAGENA, kar'-ta-zhai'-na, a fortified city and seaport of Spain, on a bay in the Mediterranean, about 30 miles from Murcia. It is the principal naval arsenal of Spain, and lies in a natural basin, forming one of the best harbours in the Mediterranean. It has several churches, convents, a town-hall, hospitals, a school of marine, custom-house, observatory, theatre, and circus. Manf. Canvas and cordage, besides other articles necessary for the equipment of ships. It has a glass-factory and smelting-works, and trades in agricultural produce and tunny-fish. Its shipbuilding-docks are extensive, and sufficiently large for constructing ships of war. The old mines of Cartagena were discovered a few years ago. Pop. about 35,000. Lat. 36° 5′ N. Lon. 0° 56′ 36″ W.—This town was built by Asdrubal, the Carthaginian general, and was taken by Scipio 210 B.C. At that time it was one of the richest places in the world. It was subsequently reduced by the Goths, and did not begin to rise into importance again till the time of Philip II. By means of the Lorca canal, it communicates with the river Segura.

CARTHAGENA, a fortified city of South America, capital of a province, and situate on a sandy peninsula, in a commodious bay. The city and suburbs are well laid out, the streets being straight, broad, uniform, and well paved. The houses are built chiefly of stone, except a few of brick. It has various churches and convents, some of which are magnificent. The bay extends 2½ leagues from north to south, has a sufficient depth of water and good anchorage, and is so smooth that the ships are no more agitated in it than in a river. Pop. 10,000. Lat. 10° 25′ 36″ N. Lon. 75° 34′ 25″ W. —In 1544 Carthagena was taken by the French under a Corsican pilot; also by Sir Francis Drake, who, after pillaging it, set it on fire, and its complete destruction was only prevented by a ransom of 120,000 ducats, paid him by the neighbouring colonies. It was captured and pillaged a third time, by the French under Monsieur de Pointis, 1697. In 1741 it was besieged by the English; but the enterprise miscarried. In the contest with the mother country, Carthagena was besieged first by Bolivar, and afterwards by Morillo, to whom it surrendered. It was subsequently reduced by the independent troops.

CARTIER, or QUARTIER, James, kar'-te-ai, a French navigator, employed by Francis I. in exploring the coast of North America, where, in 1534, he completed the discovery of Canada. B. at St. Malo. (See CANADA.)

CARTISMANDUA, kar'-tis-man'-du-a, a queen of the Brigantes, in Britain, who has gained an unenviable fame by her treachery in betraying to the Romans the unfortunate Caractacus. She put away her lawful husband, Venutius, and took, in his room, his armourbearer Vellocatus. On this, her subjects revolted, which induced her to call to her assistance the Romans, who made themselves, thereby, masters of the country. Lived in the 1st century. (See CARACTACUS.)

CARTOUCHE, Louis Dominique, kar-toosh', the most famous robber of modern times, was the son of a Parisian artisan. Whilst very young he displayed his thieving propensities, and was expelled from the school where he had been placed. He then joined a band of robbers who infested Normandy, and soon was made their chief. He afterwards brought his accomplices to Paris, and there daily performed extraordinary feats of robbery, displaying great audacity, courage, and strength. For a long time the officers of justice sought him in vain; but, after many wonderful escapes, he was at length taken in 1721, and broken on the wheel. B. about 1693.—His life has formed the subject of numerous books, and he has been represented on the stage.

CARTWRIGHT, Edmund, kart'-rits, the inventor of the power-loom for weaving, was educated for the church, and first held the living of Brampton, near Chesterfield, and afterwards that of Goadby-Marwood, in Leicestershire. He had published several poetical effusions, besides contributing to the "Monthly Review," when his attention was accidentally drawn to the subject of mechanical weaving. Accordingly, in the April of 1785, his first power-loom was put in motion; and, although its introduction was much opposed both by manufacturers and their workmen, it gradually rose into importance, until it has become one of the greatest of the mechanical forces of Great Britain. In 1809 Parliament granted him £10,000 for "the good service he had rendered the public by his invention of weaving." B. at Marnham, Notts, 1743; D. 1823.—JOHN, a brother of the above, was considerably interested in the early history of the question of parliamentary reform. He was generally called Major Cartwright, although he held his commission in the navy. B. at Marnham, 1740; D. 1824.—There is a bronze statue of him in Burton Crescent, London.

CARUS, Marcus Aurelius, kair'-us, a Roman emperor, prefect of the prætorians under Probus, on whose death, in 281, he was elected emperor by the soldiers. He defeated the Sarmatians in Illyria, conquered Mesopotamia, the towns of Seleucia and Ctesiphon, and died, it is said by a lightning-stroke, at the latter town, 282.

CARVAJAL, Francis de, kar'-vash-al, a Spanish captain, who served in America, and contributed greatly to the success of Vaca de Castro, governor of Peru, over the young Almagro. He subsequently joined his fortunes to those of Pizarro, and, in 1548, was taken with him, and hanged as a traitor, at Cuzco.

CASA, DE LA, John, ka'-sa, an Italian prelate, who, in 1544, was created archbishop of Benevento, and, the same year, was sent nuncio to Venice, where he displayed great diplomatic abilities. He was in disgrace under Julius III., on account of his connection with Cardinal Farnese; but was restored to favour by Paul IV., who made him secretary of state. B. at Florence, 1503; D. 1556.—He is accounted one of the most elegant of the Italian writers, and his Latin poetry is very fine. His principal performance is the "Galateo; or, Art of Living in the World;" besides which he wrote some beautiful Italian poems, the lives of Cardinals Contarini and Bembo, and other works, collected at Venice, in 5 vols. 4to, 1728.

CASABIANCA, Louis, ka'-sa-be-an'-ka, a distinguished captain in the French navy, who represented Corsica in the National Convention, and was also a member of the Council of Five Hundred. In Napoleon's expedition to Egypt he commanded the Orient, a 120-gun ship; and, in 1798, at the battle of the Nile, perished with his son, a youth of ten years, who, though seeing the vessel about to sink, would not abandon his dying parent. B. about 1755.

CASALE, or CASAL, ka-sa'-lai, a town of Piedmont, the capital of a province of the same name, on the Po, 36 miles from Turin, once the capital and residence of the marquis of Montferrat. Its principal public buildings are a cathedral, several churches, hospitals, a college, library, town-hall, theatre, and corn magazine. It was formerly fortified, and was one of the strongest places in Italy, but was suffered to fall into comparative decay till 1849, when, under the direction of General de la Marmora, it was again strongly fortified. The clock-tower, which was built in 1000 and repaired in 1510, is a curious structure; and an iron bridge, which here crosses the Po, is worthy of notice. Pop. 21,500.—The province has an area of 334 square miles, producing wine and truffles, and rearing vast numbers of sheep. Pop. 121,000.—In May, 1859, an Austrian reconnoitring party, who had advanced from Vercelli, were here repulsed by the Sardinian Bersaglieri (riflemen).—There are several other Piedmontese towns, with small populations, of the same name.

CASALE MAGGIORE, maj'-je-or'-ai, a town of Lombardy, on the Po, about 20 miles from Cremona. Manf. Principally earthenware. Pop. 16,000.

CASALNUOVO, kasl-noo-o-vo, a town of Naples, in the province of Calabria Citra, 15 miles from Castrovillari. Pop. 5,500.—Casale, with various affixes, is the name of several other small towns in Italy.

CASANARE, ka'-sa-na'-rai, a large river of South America, rising in the mountains of Chita, and falling into the Meta. Lat. 5° 56′ N. Lon. 76° 50′ W.—Also a province of New Grenada, extending from the slope of the Andes to the Orinoco, watered by several rivers, and comprising extensive forests and meadows.

CASANOVA, James, ka'-sa-no'-va, a famous adventurer, of Venetian extraction, who visited different countries of Europe in various capacities. He was at once a schoolmaster, soldier, musician, chemist, alchemist, writer, and politician; and displayed, in these various callings, a great amount of talent, accompanied, necessarily, by equal chicanery. He was imprisoned at Vienna, and ultimately died there, 1803; B. at Venice, 1725.—He left, besides other books, a "History of his Captivity," and his "Memoirs," which have been translated into French.—His brother Francis was a painter of battle-pieces.

CASANOVA, a town of Naples, to the south of Capua, and 3 miles from Caserta. Pop. 3,000.

CASATISMA, kaʹ-sa-teesʹ-ma, a village in the neighbourhood of Montebello, and included in the operations of that battle, fought 20th May, 1859, between the French and Piedmontese on the one side, and the Austrians on the other. The latter were defeated.

CASAUBON, Isaac, ka-soʹ-bawng, a learned Swiss divine and critic, who, at the age of 23, was chosen professor of Greek at Geneva, and subsequently at Montpellier and Paris. In 1586 he married a daughter of Henry Stephens, a learned printer, by whom he had twenty children. In 1600 he was appointed one of the Protestant judges in the controversy between Du Perron and Du Plessis Mornay, and decided against the latter. Three years later he became head librarian to Henry IV. of France, and on the death of that monarch, removed to England, where James I. settled upon him a considerable pension, and gave him a prebend of Westminster, and another of Canterbury. In this country he passed the remainder of his days, a rigid adherent to the principles of Protestantism. B. at Geneva, 1559; D. 1614, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.—Casaubon was the author of many learned works; among which we may notice his "De Libertate Ecclesiasticâ," suppressed by Henry IV. as offensive to the pope; "De Rebus Sacris et Ecclesiasticis," "A Criticism on Baronius" and his "Epistolæ."

CASAUBON, Meric, son of the above, obtained a prebend in Canterbury cathedral, and two livings in Kent, of which he was deprived in the civil war. Cromwell made him large offers to induce him to write the history of the war, but he steadily refused to comply. He also refused to accept an invitation from Christina, queen of Sweden, to superintend the universities in her kingdom. At the Restoration he recovered his preferments. B. at Geneva, 1599; D. 1671.—His most remarkable work is a treatise on "Credulity and Incredulity," wherein he maintains the existence of witches.

CASBIN, or KASBIN, kâsʹ-bin, a city of Persia, in the province of Irak, 90 miles from Teheran. It is of a square form, each side about a mile long, and surrounded by brick walls. It has a royal palace, bazaars, schools, and baths. Manf. Carpets, made of pieces of cloth of different colours, which are much valued, and bear a high price. Sword-blades were also formerly manufactured, but that branch of industry scarcely exists now. Pop. Uncertain; perhaps 40,000.

CASCADE, or PRESIDENT MOUNTAINS, kâs-kaidʹ, a range traversing Oregon, U.S., and part of British Columbia, at a distance of from 100 to 150 miles from the shore. The highest summits are Mounts Washington, Baker, Hood, and Jefferson, rising to altitudes of from 13,000 to 14,000 feet. The name is taken from the number of falls and rapids into which the river Columbia is here broken.

CASCAVEL, kasʹ-ka-vel, a town of Brazil, built on the banks of a river, and the capital of a district of the same name. Pop. about 10,000.

CASCO BAY, kâsʹ-ko, in the county of Cumberland, state of Maine, U.S., has a width of 20 miles at its entrance. The town of Portland stands on its W. shore, and it contains 300 islands. Lat. 44° N. Lon. 68° W.

CASERTA, ka-sairʹ-ta, a city of Naples, in the Terra di Lavoro, 16 miles from Naples, at the foot of Mount Caserta. Its royal palace was begun in 1752 by Charles III. of Spain, and is a magnificent structure. It has several churches, a convent, hospital, military school, and a spacious barracks, and stands in a district which produces much excellent fruit, and wine of a superior quality. Pop. 5,000.—About two miles from this place is CASERTA VECCHIA, which has a fine cathedral, and was an important place before the foundation of the above.

CASEY, kâʹ-se, a county of Kentucky, U.S. Area, 448 square miles. Pop. about 7,000, of whom a few are slaves.

CASHAN, or KASHAN, kâsh'-an, a city of Persia, province of Irak, 90 miles from Ispahan, and containing a royal palace, many fine mosques, bazaars, and caravanserais. All kinds of copper utensils are made, and artists work skilfully in gold and silver. Pop. 30,000.

CASHEL, kâshʹ-el, a city of the county of Tipperary, 50 miles from Cork. It is an archiepiscopal see, and has a cathedral and a library containing many curious manuscripts. There is a handsome market-house, a sessions-house, a county infirmary, a charter school liberally endowed, barracks, an hospital, and an archbishop's palace. There are fine ruins of an old cathedral, situate on the edge of a remarkable perpendicular rock. Adjoining it are the remains of buildings called the Chapel and Hall of Audience of Cormac M'Culinan, king and bishop, commonly called Cormac's Chapel, and which is said to have been erected in the year 901. Pop. 8,500.—In the ancient cathedral was formerly deposited the stone upon which the sovereigns of England are now crowned. In 513, it is said, Feargus, a prince of the royal line of Cashel, obtained the throne of Scotland, and used this stone at his coronation at Dunstaffnage. Here it remained until the time of Kennett II., who removed it to Scone; and thence, in 1296, Edward I. of England had it conveyed to Westminster, and placed under the coronation chair. Cashel was the ancient residence of the kings of Munster, and in it was assembled, in 1172, the synod by which Ireland was confirmed to Henry II. of England. Dean Swift was born here, 1667.—A parish 5 miles from Lanesborough. Area, 22,151 acres. Pop. 6,000.

CASHMERE, kâshʹ-meer, a province of Northern India, now united to the dominions of the Punjab. Ext. about 80 miles long, by about 40 broad. Area, estimated at 4,500 square miles. Desc. It consists of an extensive alluvial valley, of an irregularly oval form, surrounded on all sides by mountains, whence descend numerous rivulets, which form several beautiful lakes. The summits of these mountains ascend far into the skies, and are capped with perpetual snow. The highest peak is Pir Panjal, which attains the elevation of 15,000 feet. Rivers. The principal is the Jailum, which forms a navigable communication from its eastern to its western boundary. Lakes. The Dal or City Lake, the Manasa Bul, the Great Wuller, the Ossun, and the Wusikars. The Dal is 6 miles long by 4 broad, and the Great Wuller may be regarded as nothing more than a shallow expansion of the Jailum. Climate. Excessive, but on the whole, salubrious. Pro. Rice in the valley, and, in the higher lands, wheat, barley, and various other grains; but the most valuable vegetable production is saffron, of which great quantities are exported to Hindostan and other countries. Manf. Shawls, which constitute the chief source of the wealth of Cashmere. The wool or hair of which the shawl is made, is produced by a goat, only found in Tibet, whence the Cashmere merchants are supplied with the wool, and have a monopoly of the commodity. Sugar, paper, gun and pistol barrels, lacquered ware, otto of roses, and some drugs are also made and exported. Pop. estimated at 200,000, to which in 20 years, it has been reduced by famine, pestilence, and earthquakes, from 800,000. Lat. between 33° 3′ and 34° 27′ N. Lon. between 74° 30′ and 76° 14′ E. In 1586 this country was taken by the emperor Akbar, and added to his empire. In 1752 it was conquered by the Afghans, who kept it till 1819, when it was wrested from them by the Sikhs, under whose dominion it remained, in connection with the Punjab, till 1845, when a dispute with the British resulted in its cession to them, upon conditions of mutual assistance being rendered in cases of war.

CASHMERE, called also SERINAGHUR, the capital of the above province, extends 3 miles on each side of the river Jailum, over which there are several wooden bridges. Many of the houses are three stories high, and are principally built of wood, with partition-walls of brick and mortar. The residence of the governor is on the right bank of the river. The streets are narrow, and choked with the filth of the inhabitants, who are proverbially a dirty people. In the environs, on the banks of a lake, are the remains of several handsome palaces, built by the emperors of Hindostan. Its opulence has greatly decayed. Pop. Uncertain: at the commencement of the present century it was estimated at 150,000; but pestilence and misrule have immensely reduced it. Lat. 34° 5′ N. Lon. 74° 57′ E.

CASILINUM, kăs-i-lī'-num, an ancient city of Campania, on the Vulturnus, opposite Capua. It was in this vicinity that Hannibal was inclosed by Fabius in an upland valley, whence the Carthaginian general escaped by driving before him, up the hill-sides, oxen with blazing fagots fixed to their horns, about 217 B.C.

CASIMIR I., kăs'-i-meer, king of Poland, surnamed the Peaceful, son of Micilas, whom he succeeded in 1034. The Poles revolting under the regency of his mother, he went to Paris, and became a monk. The Poles, a prey to internal dissensions, induced Pope Benedict IX. to allow him to return to his kingdom and marry. Accordingly, he espoused a daughter of the grand-duke of Russia, and afterwards governed his kingdom with great wisdom. D. 1058.

CASIMIR II., king of Poland, surnamed the Just, was the younger son of Boleslaus III. When his brother Mieczlaus was, on account of his tyranny, deposed in 1177, the Poles conferred the crown on Casimir. He was an upright, generous prince. B. 1117; D. 1194.

CASIMIR III., the Great, succeeded Ladislaus in 1333. He defeated John, king of Bohemia, and conquered a part of Russia. He united to his warlike qualities the powers of a great king; maintained peace, founded several churches and hospitals, and built numerous fortresses. He is said, however, to have been a man of strong passions, in which he frequently indulged to excess. B. 1309; D. 1370.—In his reign, privileges were bestowed on the Jews, which they ever continued to enjoy; these were granted at the request of a Jewess, named Esther, one of his favourites.

CASIMIR IV. was grand-duke of Lithuania, and ascended the throne of Poland 1447. He defeated the Teutonic knights, and made war with various success against the king of Hungary and the Tartars. D. 1492.

CASIMIR V., John [illegible] of Sigismund III., succeeded to the throne of Pol[illegible] on the death of Ladislaus VII.; obtaining permission [illegible] marry his brother's widow. Defeated at first by Charles Gustavus of Sweden, he subsequently, with the aid of the emperor Leopold, was victorious, and, in 1660, concluded the treaty of Oliva with his successor. Shortly after, his troops, under Sobieski, defeated the Tartars. The cares of government, and the loss of his wife in 1667, induced him to resign the crown, and retire to France, where he died in 1672. D. 1609.

CASIRI, ka-seer'-e, a learned Oriental scholar, who took orders at Rome, and taught the Eastern languages in that city. In 1748 he repaired to Madrid, where he was made a member of the Academy of History, interpreter to the king, and head librarian of the Escurial. From 1750 to 1770 this industrious man laboured at the compilation of a description and analysis of all the Arabian MSS. contained in the library of the Escurial, the richest in Europe in works of that kind. This esteemed production was published at Madrid, 2 vols. folio, the second containing most interesting accounts of the battles of the Moors and Christians in the Peninsula. B. at Tripoli, Syria, 1710; D. at Madrid, 1791.

CASKETS, THE, kas'-kets, a group of rocks in the English Channel, 7 miles from Alderney. They have often been fatal to vessels, and, in 1119, Prince William, son of Henry I., and his suite, perished here. In 1744, the Victory ship of war, of 110 guns, also was shipwrecked upon them. On the highest there is a lighthouse in lat. 49° 45′ N.; lon. 2° 22′ W.

CASPIAN SEA, kăs'-pe-ăn, an inland sea of Asia, bounded N. by the government of Astracan, E. by Tartary, S. by Persia, and W. by the ridges of Caucasus, the principalities of Baku, Derbend, and Circassia, together with part of the government of Astracan. Ext. 730 miles long, by 150 to 270 broad. Area, estimated by different authorities at 120,000 and 140,000 square miles; in certain places it is of great depth. The water is salt, but less so than the ocean, on account of its receiving a great many large fresh-water rivers, which will be noticed under their names. It has neither tides nor outlets, its superfluous waters being exhausted by evaporation, and it is well supplied with fish. On the upper coasts, seals abound, and tortoises are numerous at the mouths of the Ural and Volga. Many thousands of persons are employed in the Upper Caspian fisheries, and sturgeon and sterlet are taken in vast quantities. The Russian delicacy caviar is here made, being the roe of the sturgeon, salted and smoked. Lat. between 36° 55′ and 47° 30′ N. Lon. between 46° 48′ and 55° 25′ E.—This sea was known to the Greeks and Romans, and took its name from the Caspii, a people who inhabited its S. coast. Although its navigation is difficult, it is now traversed by steam vessels, and is a naval rendezvous for Russian ships. (See ASIA.)

CASS, kăss, the name of several places in the United States.—1. A county of Indiana. Area, 415 square miles. Pop. 6,000.—2. In Georgia. Area, 432 square miles. Pop. 14,000, of whom a fourth are slaves.—3. In Michigan. Area, 528 square miles. Pop. 11,000.—4. In Illinois. Area, 360 square miles. Pop. 8,000.—5. In Missouri. Area, 670 square miles. Pop. 7,000. Also a river and a lake in N. America.

CASS, Lewis, an American politician, who, in the war between England and the United States, in 1812, made an incursion into Canada, and was taken prisoner. When peace was concluded, he was appointed governor of Michigan, and organized that vast territory, making treaties with the Indian tribes, by which three millions of acres were added to the state. Under the presidency of General Jackson, in 1831, he was secretary for war, and four years afterwards, was sent to Paris as envoy extraordinary. Here he remained seven years, and whilst engaged in this mission, published his "Views on the Subject of the Limitation of the Northern Frontiers of the Union," and protested against the adhesion of M. Guizot to the doctrine of the "right of visit." The treaty concluded in 1842, between England and the United States, not meeting his approval, he resigned, and returned to America. In the senate he voted for the Fugitive Slave Law, and in 1857 was made secretary of state under President Buchanan. B. 1778.

CASSANDRA, daughter of Priam and Hecuba. She was passionately loved by Apollo, who promised to grant her whatever she might require, if she would look with favour on his suit. She demanded the power of prophecy, and as soon as she had received it, refused to perform her promise, and slighted Apollo. The god, thus disappointed, wetted her lips with his tongue, and thus no belief was ever placed in her predictions. She endeavoured to prevent the entrance into Troy of the wooden horse of the Greeks, but was unsuccessful, and when that city was taken, she suffered violence at the hands of Ajax Oileus. In the division of the spoils of Troy, she fell to the share of Agamemnon, who carried her to Greece. She repeatedly foretold to him the calamities that awaited his return; but he gave no credit to her, and was assassinated by his wife Clytemnestra. Cassandra shared his fate, after seeing all her prophecies but too truly fulfilled. Lived in the 12th century B.C.

CASSANDRA NOVA, kas-san'-dra, a town of European Turkey, between the gulfs of Salonica and Cassandra. Lat. 40° N. Lon. 23° 20′ E.—The GULF is 33 miles long by 10 broad.

CASSANDER, kăs-săn'-der, the son of Antipater, took possession of the kingly power in Macedonia, on the death of his father. He caused the death of Olympias, the mother of Alexander the Great, and also of his son, the young Alexander. Joining his forces to those of Seleucus, Ptolemy, and Lysimachus, he defeated Antigonus at the battle of Ipsus, 301 B.C., the latter monarch falling on the field, and the four conquerors dividing between them Alexander's empire into the [illegible] kingdoms of Macedonia, Thrace, Egypt, and Syria. (See ANTIGONUS, &c.)

CASSANO, kas-sa'-no, a town of Calabria Citra, 35 miles from Cosenza. It is the capital of a circle, and has a cathedral, several convents, and mineral springs. Timber, corn, and fruit are raised in the neighbourhood, and it has a trade in leather, yarn, and cotton and silk fabrics. Pop. about 8,000.—There are several other smaller Neapolitan towns of the same name.

CASSANO, a town of Lombardo-Venetia, 16 miles from Milan, on the Adda, across which is here a bridge. Pop. 2,500.—In 1259 Eccelino Romano, chief of the Ghibelines, was here defeated and killed. In 1705 the French, under the duke of Vendôme, gained a victory over the Imperialists, commanded by Prince Eugène; and, in 1799, Suwarrow inflicted a defeat on the French, under Moreau. There are several villages of Northern Italy of this name, none of them with a population above 3,000.

CASSAY, KATHEE, or MUNEEPOOR, kas-sai', formerly a province of the Birman empire, but now independent, is bounded on the N., E., and S. by Burmah, and on the W. by Cachar. Area, estimated at 7,500 square miles. Desc. A valley, encompassed by rugged and precipitous mountains, watered by the tributaries of the Irawadi or the Barah. Pro. Cotton, indigo, tobacco, rice, sugar, opium, and mustard. The tea-plant is produced in the N., and a valuable breed of ponies is reared. Manf. Muslins, silk stuffs, cotton cloths, and iron wares. Pop. Uncertain; perhaps 30,000. Lat. between 23° 49′ and 25° 41′ N. Lon. between 93° 5′ and 94° 32′ E.—The government of this country is invested in an hereditary rajah, assisted by a divan. In 1826 the treaty of Yandabo rendered it independent.

CASSEL, or KASSEL, kas'-sel, a town of Germany, on the Fulda, across which there is, here, a fine stone bridge, 90 miles from Frankfort-on-the-Maine. It is the principal town of the circle of Lower Hessen, and the seat of government. The Fulda divides it into an old and new town, in the former of which is the town-hall, the government offices, the arsenal, the foundry, the house of correction, the Parade Square, the large barracks, the church of St. Martin, and the public library. The other public buildings are the opera, a picture-gallery, observatory, a mint, and a riding-school. Besides these there are pleasure-gardens, an orangery, baths, many churches, a college, an academy of arts, and societies of trade and agriculture. Manf. Fabrics of silk, cotton, and wool, leather, paper-hangings, gloves, chemicals, jewellery, earthen and lacquered wares, hats, and dyes. In the neighbourhood are oil, gunpowder, and other mills. Pop. 33,000; of its circle, 66,500.—This town was the capital of Westphalia under Napoleon I. It has communication with Leipsic and Frankfort by railway.

CASSEL, a town of France, in the department of the Nord, 15 miles from Dunkirk. Manf. Linen cloth, thread, lace, hosiery, and soap. It has some salt-refineries and oil-mills, besides a trade in cattle and poultry. Pop. about 6,000.—It is connected by rail with Lille and Dunkirk.

CASSEL, or KASSEL, a town of Germany, on the right bank of the Rhine, opposite Mayence, with which it communicates by a bridge of boats. Pop. 2,500.

CASSELLE, kas-sail'-lai, the name of several towns in the Sardinian states.—1. 8 miles from Turin. Pop. 3,500.—2. In Lombardy, 7 miles from Lodi. Pop. 1,500.—3. In Lombardy, 20 miles from Lodi. Pop. 3,000.

CASSENEUIL, kas-sen'-e(r)-e', a town of France, department of the Lot and Garonne, 5 miles from Villeneuve-sur-Lot. Pop. 2,000.

CASSIANO, SAN, kas'-se-a'-no, a village of Lombardy, 8 miles from Peschiera, included in the operations of the battle of Solferino, fought June 24, 1859, between the Austrians and the allied French and Sardinians.

CASSIM PASHA, kas'-sim pa'-sha, a suburb of Constantinople, separated, by burying-grounds, from Galata. In it are the imperial dockyard, the naval arsenal, and the palace of the capitan-pasha.

CASSINA, or CASHNA, kash'-na, an extensive kingdom of Central Africa, situate W. of Bornou and S. of the Niger. It is but little known.

CASSINI, John Dominic, a celebrated Italian astronomer, educated among the Jesuits at Genoa, who succeeded, in 1650, Cavalieri, as professor of astronomy at Bologna. He here gained so great a reputation that both the pope and the senate of Bologna intrusted him with several scientific and political missions. In 1669 Colbert induced him to visit France. He there was naturalized, and became a member of the Academy of Sciences. B. in the county of Nice, 1625; D. at Paris, 1712.—Cassini discovered several of Jupiter's and Saturn's satellites, and determined the rotation of Jupiter, Mars, and Venus. He published a "Theory of Jupiter's Satellites," remarkable for its correctness, and assisted in the measurement of the meridian line of Paris. He left behind him a great number of astronomical memoirs and observations.

CASSINI, James, son of the above, succeeded his father in the Academy of Sciences, and enriched science with many valuable discoveries. In 1720 he published a book on the figure of the earth, in which he maintained, in opposition to Newton, that it was an oblong spheroid. To determine this, the French king sent two companies of mathematicians, one towards the polar circle, and the other to the equator, to measure a degree, the result of which was a decided refutation of Cassini's opinion. B. at Paris, 1677; D. 1756.

CASSINI DE THURY, Cæsar Francis, son of the above, evinced, at a very early age, great talents for astronomy, and was received into the Academy of Sciences at 22. He was employed many years in perfecting a general chart of France, and in continuing the perpendicular of the meridian of Paris. The former was composed of 180 pages, and gave a most complete representation of the country, on a scale of a line to 6 feet. Cæsar François was unable to finish it; but it was at length concluded by his son, who presented it, in 1784, to the National Assembly. He published a great number of papers in the "Memoirs of the Academy of Sciences." B. at Paris, 1714; D. 1784.—He was succeeded in his office by his only son, Count John Dominic Cassini.

CASSIODORUS, Marcus Aurelius, kăs-si-o-dor'-us, an Italian of great talents, who was appointed by Theodoric, king of the Goths, governor of Sicily, and filled some of the highest offices in Rome, and afterwards retired to a monastery in Calabria. He is celebrated as a chronologist and historian, and is said to have devoted himself also to mechanical pursuits, and invented water-clocks, sun-dials, and lamps. B. in Calabria, 481; D. 577.

CASSIOPE, or CASSIOPEA, kăs-si'-o-pe, or kăs'-si-o-pe'-a, wife of Cepheus and mother to Andromeda. Boasting herself fairer than the Nereides, Neptune was exasperated, and sent a huge sea-monster to ravage her dominions, and she was forced to expose Andromeda to its fury. After her death, Cassiope was made a constellation. (See ANDROMEDA.)

CASSIQUIARI, kas'-se-ke'-a-re', a large and copious branch of the Rio Negro, in South America, communicating with the Orinoco and Amazons.

CASSITERIDES, kăs'-si-ter'-i-dees, a group of islands, so named by the Greeks, on account of the quantity of tin (kassiteros) there found. They are supposed to be the Scilly Isles, off the coast of Cornwall.

CASSIUS, Caius, kăsh'-e-us, a Roman general, one of Cæsar's murderers. During the civil wars between Pompey and Cæsar, he followed the fortunes of the former. After the decisive battle of Pharsalia, he was, however, spared by the conqueror. Returning to Rome, he married Junia, the sister of Brutus, and in conjunction with the latter, formed a conspiracy against the emperor. After the death of their victim, 44 B.C., Cassius received Africa as his reward, but found himself unable to maintain himself there, in consequence of the influence of Cæsar's friends. Passing into the East, he levied numerous troops and joined Brutus in Macedon. On the plains of Philippi, where Antony and Octavius met them, the left of the army, under Cassius, was defeated by Antony's troops, and this neutralized the success which Brutus was achieving on the right. Fearing to fall into the enemy's hands, he ordered one of his freedmen to run him through, and perished by that very sword which had given a wound to Cæsar, 42 B.C.—His body was honoured with a magnificent funeral by his friend Brutus, who declared over him that he deserved to be called "the last of the Romans." If he was brave, he was equally learned. Some of his letters are still extant among Cicero's epistles. He was often too rash and too violent, and many of the wrong steps which Brutus took, are to be ascribed to the prevailing advice of Cassius. Shakspeare describes him as having "a lean and hungry look," and makes Cæsar say,—

> ——"He reads much;
> He is a great observer, and he looks
> Quite through the deeds of men; he loves no plays,
> As thou dost, Antony; he hears no music:
> Seldom he smiles; and smiles in such a sort,
> As if he mock'd himself, and scorn'd his spirit,
> That could be moved to smile at anything."

The day after Cæsar's murder he dined at the house of Antony, who asked him whether he had then a dagger concealed in his bosom. "Yes," replied he, "if you aspire to tyranny." There were many other Romans of this name, in whose lives there is nothing very remarkable.

CASSIVELAUNUS, kăs'-si-ve-law'-nus, a British chief, who was invested with the supreme command of the forces of the island, to oppose Julius Cæsar during his invasion of Britain, 54 B.C.

CAST, ST., kast, a village on the coast of France, in the department Côte du Nord, having a small harbour. Pop. 1,481. Here, in 1758, a landing of the British was repulsed (see CAVENDISH, Lord), and 100 years afterwards, a column was inaugurated to commemorate the event.

CASTAGNO, Andrea del, kas-tan'-yo, a Tuscan painter, who worked first in fresco, but afterwards learned the art of painting in oil from Domenico Veneziano. His repayment for this was to assassinate his friend. Unsuspected, he pursued his calling, and produced some fine pictures, the principal of which is the "Execution of the Conspirators against the Medici," now in the Hall of Justice at Florence. B. at Castagno, 1406; D. 1189.—Stung with remorse, he, on his deathbed, confessed, amidst universal execration, the atrocious crime of which he had been guilty.

CASTASEGNA, kas'-ta-sain'-ya, a village and parish of the Grisons, Switzerland, 8 miles from Chiavenna. It is situate at the W. extremity of the Val di Bregaglia. This is the limit of the mulberry; consequently, north of this village the silkworm cannot be extensively cultivated.

CASTEGGIO, kas-tedj'-e-o, a town of Piedmont, in the division of Alessandria, 6 miles from Voghera. Pop. with parish, about 3,000.—On June 9, 1800, the battle of Montebello was gained by the French, under Lannes, over the Austrians, in the neighbourhood of this place. Another engagement was also fought on May 20, 1859, when Count Stadion, at the head of his Austrians, stormed the town on his advance upon Montebello, where, met by the French and Sardinian forces, the Austrians were defeated. (See MONTEBELLO.)

CASTEL, kas'-tel, the name, with various affixes, of a number of small Italian towns and villages.

CASTELLAMARE, kas-tel'-a-ma'-rai, a seaport-town of Sicily, 20 miles from Trapani. In its neighbourhood are the vestiges of the ancient Segesta. Pop. 8,000.—The GULF of the same name is on the N. coast, about lat. 38° 10′ N.; lon. 13° E.—Richelieu defeated the Spanish fleet here in 1648; and in 1799 a battle was fought between the French under Marshal Macdonald, and the allied English and Neapolitans.

CASTEL CALDO, kal'-do, a town of Italy, 30 miles from Padua. Pop. 3,000.

CASTEL FRANCO, fran'-ko, the name of several small towns in Italy, none of them with a population above 4,300.

CASTELL, SAN, kas-tel', the names, with various affixes, of several small Italian towns, none with a population above 3,500.

CASTELLAMARE, a seaport of Naples, 15 miles from Naples, built at the foot of a hill. It has a royal dockyard, a palace, and a military hospital. Manf. Leather, silk, cotton, linen fabrics, and sail-cloth. Pop. 30,000.—This place is built on the site of the ancient Stabiæ, near which the elder Pliny met his death during the eruption of Vesuvius, in the year 79. Here, also, considerable damage was done from the shock of an earthquake, which extended over a wide area, in 1857. It is connected with Naples by railway.

CASTELLAMONTE, kas'-tel-la-mon'-tai, a town of Piedmont, 10 miles from Ivrea. Pop. 5,000, chiefly engaged in the manufacture of pottery.

CASTELLARO, kas-tel-la'-ro, the name of several villages in Sardinia, and of a small town in Lombardy.

CASTELLAZZO, kas'-tel-lat'-so, a town of Piedmont, 7 miles from Alessandria. Pop. 5,300.

CASTELLETTO, kas'-tel-let'-to, the name of several considerable villages in the Sardinian states.

CASTELLO, kas-tel'-lo, the name, with various affixes, of several small Italian towns, none of them with a population above 2,300.

CASTELLO, the name, with various affixes, of several towns of Portugal, none of them with a population above 6,000.

CASTELLON DE LA PLANA, kas'-tel-lone dai la pla'-na, a town of Spain, in the province of Valencia, 4 miles from the Mediterranean. Some of its old Moorish walls still remain. It has a church, several chapels, the town-house, and a vast tower or belfry, 260 feet in height, and 116 in circumference. Manf. Brandy; and an active commerce in other articles is carried on. Pop. 17,000.

CASTELNAU, kas'-tel-no, the name, with various affixes, of several towns, villages, and parishes in France, of small populations. It is also the name of a fortress, in the department of Gard, 8 miles from Uzès, where Roland, the chief of the Camisards, met his death, in August, 1704.

CASTELNAU, Pierre de, archdeacon of Maguelone, was sent, at the commencement of the 13th century, by Innocent III. into the S. of France as legate extraordinary, in order to search out the heretic Albigenses, and deliver them over to the secular arm. He was met by a determined resistance, and was at last slain in the territory of Raymond, count of Toulouse. This murder led to the excommunication of Raymond, and also to the war of the Albigenses. Killed 1208.

CASTELNAUDARY, kas-tel'-no-da-re', a town of France, department of the Aude, 33 miles from Toulouse. Manf. Silk and woollen fabrics and earthenware. It has also shipbuilding-docks. Pop. 10,000.—In 1355 this place was taken and burnt by Edward the Black Prince.

CASTELNOVO, kas-tel-no'-vo, the name of several towns in Italy, none of them with a population above 3,500.

CASTEL NUOVO, noo-o'-vo, a town and parish of Piedmont, 12 miles from Alessandria. Pop. 7,000. The name of several other small towns in Italy.

CASTELNUOVO, a fortified seaport-town of Austria, Dalmatia, 11 miles from Cattaro, defended by a citadel and two forts on neighbouring heights. Pop. of parish, 7,000.—The British took it in 1814.

CASTEL-SARDO, sar'-do, a fortified seaport-town on the N. coast of Sardinia, and the strongest on the island. Pop. about 2,500.

CASTEL SARRASIN, sar'-ra-săi, a town of France, on the Garonne, 30 miles from Toulouse. Pop. 7,000.

CASTELVETERE, kas'-tel-vai-ter'-ai, the name of several towns of Naples, the largest of which has a population of 3,500.

CASTIGLIONE DELLE STIVIERE, kas-teel'-ye-o'-nai, a fortified town of Lombardy, 20 miles from Mantua. Pop. 5,300.—Here, in 1796, the French, under Augereau, gained a decisive victory over the Austrians. The French commander was afterwards made, on account of this battle, Duc de Castiglione. In 1859, the battle of Solferino also occurred in its neighbourhood.—Castiglione is the name of numerous other small towns and villages in Italy.

CASTIGLIONE, Duc de. (See AUGEREAU, Marshal.)

CASTIGLIONE, Giovanni Benedetto, called by the French Le Benedette, and at Mantua Il Grechetto. He is one of the most eminent of the Genoese painters and etchers. In animal and pastoral painting especially he excelled. His chef-d'œuvre is "The Nativity of the Saviour," in the church of San Luca, Genoa. B. at Genoa, 1616; D. at Mantua, 1670.

CASTIGLIONE, Balthazar, an Italian writer and politician, who, after serving with great bravery in a military capacity, was employed by the duke of Urbino in state affairs, and sent ambassador to several courts. He was also engaged in the same service by Pope Clement VII., and became nuncio at the court of Charles V., who held him in high estimation. B. at Mantua, 1478; D. at Toledo, 1529.—His greatest work is "Il Cortigiano," or the Courtier, written in an elegant style, and abounding with good rules and reflections.

CASTILE, kăs-teel', a part of Spain, occupying the central table-land of the peninsula, and erected into a kingdom at the beginning of the 11th century. It was subsequently extended by the additions of Andalusia, Estremadura, and Leon. In 1174 the marriage of Ferdinand of Aragon with Isabella of Castile was consummated. This circumstance brought all the Christian states of Spain under one sceptre. In 1492 the conquest of Grenada was achieved, which paved the way for the constitution of the Spanish kingdom. (See SPAIN.)

CASTILE, OLD, an extensive province of Spain, forming the N. portion of the ancient kingdom of Castile, and inclosed by Aragon, New Castile, Estremadura, Leon, Asturias, Biscay, and Navarre. The provinces now comprised in it are Avila, Burgos, Logrono, Palencia, Santandar, Segovia, Soria, and Valladolid. Area, 26,768 square miles. Desc. Traversed by mountains in the N., S., and centre, and watered by the Xalon, the Douro, the Ebro, the Carrion, and the Tormes. The plains are fertile, and yield abundance of fruit and grain; and the pasture being excellent, sheep and cattle are extensively reared. The mountains supply some useful minerals, and are, in some parts, covered with wood. Manf. Unimportant; consisting of paper, glass, leather, and earthenware. The chief articles of export are corn, wool, and madder. Pop. 1,428,000.

CASTILE, NEW, one of the largest provinces of Spain, forming the S. portion of the ancient kingdom of Castile, and inclosed by Old Castile, Aragon, Valencia, Murcia, La Mancha, and Estremadura. The provinces now comprising it are Ciudad-real, Cuença, Guadalaxara, Madrid, and Toledo. Area, 42,994 square miles. Desc. Mountainous in the N. and S., and its centre is traversed by numerous ranges, separating extensive plains and fertile valleys. From the great drought of the climate, the soil suffers from want of water. Rivers. The Tagus, the Xucart, and the Guadiana, and many smaller streams; such as the Xarama, the Molina, and the Alberche. Pro. Oil, wine, madder, saffron, hemp, and fruit. Agriculture is in general neglected; but large herds of cattle are raised, and the sheep of the Sierras Molina and Cuença supply the merino wool. Horses are numerous and of excellent quality. Minerals. Abundant; the Sierra Morena yields the richest in the kingdom. Rock-salt and marble are plentiful in several parts of the province. Manf. Paper, silk, cotton, and cloth are the principal. Pop. 1,491,000.

CASTILHO, Antonio Feliciando de, kas-teel'-yo, one of the most distinguished modern Portuguese poets, who early discovered his genius, and first came into notice by the publication of a meritorious imitation of Ovid, entitled "Letters from Echo to Narcissus." He has written much poetry with various success, and was the founder of a magazine which had a considerable circulation. B. at Lisbon, 1800.

CASTILLON, kas-tee'-yawng, a town and parish of France, in the department of the Gironde, 10 miles from Libourne. Pop. 3,000.—In the neighbourhood of this place Montaigne, the French essayist, was born and died. In 1453, under the walls of this town, the English were defeated by the French, and Talbot, their leader, was slain.

CASTLE, kas'-el, the prefix to the names of numerous places in the United Kingdom, having small populations, and, in general, with little to record of them. The most important are given below.

CASTLEBAR, kas'-el-bar, a town and parish of Ireland, in the county of Mayo, 10 miles from Westport. Area of parish, 14,794 acres. Pop. 9,300; of the town, 4,000.—This town was occupied by the French when they landed in Killalea Bay, in 1798; but, on the approach of Lord Cornwallis, shortly afterwards, was evacuated.—The CASTLEBAR RIVER flows from a lake 3 miles in length, and falls into Loch Cullin.

CASTLECOMER, kas'-el-ko'-mer, a town and parish of Ireland, in the county of Kilkenny, near extensive coal-mines, 10 miles from Kilkenny. Area of parish, 21,592 acres. Pop. 9,000; of town, 1,695.—In the rebellion of 1798 this town was attacked by the rebels, and nearly destroyed by fire.

CASTLE-CONNELL, kas'-el-kon'-nel, a town and parish of Ireland, on the Shannon, 7 miles from Limerick. Area of parish, 6,698 acres. Pop. 4,200; of the town, 600.—It has mineral springs.

CASTLE-DOUGLAS, kas'-el-dug'-las, a market-town of Kirkcudbright, 18 miles from Dumfries, in Scotland. Pop. 2,000.

CASTLE-REA, or CASTLEREAGH, kas'-el-re, a market-town of Ireland, in Connaught, 16 miles from Roscommon, the head of a poor-law union. Pop. 1,300.

CASTLEREAGH, Lord. (See LONDONDERRY, Marquis of.)

CASTLE-RISING, kas'-el-ri'-sing, a town and parish of Norfolk, 4 miles from King's Lynn. Area of parish, 2,330 acres. Pop. 400.—This place is remarkable for having a castle in which Isabella, the queen of Edward II., was incarcerated after the murder of her husband, in 1327.

CASTLETON, kas'-el-ton, a village of Derbyshire, 13 miles from Sheffield. It stands at the bottom of a precipitous rock, on which is erected Peak Castle, the fortress of William Peveril, natural son of the Conqueror. The supposed founder was the Peveril of the Peak in Sir Walter Scott's novel of that name. In the neighbourhood is the Peak Cavern, 46 feet high and 120 wide.

CASTLETON, a township of Lancashire, 2 miles from Rochdale. Pop. 17,500.

CASTLETOWN, or CASTLE RUSHEN, the chief town of the Isle of Man, on the south coast. It is tolerably well built, and has a safe and commodious harbour. Pop. 2,300.—The keep of the ancient castle of Rushen now forms the only prison on the island. This town was the ancient Sodo.

CASTLETOWN ROCHE, a town and parish of Ireland, in the county of Cork. Area of parish, 6,485 acres. Pop. 3,500; of town, 1,064.

CASTOR and POLLUX, kas'-tor, were twin brothers, sons of Jupiter, by Leda, and were supposed both to have sprung from one egg. As soon as they had arrived at years of maturity, they embarked with Jason in quest of the golden fleece, and behaved with great courage. Pollux slew Amycus in the combat of the cestus, and is the god and patron of boxing and wrestling. Castor distinguished himself in the management of horses. After many adventures, Castor was killed, and his death avenged by Pollux. (See POLLUX.)

CASTRACANI, Castruccio. (See CASTRUCCIO.)

CASTRES, kastr, a town of France, in the department of Tarn, 23 miles from Albi, divided into two parts by the river Agout. It contains many fine public buildings, particularly the ancient palace of the bishops of Castres, and the cathedral church. Pop. 3,994.—Here Rapin, the historian, was born in 1661.

CASTRI, kas'-tre, a village of Greece, occupying a portion of the site of ancient Delphi. It stands on the S. declivity of Parnassus, at a distance of 7 miles from Salona. In its immediate neighbourhood is the celebrated spring of Castalia.

CASTRO, kas'-tro, a town of Italy, in the States of the Church, 55 miles from Rome.—This is the prefix to the names of numerous places in Italy, Spain, and Portugal.

CASTRO, the ancient Mitylene, a seaport-town of the island of Mitylene, about a mile in circumference. Pop. 6,500.

CASTRO, a town of Brazil, in the province of San Paulo, 85 miles from Curitiba. Pop. of district, 9,000.

CASTRO, Juan de, a Portuguese viceroy of the Indies, allied to the royal family of his country. In 1545 he was appointed to the government of the East, and gained several considerable victories over the natives. As honest as brave, he died poor, and was buried at the public expense. It is is said that once, wanting to raise a loan to assist commerce, he offered his "moustaches" as a security; the lenders, however, were satisfied with his word. B. at Lisbon, 1500; D. at Goa, India, 1548.

CASTRO, Vaca de, priest and judge-royal of Valladolid, was sent by Charles V. to Peru, in 1540, to suppress the various contending factions, and to regulate the interior administration of the kingdom. On his arrival he learnt the assassination of Pizarro, and Almagro's usurpation. Marching an army against the latter, he defeated, and executed him with his accomplices. This done, he endeavoured to ameliorate the lot of the Indians by wise regulations, but fell into disgrace on this account, 1544. D. in Spain, 1558.

CASTRO-DEL-RIO-EL-LEAL, a town of Spain, in the province of Cordova, and 18 miles from the town of that name. Pop. 9,000, mostly engaged in woollen manufacture.

CASTRO GIOVANNI, cho-van'-ne, a town of Sicily, in the Val-di-Noto, 40 miles from Catania. Pop. about 6,000.—This is the Enna of antiquity, fabled as the nativity of Ceres, and the site of her most celebrated temple. At a distance of 6 miles is the Lake of Pergusa, where Pluto found Proserpine and carried her off.

Castro Nuovo, noo-o'-vo, a fortified town of Sicily, 20 miles from Palermo. Pop. 6,000. In its vicinity are marble-quarries.

Castro Urdiales, oor'-de-a-laies, a seaport-town of Spain, 28 miles from Santander, in the Bay of Biscay. Pop. 3,000. In 1811 this town was sacked by the French; but it was afterwards rebuilt.

Castrovillari, kas'-tro-veel-la-re, a fortified town of Naples, in the province of Calabria Citra, 8 miles from Cassano. Pop. about 8,000. Near Monte Pollino, in its neighbourhood, the famous cheese called cacio cavallo is made.

Castro Virreyna, ve-ri'-na, the capital of a province of the same name in Peru, situate on a lofty mountain, where the cold is intense. It is 112 miles from Guamanga. Pop. of the province, 14,000. The cold of this region arises from its elevation; otherwise, it is situate within the tropics.

Castruccio, Castracani, kas-troot-ch'-e-o, a distinguished Italian soldier, who was designed for the church. In his youth the quarrels of the Guelphs and Ghibelines were distracting Italy, and he, as one of the latter party, was driven out of Pavia. After serving with distinction in Lombardy, he went to England, and entered the army of Edward I.; but was forced to quit that country, having killed a nobleman in a duel. He then became a soldier under Philip the Fair, of France, and subsequently returned to Italy, where the Ghibelines of Lucca made him their chief. He had here much to combat, both in the jealousies of his friends and the strength of his enemies; but ultimately succeeded in overcoming all difficulties. In 1320 he was proclaimed duke of Lucca, and was recognized by the emperor Louis of Bavaria. B. at Lucca, 1281; D. 1328.—His life has been written by Macchiavelli.

Castua, kas-too-a, a town of Illyria, Austria, 30 miles from Trieste. Pop. 500. This place was formerly the capital of Liburnia.

Castuera, kas'-too-air'-a, a town of Spain, about 70 miles from Badajoz. It stands on the right bank of the Guadalefra, and has a trade in wine and fruit. Pop. 6,000.

Caswell, kăs'-well, a county in the N. of N. Carolina, U.S. Area, 400 square miles. Desc. Fertile, and diversified with hill and dale. Pro. Maize, wheat, and tobacco. Manf. Cotton, tobacco, and iron wares; it has also numerous flour, corn, and saw mills. Pop. 16,000, of whom the half are slaves.

Cat Island, one of the Bahama islands, also called San Salvador. (See Bahamas.)

Catalina, Santa, ka'-ta-le'-na, the name of several small islands in the Caribbean Sea and Pacific Ocean. Also a Cape of central America, 70 miles from Nicaragua, and a Harbour on the E. coast of Newfoundland, at the N. entrance of Trinity Bay.

Catalonia, kăt'-a-lo'-ne-a, a province of Spain, situate in the N.E. part of the kingdom, and bounded N. by the Pyrences, which separate it from France; E. by the Mediterranean, S. by Valencia, and W. by Aragon. It now comprises the provinces of Barcelona, Gerona, Lerida, and Tarragona. Area, 12,111 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, but less fertile than either of the Castiles, though its inhabitants are far more industrious, and more advanced in manufactures, commerce, and agriculture. Near its centre, Mont Serrat attains an elevation of 4,054 feet. Rivers. The Ebro, the Ler, and the Llobregat. Pro. All the usual cerealia, with flax, hemp, madder, liquorice, saffron, barilla, fruits, and wine. Minerals. Coal, zinc, manganese, copper, and lead. There are salt-works along the coast, and a salt-mine at Cardona. Manf. Silk, cotton, woollen, paper, leather, and fire-arms. Pop. 1,284,000. —This province was anciently under the dominion of the Romans, who were ejected in the 5th century by the Goths, who, in their turn, were ejected by the Moors, at the beginning of the 8th century. The Spaniards finally reconquered it, and its people were represented by local parliaments. From 1137, when the province was united to Aragon, the history of the Catalonians is nothing more than a record of rebellions, which were not finally suppressed until Philip V., who, after the capture of Barcelona, in 1714, crushed their liberties and deprived them of their ancient cortes.

Catamarca, ka'-ta-mar'-ka, a department of the confederation of La Plata, S. America, bounded on the W. by the Andes, which separate it from the northern provinces of Chili. On the other sides it has the departments Cordova, Salta, Tucuman, and Rioja. Area, unascertained. Desc. Fertile, having excellent pasture lands, and producing maize and other corns in abundance; it also grows good cotton, and exports large quantities of red pepper to Buenos Ayres. Pop. of department, estimated at 35,000. Lat. between 25° and 29° S. Lon. between 66° and 69° W.

Catanduanes, ka'-tan-doo-a'-nais, one of the Philippine isles. Ext. 40 miles long, by 15 broad. It is fertile. Lat. 15° N. Lon. 124° 30′ E.

Catania, kă-tai'-ne-a, a city and seaport of Sicily, beautifully situate at the foot of Mount Etna, 30 miles from Syracuse. Although destroyed three times by the lava of Etna, Catania appears to have always risen with renewed splendour from its ashes, to rank among the elegant cities of Europe. It consists of two very long and spacious streets, which are intersected at right angles by several others, and are all regularly built and well paved with lava. The houses are generally very handsome, and the public buildings superb: they consist of a number of monasteries, a foundling hospital, poor-house, and an asylum; numerous churches, and other places of public worship; a senate-house, which is a model of architecture; the cathedral, originally founded by Roger, earl of Normandy, in the year 1091, and rebuilt after the earthquake of 1693, very beautiful in the simplicity and grandeur of its design. There is a great square formed by the town-hall, cathedral, and university. The harbour of Catania is one of the largest in the island, and is inclosed by a natural mole of lava. Pop. 56,000. Lat. 37° 28′ 18″ N. Lon. 15° 5′ 12″ E.—The Gulf of Catania extends from La Trizza on the N. to Santa Croce on the S., a distance of 17 miles. It forms a dentation in the coast about 10 miles deep.

Catanzaro, ka'-tan-za'-ro, a town of Naples, the capital of Calabria Ultra, built on a mountain 5 miles from the Gulf of Squillace. It has a citadel, a cathedral, several convents, a royal academy of sciences, a lyceum, and some charitable institutions. Manf. Woollen and silk fabrics, and it has an active trade in agricultural produce. Pop. about 14,000. In 1783 this town suffered severely by an earthquake.

Catawba, kă-taw'-ba, a county in the centre of N. Carolina, U.S. Area, 250 square miles. Desc. Fertile in maize and wheat, besides having rich pastures. Minerals. Iron is the principal. Pop. 9,000, of whom a fourth are slaves.

Cateau Cambresis, ka'-to kam-bres'-e, a fortified town of France, in the department of the Nord, 14 miles from Cambrai. Manf. Merinoes, shawls, and calicoes. Pop. 8,500.—The treaty which bears the name of this place was here made in 1559, between Philip II. of Spain, and Henry II. of France. Marshal Mortier was born here, in 1768.

Caterina, Santa, ka'-tai-re'-na, a fortified town of Sicily, 8 miles from Caltanisetta, near the bank of the Salso. Pop. 6,000. In the neighbourhood fine jaspers and agates are found.

Catesby, Mark, F.R.S., an English naturalist, who from 1712 to 1726 occupied himself in collecting specimens of natural history in Virginia, Carolina, Florida, and the Bahama isles. Returning to England, he published, in 2 vols. folio, with beautiful coloured plates, the Natural History of those countries. He is also the author of other works. B. 1680; D. 1749. Gronovius designated a genus of plants Catesbia after him.

Catesby, Robert, instigator of the Gunpowder Plot. (See James I.)

Catharina Santa, ka-ta-re'-na san'-ta, a maritime province of S. Brazil, bounded on the E. by the Atlantic, and on the other sides by the provinces of San Paulo and Rio Grande do Sul. Area, 31,746 square miles. Desc. Low along the coast, but otherwise consisting of long valleys, sheltered by mountain-ranges, and traversed by numerous streams. The soil is remarkable for its fertility. Pro. Sugar, rice, man-dioc, millet, beans, and onions of an immense size. Pop. 90,000. Lat. between 26° and 30° S. Lon. between 49° and 51° W.—There is a fortified island of the same name from 3 to 7 miles from the coast. Ext. 37 miles long, by 10 broad. Desc. Fertile, yielding rice, coffee, wheat, millet, and fruit. Its garden fruits are esteemed the best in Brazil. Pop. 12,000.

CATHARINE, the daughter of Charles VI. of France, and wife of Henry V., king of England. After the death of that prince, she married Owen Tudor, by whom she had a son called Edmund, who became the father of Henry VII. D. 1431.—For the manner in which this lady, according to Shakspeare, was wooed and won by "Harry of England," the reader is referred to the fifth act of "Henry V."

CATHARINE I., empress of Russia, from being born of poor Livonian parents, became the wife of a Swedish dragoon, who was killed at the taking of Marienburg by the Russians. She then became the mistress of General Bauer, and subsequently obtained a situation in the family of Prince Menzikoff, who was fascinated by her beauty. She now attracted the notice of the Czar, Peter the Great, who made her his mistress, and, in 1711, his wife. At his death he left her the throne. In 1725 she was proclaimed empress, and continued to execute the great designs which had been left unfinished by her husband, B. in Livonia, 1683; D. 1727. (See PETER THE GREAT.)

CATHARINE II., empress of Russia, was the daughter of the prince of Anhalt Zerbst. Her original name was Sophia Augusta, but on her marriage, in 1745, with the grand-duke of Russia, afterwards Peter III., she was baptized according to the formulary of the Greek church, and named Catharine Alexiewna. She brought her husband two children: Paul, who succeeded her, and Anne, who died an infant. On the death of the empress Elizabeth, in 1761, Peter came to the throne, and soon discovered his intention of disinheriting his son and divorcing Catharine. She, however, anticipated his designs, and formed a conspiracy against him. Accordingly, she gained over the nobility and the army, and on June 27, 1762, Peter, after signing a renunciation of his crown, was sent prisoner to the palace of Robscha. Between the prisons and the graves of princes the distance is short. On the 17th of July, Alexius Orloff, the empress's favourite, with some other conspirators, strangled Peter, who, the empress gave out, had died of colic. She did not take any measures against the assassins, and in the following September was crowned at Moscow. The regulations adopted at the beginning of her reign were in the manner and spirit of Peter the Great. She affected to rule by clemency, and laboured to win the hearts of her subjects by acts of liberality. She also avoided foreign war till she had settled the tranquillity of the empire. Fond of literature and the arts, she gave unbounded encouragement to their introduction to her dominions, and held a correspondence with the most eminent literary characters in Europe. In 1764 she caused her favourite, Poniatowski, to be crowned king of Poland, under the name of Stanislaus Augustus. She also caused a liberal code of laws to be enacted, in which the practice of torture was abolished; attended to the subject of education, and took means to diffuse knowledge among all classes of her subjects. She encouraged medical discovery by submitting, herself, to inoculation, and in every way laboured for the enlightenment of her people. In 1769 Turkey declared war against Russia; the result of which was the first partition of Poland, between Catharine, Joseph II. of Austria, and Frederick of Prussia, in 1772. More than one-third of the kingdom fell to the share of Russia, and which included the larger portion of Livonia and Lithuania. In 1774 the peace of Kainarji was concluded, and Azof and Taganrog were annexed to Russia, and the Crimea made independent of Turkey. Peace being restored, the empress devoted her attention to public improvements and to political engagements. In 1780 she formed, with the other northern states, the famed armed neutrality, the object of which was to protect the Baltic trade from the belligerent powers. In 1782 she founded a Roman Catholic archbishopric in her dominions, for her subjects of that persuasion. About the same time she created a new military order by the title of St. Wolodimir. In 1785 she seized on the Crimea and Cuban, which so alarmed the Porte, that war became almost inevitable; but the accession of Germany as an ally to Russia stopped the preparations, and the Turks yielded to the aggression. In 1787 Catharine travelled through her new territory with a magnificent retinue, and at Cherson had an interview with the emperor Joseph II. Immediately after this, war again broke out between

CATHARINE II. OF RUSSIA.

Russia and the Porte, in which the former was assisted by Germany and the latter by Sweden. Hostilities were carried on with great fury. Oczakoff was stormed by the Russians, and a prodigious carnage ensued; Ismail was also taken by Suwarrow in the same manner, and the Turks were, in general, everywhere unsuccessful. In 1792 peace was concluded, when, by the treaty of Yassi, the Porte ceded to Catharine the important fortress of Oczakoff, and the frontiers of Russia were extended to the Dniester. Shortly after, the attention of Catharine was drawn to the state of Poland, where a spirit of revolt had broken out, and the people seemed determined to shake off a foreign yoke. A Russian army was immediately dispatched to that province, and decided the fate of Poland, by the massacre of the inhabitants of Warsaw. That kingdom was again partitioned between Russia, Germany, and Prussia, when the whole of Lithuania, Volhynia, and Podolia were given to Russia. This is historically called the second partition of Poland, and took place in 1793. In 1795 the third and last partition of Poland was effected, when Russia had all that remained of that kingdom, with the exception of Warsaw, which was assigned to Prussia, and Galicia, which was handed over to Austria. Courland was next annexed by Catharine to her empire, after which her life was suddenly terminated by a fit of apoplexy. B. 1729; D. 1796.—The passions of this woman were as gross as her mental powers were great to govern her empire.

CATHARINE OF ARAGON. (See HENRY VIII.)

CATHARINE DE MEDICIS, queen of France, was the daughter of Lorenzo de Medici, duke of Urbino. In 1533 she married the second son Francis I., afterwards Henry II. After the death of her husband and that of her eldest son, Francis II., she possessed herself of the regency of the kingdom during the minority of her second son, Charles IX. Chicane and dissimulation distinguished her government. Exciting the civil war between the Catholics and Huguenots, she resolved on the destruction of the latter, after having feigned to favour them for a time, and will be ever infamous as the principal instigator of the horrible massacre of St. Bartholomew, in 1572. Subsequently, she quarrelled with her son, Charles IX., and lost her power at court, in the reign of Henry III. of France. B. at Florence, 1519; D. at Blois, 1589.—Notwithstanding her evil propensities, Catharine possessed the love of literature and the arts, which distinguished the Medici family. By her orders the palace of the Tuileries, the Château of Monceaux, &c., were built. She was, it is said, a strong believer in astrology.

CATHARINE PARR. (See HENRY VIII.)

CATHARINE OF SIENNA, a saint in the Romish calendar, was a dyer's daughter, and entered, at the age of 20, into the institution of the Dominican sisters. There, it is asserted, revelations were made to her, which soon rendered her famous. She played an important part in the schism in the Church which broke out in 1378, between Popes Urban VI. and Clement VII., Catharine declaring for the former. She wrote some treatises on devotion, letters, and poetical pieces, which have been described as remarkable for the elegance and purity of their style. This, however, is somewhat doubtful. B. at Siena, 1347; D. emaciated by her austere penances, 1380.—Mr. Trollope, in his "Decade of Italian Women," published in 1859, presents an interesting account of Catharine of Sienna.—There were, at Bologna and Genoa, two other saints of this name, celebrated for their piety and mystical writings. The former lived in the 15th, the latter in the 16th century.

CATHCART, kath'-kart, a parish of Scotland, 2 miles from Glasgow. Area, 3,000 acres. Pop. 3,000.—Here, in 1568, the battle of Langside, which ended in the defeat of Queen Mary, was fought. When she beheld her adherents defeated, she fled to the abbey of Dundrennan, in Galloway, and thence to England, whence she never returned.

CATHCART, the Honourable Sir George, K.C.B., entered the army in 1810, and served with distinction throughout the campaigns of Germany, in 1813, and of France, in 1814. At Quatre-Bras and Waterloo he acted in the capacity of aide-de-camp to the duke of Wellington, and continued on his staff to the end of the service of the army of occupation. In 1818 he accompanied his grace to the congress of Aix-la-Chapelle, to Verona in 1822, and to Prussia in 1826. He subsequently served with success in Canada; and, in 1852, was appointed governor of the Cape of Good Hope, where he brought the Caffir war to a successful termination. In 1853 he was appointed adjutant-general, and, the following year, received the command of the fourth division of the army destined to operate in the Crimea. At the battle of the Alma, his division, with the cavalry, was held in reserve; but at Inkermann he bore a distinguished part, and fell, mortally wounded, in the thickest of the fight. B. at Walton, Essex, 1783; killed at Inkermann, November 5, 1854.

CATHERINE'S, ST., an island lying off the coast of Georgia, in the United States, 12 miles from Riceborough. Ext. 10 miles long, by 5 broad.

CATILINA, L. Sergius, kăt-ă-lī'-na (CATILINE), born of a noble Roman family, squandered his fortune in debaucheries and extravagance. Being refused the consulship, he conspired, with many of the most illustrious of the Romans, to extirpate the senate and set Rome on fire. This conspiracy was timely discovered by the consul Cicero, who, in the full senate, crushed Catiline with his eloquence, and forced him to unmask himself. Catiline then retired to Gaul, where his partisans were assembling an army. Petreius, the lieutenant of Antonius, Cicero's colleague, attacked his ill-disciplined troops, and routed them, Catiline himself falling, 63 B.C.—Sallust has written an excellent account of this conspiracy.

CATINAT, Nicholas, ka'-te-na, an illustrious French marshal, who, in 1690, defeated the duke of Savoy at the battle of Staffarde, in Piedmont, and again, in 1693, at Marseilles. Subsequently he was appointed commander of the army in Italy against Prince Eugène; but the want of funds and provisions paralyzed his efforts; and, meeting with several disasters, he was forced to retreat. These checks brought him into disgrace, to which he submitted with great philosophy, living contentedly in retirement. B. at Paris, 1637; D. on his estate of St. Gratian, 1712.

CATO, Marcus Portius, kaī'-to, an illustrious Roman, surnamed the Elder, or the Censor, who served in the army at the age of 17, and distinguished himself alike by his valour and his temperance, never drinking anything but water, and always contenting himself with the plainest food. By the interest of his friend Valerius Flaccus, he was appointed military tribune in Sicily, and afterwards became quæstor in Africa under Scipio, where he displayed strict economy in the expenditure of the public money. After passing through other employments, he was chosen consul, 195 B.C., in which station he had Valerius Flaccus for his colleague. He conducted the war in Further Spain with great success, and, on his arrival at Rome, was honoured with a triumph. Eight years afterwards, he was elected censor, and exercised the functions of that office with a stringency which passed into a proverb; and a statue was erected to him with a laudatory inscription. In his latter years, fearing the rivalry of Carthage, he always concluded his speeches in the senate with the expression, "Delenda est Carthago,"—Carthage must be destroyed. B. at Tusculum, 235 B.C.; D. 150 B.C.—He wrote a history of Roman affairs, of which only a few fragments remain; but a treatise of his on husbandry is extant in the "Scriptores de Re Rustică."

CATO, Marcus Portius, surnamed of Utica, was the great-grandson of the preceding, and at an early age manifested that inflexibility of disposition which marked the whole of his public conduct in after-life. His habits of austerity and frugality led him to embrace the doctrines of the Stoics. He served in the army with his brother Cæpio against Spartacus, and displayed so much valour and prudence as to obtain the commission of tribune in the army sent to Macedonia. In his civil character he served first the office of quæstor, and by his uprightness in administering justice gained great popularity, and rendered his name proverbial for integrity. He gave his support to Cicero, when that great man was consul, and publicly honoured him with the title of "father of his country." Penetrating the ambitious designs then contemplated by Cæsar, he opposed him to the utmost of his power, and was afterwards sent into Asia to announce to Ptolemy, king of Cyprus, the decree which deprived that sovereign of his dominions. This resulted in Ptolemy's poisoning himself and Cato seizing the royal treasure for the republic. He supported Pompey against Cæsar, whose designs he considered as dangerous to Roman liberty; but the civil war which ensued, filled him with grief. After the battle of Pharsalia, he retired to Africa, where he had thought Pompey had fled, and endured, with his troops, great hardships in marching across the desert to join Scipio at Utica, with whom he had some contest about the mode of carrying on the war. Cato also gave offence to that general by sparing those inhabitants of Utica who were attached to Cæsar. When that conqueror came before the place, Cato retired to his chamber and after reading Plato's "Phædo," or Dialogue on the Immortality of the Soul, fell upon his sword, 45 B.C. B. about 93 B.C. When Cæsar arrived, he said, "Cato, I envy thee thy death, since thou didst envy me the glory of saving thy life."—The principal events in the life of this great Roman furnished Addison with a theme for his celebrated tragedy of "Cato." There are others of the name of Cato in Roman history.

CATORCHE, ka-tor'-chai, the richest silver-mine of Mexico, in the state of San Luis de Potosi, from the town of which name it is distant 120 miles. This mine produces annually nearly £1,000,000 sterling.

CATS, Jacob, kats, an eminent Dutch poet, who rose to represent his country twice at two very dissimilar courts in England—Charles the First's and Oliver Cromwell's. He was knighted by Charles in 1627, but was unsuccessful in his mission with the Protector. After he returned to his country, he retired from public life, and in a rural retreat, near the Hague, betook himself to the cultivation of the muses. Here he composed his "Court Life," a poem full of practical precepts of wisdom and virtue, but having little pretensions to any very lofty flights of the imagination. He was long a favourite with his countrymen, who still affectionately style him "Vader Cats,"—Father Cats. B. in Zealand, 1577; D. near the Hague, 1660.

CATSKILL, kăts'-kil, the capital of Greene county, New York, U.S., on the Hudson, 33 miles from Albany. Pop. 5,500. The MOUNTAINS of the same name are in the neighbourhood; their highest peak is called Round Top, and rises to 3,804 feet.

CATTARAUGUS, kat'-tă-raw'-gus, a county of the state of New York, U.S., with a fertile soil and excellent pasture. Pop. 40,000. This county is intersected by the New York and Erie Railway and the Genessee Valley Canal.

CATTARO, kat-ta'-ro, a fortified town of Dalmatia, Austria, at the bottom of the Gulf of Cattaro, on the east side of the Adriatic, 33 miles from Ragusa. It is surrounded by mountains, the heights of which are covered with fortifications. It has a cathedral, several other churches, and an excellent harbour. Pop. 4,000. —This place was captured by the British in 1813, and till 1814 belonged successively to Austria and France. The Gulf of Cattaro is about 30 miles long, sheltered on all sides by mountains in such a manner as to make it one of the safest harbours in the Adriatic. Its depth varies from 15 to 20 fathoms.

CATTEGAT, or KATTEGAT, kăt'-te-gät, a large inlet of the German Ocean, between the E. coast of Jutland, the islands of Funen and Zealand, the W. coast of Sweden, and the Scaget-rock. Ext. 120 miles long, and between 60 and 70 broad. (See BALTIC.)

CATTERMOLE, George, kăt'-ter-mole, one of the most original and expressive of the English school of water-colour painters. Though dealing mostly with imaginative or demi-historical subjects, his genius found ample scope in the manner in which he treated them, whilst his style is entirely his own. Scenes from Shakspeare's plays and the novels of Sir Walter Scott he conceived and executed with an originality which few have equalled. He is, therefore, quite free from the charge of being an imitator, and merited the high position which his poetic feeling and artistic execution enabled him to attain. Subsequently he painted chiefly in oil. B. at Dukleburgh, Norfolk, 1800.

CATULLUS, Valerius, kă-tul'-lus, a Latin poet, whose compositions, though elegant, are the offspring of a too luxuriant imagination. He had the boldness to satirize Cæsar, but the emperor soon gained the poet's heart by his liberality. Catullus was the first Roman who imitated with success the Greek writers, and introduced their numbers among the Latins. B. at Verona, 86 B.C.; D. 16 B.C.—The effusions of this poet are said to have been lost till the beginning of the 15th century, when, in 1425, a copy was accidentally found in a granary, and transmitted to his native city.

CATULUS, Q. Luctatius, kăt'-u-lus, a Roman consul, who commanded the fleet during the first Punic war against the Carthaginians, and destroyed their navy under Hamilcar, near the Ægates, sinking 50 and taking 66 of their ships. This decisive victory put an end to the war.

CAUB, koub, a town of N. Germany, 20 miles from Wiesbaden, where, in the January of 1814, Blucher crossed the Rhine with his army.

CAUCA, kow'-ka, a large river of S. America, rising in the province of Popayan, between the great western and middle ridges of the Andes, and, after a course of about 500 miles, falling into the Magdalena, in lat. 4° 30′ S. It gives its name to a department of New Grenada, having 68,300 square miles, with a population of 200,000.

CAUCASUS, kaw'-kă-sus, a vast chain of mountains in Asia, commencing to the S. of the fortress of Kopil, at the mouth of the river Kuban, and, after taking a southerly direction, traversing Mingrelia to the source of the river Kuma. Thence it takes a S. course, and enters Georgia near the source of the Kur, and afterwards turning E., runs along the W. shores of the Caspian Sea, and terminates in the peninsula of Apsheron. Ext. 750 miles long, and from 65 to 150 broad. The culminating point of the chain is Mount Elburz, which attains a height of 18,493 feet; the next point is Mount Kazbek, which rises to 16,523 feet. The height of the other peaks is much less. Passes. The only practicable pass for carriages is from Mogdok to Tiflis, by the valley of the Terek: on the E. the chief is that of Derbend. Desc. The slopes of the Caucasus are covered with wood, and the valleys which intersect them are fertile in the highest degree. Pro. The usual cereals, some kinds of which are cultivated at a height of 8,000 feet. In the lower valleys, cotton and rice, tobacco, lint, indigo, and the grape are raised. Minerals. Iron, coal, sulphur, lead, and copper. Although some of the tribes of this country are nominally subject to Russia, they struggle against her authority, and endeavour to preserve an independent existence, in spite of the lines of forts which successive czars have placed on the summits of their mountains.—From the regions of Caucasus it is supposed that the white race of mankind, which now covers the whole of Europe and a great part of Asia, issued, and is thus called the "Caucasian race."

CAUCASUS, GOVERNMENT OF, a province of Russia, embracing a large portion of the chain of the Caucasus. It is bounded on the N. by the governments of Astrakan and the Don Cossacks; E. by the Caspian Sea; S. by the Persian and Turkish dominions, and the territories of independent tribes; and W. by the Sea of Azof and province of Taurida. Desc. An extensive flat, covered with marshes, the steppes affording excellent pasturage, and the banks of the rivers teeming with fertility. Pro. Corn, silk, cotton, wine, cattle, and horses. Pop. estimated at 600,000.

CAUCHY, Augustin Louis, F.R.S., ko'-she, a modern French mathematician, who, after passing through the Polytechnic School and attracting considerable notice by his talents, was appointed engineer for the port of Cherbourg. He was a large contributor to mathematical science. His loyalty to the Bourbon dynasty he suffered greatly to stand in the way of his pecuniary interests, and rather than take the oath of allegiance to Louis Philippe, he resigned his public employments. The republican government of 1848 absolved him from taking any oath, and he took the chair of the Sorbonne. Louis Napoleon also pursued the same course, demanding no oath either from him or the astronomer Arago. Independently of his scientific pursuits, he applied himself to the cultivation of the muses, and produced several poems of considerable merit. B. at Paris, 1789; D. 1857.

CAUDEBEC, kō'-de-bek, a town of France, on the Seine, 26 miles from Havre. Manf. Cotton goods. Pop. 3,000. Formerly the fortified capital of the Pays de Caux, and in 1419 taken by the English. The Pays de Caux is now comprised in the department of the Seine Inférieure.

CAUDIUM, kaw'-di-um, a city of Samnium, on the frontiers of Campania, between Beneventum and Capua. In its neighbourhood is the defile known as the "Caudine Forks," celebrated for the check which the Romans here received at the hands of the Samnites, 321 B.C. Closed up in the defile by a stratagem of the Samnite general, the whole Roman army, with the consuls Calvinus and Albinus, was obliged to surrender, and pass under the yoke.

CAULAINCOURT, Armand Augustin Lewis, kō'-lăn-koor, duke of Vicenza, a French military officer and diplomatist, who took part in most of the wars of the French revolution, and attracted the attention of Napoleon I., who successively made him grand equerry, general of division, and duke of Vicenza. In 1807 he was sent as ambassador to Russia, and succeeded in gaining the friendship and esteem of the emperor Alexander. Returning to France in 1811, he accompanied the expedition to Moscow, and, subsequently, was Napoleon's companion when he left the army for Paris. After the reverses of this Russian campaign, he was sent on various missions to the courts of Napoleon's allies, and ever showed himself devoted to the interests of the emperor and his dynasty. From 1837 to 1840 he published, under the title of "Souvenirs of the Duke of Vicenza," interesting memorials of the empire. B. at Caulaincourt, Somme, 1772; D. 1827.—His brother, Auguste Jean Gabriel, was a general in the French army, serving on the Rhine, at Marengo, in Spain, and Portugal. He was finally killed at the battle of the Moskwa, 1812. B. 1777.

CAUSSIDIÈRE, Mark, ko-sid'-e-air, a French politician, born of a family of humble artisans, took an active part with the revolutionists of 1834, in Lyons and St. Etienne. He was taken prisoner and sent to Mount St. Michel, where he was confined till 1837, when he was released by the amnesty granted by the minister Molé. In 1848, when his party triumphed, he was appointed prefect of police, in which capacity he acted with great firmness, and had the glory of extracting order from disorder. He was one of the firmest defenders of the rights of property throughout the insurrectionary movements of the time. For the inactivity which he showed on the 15th of May, he was accused before the National Assembly; but he not only defended himself, but justified his conduct. After the days of June, he was again accused, and by a vote of the Assembly, condemned on the night of the 25-26th of August. He immediately took refuge in London, where he published his memoirs, in which a full explanation of his conduct will be found. After this he relinquished politics and entered on a mercantile life. B. at Lyons, 1809.

CAVADONGA. (See COVADUNGA.)

CAVAIGNAC, Louis Eugène, kaV-vän-yak, a French general and statesman, entered his country's army, and, as a captain of engineers, served in the Morea, when the revolution of 1830 found him one of its firmest adherents. A warm republican and fearless in the expression of his opinions, it was found necessary to give him employment abroad. Accordingly, in 1832, he was sent to join the army of Africa. Here he distinguished himself in various skirmishes and battles, when, in 1836, he was appointed to the command of the garrison in the citadel of Tlemsen. In this post he continued to extend his fame for determination and valour. Soon afterwards, he had the command of a battalion in the infantry of the line. In 1840 we find him holding a lieutenant-colonelcy in the Zouaves, with whom he had served before; and in the following year he was made a colonel; but, subsequently, he again entered the line, and greatly distinguished himself at the battle of Isly. In this conflict he commanded the vanguard under General Bugeaud, and, for his conduct, was, in 1844, created a maréchal-de-camp. In 1846, at the head of 6,000 men, he drove Abd-el-Kader before him; and, in the following year, succeeded Lamoricière in the government of Oran. In 1848 he was appointed governor-general of Algeria, and, two months afterwards, was invited by Lamartine to Paris, where he promptly suppressed the insurrection of June, and established his character for great decision and military ability. On this occasion he became dictator, and defeated the anarchists after a general slaughter of 8,000 individuals. On the achievement of this feat, he resigned the dictatorship, and was appointed president of the council by the National Assembly. He next came forward as a candidate for the office of president of the republic, and was supported by nearly 1,450,000 votes. On December 2, 1851, he was arrested; but, shortly afterwards, was set at large, and permitted to live undisturbed in France, although he abstained from giving his support to the government of Napoleon III. In 1857 he was elected, with M. Carnot, a member of the Legislative Assembly, by the 4th arrondissement of Paris; but both refused to take the oath to the emperor. Cavaignac died suddenly, a few weeks after. B. at Paris, 1802; D. 1857.—He was buried at Paris, and all agreed in regretting, in the death of the ex-dictator, an honest, worthy citizen.

CAVALIER, Jean, ka-val'-e-ai, one of the principal leaders of the Camisards, or Protestants of Cevennes, when forced into rebellion against Louis XIV., by the persecutions of the Catholics. He defeated the best generals that came against him, and compelled Marshal de Villars to make a treaty with him. He was then taken into the king's service as colonel of a regiment; but being apprehensive that some design was formed against him, he entered into the service of England, and commanded, with his usual skill, a regiment of French refugees at the battle of Almanza, in Spain. He was afterwards appointed governor of Guernsey and Jersey, where he spent the remainder of his days. B. in the Cevennes, 1679; D. 1740.—The marvellous defence of the Cevennes against the best regular troops of France has been often used as a proof of the great deeds which may be done by bodies of riflemen, voluntarily enrolled and acting on their own soil.

CAVALIERI, Buonaventura, ka-val'-e-air-e, an Italian friar, who, from being a disciple of Galileo, became a mathematical professor at Bologna. He wrote several treatises upon his favourite science, of which he was the first to attempt the generalization. B. at Milan, 1598; D. 1647.

CAVALIERS, käv'-ä-leers, a familiar name given to the royalist party in the civil war between Charles I. and his parliament.

CAVALLINI, Pietro, ka-val-le'-ne, a distinguished artist, who assisted his master, Giotto, in the famous mosaic in the porch of St. Peter's at Rome. Some of his own mosaics are to be seen in the basilica of San Paolo; but we know of no remains of his paintings. The last of these were consumed in the fire of 1824, when the old basilica of San Paolo was nearly entirely destroyed. Some of his frescoes still exist at Orvieto, Florence, and Assisi. It is conjectured that he was the architect of the shrine of Edward the Confessor in Westminster Abbey. B. 1259; D. 1344.

CAVALLO, Tiberius, ka-val'-lo, an eminent electrician, who began his manhood as a merchant, and ended it as a natural philosopher. His performances were not characterized by originality, so much as by the industry they displayed, and the untiring energy with which he laboured to illustrate electricity and magnetism. B. at Naples, 1749; D. in London, 1809.

CAVAN, käv'-an, an inland county of Ireland, in the province of Ulster, bounded N. by Fermanagh, E. by Monaghan, S. by the counties of Longford, Meath, and Westmeath, and W. by Leitrim. Area, 470 square miles. Desc. It consists entirely of hill and dale, and is mountainous towards the S.W. In general the soil is light and poor, except along the courses of the streams. Rivers. The Erne, Croghan, Annalee, and other streams. Lakes. Lough Erne, Lough Oughter, Lough Ramor, and Sheelan. Pro. Oats, potatoes, turnips, and, in some districts, flax. Agriculture, however, is in general in a backward state. Minerals. Silver, lead, and iron. Manganese is obtained; also pure sulphur, coal, and very small quantities of limestone. Manf. The principal are yarn and linen. Pop. 176,071.

CAVAN, the principal town of the above county, 57 miles from Dublin, situate on a small river of the same name. It has a court-house, a gaol, a county infirmary, and barracks for the military. Its trade is inconsiderable. Pop. nearly 4,000.

CAVE, William, kaiv, a distinguished English divine, who wrote a great number of works of a religious tendency, and others with a view to illustrate ecclesiastical history. He is remembered chiefly by his "Primitive Christianity," "Lives of the Apostles and Martyrs," and his "Historia Literaria." B. at Pickwell, Leicestershire, 1637; D. at Windsor, 1713.

CAVE, Edward, a London bookseller, who was originally a clerk in the excise, but afterwards went to London, where he apprenticed himself to a printer. On the expiration of his time he obtained a place in the Post-office, but still continued at intervals to follow his business. He corrected the "Gradus ad Parnassum," and wrote for the newspapers. On being dismissed from his place for resisting abuses in the privilege of franking, he started the "Gentleman's Magazine," which had great success, and to which Dr. Johnson, the future lexicographer, was a contributor. Indeed, Cave is to be remembered chiefly on account of his being the early patron and friend of the immortal doctor, who wrote his biography. B. at Newton, in Warwickshire, 1691; D. in London, 1754.

CAVE, two parishes of Yorkshire, with small populations.

CAVENDISH, Henry, käv'-en-dish, was the younger son of Lord Charles Cavendish, and the first to lay the foundation of the modern form which the science of chemistry has taken. His philosophical researches have been followed by the most important results; and it is said that he supplied Lavoisier with the materials for his system. Sir Humphry Davy observed, shortly after his death, that "his processes were all of a finished nature, perfected by the hand of a master; they required no correction; and though many of them were performed in the very infancy of chemical science, yet their accuracy and their beauty have remained unimpaired amidst the progress of discovery." B. at Nice, 1731; D. 1810.—This philosopher was of so singular and retired a disposition, that he could hardly bear the presence of strangers. He was never married; indeed, it is doubtful whether he ever spoke to a woman. At all events, Lord Brougham says of him, that "he used to order his dinner daily by a note, which he left at a certain hour on the hall table, whence the housekeeper was to take it." It is also said, that if a female servant showed herself to him, she was immediately dismissed. He died worth upwards of £1,000,000 sterling.

CAVENDISH, Margaret, Duchess of, the eccentric wife, first of Sir Charles Lucas, and then of William Cavendish, duke of Newcastle. After the Restoration, she passed the greater part of her time in literary composition, holding the belief that she was one of the greatest geniuses that ever held a pen. She also believed the same of her husband, who, very singularly, entertained a similar opinion of her. The best-known works of the duchess are some plays, which will hardly carry her name down to a very distant posterity. B. in Essex; D. 1673.

CAVENDISH, or CANDISH, Thomas, an enterprising English navigator, who, about 1585, fitted out "a stout bark" of 120 tons, and proceeded to Virginia and the West Indies. By this expedition his fortune was not increased; but on his return he assumed the manners of a courtier, and became one of the gallants of the court of Queen Elizabeth. The mode of life which he then led still further impaired his fortune, when he undertook another voyage to endeavour to repair the evil which extravagance and dissipation had wrought upon his funds. For this expedition he fitted out three small vessels of 40, 60, and 120 tons; and, with a total crew of about 125 men, set sail from Plymouth, on July 21, 1586. He crossed the Atlantic, passed through the Straits of Magellan, and, entering the Pacific, reached the scene where he had intended to recruit his finances. His object was to plunder the Spaniards, with whom England was then at war, and who were, according to the manners of the times, considered fair game to occupy the buccaneering pastime of any English gentleman who had the courage to attack them. Accordingly, he commenced his career of fortune; fought, captured, burned, and sunk wherever he could; and, after great success, circumnavigated the globe, and arrived at Plymouth in September, 1588. He was now rich enough to purchase an earldom, and was knighted by the queen. In three years, however, he was again reduced in circumstances, when he once more looked to the New World to replenish his coffers. Another expedition was fitted out, but in the manner of a joint-stock concern. It met with no success; and Cavendish, a disappointed and broken-hearted man, ended his days whilst on his passage back from this ill-starred enterprise. D. in Suffolk, 1564; D. at sea, 1593.

CAVENDISH, Lord Frederick, a field-marshal in the English service, entered early on a military life. In 1758 he was in the action of St. Cast, on the coast of France, and was taken prisoner. The duke d'Aiguillon, who commanded the French army, politely offered the British officers permission to return to England on their paroles. They all accepted this offer except Lord Frederick, who gave as his reason for not doing so, that he was a member of parliament. "And what has that to do with it?" inquired the duke. "Why, sir," replied Lord Frederick, "whilst I am attending to my parliamentary duties I should vote for the supplies for carrying on the war, which might be considered as a breach of my parole." "Poh, poh!" said the duke, "we should as soon think of restraining you from getting a child, lest, when it came to maturity, it should conquer France." B. 1729; D. at Twickenham, 1803.—This officer was one of the six who, at the beginning of the "Seven Years War," entered into an agreement with each other not to marry until peace was restored, so that no domestic relations might influence their conduct. Generals Wolfe, Monkton, and Keppel were among the number.

CAVENDISH. (See BENTINCK, Lord George.)

CAVERS, kai'-vers, a parish of Roxburghshire, Scotland. It is near Hawick, and comprises the Wisp mountain, which rises to 1,839 feet above the level of the sea. Pop. 1,500.

CAVERY, or CAUVERY, a celebrated river of India, which, after a winding course of nearly 470 miles through the Mysore and Carnatic, falls into the Bay of Bengal, through various mouths, in the district of Tanjore. This is the most useful river of India. It rises in lat. 12° 25′ N.; and lon. 75° 34′ E.

CAVIANA, ka'-ve-a'-na, an island of Brazil, in the northern mouth of the Amazon, on the equator. Ext. 35 miles long, and 20 broad. Desc. Fertile, and well stocked with cattle.

CAVITE, ka'-ve-tai, a fortified seaport-town of Luzon, one of the Philippines, 10 miles from Manilla. This is the capital of a province of the same name, and the head naval depôt of the Spanish possessions in the East. Pop. 5,200.—The province of CAVITE is flat, but productive in rice, indigo, sugar, and coffee. Its rivers are unimportant. Pop. 84,500.

CAVOUR, Camille, Count de, ka-voor', a modern Sardinian statesman, whose father amassed a considerable fortune by speculation, and was created a count by Charles-Albert. In 1847, when the principles of reform became prevalent in the states, Count Cavour took a leading part in examining the economical questions of the day; but, in the following year, did not play a very important part in the struggle between his country and Austria. After the disaster of Novara, he entered, in 1849, the Chamber of Deputies, succeeding Santa Rosa as minister of commerce and agriculture. In 1851 he became minister of finance, and, by his abilities, re-established the equilibrium which, by the wars of Charles-Albert, had been deranged. He now took the government of Great Britain for his model, and laboured to organize a similar free-trade system for his country, but met with many difficulties in the attempt. In 1852 he became president of the council, and was, for the succeeding seven years, the moving spirit of Sardinian affairs. The great question which occupied his attention after 1848, was the establishment of the union and independence of the Italian states; and, regardless of the threats of Austria, he pursued his object with unswerving constancy. Relying on the active assistance of the emperor of the French, the liberal sympathies of western Europe, and the national sentiment expressed by the elections of 1857, he persevered in his course, which may be considered to have tended greatly to precipitate the war with Austria in 1859. On the sudden termination of this war in July of the same year, the count retired from the high position which he had filled with so much energy. B. at Turin, 1809.

CAVOUR, or CIVOR, a town and parish of the Sardinian states, Piedmont, 7 miles from Pinerolo. Manf. Leather, linen, and silk twist. In its vicinity are marble and slate quarries. Pop. about 8,000.

CAVRIANA, kav-re-a'-na, a village of Lombardy, about 6 miles from Peschiera. The tower of Cavriana formed one of the principal positions of the centre of the Austrian army, from which it was driven by the Franco-Sardinian forces, under Napoleon III. and Victor Emmanuel, at the battle of Solferino, June 24, 1859.

CAWNPORE, kawn'-por, a district in the N.W. provinces of British India. It is separated from Oude by the Ganges, and from the British districts of Humeerpoor and Calpee by the Jumna. It lies within the limits of the Doab between the Ganges and the Jumna. Area, 2,337 square miles. Desc. A fertile alluvial plain, in a state of high cultivation. Rivers. The tributaries of the Ganges, Esun, and Jumna, all of which are navigable. Pro. Maize, pulse, wheat, barley, sugar, rice, potatoes, cotton, tobacco, poppy, oil-seeds, European vegetables and fruits. Wine is produced, and indigo grows wild. Pop. 1,000,000. Lat. between 25° 55′ and 27° N. Lon. between 79° 34′ and 81° 37′ E.—In this district the mutiny of 1857 was marked by the most atrocious cruelties perpetrated on the British by the leaders of the sepoys.

CAWNPORE (properly Kahnpur, 'chief's town'), the capital of the above, stands on the right bank of the Ganges, 124 miles from Allahabad, and 628 from Calcutta. It is a place of great extent, the cantonments, before the mutiny of 1857, extending six miles from one extremity to the other. It contains many handsome mosques, and the view of the town from the country approaches, gives quite the idea of a city. Most of the European houses are large and roomy, standing in extensive compounds, and built one story high, with sloping roofs, first thatched, and then covered with tiles,—a roof which is found better than any other to exclude the heat of the sun, and to possess a freedom from the many accidents to which a mere thatched roof is liable. The great inconveniences of the place are its glare and dust; defects, however, which are, in a considerable degree, removed by the multitude of trees planted in all directions. The shops in Cawnpore are large, and, though far from showy, contain many excellent articles, which are sold very little dearer than in Calcutta. The necessaries of life are barely half the price which they are there, and an excellent house may be rented for eighty or ninety rupees (£8) monthly. On the whole, it is, in many respects, one of the most considerable towns in northern India, although it has no fine ancient buildings. Pop. exclusively of the military, about 60,000.—Here, on June 15, 1857, "the bloodiest record in the book of time" took place. The Nana Sahib ordered 205 British women and children to be murdered in cold blood; and when the butchery was completed, he gave a nautch, or dancing-ball in an adjoining hotel to his friends. On the following day he ordered the bodies to be flung into a well in the compound; but, as this receptacle was too small to hold them all, he caused some to be thrown into the Ganges and other places.

CAWOOD, ka-wood, a town and parish of England, in the West Riding of Yorkshire, 18 miles from Leeds. Pop. 1,200. This place was long the principal residence of the archbishops of York, and here, after his fall, Cardinal Wolsey retired, and was arrested on a charge of high treason, by the earl of Northumberland.

CAXAMARCA, kax'-a-mar'-ka, the capital of a province of the same name, in Peru, 70 miles from Truxillo. The houses are built of clay, and its streets are wide and straight. The parish church, erected in 1682, is of finely-worked stone. Pop. 7,000. The PROVINCE is chiefly agricultural, although some mines are worked in it, and gold-washing to some extent carried on. It is well watered, and traversed by a chain of the W. Cordilleras. Area, 2,165 square miles. Pop. 85,000.

CAXAMARQUILLA, kax'-a-mar-keel'-la, called also PATAZ, or PATA, the capital of a province of the same name in Peru, 95 miles from Truxillo. Pop. 8,000.

CAXATAMBO, kax'-a-tam'-bo, the capital of a province of the same name in Peru, 140 miles from Lima. Pop. 6,000. The PROVINCE is the most barren in Peru, though yielding good pasturage on the slopes of the mountains, of which it is chiefly composed. Area, 1,494 square miles. Pop. 25,000.

CAXTON, William, kax'-ton, the first English printer, who, at the age of 15, was apprenticed to a mercer, and on the death of his master, went to the continent, as agent of the Mercers' Company. During his residence in Flanders, he acquired a knowledge of the new invention of printing, and the first book he put to press, was the "Recuel of the History of Troy," in the rigmal. This work, he himself afterwards translated by commandment of Margaret, duchess of Bourgoyne, &c.," and printed in 1471. In 1474 appeared "The Game and Playe of the Chess," which was succeeded by other works. He printed in the Almoury in Westminster; and whilst the literary pilgrim directs his footsteps to the Poets' Corner in Westminster Abbey, to recall the effusions which received expression from the immortal dust which is entombed in that sacred edifice, let him remember, that it is to the enterprising spirit of William Caxton that he is indebted for the introduction to this country of the sublime art, which gives him so much mental enjoyment. D. in Kent, 1410; D. 1491.

CAYENNE, kay'-en, an island of S. America, in French Guiana. Ext. 18 miles in length from N. to S., and 10 broad. Pro. Cotton, sugar, coffee, and rice. Pop. nearly 8,000, of whom by far the greater proportion are slaves. Lat. 5° 0′ N. Lon. 53° 15′ W.—It was taken by the British in 1809, but was restored to France at the peace of Paris, in 1814. The climate is described as unhealthy in the extreme; and hence, in the swamps, were deported, by the government of Louis Napoleon, political criminals.

CAYENNE, the capital of the above island, stands at the mouth of the river Cayenne, where it falls into the Atlantic. It has a large and convenient port, protected by batteries, and is the centre of all the trade of French Guiana. Pop. 5,300, of whom half are slaves.—The river CAYENNE, after a course of 300 miles, falls into the Atlantic, in lat. 4° 56′ 5″ N.; lon. 52° 20′ W.

CAYMANS, kai'-mans, three islands of the British West Indies, in the Caribbean Sea, 130 miles from Cuba. Pop. 200, chiefly occupied in catching turtle for the inhabitants of some of the other islands.

CAYSTER, kais'-ter, a river of Natolia, which, after a course of 75 miles, falls into the Gulf of Scala Nova, 35 miles from Smyrna. The ruins of Ephesus stand at its mouth.

CAYUGA, kai-yoo'-ga, a county of New York, U.S., E. of Cayuga lake. Area, 648 square miles. Desc. Fertile, and producing the usual cereals, and having gypsum and salt, with numerous sulphur-springs. Pop. 56,000.—CAYUGA CREEK, a small stream of Niagara county, U.S., the most northern ford of Buffalo Creek.—CAYUGA LAKE, between Cayuga and Seneca counties, U.S., 40 miles long, and from 1 to 4 broad. Its outlet is Seneca river, which falls into Lake Erie.

CAZALLA-DE-LA-SIERRA, ka-thal'-la, a town in the Sierra-Morena, Spain, 40 miles from Seville. Manf. Chiefly linens. Pop. about 8,000.

CAZEMBE, ka-zem'-be, a country in the interior of Africa, with a fortified capital town, said to be some miles in circumference. Pro. Maize, manioc, copper, iron, and ivory. Lat. of its capital, 11° 45′ S. Lon. 30° 30′ E.

CAZENOVIA, kais'-e-no'-ve-a, a post township of New York, U.S., 40 miles from Utica. It is a pleasant and flourishing place, and contains a court-house, gaol, church, and bank. Woollen and fulling mills are the principal sources of industry. Pop. 5,000.

CEARA, sai-ar'-a, a maritime province of Brazil, stretching along the N. coast, where it is bounded by the Atlantic. On the other sides it is inclosed by the Rio Grande-do-Norte, Pernambuco, and Piauhi. Area, 66,387 square miles. Desc. Rather flat than mountainous, rising from the Atlantic coast towards the centre, in the form of an amphitheatre. It is fertile and well watered, producing a great deal of timber, and abounds with minerals. Pop. 190,000. Lat. between 2° 40′ and 7° 25′ S. Lon. between 37° 40′ and 41° 30′ W.

CEBES, se'-bees, a Greek philosopher, a disciple of Socrates. The "Pinax," or Picture of Human Life, is generally attributed to him. It is usually printed with the "Enchiridion" of Epictetus. D. at Thebes, and lived in the 5th century B C.

CECIL, ses'-il, a county of Maryland, U.S, on the E. shore of the Chesapeake, inclosed by Penn-sylvania, Delaware, Kent county, and the Chesapeake. Pop. 20,000, including 2,000 slaves.

CECIL, Robert, earl of Salisbury. (See BURLEIGH.)

CECROPS, se'-krops, the founder of Athens, who led a colony to Attica about the 16th century B C., and divided the country into twelve communities, of which Athens afterwards became the capital. He established the tribunal of the Areopagus, extended the worship of Minerva and Jupiter, introduced agriculture, and the rites of marriage and burial. Athens was originally called Cecropia, in honour of Cecrops, and the word is often used for Attica, the Athenians being also called Cecropidæ. D. at Saïs, Egypt; lived in the 16th century B C.

CEDAR MOUNTAINS, se'-dar, a range in Cape Colony, South Africa. It runs between the Thorn and Elephant rivers, having a varying elevation of from 1,500 to 5,000 feet. The mountains take their name from the cedar-trees with which their sides are, in different places, clothed.

CEDAR LAKE, a lake of N. America, about 60 miles from Lake Winnipeg.—Cedar is the prefix to the name of several unimportant places in the United States.

CEDRON, se'-dron, 'black or sad,' a brook flowing at the foot of Mount Olivet into the Sea of Sodom, near Jerusalem.

CELAKOWSKY, Frantisek Ladislaw, sel'-a-kov'-ske, a modern Bohemian poet and philologist, who, besides some original effusions, produced a translation of Sir W. Scott's "Lady of the Lake," into a kind of Ossianic prose, which does not seem to have had the effect of inspiring his countrymen with a very exalted idea of the poetical qualities of the Scottish minstrel. He subsequently became the editor of the leading newspaper at Prague, and also professor of the Bohemian language at that university. These situations he afterwards lost on account of an article which he wrote against the severities exercised by the emperor Nicholas of Russia upon the insurgent Poles of 1831. In 1842 he obtained a professorship of Sclavonian literature in Breslau, where he remained for several years. In 1849 he returned to Prague, mentally shattered, through misfortunes and domestic calamities, which he did not long survive. B. at Strakonue, 60 miles from Prague, 1799; D. at Prague, 1852.—In 1832 Sir John Bowring dedicated to Celakowsky his volume of "Cheskian Anthology."

CELEBES, sel'-e-bees, a large island of a very irregular figure, comprised in the Asiatic archipelago. It consists of four peninsulas, between which immense bays are formed, affording secure harbours for shipping. Area, estimated at 73,000 square miles. Desc. Diversified with hill and dale, but mountainous in the centre, where Lampo Betang attains an elevation of 7,000 feet above the level of the sea. Volcanoes exist in the N. and S. peninsulas. This island, generally, is well watered, and its climate healthy. Pro. Maize, rice, cassava, tobacco, cotton, yams, sago, and sugar. Excellent breeds of cattle and horses are raised, vegetables are abundant, and poultry is plentiful. Minerals. Iron, salt, and gold. Manf. Cloths and variegated mats, but the native produce is collected and exchanged for muskets, gunpowder, calicoes, and other British and Indian manufactures. Turtles abound on the coasts, and the Badjus, or sea-gipsies, who live in their vessels, carry on an active trade with the Chinese in tortoise-shell, birds-nests, trepang, pearl, and sharks' fins. Pop. nearly 2,000,000. Lat. between 1° 50′ N. and 5° 30′ S. Lon. between 119° and 125° E.—The Portuguese established themselves in Celebes in 1512, and were expelled by the Dutch in 1667. The latter were dispossessed by the British in 1811; but by the treaty of Paris, in 1816, the Dutch settlements were again restored.

CELERES, sel'-e-rees, the body-guard of Romulus, composed of 300 of the most noble and accomplished Roman youths.

CELESTIAL MOUNTAINS. (See ASIA.)

CELESTINE I., sel'-es-teen, a pope and saint, succeeded Boniface I. in 422. He condemned the doctrine of Nestorius in a council held at Rome, in 430. D. 432.—CELESTINE II. was elected in 1143, on the death of Innocent II., and sat in the chair only five months.—CELESTINE III. succeeded Clement III. in 1191. He claimed the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, and gave the latter to Frederick, the son of the emperor Henry VI., on condition of his paying a tribute to the Holy See. D. 1198.—CELESTINE IV. D. 1241, eighteen days after his election.—CELESTINE V., a Benedictine monk, who founded a new order called the Celestines, suppressed in France in 1778. Confining himself to his cell, he spent a life of constant devotion, which led to his being elected pope, in 1294. Cardinal Cajetan prevailed upon him to resign the chair, and was afterwards elected in his stead, by the name of Boniface VIII. He then caused the credulous Celestine to be imprisoned in a castle, where he died, 1296. Clement V. canonized him in 1313.

CELLARIUS, Christopher, sel-lair'-e-us, a German professor of philosophy and Oriental languages at Jena, attracted the attention of Frederick I., elector of Brandenburg, and first king of Prussia, who gave him the professorship of history and rhetoric in the university of Halle, Saxony. In this tranquil capacity he passed the greater part of his life, and produced several works of great merit. Among these may be noticed his "Atlas Cælestis," and his "Notitia Orbis Antiquæ." B. at Smalkald, 1638; D. at Halle, 1707.

CELLE, or ZELL, tsell, a town of Hanover, on the Aller, 24 miles from Hanover. It is well built and paved, containing several churches, a library, gymnasium, lying-in hospital, royal palace, medical school, and penitentiary. In the old parish church is the burial-vault of the house of Brunswick-Luneberg. Manf. Linen fabrics, hosiery, soap, chicory, tobacco, wafers, and brandy. Pop. 12,000.—Matilda, queen of Denmark and sister of George III., died here, and the town contains a monument to her memory.—CELLE, or CELLES, is also the name of a number of parishes and villages in Belgium and France.

CELLINI, Benvenuto, chel-le'-ne, a famous Florentine artist, who served an apprenticeship to a jeweller and goldsmith, and, at the same time, applied himself to the study of drawing, engraving, and music. He was appointed by Clement VII. his goldsmith and musician. Being of a very turbulent disposition, he was frequently engaged in quarrels, in one of which he so severely wounded his antagonist that he was forced to make his escape from Florence to Rome, in the disguise of a friar. Here he distinguished himself by his courage in defending the citadel against the duke of Bourbon, whom he said he killed as he attempted to scale the city walls. He also defended the castle of St. Angelo, and the duke of Orange, he declares, was killed by the ball which was shot from a cannon he had directed. After this, he was employed to engrave stamps for the mint, and the coins and medals which he executed are very beautiful. On the death of Clement VII., in 1534, he returned to Florence, whence he went to France, where he was patronized by Francis I., but soon, quitting that country, revisited Rome, where he was confined a long time in the Castle of St. Angelo, on the charge of having robbed the fortress of a considerable treasure, when he had the care of it. He escaped, but was retaken, and suffered great hardships till released by the mediation of Cardinal Ferrara. He then revisited France, where he executed some fine works of sculpture, and cast large figures in metal, which gained him a high reputation. After staying there five years, he returned to his own country, and was employed by the grand duke Cosmo de Medici, who gave him a studio, where he commenced his great work, "Perseus," which was not finished for some time afterwards. The success of this performance was so great that, in gratitude, he went on a pilgrimage to Valambrosa and Camaldoli. He now contested the palm of glory with Bandinelli for a design of Neptune. Cellini's work being pronounced the best, caused the death of the rival sculptor, through grief. His fame was now firmly established, and he spent the remainder of his days in Florence. B. at Florence, 1500; D. 1570.—He worked equally well in marble and metal, and wrote a treatise on the goldsmith's art, and another on sculpture and the casting of metals. He also wrote his own life, which has been translated into English by W. Roscoe, and which presents us with a tolerably accurate picture of the manners of the 16th century.

CELSIUS, Olaus, sel'-se-oos, a Swedish botanist, theologian, and orientalist. He was the professor of theology and the eastern languages at Upsal, and, by command of Charles XI., visited the principal states of Europe, to compile an account of the plants mentioned in the Bible. He wrote a number of works, the principal of which are "Hierobotanicon," being dissertations on the plants of the Scriptures, and "De Linguâ Novi Testamenti Originali." B. 1670; D. 1756.—Celsius is regarded as the founder of natural history in Sweden. He was the first master and patron of Linnæus, the great botanist, who gave to a new genus of plants the name of Celsia.

CELSUS, Aurelius Cornelius, sel'-sus, a celebrated Roman physician, who lived in the reigns of Augustus and Tiberius. Nothing is known with certainty of his personal history, but he is supposed to have practised medicine at Rome. He appears to have understood the sciences of rhetoric, agriculture, and military tactics, as well as medicine, and compiled a kind of cyclopædia, treating on those various subjects, with great ability and success. Only one work of his has come down to the moderns, called "De Medicinâ," consisting of eight books, and it is considered the most precious work of its kind which the Romans have left us. Celsus was styled the Hippocrates of the Latins, and is universally admired for his extensive erudition and the purity of his language. Eighty editions of his "De Medicinâ" have been published, and a good English translation by Dr. Grieve appeared in 1756.

CELTÆ, sel'-te, the Celts, a great people of Gaul, a portion of the Indo-Germanic race, who, at a very early period, would seem to have spread from east to west across central Europe, and to have left in their route various tribes; amongst others, the Cimmerians, in the Crimea; the Cimbrians, in Jutland; and different races in ancient Illyria, before the great body of them settled in Gaul. According to some authorities, the name of Gaul or Gael (Gallus) is synonymous with the Celts dwelling in Gaul; but, according to others, it means the primitive indigenous population, with whom the Celts, who would then be no other than the Cimbri (or Kymri), divided the country. From Gaul the united Gauls and Celts swarmed into Germany, where they occupied Bohemia, and then Bavaria; thence into Italy, of which almost the whole northern portion took the name of Cisalpine Gaul; and here they left the Ligurians, the Isombrians, and the Ombrians. They afterwards overran Spain and Portugal, Britain, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland.

CENCI (THE), chen'-che, a Roman family, noted for their wealth, crimes, and misfortunes, of whom the most remarkable are the following:—

CENCI, Francesco, who plunged into the lowest depths of infamy, and was only saved from an ignominious end by his gold, with which he corrupted the judges. He had four sons and one daughter, the celebrated Beatrice Cenci, all of whom he treated with the most abominable cruelty. He is even accused of having assassinated his two elder sons. Revolting at the horrible scenes she had passed through, Beatrice, in concert with two of her brothers, and Lucretia, her mother, accomplished the death of the hated Francesco. Accused and found guilty of the murder, all four perished on the scaffold, that sentence having been passed on them by Clement VIII. This terrible event made a profound impression on the people of Rome, and for many ages the name of Beatrice Cenci was preserved in the popular airs. The death of the Cenci has been the subject for many paintings, of which the most celebrated is in the Colonna palace, Rome, and was for a long time attributed to Guido Reni. The life of Beatrice has also been dramatized.

CENIS, MOUNT, se-ne', a mountain of the Alps, in Savoy. (See ALPS.)

CENSORES, sen-sor'-es, CENSORS, the name of certain magistrates of great authority at Rome, whose functions at first consisted in making the census, or numbering the citizens and estimating their wealth. Afterwards, however, they acquired greater power, and were charged with the regulation of manners, and could inquire into the expenses of every citizen, and even degrade a senator from all his privileges and honours, if guilty of any extravagance. The first censors were created 442 B.C.; they were two in number, and were elected for five years. This term was afterwards diminished to one year and a half, lest they should abuse their authority. The office was at first reserved for the patricians, but was thrown open to plebeians 352 B.C. The censorship was abolished under Augustus, but the emperors, up to Vespasian, exercised its rights; after his death, all trace of the office disappears. The emperor Decius wished to re-establish it, but was unsuccessful in his attempts. (See CATO.)

CENTAURI, sen-taw'-ri, Centaurs, a people of Thessaly, half men and half horses. They are supposed by some to be the offspring of Centaurus, son of Apollo, by Stilbia, daughter of the Peneus, and by others, to be the progeny of Ixion. The battle of the Centaurs with the Lapithæ is famous in classic history, and the distinguished painters Phidias and Parrhasius represented it in the temple of Jupiter, at Olympia and at Athens. The origin of this battle was a quarrel at the marriage of Hippodamia with Pirithous, where the intoxicated Centaurs offered rude violence to the women that were present. This insult irritated Hercules, Theseus, and others of the Lapithæ, and they attacked and defeated the Centaurs, obliging them to leave the country and retire to Arcadia. They were afterwards extirpated by Hercules, few escaping his vengeance.

CENTLIVRE, Susannah, sent-le'-ver, an English actress and dramatic writer, whose performances are marked by considerable elegance and vivacity, though not altogether free from a charge of indelicacy. Among her best plays are "A Bold Stroke for a Wife," "The Busybody," and "The Wonder." B., it is presumed, in Ireland, 1680; D. in London, 1723.

CENTO, chen'-to, a town of the States of the Church, 13 miles from Bologna. It is encompassed by a wall and a fosse, and contains several churches, convents, and a cathedral. Pop. 4,500. It is the birthplace of Barbieri, generally called Guercino, who, in 1616, founded a school of art. (See BARBIERI.)

CENTRAL AMERICA. (See AMERICA, CENTRAL.)

CENTRE, sen'-ter, a county of Pennsylvania, U.S., inclosed by the counties of Lycoming, Northumberland, Mifflin, Huntingdon, and Clearfield. Area, 1,000 square miles. Desc. Diversified with barren mountains and fertile valleys, yielding a considerable quantity of timber, and the usual cerealia. It has also iron, coal, and limestone. Pop. 25,000.—The name also of three small towns in the United States.

CENTREVILLE, sen'-ter-veel, a town of the United States, 45 miles from Buffalo. Pop. 1,500.—A name common to many small towns in the United States.

CENTUMVIRI, sen-tum'-vi-ri, centumvirs, certain magistrates of Rome, who, at first, numbered 105, but were afterwards increased to 180. Causes of the highest importance were tried before them, and from their decision there was no appeal.

CENTURIA, sen-tu'-re-a, a division of the people among the Romans, consisting of a hundred. The word centuria is also applied to a subdivision of one of the Roman legions. It consisted of a hundred men, and was the sixth part of a cohort, and the sixtieth part of a legion. The commander of a centuria was called centurion, and he was distinguished from the rest by the branch of a vine which he carried in his hand.

CEOS. (See ZEA.)

CEPHALONIA, sef'-ă-lo'-ne-a, the largest of the Ionian islands, is situate in the Mediterranean, opposite the entrance of the Gulf of Lepanto, between Santa Maura, Zante, and the coasts of Morea and Livadia. Area, 348 square miles. Capes. The principal are Fiscardo in the north, and Capra in the south. Desc. Irregular in shape, and uneven in surface. Mount Nero, or Black Mountain, in the south, rises to a height of upwards of 5,300 feet above the level of the sea. Pro. Maize, wheat, corn, currants, flax, cotton, olive oil, wine, and salt. Of these, a considerable quantity is exported. Pop. 70,000. Lat. between 38° 3′ and 38° 30′ N. Lon. between 20° 21′ and 20° 49′ E.—This is the Tetrapolis of Thucydides. In 1809 it was taken by the British, under whose protection it still continues. (See IONIAN ISLES.)

CEPHALUS, sef'-ă-lus, son of Deioneus, king of Thessaly, and husband of Procris, an Athenian princess. Aurora became enamoured of him, but he remained faithful to his wife. Aurora, however, with a view of gaining his affections from Procris, wished him to prove his wife's fidelity. Disguised as a merchant, he entered his own house, and Procris's virtue was not proof against the riches he offered her. He then drove her from his door; but a reconciliation was soon effected between them. Finally, Cephalus, whilst hunting, accidentally pierced her with his spear; and, in despair at her death, killed himself with the same weapon.

CEPHISUS, or CEPHISSUS, se-fi'-sus, a celebrated river of Greece, rising at Lilæa, in Phocis, and, after passing to the N. of Delphi and Mount Parnassus, entered Bœotia, where it flowed into the lake Copais. The Graces loved this river, and were called the goddesses of the Cephisus.—There was another river of the same name in Attica, and also in Argolis.

CERAM, se'-ram, an island of the Asiatic archipelago, 20 miles from Amboyna. Area, estimated at 10,500 square miles. Desc. It is traversed by a chain of mountains, which attain an average elevation of 7,000 feet, and produce fine timber. The valleys teem with fertility, and the vegetation is both luxuriant and gigantic. Pop. Unascertained; estimated at 230,000. Lat. between 2° 47′ and 3° 50′ S. Lon. between 127° 51′ and 123° 56′ E.

CERAMICUS, se-ra-mi'-kus, a public walk of Athens, which was, at first, full of pottery or ceramic works. It was afterwards used as a burial-place for those who were killed in defence of their country; and many temples, porticos, and theatres rising here, it became one of the handsomest quarters of the city. Near it were the gardens of Academus.

CERBERUS, ser'-be-rus, a dog with three heads, who was stationed as a watch at the entrance of Hades, and guarded it night and day. Orpheus, when he descended into the infernal regions in search of Eurydice, lulled him to sleep with his lyre; and Hercules dragged him from the gate of Hades, when he went to redeem Alceste.

CERDIC, ser'-dik, a Saxon chief, who, in the first year of the 6th century, invaded England, and, after an obstinate resistance from the Britons, sustaining many defeats, yet winning more victories, established, about 516, the kingdom of Wessex. At his death, in 534, he possessed the Isle of Wight and the present counties of Hants, Dorset, Wilts, and Berks, and was succeeded by his son Cynric.

CERE, ST., scer, a town of France, in the department of the Lot, 35 miles from Cahors. Manf. Principally hats, and it has a linen trade. Pop. 4,500.

CERES, se'-rees, the goddess of corn and of harvests, was the daughter of Saturn and Vesta. She had a daughter by Jupiter, whom she called Pherephata, 'fruit-bearing,' and afterwards Proserpine. This daughter was carried away by Pluto, as she was gathering flowers in the plains near Enna. Ceres went in search of her daughter, and, during her absence, Attica had become the most desolate country in the world, when she instructed Triptolemus of Eleusis in everything which concerned agriculture. She taught him how to plough the ground, to sow and reap corn, to make bread, and to take particular care of fruit-trees. After these instructions she gave him her chariot, and commanded him to travel all over the world, and communicate his knowledge of agriculture to the rude inhabitants, who had hitherto lived upon acorns and the roots of the earth. Her benefits to mankind made Ceres respected, and Sicily was supposed to be the favourite retreat of the goddess. Attica, which had been so eminently distinguished by her, gratefully remembered her favours in the celebration of the Eleusinian mysteries. Ceres is the same as the Isis of the Egyptians; and her worship, it is said, was first brought into Greece by Erechtheus. She was represented with a garland of ears of corn on her head, holding in one hand a lighted torch, and in the other a poppy, which was sacred to her. The Romans paid her great adoration, and her festivals, called Cerealia, were yearly celebrated by their matrons in the month of April, during eight days. Ceres is metaphorically called bread and corn, as the word Bacchus is sometimes used to signify wine.

CERES, a parish in Scotland, 3 miles from Cupar-Fife, in Fifeshire. Pop. 3,000. Here Archbishop Sharpe was murdered in 1679.

CERESOLE, che'-re-so-lai, a village of Piedmont, 14 miles from Alba. Pop. 1,600.—In 1544 the Imperialists were defeated by the French in the neighbourhood of this town.

CERET, ser-ai', a town of France, in Roussillon, 15 miles from Perpignan. Manf. Copper wares and leather. Pop. 4,000.—Here, in 1660, the plenipotentiaries of Spain and France met to determine the limits of the two kingdoms.

CERIGNOLA, che-reen'-yo-la, a town of Naples, in the province of Capitanata, 28 miles from Manfredonia. Manf. Chiefly linen; and the district produces large quantities of cotton and almonds. Pop. 16,000.—Here, in 1503, the French were defeated by the Spaniards, and the duke of Nemours, who commanded the former, was slain.

CERIGO, or KERIGO, cher'-e-go, one of the Ionian islands, situate at the entrance of the Archipelago, to the S. of the Morea. Area, 116 square miles. Desc. Hilly, with fertile valleys, and a precipitous and rocky coast. Pro. Grain crops, olives, and the vine. Pop. about 13,000, of Greek origin, and belonging to the Greek church. Lat. between 36° 7′ and 36° 23′ N. Lon. 23° E. This island was noted in antiquity for the worship of Venus, and it still contains some remains of the ancient Cythera and its temples. (See IONIAN ISLES.)

CERIGOTTO, or KERIGOTTO, cher'-e-got'-to, the most S. of the Ionian islands, 18 miles from Cerigo. Ext. 6 miles long, by from 1 to 2 broad. Desc. Mountainous, and fertile in producing olives. Pop. 300. This was long a favourite resort of Greek pirates. (See IONIAN ISLES.)

CERRO DE PASCO, ther-ro or ser-ro dai pas'-ko, a town of Peru, about 150 miles from Lima. It stands 14,000 feet above the level of the sea, with a climate throughout the year resembling the winter of England. Its silver-mines are the richest in Peru. Pop. uncertain, but estimated at from 10,000 to 15,000.—Cerro is a prefix to several other places in S. America.

CERTALDO, chair-tal'-do, a town of Tuscany, on the Elsa, 20 miles from Florence. Pop. 2,000.—Boccacio was born here in 1313. (See BOCCACIO.)

CERVANTES DE SAAVEDRA, Miguel, ser-van'-tees, a distinguished Spanish novelist, the author of "Don Quixote," who from early years discovered a strong predilection for literature, but whose necessities forced him to seek for a livelihood by some other means than by that, which, at best, is considered to be of the most precarious kind. Consequently, he entered the service of Cardinal Aquaviva of Rome, as a page, but subsequently entered the navy, and lost an arm at the famous battle of Lepanto, in 1571. This misfortune did not prevent him joining the troops of the king of Spain at Naples; but in returning to Spain by sea, he was made a prisoner by pirates, who took him to Algiers, where, for five years, he was kept as a slave. After this period he was ransomed, when he went to Madrid. Here he settled, got married, and, in the course of about ten years, published about thirty dramas. The prolific Lope de Vega, however, was at that time at the head of the Spanish drama, to whom, therefore, he resigned the palm of superiority, and directing his genius into a kindred channel, he produced the immortal novel of "Don Quixote." Inimitable in its wit and humour as this work is, it was at first received with comparative indifference. Ultimately, however, it met with the greatest applause, although the author reaped few or none of the emoluments which might have been expected from it. He was compelled to continue to struggle on in the shades of poverty, sustained only by the consciousness of being possessed of such talents as fall to the lot of few to cultivate. D. at Alcala de Henares, New Castile, 1547; D. 1616.

CERVERA, sair-vair'-a, the name of three small Spanish towns, and a cape in the Mediterranean. Lat. of cape, 42° 26′ N. Lon. 3° 10′ E.

CERVETERE, chair-vai-tair'-ai, an Italian village in the States of the Church, 30 miles from Rome. Pop. 750. This is the Cære of antiquity, and is celebrated by Virgil as the capital of Mezentius.

CERVIN, MONT, sair'-vă, a mountain of the Pennine Alps, 40 miles from Mont Blanc. Height, 14,835 feet. (See ALPS.)

CESAROTTI, Melchior, sai'-sa-rot'-te, an Italian poet, and professor of rhetoric, Greek, and Hebrew in the university of Padua. In 1762 he translated the poems of the Scottish Ossian into Italian blank verse, and declared that he preferred the fitful flights of Ossian the Scot to the steady and sustained grandeur of Homer the Greek. He also translated the "Iliad" into Italian; but the performance was rather a caricature than what it professed to be, and brought upon the head of Cesarotti a considerable amount of ridicule. Besides these, he produced some critical and philosophical works, which have a higher claim to respect than his poetical translations of the poets we have named. He was a great admirer of Napoleon, and wrote a poem called "Pronea" (Providence), which aimed at exhibiting that personage as the envoy of the Almighty. Whether the emperor was pleased with this performance, we have no means of knowing; but as he was a great admirer of Cesarotti's Ossian, he created him a knight of the Iron Crown, and gave him a pension. B. at Padua, 1730; D. 1808.—Besides the above, he translated the works of several of the Greek writers of antiquity.

CESENA, chai-sai'-na, a town of Italy, in the States of the Church, 12 miles from Forli. It stands on the Sorano, at the foot of a mountain, and has a cathedral, monasteries, nunneries, an agricultural society, a seminary, and some silk-mills. Pop. 14,000.—In the neighbourhood are some sulphur-mines, and it is the birthplace of the popes Pius VI. and VII.

CESENATICO, chai'-sai-na'-te-ko, a town of the Papal States, 18 miles from Ravenna, near the Adriatic. Pop. 8,000.—This town was bombarded by the British in 1800.

CESPEDES, Paul, ses-pai'-dais, an eminent Spanish painter, whose picture of the "Last Supper," in the cathedral of Cordova, is greatly admired. He wrote a learned book on ancient and modern art, was a linguist and poet, and practised sculpture as well as architecture. B. at Cordova, 1538; D. 1608, and was buried in the cathedral of his native city.

CETHEGUS, se-the'-gus, an ancient and illustrious Roman family, noted for their austerity, and for their affecting a peculiar costume, which left their arms bare. The following are its most important members. Marcus Cornelius, who was successively pontifex maximus, prætor, censor, and consul. In 206, whilst consul, he defeated Mago, Hannibal's brother, in Cisalpine Gaul, and obliged him to quit Italy. D. 196 B.C.—He was, according to Cicero, the best orator of his time.—Caius Cornelius, who followed, in their turn, the fortunes of Marius, Sylla, Pompey, and Antony, and ended by taking a part in Catiline's conspiracy. He was arrested by command of Cicero, and strangled in prison with the other conspirators.

CETONA, che-to'-na, a town of Tuscany, in the Val de Chiana, 35 miles from Arezzo. It is built round the foot of a mount of the same name. Pop. 3,500.

CETRARO, che-tra'-ro, a town of Naples, in the province of Calabria Citra, 24 miles from Cosenza. It has a small fishing port on the Mediterranean. Pop. 5,000.

CETTE, or SETTE, set, a fortified seaport of France, in the department of Herault, 18 miles from Montpellier. It has a commodious harbour, defended by a citadel, formed by two moles, on both of which are forts, which, with the citadel, defend the entrance of the harbour. There is also a broad and deep canal, bordered by quays and warehouses, connected with the Lagoon of Thau, and with other canals leading to the Rhone, and greatly facilitating the trade of the place. Manf. Soap, cork, spirits, perfumes, grape, sugar, liqueurs, and casks. There are shipbuilding-yards and glass-works, and sardines are caught on the coast, and here salted. Salt-works are established in the neighbourhood, and a considerable commerce is carried on in wine, there being an extensive manufactory for the preparation of port, sherry, claret, and champagne, for the English and other markets. For this purpose large quantities of Benecarlo wine are imported from Spain. Pop. about 20,000.—Steamers ply from this place to Marseilles, and it is at the head of a railway from Beaucaire.

CEUTA, soo'-ta, a fortified seaport of Morocco, opposite Gibraltar. The castle stands on the highest point of the ancient Abyla, one of the pillars of Hercules, terminating a peninsula, and has a fine appearance from the sea. The town, however, is extremely mean, and is used mostly as a penal settlement for the state prisoners of Spain, and has little to attract the attention or excite the interest of the stranger. It has a good harbour for small vessels. Pop. 8,000. Lat. 35° 54′ N. Lon. 5° 18′ W.—This was a Mauritanian town under the Romans, and in 1415 was taken from the Moors by the Portuguese. In 1580 it passed into the possession of the Spanish, in whose hands it afterwards remained.

CEVA, chai'-va, an ancient town of Piedmont, in the district of Mondovi, on the Tanaro, 40 miles from Genoa. It has a trade in cheese, and a manufactory of silk twist. Pop. 5,000.

CEVENNES, se-ven', a range of mountains in the S. of France, divided into N. and S. The district, bearing this name in former times, occupied a large tract of Languedoc. It was generally a wild, rugged country, and the abode of many Protestants, who here maintained themselves against the persecutions of their enemies. (See CAVALIER, Jean.) Their highest points are Mazin, 5,794 feet, and Lozère, 4,884 feet above the level of the sea. (See ALBIER and AVEYRON.)

CEYLON, se-lon', an island in the Indian Ocean, separated from the south extremity of Hindostan by a channel called the Straits of Manaar and Palk's Strait. Ext. 270 miles long, with an average breadth of 100. Area, 24,600 square miles. Desc. On the N.W. the coast presents a flat and monotonous appearance, but on the S. and E. it rises into bold and rocky heights, crowned by a luxuriant vegetation. The centre may be characterized as mountainous, some of the summits rising to 7,000 and 8,000 feet above the level of the sea. Of these the most remarkable is Adam's Peak, which, though not the highest, is seen at a great distance from the sea, and was the point whence Buddha, according to his followers, rose to heaven, a huge footprint still bearing testimony to the fact. Rivers. The principal are the Mahawelli Ganga, Kalani Ganga, Kalu Ganga, and the Walawe Ganga, all of which have their sources in the central mountain mass. Lakes. None of any great extent, the largest having a breadth of not more than 4 miles. Climate. Exceedingly diversified; in some parts hot and oppressive, and liable to frightful storms of thunder and lightning; in others more temperate and salubrious; but in the neighbourhood of the woods particularly destructive to strangers. Zoology. Ceylon contains a considerable proportion of the animals indigenous to the East. Its elephants are highly celebrated for strength and sagacity. Buffaloes, wild hogs, deer, and hares abound. The cheetah, or hunting tiger, two species of wild cats, the bear, and jackal, inhabit the forests. Monkeys of various species are seen everywhere, and, with the apes, sometimes do much mischief. The great snake, or boa-constrictor, is said to attain the length of 30 feet; and there are some of the most venomous species, as the cobra di capella, as well as others, which do not bear poison. Alligators, and all the lizard tribe, are numerous; fish are various and abundant; and the birds form a large class of themselves. Pro. Rice, cotton, tobacco, pepper, coffee, an infinite variety of vegetables, and the finest fruits. The most valuable of all the Ceylonese plants, however, is the cinnamon-tree, of which the natives enumerate ten species, five of which only are esteemed fit for use. Amongst the most useful of other trees, are the cocoa-palm, the Palmyra-palm, talipot-tree, jack-tree, tamarind, and the bread-fruit. Minerals. Tin, lead, iron in abundance, manganese, plumbago, and precious stones in great variety. The most extensive pearl-fishery in the globe was carried on in the Straits of Manaar. In the year 1804, the rent amounted to £120,000 for the right of fishing 30 days, with 150 boats; but, since 1837, the pearl-fishery has been abandoned. Manf. Unimportant, with the exception of arrack, which is extracted from the blossoms of the cocoanut-tree. The native manufactures consist of handkerchiefs, napkins, towels, sail-cloth, table-cloths, and a coarse material made use of for their own dresses. The natives also are ingenious workers in gold and silver, and excel in producing lacquered ware. Fortresses. The principal are Colombo, Trincomalee, Galle, and Jaffna. Gov. Consisting of a governor and two councils, executive and legislative, of both of which the governor is president. Pop. upwards of 1,500,000. Lat. between 5° 56′ and 9° 46′ N. Lon. between 79° 36′ and 81° 58′ E.—Little was known of this island till 1505, when the Portuguese established a regular intercourse with its inhabitants, and were paid by the king of Candy, to whom it belonged, a tribute in cinnamon to defend it from the attacks of Arabian pirates. Subsequently, the Portuguese were expelled by the Dutch, who, in their turn, were driven from it by the British, to whom the island was ceded by the peace of Amiens, in 1801. It now forms one of the British governments in India, and is a central point for the Oriental mail packets. From it, branch mails issue to Calcutta, Madras, Penang, Singapore, Hong-Kong, and Australia.

CEZE, saiz, a river of France, which rises in the Cevennes, and, after a course of 50 miles, unites with the Rhone 6 miles from Orange. Its sands are said to be auriferous.

CHABEUIL, shă′-be(r)e, a town and parish of France, in the department of the Drôme, 8 miles from Valence, on the Veure. Manf. Chiefly silk. Pop. about 6,000.

CHABLAIS, shab-lai′, the most N. province of Savoy, on the Lake Geneva. It lies between the Geneveso and the Valese. Area, 336 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, with fine forests and excellent pastures, producing grain, grapes, chestnuts, and other fruits. It has a considerable trade in mules, cattle, pigs, and dairy produce. Pop. 55,000.—This is one of the Sardinian provinces which, by the acts of the congress of Vienna, was comprised in the Swiss neutrality.

CHABLIS, shab-le′, a parish and town of France, in the department of the Yonne, 9 miles from Auxerre. Pop. 3,000.—In the neighbourhood the wine called Chablis is produced.

CHABRIAS, kaï′-bre-as, an Athenian general, famous for his many naval victories. From 388 to 376 B.C. he defeated, in several engagements, the Spartans, who were commanded by Agesilaus, and took a prominent part in the war in Egypt. D. at the siege of Chios, fighting on his ship, 357 B.C.—Cornelius Nepos has written his life.

CHACEWATER, chais-waw′-ter, a town of Cornwall, 6 miles from Truro. Pop. about 2,000. In its neighbourhood are valuable copper-mines.

CHACO, chă′-ko, an extensive country, mostly included within the boundaries of Peru, and frequently called Gran Chaco. It is bounded E. by the river Paraguay, and extends as far S. as Buenos Ayres. Ext. 450 miles long from N. to S., with a breadth towards its N. part of about 250. Desc. Well watered by the affluents of the Paraguay, and has extensive plains and marshes interspersed with immense tracts of sand and salt-pools. In other portions there are dense forests and a luxuriant vegetation; but it is, in general, little known and thinly inhabited. Its population chiefly consists of wandering tribes of Indians.

CHAD. (See TCHAD, Lake.)

CHADDA. (See TCHADDA, River.)

CHADWICK, Edwin, chăd′-wik, a modern social reformer, who, in 1834, was appointed secretary to the board of the Poor Law Commission. In 1842 he completed a report "On the General Sanitary Condition of the Labouring Classes in Great Britain," and in 1847 was appointed to the Metropolitan Sanitary Commission. The following year he became a member of the General Board of Health, and in 1854 received a retiring pension for the labour of a long series of years devoted to the advocacy of questions, by the practical application of which the social comforts of the community at large were greatly improved. Whilst labouring as commissioner of the General Board of Health, the honour of companion of the Bath was conferred upon him. B. at Manchester, 1801.

CHÆRONIA, CHÆRONEA, or CHERRONEA, ker′-o-ne′-a, a city of Bœotia, on the Cephisus, so called from Chæron, the founder. It is celebrated for a defeat of the Athenians by the Bœotians, 447 B.C., and for the victory which Philip of Macedon obtained here, at the head of 32,000 men, over the confederate army of the Thebans and Athenians, consisting of 30,000 men, August 2, 338 B.C.—It is the birthplace of Plutarch.

CHAGOS ARCHIPELAGO, shă′-gos, a group of coral islands in the Indian Ocean, comprising the Peros Banhos group and the Egmont Isles. The most important of them is Diego Garcia, or Great Chagos Island, which is represented as being a wall of coral of a circular form, inclosing a natural harbour or lagoon. Pro. Cocoanut oil, vegetables, poultry, &c., for which latter, ships often touch the island. Pop. unascertained. Lat. between 5° and 7° S. Lon. 71° and 73° E.—The French formerly had a small settlement here, dependent on Mauritius; but this island, with Chagos Archipelago, came into the possession of the English in 1810.

CHAGRES, shagr, a large and navigable river of the Isthmus of Panama, rising 30 miles from the town of that name, and falling into the Caribbean Sea near lat. 9° 18′ 13″ N.—A town of the same name stands at the mouth of this river, with a harbour; but the unhealthy nature of the climate makes it a place little resorted to.

CHAKA MOUNTAINS, chă′-ka, a range of Abyssinia, forming the S. boundary of Shoa, the watershed between the rivers Nile and Hawash.

CHALCEDON, kăl-se′-don, a city of Bithynia, at the entrance of the Pontus, opposite Byzantium, colonized by the Megarees. It was a flourishing place for a long period, and retained its independence under the Roman empire. It was destroyed by the Scythians under Gallienus, in the 3rd century, and rebuilt by Justinian in the 6th. It is the birthplace of Zenocrates.

CHALCIS, or NEGROPONT, kăl′-sis, a maritime town of Greece, capital of Eubœa, built on the Euripus, where it is crossed by a bridge, 18 miles from Thebes. Pop. 5,000.—Aristotle died here, 322 B.C.

CHALDEA, kăl-de′-a, the ancient country of Shinar, or Babyloma, watered by the rivers Tigris and Euphrates. (See BABYLON.)

CHALEUR BAY, shă′-lur, a large bay in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, North America. It separates New Brunswick from Lower Canada, and has a length of 90 miles, with a varying width of from 12 to 20. Lat. 48° N. Lon. 65° W.

CHALFONT, chăl′-font, the name of two parishes in England. 1. (ST. GILES.) In Buckinghamshire, where Milton finished his "Paradise Lost," and where William Penn, the founder of Pennsylvania, in the United States, is buried. It is 3 miles from Amersham. Pop. 1,200.—2. (ST. PETER'S.) 4 miles from Beaconsfield. Pop. 1,500.

CHALKY ISLAND, chaw′-ke, is situate in a bay of the same name, at the extremity of Middle Island, New Zealand. Lat. of the bay, 46° S. Lon. 169° 29′ E.

CHALMERS, Alexander, chal′-mers, received a Scottish classical education, and settled in London as a literary man. He was employed by the most eminent booksellers and printers of his time, edited a great variety of works and contributed largely to periodical literature. B. at Aberdeen, 1759; D. in London, 1834. —Amongst other works, Mr. Chalmers edited the "General Biographical Dictionary," 32 vols.; "The British Essayists, with Prefaces, Historical and Biographical," in 45 vols.; "The British Poets, from Chaucer to Cowper," in 21 vols.; and Shakspeare, in 9 vols.

CHALMERS, Reverend Dr. Thomas, one of the most distinguished modern Scottish divines. In 1803 he was appointed to the living of Kilmany, in Fifeshire, where, in conjunction with his clerical duties, he, for twelve years, devoted himself to the study of mathematical and chemical science. In 1809 he became a contributor to the "Edinburgh Encyclopædia," then under the editorship of Dr. David Brewster; and other periodicals, among which were the "Christian Instructor" and "Eclectic Review." In 1815 he was called to the Tron Church of Glasgow, where he officiated for eight years. He was already, however, a man of note; and in the following year, the degree of D.D. was conferred upon him by the university of Glasgow. His eloquence now excited a national interest. "It reminds me more of what one reads of as the effect of the eloquence of Demosthenes, than anything I ever heard," says Lord Jeffrey, whose opinion has been echoed by Canning, Wilberforce, Hazlitt, Hall, and others. It was his extraordinary union of thought and imagination which struck us as being the secret of his power over assembled multitudes; and to this union he added the force of an earnest delivery, at once grand and impressive. In 1816 he began his "Astronomical Discourses," which created an unprecedented excitement amongst all who heard them. He was immediately raised to the apex of popularity, for which he had to pay the usual penalty, as may be gathered from the following passage:—"A popularity," says he, "which rifles home of its sweets, and, by elevating a man above his fellows, places him in a region of desolation, where he stands, a conspicuous mark for the shafts of malice, envy, and detraction;—a popularity which, with its head among storms and its feet on the treacherous quicksands, has nothing to lull the agonies of its tottering existence but the hosannahs of a drivelling generation." He now devoted himself to what we would call organizing Christianity among the people; and in this was so successful, that he created a new era in the parish in which he officiated as pastor. He removed from the Tron Church to St. John's, where Edward Irving was for some time his assistant; and, perhaps, no two such extraordinary men ever before officiated to one and the same congregation as ministers of the gospel. In 1823, when at the very zenith of his fame, Dr. Chalmers resigned his charge, and accepted the chair of moral philosophy in the university of St. Andrew's. In this capacity his emoluments were much less, but his duties were better suited to his tastes, for his health was already somewhat shaken. Here he remained for five years, when, in 1828, he was appointed to the divinity chair of the university of Edinburgh. He officiated here for fifteen years, when, in 1843, the disruption in the Church of Scotland called him to another sphere of action. Then, at the head of 400 clergymen, he seceded from the establishment, and instituted the "Free Church," and became principal and professor of divinity in the new college, founded by its adherents. In this position he continued, during the remainder of his days, imparting Christian life and moral strength to all who came within the scope of his influence. B. at Anstruther, Fifeshire, 1780; D. at Edinburgh, 1847. —Dr. Chalmers was emphatically a great man, working for the good of his species with untiring energy and assiduity. His writings are numerous, and all of a religious tendency. Perhaps his best-known work is his Bridgewater treatise "On the Adaptation of External Nature to the Moral and Intellectual Constitution of Man."

CHALONNE-SUR-LOIRE, sha-lon', a town of France, in the department of Maine-et-Loire, 12 miles from Angers. Manf. Woollen and cotton. Pop. 5,000.

CHALONS-SUR-MARNE, sha'-lawng, a parish town of France, in Champagne, on the Marne, and in the department of the same name, 25 miles from Rheims. It is divided by the river into three parts, and is crossed by several bridges, one of which, erected in 1787, is admired for its boldness and elegance, and has an elevation of 270 feet. The public buildings are a handsome town-house, Gothic cathedral, built in the 13th century, several parish churches, three secularized abbeys, some convents; and there is a fine public walk. Manf. Woollen, linen, and cotton goods. Both dyeing and tanning are carried on to a considerable extent. Pop. 16,000.

CHALONS-SUR-SAÔNE, a town and parish of France, in the department of Saône-et-Loire, on the Saône, 30 miles from Macon. It has a wide circuit, is well built, and has a cathedral, town-hall, hospital, hospice, theatre, college, public library, and baths. Manf. Linen and cotton fabrics, watches, and jewellery; also glass-manufactures and iron goods. Pop. 17,000. —It is the centre of a considerable trade, which is greatly facilitated by its position, being at the commencement of the Canal du Centre, and having connection with the Rhone, Saône, and Loire, and, by means of great roads, with the Atlantic, Mediterranean, and North Sea.

CHALUS, sha'-loo, a town of France, in the department of Haute-Vienne, 18 miles from Limoges. Pop. 1,091. It is a place of great antiquity, and contains the remains of the castle of Chabrol, besieging which, in 1199, Richard Cœur de Lion was mortally wounded.

CHALYBES, kil'-i-bees, a small tribe of Asia, in Paphlagonia. This country produced iron in considerable quantities, and from it they manufactured steel. The Greeks took their name for this metal from these people, and from it (chalybs) we derive our word chalybeate.

CHAMALARI, sha'-ma-lar'-e, one of the principal peaks of the Himalaya mountains, in Central Asia. Height, nearly 28,000 feet. Lat. 28° 4′ N. Lon. 90° E.

CHAMBERS, chaim'-bers, a county in Alabama, U.S. Area, 775 square miles. Pop. 24,000, of whom half are slaves.

CHAMBERS, Ephraim, the compiler of an extensive cyclopædia, who, while an apprentice to Mr. Senex, a globe-maker in London, formed the plan of his dictionary. This design occupied his whole attention, and some of the articles are said to have been written by him whilst standing behind the counter. The first edition appeared in 1728, in 2 vols. folio. The next year he was chosen F.R.S. In 1738 a new edition was published, with additions; a third in the following year; a fourth in 1741; and a fifth in 1743. It was afterwards continued by Mr. Scot and Dr. Hill, and subsequently enlarged by Dr. Rees. Besides this work, he was engaged in translating and abridging the "History of the Academy of Sciences of Paris." He also translated the "Jesuits' Perspective." B. at Kendal, Westmoreland; D. in London, 1740.—Chambers may be considered the originator of all the encyclopædias which afterwards appeared in England, as well as on the continent.

CHAMBERS, Sir William, F.R.S., F.R.A.S., a celebrated English architect, surveyor-general of the Board of Works, treasurer of the Royal Academy, and knight of the Polar Star in Sweden, was descended of an ancient Scotch family. At the age of eighteen he was appointed supercargo to the Swedish East-India Company, and brought from China the Asiatic style of ornament, which became so fashionable in England at one time, under the patronage of King George III. He then settled in England as an architect, and erected some magnificent mansions in various parts of the kingdom. His principal work, however, is Somerset House, which will prove a lasting monument of his taste. He was very successful in his staircases, and designs for interior ornaments. B. at Stockholm, of English parents, 1726; D. 1796, leaving a large fortune. —He wrote a treatise on civil architecture, which is deemed valuable.

CHAMBERS, George, an English marine painter, who, in his tenth year, was sent to sea as a cabin-boy. Whilst serving his apprenticeship, he discovered his imitative genius by making rough sketches of sea scenes for the amusement of his brother sailors. These attracted the notice of the captain of the ship, who had sufficient appreciation of their merit to induce him to cancel the indentures of Chambers, and allow him to follow a profession for which he seemed by nature to have been designed. Accordingly, he worked his way to Whitby, where, in order to get an acquaintance with colours, he apprenticed himself to an old woman who kept a painter's shop. At the same time he worked as a house-painter, then took lessons of a drawing-master, and finally began to paint small marine pieces, which met with a ready sale. Three years after this, he worked his passage to London as a seaman, where, after some difficulty, he became a painter of ships. He now attracted the attention of a Mr. Horner, who employed him on a panorama of London, which was exhibited at the Colosseum. He was next engaged to paint for the Pavilion Theatre, where he received the patronage of Vice-Admiral Lord Mark Kerr, who introduced him to William IV. and Queen Adelaide. His fortune was now made, and he became marine painter to their majesties. B. at Whitby, Yorkshire; D. in London, 1840.

CHAMBERS, William and Robert, two eminent modern Scotch publishers, whose practical good sense and high moral rectitude of taste have been directed to the elevation of the people, through the means of their numerous publications. In accordance with the design of this work, Robert has the highest claim to our notice, as it is to him that the public debt of gratitude is due for much of the literary ability which has characterized the publications emanating from their establishment. At the age of sixteen he commenced, on very limited means, as a bookseller in Edinburgh, and subsequently contributed some popular works to "Constable's Miscellany." These were marked by considerable ability, and in 1832 led him, with his brother William, who was also following the trade of a bookseller, to unite in the establishment of "Chambers' Edinburgh Journal." The success of this periodical was complete, and it largely helped to exalt the intellectual enjoyments of its readers, both in England and Scotland, but more especially in the latter. Independently of his contributions to his "Journal," Robert wrote "Traditions of Edinburgh," a "History of the Rebellion of 1745-46," a work, in our opinion, of great merit; "Popular Rhymes of Scotland," and "The Life and Works of Burns," of whom he is an enthusiastic admirer, and to whose family he has been of great service. He has also devoted much of his time to scientific pursuits, and deserved well of his age for the unwearied efforts he has made, in conjunction with his brother, to shed the placid beams of a light and agreeable literature throughout the length and breadth of the land. B. both in Peebles, William, 1800; Robert, 1802.

CHAMBERSBURG, the capital of Franklin County, Pennsylvania, U.S., 46 miles from Harrisburg. Its situation is healthy, and the surrounding country rich and highly cultivated. The town is composed of two large streets, intersecting each other at right angles, and having a public square in the centre. Pop. 5,000.

CHAMBERY, sham'-ber-e, the capital of Savoy, situate in a fruitful valley, 45 miles from Geneva. It is protected by a large castle and several old fortifications; is an archbishop's see, the seat of the superior tribunal, and of the Academy of Savoy. Manf. Gauze, silk lace, leather, hats, and soap. Pop. 18,000.—From 1792 to 1815 this was the capital of the French department Mont Blanc.

CHAMBON, sham'-bawng, several towns and parishes of France, with small populations, and little of interest to record.

CHAMBORD, sham'-bor, a village in the department of Loire-et-Cher, France, 4 miles from St. Dié-sur-Loire, surrounded by the large forest of Chambord. Pop. 470. —This place is famous for its fine château, which was commenced by Francis I., after designs by Primaticcio, and finished under Louis XIV., vast sums having been spent in its erection. It was for some time the residence of Stanislaus Leczinsky, king of Poland; was afterwards presented by Louis XV. to Marshal Saxe; by Louis XVI. to the Polignac family; to Napoleon, by Berthier; and subsequently was purchased by public subscription, and given to the duke of Bordeaux. A park is attached to it, 21 miles in circumference.

CHAMBORD, Count of. (See BORDEAUX, Duke of.)

CHAMBRAY, Georges, Marquis de, sham'-brai, a French general and historian, who, entering the artillery, served in the German campaigns of 1806-9. He rose to the rank of captain, but in the Russian campaign fell sick at Wilna, and was taken by the Russians, and transported into the Ukraine. After the fall of Napoleon, he returned to France, and in 1825 became colonel-director of the artillery of Perpignan. In 1829, on account of bad health, he was permitted to retire from the service with the honorary title of maréchal-de-camp. B. at Paris, 1783; D. 1850.—In his retirement, the marquis wrote a history of the Russian expedition, which, in 2 vols., appeared in 1833. This work passed through several editions, and was recognized as a production of considerable merit. He also wrote some other works upon military tactics.

CHAMFORT, Sebastien Roch Nicholas, sham'-for, a French writer, who became connected with the "Revue Encyclopédique." His Elogies of Molière and Fontenelle procured him prizes from the French Academy, and that of Marseilles. He next compiled a "French Vocabulary," and a "Dictionary of Dramatic Anecdotes." The latter work led him to dramatic composition, and his tragedy of "Mustapha" was very successful. He was honoured with the patronage of the Prince de Condé, Madame Helvetius, and Madame Elizabeth. At the breaking out of the French revolution, he, at first, supported its principles, but afterwards became shocked at its outrages. Being a friend of Mirabeau, he assisted him in many of his works. He suffered imprisonment under Robespierre, and the horrors he witnessed had such an effect on his mind that he attempted to destroy himself. B. in Auvergne; D. from the effects of his wounds, 1794.—His works have been printed in 4 vols. 8vo.

CHAMIER, Captain, cha'-meer, a modern English writer of naval tales, who entered the navy 1809, and distinguished himself in the American war of 1812. In 1833 he quitted the service. The best known of his works are "Ben Brace," the "Arethusa," "Life of a Sailor," and "Tom Bowling." B. in London, 1796.

CHAMILLY, Noel Bonton, Count of, sha'-me-ye, a marshal of France in the reign of Louis XIV., who greatly distinguished himself in the defence of Grave, 1677. The siege of this place occupied 93 days, and cost William, prince of Orange, 16,000 men. The count, however, is better known as the receiver of the charming epistles known as the "Portuguese Love-Letters," written to him, when in Portugal, under Schomberg, by a nun, who had conceived a violent passion for him. These he had the bad taste to show to his friends, and, returning to France, to publish. D. 1715.

CHAMISSO, Aldebert Von, sha-mees'-so, a German poet, traveller, and naturalist, of French extraction, the author of "Peter Schlemil." The misfortunes brought upon his family by the first revolution, drove them from France, and in 1796 they took up their residence in Berlin. Aldebert became one of the pages of the queen of Prussia, who had him educated with great care, and made well acquainted with German literature. In 1798 he entered the Prussian army, and soon after commenced writing poetry in German, and from 1804 to 1806 was one of the editors of the "Musen-Almanach." In 1810 he returned to France, where his family had again settled, and recovered the greater portion of their property; but his mind having become thoroughly Germanized, he returned to that country, and devoted himself to the study of the natural sciences. In 1813 he wrote, for the amusement of the children of a friend, a little book called "Peter Schlemil," containing the story of a man who lost his shadow, which was translated into English, and most other European languages. In 1815 Chamisso accompanied an exploring expedition round the world, in the capacity of naturalist, and after an absence of three years, returned, and appended a supplement to the work of Kotzebue, who wrote an account of the expedition. He now took up his abode at Berlin, and became the inspector of the Botanical Gardens of that city. Here he remained to the end of his life, cultivating poetry and botany, and living in the esteem of many friends. B. at the château of Boncourt, Champagne, 1781; D. at Berlin, 1838.—His ballads and legends are considered among the best effusions of their kind in German literature.

CHAMOUNI, or CHAMONIX, sha'-moo-nee, a valley of the Sardinian states, forming the upper portion of the basin of the Arve, with a length of 12 miles, and a breadth of from 1 to 6. It has on the N. Mont Breven, and on the S. Mont Blanc, whilst its village of the same name has an elevation of 3,425 feet above the level of the sea. No situation more sublime can be conceived, heightened, as it is, by a view of the Mer de Glace, one of the grandest glaciers of the Alps. Pro. Grain and fruits are cultivated, and cattle are reared. The soil, however, is not fertile, but much honey is collected. The village of Chamouni is on the right bank of the Arve, 14 miles from Sallenche. Pop. 1,800.

CHAMPAGNE, shăm-pain', an old province of France, in the eastern part of the kingdom, adjacent to Franche-Comté and Lorraine. It now forms the whole of the departments of the Ardennes, the Marne, the Upper Marne, and the Aube, and the greater part of those of the Yonne and the Seine-and-Marne. Pro. Slate, chalk, and marl, in abundance; besides large quantities of grain, fruits, and vegetables. Champagne, however, is above all celebrated for its sparkling wine called Champagne, produced from the grape which flourishes here. In 1286 the union of Philip the Fair with Jeanne de Navarre annexed it to France.—The name also of several small towns in France, and of a district of the departments of the Charente and the Charente-Inférieure, celebrated for its wines and brandy called Cognac.

CHAMPAIGN, a county of Ohio, U.S., on a branch of the Miami. Area, 390 square miles. Pop. 20,000. It is intersected by the Erie Railway.

CHAMPAUBERT, shawmp-o'-bair, a village and parish of France, 30 miles from Chalons, where the progress of the allied Russian and Prussian army was arrested by Napoleon I. in 1814.

CHAMPLAIN, sham-plain', a large lake, forming the boundary between New York and Vermont, U.S. Ext. 105 miles long, with a varying breadth from 1 to 10. It contains numerous islands, and was the scene of many of the military operations of the revolutionary war. Its superfluous waters are carried off by the Richelieu river into the St. Lawrence, and a canal connects it with the river Hudson. In 1811 a British flotilla sustained a reverse on this lake at the hands of the Americans.

CHAMPLAIN, a post-township and port of entry of Clinton county, New York, U.S., on Lake Champlain. Pop. about 6,000.

CHAMPLAIN, Samuel de, a French naval officer, who founded Quebec, and of which he became governor-general. The above lake was named after him. B. at Le Brouage, 1570; D. 1634. He was the author of "Travels in New France, or Canada," 4to. (See CANADA.)

CHAMPMESLÉ, Mary-Desmares de, shaw-mail'-ai, a French actress, who was at first a strolling player, and afterwards appeared at Paris, where she had uncommon success. She received instructions from Racine in the performance of tragedy. B. at Rouen, 1644; D. 1698.—Her husband was also an actor and a dramatic writer. He died 1701, and his works were published in 1742, 2 vols. 12mo.

CHAMPOLLION, Jean Jacques, sham-pol'-le-awng, from being professor of Greek literature in Grenoble, became, in 1840, keeper of the library in the palace of Fontainebleau, and in 1856 librarian to the emperor Napoleon III. He has written several scientific, chronological, and antiquarian works, and in 1819 received the prize of the Academy of Inscriptions. He also wrote a work entitled "The Tournaments of King Réné," of which only 200 copies were printed, and which is very expensive. He was also a considerable contributor to periodical literature. B. at Figeac, 1778.

CHAMPOLLION, Jean François, a younger brother of the above; distinguished himself as an archæologist. In 1828 he accompanied a party of savans to Egypt, where important discoveries were made relative to the manners and customs of the ancient inhabitants of that country. Among his numerous works, we may mention his "Panthéon Egyptien," and his "Précis du Système Hiéroglyphique des Anciens Egyptiens." B. at Figeac, 1790; D. at Paris, 1832.

CHANCELLOR, Richard, chan'-sel-lor, an English navigator, who had a command under Sir Hugh Willoughby in the unfortunate voyage, undertaken under the direction of Sebastian Cabot, to discover a N.E. passage to China. Parting company with Sir Hugh, who perished on the coast of Lapland, Chancellor discovered the port of Archangel, Russia, and had an audience of the grand-duke John Basilovitz, who received him graciously, giving permission to the English to trade with his subjects. This was the foundation of the Russian Company. On Chancellor's arrival in England, a company was incorporated, by whom he was sent again to Russia; but on returning, he was unfortunately lost on the coast of Norway. Perished, 1556.

CHANDAH, shan'-da, a town of Hindostan, in Nagpore, 430 miles from Bombay. It is surrounded by walls, and has an extensive suburb.

CHANDAHNEE, shan-da-ne', the capital of a district of the same name in the province of Lahore, Hindostan. It stands near an affluent of the Chenab, and is 75 miles from Serinagur.

CHANDELEUR ISLES and BAY, shan'-de-lur, a group of small islands, uninhabited, in the Gulf of Mexico, off the coast of Louisiana. Lat. 29° 32′ N. Lon. 91° 15′ W.—The BAY is formed by these islands and those of Grand Grozier and Briton.

CHANDERI, or CHANDHAREE, shan-dair-e', a town in the province of Malwa, Hindostan, 170 miles from Agra. This town has a strong fort built on a hill, but it has greatly fallen into decay.

CHANDERNAGORE, shan'-der-na-gor', the principal settlement of the French in Bengal, 17 miles from Calcutta, and encompassed by the British district of Hooghly. Area, 2,330 acres.—The town is well built, but falling to decay. Pop. about 33,000, all of whom are natives, with the exception of a few hundreds.—In 1757 this settlement was taken by the British, but restored in 1763. In 1793 it was again taken by the British, but again restored in 1816.

CHANDLER, Richard, chand'-ler, an eminent English scholar and antiquary, who published, in 1763, a magnificent edition of the "Marmora Oxoniensia." Commissioned to examine the monuments of antiquity, he, from 1764 to 1766, visited Asia Minor and Greece, bringing back to England a vast amount of valuable materials. He published, during the succeeding years, the result of his travels and researches, some of which have been translated into French. B. at Elson, Hants, 1738; D. 1810.

CHANDOR, shan-dor, a fortified town of British India, 150 miles from Bombay. Pop. about 8,000.—In 1804 and 1818 this place capitulated to the British.

CHANDOS, John, Lord, shan'-dos, a celebrated English captain in the reign of Edward III. He was appointed lieutenant-general of the English possessions in France; and, at the battle of Auray, in 1364, took Dugueselin prisoner. When Edward III. erected Aquitaine into a principality for his son, the Black Prince, Chandos became the prince's constable. He was present at the battle of Poitiers, 1356; and was killed, bravely fighting, at the battle of Lussac, 1369.—Chandos was a chivalric soldier, and was held in equal esteem by his adversaries and friends.

CHANGARNIER, Nicolas-Anne-Théodule, shan-gar'-ne-ai, a French general, once the confidant, and, in a measure, the rival, of Napoleon III., before the elevation of the latter to the throne. In 1815 he entered the army as a private, and in 1821 accompanied the duke of Angoulême to Spain, where he distinguished himself both by his courage and capacity. After the revolution of 1830, he went with the rank of captain to Algeria, where he greatly increased his renown, and became a chef-de-bataillon. His coolness and intrepidity, in the first unsuccessful attack on Constantine, were the forerunners of greater fame and honour to him; for at Mansourah, on the 24th November, 1836, with only 300 men, he defeated 6,000 of the enemy. In 1838 he was made a colonel, and in 1841 was wounded at the head of his brigade in an affair with Abd-el-Kader, in which, as usual, he distinguished himself by his bravery. In 1843 he had the rank of lieutenant-general conferred on him; and, after serving a period of thirteen years, returned to France. In 1847 the duke d'Aumale became governor of Algeria, and induced Changarnier to accept the command of the army in that province. In the following year the duke was forced to quit Algeria, when the government was provisionally handed over to General Cavaignac, and Changarnier, once more, returned to France. He was now appointed governor-general of Algeria, in the place of Cavaignac, who was recalled to Paris; and, on the election of Louis Napoleon to the presidency of the republic, he was made commander of the first military division, with the whole of the military command of Paris. His influence, however, was now too great to be viewed with ease by Napoleon, who stripped him of his command, and reduced him to the condition of a private citizen. After the coup d'état of December 2, 1851, he was exiled, and afterwards lived mostly at Brussels. B. at Autun, 1793.

CHANG-CHOW, chang-chow', a city in the province of Fo-Kien, in China, 30 miles from Amoy. Pop. 800,000.

CHANG-MAI, chang-mai, a town of Laos, on the bank of the Menam. Pop. 30,000. Lat. 20° 16′ N. Lon. 99° 2′ E.

CHANNEL ISLANDS, a name given to a group in the English Channel, off the N.W. coast of France. They are the only portions of ancient Normandy now belonging to the British crown, under the power of which they have remained since the Conquest. (See ALDERNEY, GUERNSEY, JERSEY, &c.)

CHANNING, William Ellery, chan'-ning, an eminent

Unitarian minister of the United States, who in 1803 became pastor of the Federal-street congregation in Boston. As a preacher, he was remarkable for the polished grace with which he adorned his style, and the love of pure and lofty morality with which his sentiments were imbued. His writings are animated by the same spirit, and have justly obtained for him a considerable celebrity wherever the English language is spoken. His "Remarks on the Character and Writings of John Milton," and his "Remarks on the Life and Character of Napoleon Bonaparte," are the two performances by which he is best known in Great Britain. B. at Newport, Rhode Island, 1780; D. at Burlington, Vermont, 1842.

CHANTENEY, shant'-nai, the name of several unimportant places in France, with small populations.

CHANTIBUN, shan-te-boon, an inland town of Siam, near the mouth of a river in the Gulf of Siam. It is about 180 miles from Bangkok, and exports dye-woods, ivory, hides, horns, and gums. It its vicinity are mines of precious stones.

CHANTILLY, shan-te'-ye, a town and parish of France, in the department of the Oise, 24 miles from Paris. Manf. Porcelain and lace. Pop. 2,500.—The FOREST OF CHANTILLY, in the neighbourhood, comprises 6,700 acres. Here is the best race-course in France. English horses are often sent by their owners to run in its races, and not seldom carry off the stakes.

CHANTREY, Sir Francis, chant'-re, an eminent English sculptor, who was designed by his father, a Derbyshire farmer, for the law, but who preferred the precarious pursuits of an artist, and was, accordingly, bound three years to a carver in Sheffield. Whilst serving his apprenticeship, he became a modeller in clay, and, in this capacity, subsequently tried his fortune successively in Dublin, Edinburgh, and London. In this last he was taken by the hand by Nollekins, who greatly smoothed his path to fame and fortune. His abilities as a monumental sculptor were great; and, being universally acknowledged, he was uniformly successful in his career. In 1818 he was elected a member of the Royal Academy, and, in the following year, paid a visit to Italy. In 1837 he was knighted by Queen Victoria. B. at Norton, Derbyshire, 1782; D. 1841.—Chantrey had little of the poetry of his art. He therefore prudently confined himself within the limits of what it was in his power to achieve. One of his best statues is that of Pitt, in Hanover Square, London; another, that of Canning, in Westminster Abbey.

CHAOS, or BIRD ISLANDS, kai'-os, several rocky islets off the coast of S. Africa, about 40 miles from Port Elizabeth. On one of them the Portuguese navigator Bartholomew Diaz perished in 1500.

CHAPALA, sha-pa'-la, a lake of Mexico, containing many islands, and traversed by the Rio Grande de Lerma. Area, estimated at upwards of 300 square miles. Lat. 20° 20′ N. Lon. 102° to 103° W.

CHAPELAIN, John, shap-lā, a French poet, who wrote "La Pucelle" (the Maid of Orleans), which, at first, was received with immense favour. It passed through six editions in eighteen months, but was subsequently neglected. Besides the above, he produced some other effusions, and had a fate unusual with his order, —that of dying very rich, having himself amassed his fortune. B. at Paris, 1595; D. 1674.

CHAPEL-EN-LE-FRITH, a town and parish of Derbyshire, 5 miles from Buxton. It is encompassed by hills, and is the seat of petty sessions. Manf. Chiefly cotton and paper. In its neighbourhood are coal and lead mines, and lime-works. Pop. 3,500.

CHAPELLE (LA), sha-pel', the name of a great number of villages and towns of France, with populations varying between 1,000 and 9,000, but with nothing remarkable to record of them.

CHAPMAN, George, chāp'-man, an English poet, who was well versed in the Latin and Greek languages, and translated Homer's "Iliad" and "Odyssey" into English. This work, if less elegant than Pope's, is more faithful; and Pope is said to have been greatly indebted to it in his own translations of the immortal Greek bard. He also wrote many dramatic pieces. B. supposed in Hertfordshire, 1557; D. in London, 1634.

CHAPTAL, Jean Antoine, shap'-tal, a distinguished French chemist, who, in 1793, became manager of the saltpetre manufactory at Paris, and one of the first professors of the Polytechnic School. In 1801, during the consulate of Napoleon I., he became minister of the interior; but, in three years, retired from this post, to devote himself to pursuits more in accordance with his tastes. In this spirit he directed his attention to the manufacturing interests of his country, instituted chambers of commerce, and established councils of arts and manufactures. From time to time, he gave to the public the results of his studies and investigations, and, by every means in his power, endeavoured to improve and extend the manufactures of France. His chemical works are numerous and highly appreciated, and he was one of the founders of the Society of Encouragement, over which he presided for many years. B. at Nozaret, 1756; D. at Paris, 1832.—At the time of his death, Chaptal was a peer of France and a grand officer of the Legion of Honour.

CHARD, chard, a parish and town of Somersetshire, 12 miles from Taunton. Manf. Woollen and lace goods. Pop. about 5,500.—Here the royalists were defeated in the Cromwellian wars.

CHARDIN, Sir John, shar'-dī, a French traveller, who went to the East to endeavour to advance "his fortunes and estate." He twice visited Persia, remaining several years each time, between 1664 and 1677, and making himself acquainted with the manners and customs of the country. On his return, he visited London, where, in 1681, he settled as a jeweller to the court and nobility. He was knighted by Charles II., and married on the same day; and, in the following year, became a fellow of the Royal Society. In 1686 a folio volume of his travels appeared, and has been translated into several languages. B. at Paris, 1643; D. in Turnham Green, and buried at Chiswick, 1713.—Chardin was a painstaking traveller, and knew Ispahan better than he did Paris, and spoke the Persian language like a native.

CHARENTE, sha-rent', a large river of France, rising in the department Haute Vienne, 12 miles from Chalus, and, after a course of 200 miles, falling into the Atlantic, opposite the island of Oléron.

CHARENTE, a department of France, bordered by the departments of the Lower Charente, the Deux Sèvres, the Vienne, the Upper Vienne, and the Dordogne. Area, 2,270 square miles. Desc. Generally diversified with hill and dale, and watered by the Charente and the Vienne. It abounds with wood, and produces large crops of chestnuts; but the soil is not considered fertile. Minerals. Iron and gypsum. Manf. Paper-making, tanning, distilling, and ironwares. Pop. 385,000.

CHARENTE-INFÉRIEURE (THE LOWER), a department of France, inclosed by the Atlantic Ocean and the departments of the Gironde, the Dordogne, the Charente, the Deux Sèvres, and La Vendée. Area, 2,763 square miles. This measurement includes the islands Ré and Oléron. Desc. Flat, but generally fertile, and producing corn and wine. The pastures are extensive, and live stock numerous. Rivers. The Charente, Boutonne, and Sèvre-Niortaise. Manf. Woollens, soap, glass, leather, and earthenware. The coast fisheries are important, and a considerable quantity of brandy is made. Pop. 470,000.

CHARENTON-LE-PONT, sha-ren'-tawng, a town and parish of France, in the department of the Seine, 5 miles from Paris. It stands on the Marne, over which there is a bridge, which was frequently the scene of bloody conflicts between the citizens and the soldiers during the revolutionary periods of France. It now forms a portion of the fortifications of Paris. Pop. 3,300.

CHARETTE DE LA CONTRIE, Francis Athanasius de, sha-ret' kon-tre', a French royalist, and leader of that party in La Vendée. From being a lieutenant in the navy, he headed an army of Bretons, and in a great many battles fought with various success. At length he was wounded and taken prisoner. He was carried to Nantes, where he expiated with his life the crime of avenging the atrocities of the revolutionists and defending, to the last, the cause of proscribed royalty. Shot 1796.

CHARIKAR, shar'-e-kar, a town of Afghanistan, 35 miles from Cabul. Pop. 5,000.—Here, in 1841, a British garrison was stationed, and afterwards nearly destroyed on its route to Cabul.

CHARING, chair'-ing, a town and parish of Kent, 12 miles from Maidstone. Area, 4,060 acres. Pop. 1,321. —It is 6 miles from the Pinckley station on the Dover Railway.

CHARITÉ (LA), shar'-e-tai, a town and parish of France, in the department of Nièvre, on the Loire, 14 miles from Nevers. Manf. Glass, buttons, hardware; and it trades in iron, timber, and charcoal. Pop. 5,000.

CHARITES (Greek), and GRATIÆ (Latin), kär'-i-tes, grai'-shi-e, the Graces, the three daughters of Venus, by Jupiter or Bacchus, who were named Aglaia, Thalia, and Euphrosyne. They were the constant attendants of their beautiful mother, and were represented as three young and lovely virgins, with their hands joined. They presided over kindness and all good offices, and their worship was the same as that of the nine Muses, with whom they had a temple in common. They were generally represented in a nude state, to show that kindnesses ought to be performed with sincerity and candour. The moderns explain the allegory of their having their hands joined, to mean, that there should be a perpetual return of kind and good deeds among friends.

CHARKOV, or KHARKOV, kar-kof', a government of European Russia in the south, inclosed by Veroniaj and Katerinoslav, Pultowa, and Koursk. Area, 21,000 square miles. Desc. Flat, but fertile, producing grains of all kinds, and wine in abundance. Pop. 1,500,000.

CHARKOV, or KHARKOV, the capital of the above government, is situate on the small rivers Charkov and Lapan. It is the see of the bishops of the Ukraine and Kharkov, and holds, for cattle and wool, four yearly fairs, which are among the most important in Russia. Pop. 35,000.

CHARLBURY, chärl'-ber-e, a town and parish of Oxfordshire, 6 miles from Witney. Area, 11,320 acres. Pop. 3,200.

CHARLEMONT, chärl-mont, a town of Ireland, in the county of Armagh, on the Blackwater, 8 miles from Armagh. Pop. 600.—This place has a fort, which is used as a depôt for ordnance, and is the head artillery quarters for the north of Ireland.

CHARLEMONT, sharl'-e-mawng, a hamlet and fortress of France, near the Ardennes. The fortress stands opposite Givet, not far from the Belgian frontier.

CHARLEROI, sharl'-rwaw, a town and fortress of the Netherlands, in the county of Namur, on the Sambre, 22 miles from Mons. It has a few manufactures of nails and other hardware, glass, and woollen stuffs; and in the neighbourhood are extensive pits of turf and coal. Pop. 6,500. It is a station on the Brussels and Namur Railway, and is connected with Brussels by the Charleroi canal.—This town has been taken and retaken several times in various continental wars.

SOVEREIGNS OF ENGLAND.

CHARLES I., king of England, was the third son of James I., by Anne, daughter of the king of Denmark. On the accession of his father to the English throne, he was created duke of York and Cornwall. The death of his brother Prince Henry, in 1612, left him heir-apparent to the throne; but he was not created Prince of Wales till the month of November, 1616. In 1623, at the suggestion of the duke of Buckingham, and accompanied by him, he undertook a journey to Spain, for the purpose of personally paying his addresses to the Infanta. This contemplated match was, however, broken off, and shortly after his accession to the throne, in 1625, he married Henrietta Maria, youngest daughter of Henry IV. of France. Previous to his accession, the struggle between the popular and the monarchical principles of the constitution had commenced; but they had not assumed the definite form into which the resolute spirit of the times so soon afterwards moulded them. Charles was engaged in a war with Spain, and found it necessary to summon a parliament to grant him supplies. Nothing, however, was more remote from the minds of the representatives of the people than the intention of complying with the demands of the king. Accordingly, they were dismissed, and several parliaments were similarly served, until the meeting of the Long Parliament, which was the fifth of the reign, and which was assembled in 1646. Meanwhile, a foolish war with France had been terminated, and also that with Spain; the duke of Buckingham had been assassinated, and in 1637 John Hampden had been tried and condemned for refusing to be assessed for ship-money. Scotland had risen in insurrection, and the first act of the Long Parliament was to enter into an alliance with the insurgents. It then proceeded to strip the crown of all its objectionable prerogatives, impeached, and subsequently executed Strafford, the minister of Charles, and committed Bishop Laud to the Tower. It also brought in a bill called the Militia Bill, which was to transfer all the military power of the kingdom into their own hands, and to which the king would not give his assent. This was followed by the battle of Edgehill, fought on the 23rd October, 1642, and which was the first blood drawn in the civil war. Hostilities having thus commenced, the royal arms were, for some time, successful, particularly in the west; but the battle of Marston Moor, in July, 1644, and that of Newbury, were ruinous to the king's cause. A treaty was entered into at Uxbridge, but the parliament insisting upon the abolition of episcopacy, which Charles would not yield, hostilities were renewed, when the battle of Naseby, fought on the 14th of June, 1645, proved fatal to the royal cause. The king now threw himself on the protection of the Scots, who ultimately gave him up to the commissioners of the English parliament, from whom he was forcibly taken by Cornet Joyce and carried to the army, then lying at Triplow Heath. Thence he was sent to Hampton Court, where he was treated with some respect, as the parliament and army were at variance, the former being mostly Presbyterians, and the latter Independents. Intending to quit the kingdom, he shortly afterwards effected his escape, and sought refuge with Colonel Hammond, the parliamentary governor of the Isle of Wight. Here, however, he was detained as a prisoner, and confined in Carisbrook Castle. The army now determined to bring him to trial, in which the House of Commons concurred. Accordingly, he was, on the 20th January, 1649, brought to trial in Westminster Hall, and behaved with great dignity, refusing to acknowledge the authority of his judges, who had constituted themselves into a High Court of Justice. During his trial, he was forced to submit to many indignities, which he bore with patience and resignation. The trial lasted some days, when, on the 27th, sentence of death was pronounced upon him. Three days only were allowed to intervene between his condemnation and his execution, which were spent in affectionate interviews with his children, whom he exhorted to steadfastness in the Protestant religion, as reformed in the Church of England, and in recommending his successor to forgive his enemies. On the scaffold before the Banqueting-house at Whitehall, he was beheaded by a masked executioner, January 30, 1649. B. at Dunfermline, Scotland, 1600.—In his domestic character, few sovereigns have equalled Charles I. He was naturally possessed of a fine genius, and was one of the most powerful and elegant writers of the English language. The celebrated "Eikon Basilike" is now generally allowed not to be a production of his, although many believe that he was quite equal to its composition. Of the fine arts he was a liberal patron, and, but for the evil counsels by which he suffered himself too much to be guided, might have escaped the untimely end to which he was brought by the offended judgment of a people determined to be free. He was the father of Charles II. and James II.

CHARLES II., king of England, was the second son of the above, an elder brother, Charles James, having died on the day of his birth. Having served with the royal army till after the battle of Naseby, he then left the country, and in 1646 joined his mother at Paris, whence he proceeded to the Hague, where he received the news of the fate of his father. In Scotland he was, at Edinburgh, proclaimed king on the 3rd February, 1649, and again on the 15th July, 1650, after he had arrived in that country. He had already been obliged to take the covenant imposed by the Presbyterians, when, on the 1st January, 1651, he was crowned at Scone. Cromwell, however, was by this time "up and doing," and had made himself master of the greater part of Scotland, when Charles determined on marching southward into England. He was proclaimed king at Carlisle, of which city he took possession. He next proceeded to Worcester, where Cromwell put an end to his enterprise by defeating his army, on the 3rd of September, 1651. His escape, after this battle, was almost miraculous. Hid in the thick branches of a large oak in Boscobel wood, he avoided his pursuers, who came under the tree where he was. After wandering from one place to another in various disguises, he reached Shoreham, in Sussex, whence he embarked on the 15th October, and arrived safe at Fescamp, in Normandy. Thence he proceeded to Paris, and finally to Bruges and Brussels, at which he mostly resided until the death of Cromwell, in September, 1658. On the 23rd of May, 1660, he embarked from the Hague for London, where he arrived on the 29th of the same month, and was received with the most joyous acclamations. General Monk was the chief instrument of his restoration, and therefore shared in the royal favour. One of the first acts of Charles, on coming to the throne, was to sell Dunkirk, in order to supply his extravagances. In 1663 he declared war against Holland, which produced a confederacy between that country, France, and Denmark. A Dutch fleet sailed up the Medway, and destroyed several ships. To add to the national calamities, the plague, in 1665, swept away a vast number of the inhabitants of London, and, in the following year, a large proportion of the city was laid in ruins by fire. In 1667 peace was concluded with the Dutch, and, shortly afterwards, the great Lord Clarendon was sent into exile. About 1670 was formed the famous ministry called the Cabal, from the initial letters of the names of the five persons who composed it. At this time Charles became a pensionary of France, and entered into a new war against Holland, which terminated in 1674. In 1678 the peace of Nimeguen was established. The same year was remarkable as being that on which the pretended discovery of a popish plot was made, when, on the evidence of Oates and Bedloe, several eminent persons were put to death. In the parliament of 1679 the famous Habeas Corpus act was passed; and, in the following year, the contest between the court and popular party gave rise to the famous distinctions of Whig and Tory. A new parliament met at Oxford in 1681, but it was soon dissolved. From this time Charles assembled no more parliaments, and governed in the most arbitrary manner. The charters of the corporations were called in and altered, so as to make them dependent on the crown. These proceedings caused a conspiracy, called the Rye-house plot, to be formed against him, and Lord Russell and Algernon Sydney were executed for their supposed concern in it, 1683.—B. 1630; D. of apoplexy, 1685.—In his last moments the "merry monarch" received the sacrament from a Catholic priest, although he had professed Protestantism, whilst his libertinism was of the most open and audacious kind. In 1662 he married Catharine, daughter of John IV., king of Portugal, by whom he had no offspring, but, by various mistresses, he left a numerous progeny, whose descendants represent in England some of the titular dukedoms which he conferred upon them.

CHARLES EDWARD, of the Stuart family, commonly called the Pretender, was the grandson of James II. of England. In 1745 he landed in the west Highlands of Scotland, and published a manifesto setting forth the claims of his father to the English throne. Being aided by several Highland chiefs and their followers, he made a successful descent upon the Lowlands, and entered Edinburgh. Here he caused his father to be proclaimed; on which General Cope hastened towards the capital, but was met and defeated by Charles at Preston Pans. Instead of making a proper use of this victory, by pushing into England, Charles returned to Edinburgh, wasting his time in an idle parade of royalty. Being joined, however, by Lords Kilmarnock, Cromarty, Balmerino, and other discontented chiefs, he marched as far as Manchester; but hearing that the king was about to take the field, he returned to Scotland, where he defeated the English forces under Hawley at Falkirk. In the mean time the duke of Cumberland advanced to Edinburgh, and thence to Aberdeen, the Pretender retreating before him. At last the two armies met at Culloden, when, after an obstinate conflict, in which the Highlanders displayed signal courage, the royal army was victorious, and the Scotch fled, leaving three thousand of their number dead on the field. Charles, after wandering about in different disguises, chiefly among the Hebrides, effected his escape to France, and thus ended all hopes of this unfortunate family ever recovering the crown of their ancestors. B. at Rome, 1720; D. at Florence, 1788. He married the Princess Stolberg-Guendern, who afterwards secretly married Count Alfieri, the poet. His brother, Henry Benedict, Cardinal York, suffered so much from the ravages of the French in Italy, as to excite the compassion of the English, and his case being made known to King George III., he settled upon the venerable representative of an illustrious house a considerable pension. (See ALBANY, Countess of, and ALFIERI.)

SOVEREIGNS OF GERMANY.

CHARLES I. and II. (See CHARLEMAGNE and CHARLES THE BALD of France.)

CHARLES III., or the Gross, emperor of Germany, was elected in 881. He held, at the same time, the sovereignty of France; but being, from incapacity, deposed, he died of grief and poverty at Constance, in 887.—From that time the crown of France was separated from that of Germany.

CHARLES IV. was the son of John of Luxembourg, and grandson of the emperor Henry VII. He ascended the throne in 1347. His reign was rendered remarkable by the golden bull, published at the diet of Nuremberg in 1356, and which established the Germanic constitution. D. at Prague, in Bohemia, 1378.—He was a learned man, and a great encourager of letters.

CHARLES V., emperor of Germany and king of Spain, succeeded his grandfather Ferdinand in the kingdom of Spain in 1516, and to the empire on the death of Maximilian, in 1519. Francis I. of France disputed with him the latter title, which gave rise to a violent war, in which Charles was leagued with Henry VIII. of England. After driving the French from Lombardy and taking Geneva, he defeated and made Francis a prisoner at the battle of Pavia, fought in February, 1525. In the following year, Francis was liberated; and, although the war was renewed, peace was concluded in 1529, when, by the treaty of Cambrai, Francis gave up all his claims to Italy and Flanders. In 1530 Charles was crowned by the pope at Bologna, emperor and king of Lombardy. In 1535 he turned his arms against Africa, where he took Goletta, vanquished Barbarossa, entered Tunis, and re-established Muly-Hassan on the throne. Soon after this, he recommenced hostilities against France, and ravaged Champagne and Picardy; but was, at length, obliged to retire, and peace was restored in 1538. In 1539 the revolt in Ghent led him into Flanders, where, in the following year, he caused to be executed twenty-six of the citizens of the revolted town, and otherwise treated its inhabitants with great severity. In 1541 he attempted the conquest of Algiers; but his fleet was dispersed in a hurricane, and the emperor was obliged to return unsuccessful. He again entered into a league with England against France; but he was unfortunate in this war, and was glad to conclude a treaty, at Crespi, in 1545. In the following year the Protestant princes of Germany confederated against him, and, after some fighting, and a new war with Henry II. of France, he was forced to sign the treaty of Passau, in August, 1552, by which the Protestants obtained the right to freely exercise their religion in the dominions of the confederated princes. In 1555 he resigned the crown to his son Philip, in the presence of a magnificent assemblage of Spanish and Flemish nobles, in the hall of the palace of Brussels. He then retired to the monastery of St. Just, in Estremadura, where it was long supposed he employed the remainder of his days in religious exercises, mechanical pursuits, and gardening. This view of the case seems, however, to have been quite erroneous; for we learn that he was engaged as much with diplomatic notes and dispatches in his monkish apartments as if he had been in his palace at Madrid. The reader is referred to Mr. Motley's "History of the Rise of the Dutch Republic" for further knowledge of this emperor's life. B. at Ghent, 1500; D. 1558, after having his own funeral obsequies performed in the chapel of the convent in which he had spent the last two or three years of his life.

CHARLES VI., the second son of the emperor Leopold I., was declared king of Spain by his father in 1703, and crowned emperor in 1711. He made peace with France in 1714, and two years afterwards declared war against the Turks, in which his general, Prince Eugene, obtained several victories; among which was that of Peterwardein, and the taking of Belgrade. These successes forced the Turks to make peace, which resulted in the treaty of Passarowitz, in 1718, by which large portions of Servia and Temeswar were ceded to Austria. An alliance was now entered into between the emperor, France, Great Britain, and Holland, against Spain; the consequence of which was the wresting of Sardinia and Sicily from that power, and the erecting of the former into a monarchy, under the duke of Savoy. He afterwards entered into a war against his former allies, and by the peace of Vienna, in 1735, lost Naples and Sicily. B. 1685; D. at Vienna, 1740.—He was the last male of the line of the Austrian Hapsburgs.

CHARLES VII. was elector of Bavaria, and owed his crown to France and Prussia, in 1742. He had, however, a powerful rival in Maria Theresa, queen of Hungary, whose right was supported by Great Britain and Sardinia, and who finally succeeded to the empire. The struggle between these princes is known in history as the "War of the Austrian Succession." D. 1745.

Sovereigns of France.

CHARLES MARTEL, mayor of the palace under Chilperic and Thierry IV., kings of France. He was the natural son of Pepin d'Heristal, duke of Austrasia, of which he was proclaimed duke in 715. As mayor of the palace, he possessed the whole regal power, which he administered with great success, and gained many victories, the principal of which was over the Saracen general Abdalrahman, between Tours and Poitiers, in 732. (See ABDALRAHMAN.) It was in consequence of this victory that he was called Martel, or the hammer. On the death of Thierry, in 736, no successor was appointed, and Charles conducted the government as duke of the Franks. D. at Crécy, 741, dividing his kingdom between his sons Carloman and Pepin.—The latter became the first king of France of the Carlovingian race, which name was taken from the founder, Charles Martel.

CHARLEMAGNE, or Charles the Great, shar'-e-main, king of France, and founder of the Germanic empire, or Empire of the West, was the son of Pepin, and grandson of Charles Martel. He succeeded his brother Carloman, king of France, in 771. The greater part of his reign was spent in war. In 774 he conquered the Lombards, and assumed the crown of Lombardy. In 778 he made some conquests in Spain, but at Roncesvalles, where Roland, the hero of continental romance, fell, his vanguard was defeated. After defeating the Saxons and putting an end to the monarchy of the Lombards, he was in 800 crowned emperor of the West by Pope Leo III. B. in the castle of Salzburg, Bavaria, 742; D. at Aix-la-Chapelle, 814, in the cathedral of which he was buried with great pomp. Charles was not only a successful warrior but a wise legislator, and promoted learning by all the means in his power. (See AIX-LA-CHAPELLE.)

CHARLES I., called the Bald, is generally placed by French writers as their first king, although Charlemagne is unquestionably entitled to that eminence: were this given to him, however, an irreconcilable discrepancy would take place in the numerical priority of the reigns of their sovereigns; consequently, Charles the Bald is called the first. He was crowned in 840, and elected emperor of the West by the people of Rome in 875. It is supposed he died of poison, at a place called Briosman, on Mount Cenis, in the Alps. B. at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, 823.

CHARLES II., or the Fat, was the nephew of the preceding monarch. He was a feeble and treacherous prince, whom his subjects compelled to resign the crown in favour of his nephew Arnolph, an illegitimate son of the king of Bavaria and Italy. B. 832; D. at the castle of Indinga, Suabia, 888.

CHARLES III., or the Simple, was crowned at Rheims in 893, and on the death of Louis IV., king of Germany, was elected emperor; but his power was greatly reduced by the usurpations of his nobles, and the encroachments of the Normans. His minister and favourite, Haganon, gave such offence to the nobles, that they revolted and drove him from his kingdom, which was seized by Robert, duke of France, who was crowned by the archbishop of Rheims in 922. The same year a battle was fought between the two monarchs, in which Robert was slain; but his son, Hugh the Great, defeated Charles, who fled for refuge to the count of Vermandois. His wife, a sister of Athelstan, king of England, took shelter with her son Louis in that country, and he remained a prisoner during the remainder of his days. B. 879; D. 929.

CHARLES IV., or the Fair, the third son of Philip the Fair, obtained the crown of France in 1322. In his reign a fierce war raged between him and Edward II. of England, who had married Isabella, the sister of Charles. The war resulted in the cession of Guienne to Edward. In 1323 Charles visited Toulouse, when the people of that city tried to revive the ancient Provençal poetry, and instituted an annual meeting of poets at the floral games, which was continued down to the Revolution. D. 1328.—With this sovereign the elder branch of the line of Capet terminated, and was succeeded by the younger; viz., that of Valois.

CHARLES V., called the Wise, was the eldest son of John II., and the first prince who bore the title of dauphin. His father was the king who was, in 1356, taken prisoner by Edward the Black Prince at the battle of Poitiers. He succeeded to the crown on the death of his brother in 1364. By his prudence and valour he restored the commerce and agriculture of his country, and gained several advantages over the English. Bertrand Dugueselin and Olivier de Clisson were amongst his most famous generals. D. 1380.—The Royal Library of Paris was founded by this prince, and the Bastille was erected by him.

CHARLES VI., the Well-beloved, son of the above, was crowned in 1380. His reign was unfortunate, owing to the quarrels of his uncles for power during his minority, and the contentions of the dukes of Orleans and Burgundy for the succession. Henry V. of England took advantage of these disputes to invade France. His great victory at Agincourt gave him possession of Normandy, and, allying himself with the Burgundian party, he disinherited the dauphin, married Catharine, the daughter of the French king, and was crowned king of France in 1421. B. 1368; D. 1422. (See HENRY V. of England.)

CHARLES VII., called the Victorious, was crowned in 1423, and by his activity drove out the invaders from all their possessions except Calais. In effecting this, Joan of Arc, the Maid of Orleans, may be considered to have greatly assisted, as the tide of fortune turned against the English, after her appearance at Orleans. D. at Bourges, 1461.—The Greek language was first taught in the University of Paris during the reign of this prince. Charles was an amorous monarch, and the beautiful and talented Agnes Sorel was for many years his mistress. His last days were embittered by the ambition of his son, the cruel Louis XI., and, fearing to be poisoned by him, he starved himself to death.

CHARLES, VIII., called the Affable, was the son of Louis XI., and ascended the throne in 1493, at the age of 13. He conquered Naples after a short war of five months, but lost that kingdom as quickly as he had won it. In 1495, at about ten miles from Piacenza, on his return to France, he obtained a great victory over the Italians, though their army numbered 40,000 strong, against 9,000 of his troops. D. 1498.

CHARLES IX. succeeded to the throne in 1560, on the death of his brother, Francis II. He was the son of Henry II., and his mother was Catharine de Medicis, who was, in effect, the reigning sovereign. She, however, abused the power she possessed, and caused great discontents among her Protestant subjects, who revolted from her authority. This resulted in the massacre of St. Bartholomew, one of the blackest deeds on record, and which must for ever stain with infamy the memory of Charles. Shortly after this event, he died, in his 24th year, smitten by the terrors of an evil conscience. B. 1550; D 1574.—The remorse which Charles felt on account of the massacre of St. Bartholomew seems to have been as deep as it was sincere. "That miserable day," says Sully, "was, without ceasing, present to his mind; and he showed by his transports of grief, and by his terrors, how great was his repentance." (See CATHARINE DE MEDICIS, COLIGNY, &c.)

CHARLES X. was the brother of Louis XVIII., and after a variety of fortune, caused by the French revolution, was proclaimed king in September, 1824. On his accession to the throne, he endeavoured to make himself popular; but there was a strong party against him, who were intimate with his character, and, therefore, had little faith in the sincerity by which any of his more liberal acts were professedly governed. In 1827 a bill was brought in regarding the "police of the press," which was nothing less than the offensive re-establishment of a censorship over all pamphlets of less than 21 sheets. It was, also, otherwise extremely oppressive upon the editors and proprietors of newspapers. The bill was, after a lively debate, withdrawn; but it left a deep impression on the minds of the Parisians. Accordingly, at a grand review, at which the king soon afterwards appeared, he was saluted with "Down with the ministers!" "Down with the Jesuits!" from all classes of the people. The king, however, was rather irritated than disconcerted or dismayed, by this demonstration, and sternly told some of the most clamorous, that he "had come there for homage, and not to be taught lessons," and then disbanded the troops. Shortly afterwards, the House was dissolved, and, in the January of 1828, a new ministry formed. Several other ministries enjoyed short reigns up to 1830, when the chambers opened in March, with Prince Polignac at the head of the administration. In reply to the speech from the throne, the king was told that his ministry had not the confidence of the representatives of the nation, and the chambers were prorogued till September, when a dissolution was proclaimed and new elections made. In the spring of the next year, discontents had increased among the people, and on the 25th July the liberty of the press was suspended. Several other oppressive measures accompanied this, which were energetically protested against, and which roused the mass of the people to take up arms. On July 27, the first encounter took place between the people and the soldiery. On the following day the fighting became general, and the next, Marmont, who was at the head of the Guards, evacuated Paris. On the 30th, the duke of Orleans was proclaimed lieutenant-general of the kingdom, and on the 2nd of August, Charles abdicated in favour of the duke of Bordeaux, and set out for Cherbourg. The claims of this duke, however, were not recognized by the chambers, and the duke of Orleans (Louis Philippe) was chosen to reign in his stead. Charles sailed for England, and eventually took up his abode at Holyrood Palace, in Edinburgh, where, 20 years before, he had sought and found an asylum. He subsequently removed to Prague, in Bohemia; thence to Goritz, in Styria; and there, in the château of Grafenberg, he was soon afterwards attacked by cholera, which carried him off. B. at Versailles, 1757; D. at Goritz, 1836.

SOVEREIGNS OF SPAIN.

CHARLES I. of Spain. (See CHARLES V. of Germany.)

CHARLES II., the son of Philip IV., succeeded to the throne in 1665. He married twice, but never had any issue. By his will he constituted Philip of France, duke of Anjou, his heir, which, after his death, led to the contest known in Europe as the "War of the Spanish Succession." D. 1700.

CHARLES III., son of Philip V., on the death of his brother Ferdinand exchanged his kingdom of Sicily for the Spanish dominions. He was a virtuous man, and possessed of considerable administrative abilities. In the war with England he retook Minorca, but saw his commerce ruined, and all his treasure at Havannah fall into the enemy's hands. D. 1788.—He founded the orders of St. Januarius at Naples, and of the Immaculate Conception.

SOVEREIGNS OF SWEDEN.

CHARLES I. TO IX. These biographies present nothing remarkable; and, indeed, in the case of the first six, nothing authentic.

CHARLES X., or GUSTAVUS, king of Sweden, the son of John Casimir, count palatine of the Rhine, ascended the throne of Sweden on the abdication of Christina in 1654. He turned his arms with success against the Poles, and gained, in 1656, the famous battle of Warsaw, which lasted three days, besides taking a great number of their principal places. The Poles called to their assistance Russia, Holland, and Denmark, obliging the king of Sweden to conclude a peace. War, however, soon broke out again, and after taking Kronenburg, Charles laid siege to Copenhagen; but, his navy being defeated, he was obliged to return to his country. B. at Upsal, 1622; D. 1660.

CHARLES XI. was the son and successor of the above. On his accession, in 1660, a peace was concluded with Denmark; but in 1674, the latter power declared war against him, and he lost several places, which were restored at the peace of Nimeguen, in 1678. He was a good prince, and gave much of his attention to the regulation of the internal affairs of his kingdom. B. 1655; D. 1697.

CHARLES XII., son and successor of the preceding, had, from his childhood, an ambition to imitate the actions of Alexander the Great. He mounted the throne in 1697, being then only fifteen, and, at his coronation, snatched the crown from the hands of the archbishop of Upsal, and placed it on his own head. His youth presented a favourable opportunity to Russia, Denmark, and Poland to enter into an alliance against him, with the view of dismembering his kingdom. The young hero, undaunted by this confederacy, attacked each in turn, beginning with Denmark, whom he compelled to sue for peace. In 1700 he decisively defeated the Russians at Narva, although the odds against him were 80,000 to 8,000. His next enterprise was against Poland, and, after several battles, he dethroned Augustus in 1707, and placed Stanislaus upon the throne. Charles was now at the head of 60,000 men, when he formed the resolution of humbling Peter the Great. At first he obtained some signal advantages, and was joined by Mazeppa, the hetman or chief of the Cossacks, in his attempt to overpower the Czar. After suffering the horrors of a winter campaign in the Ukraine, he laid siege to the town of Pultowa, to the relief of which Peter came at the head of 70,000 men. On the 8th July, 1709, a general battle was fought, in which Charles was completely defeated, and fled, leaving 9,000 men upon the field. He himself was wounded in the leg, and had to be carried off in a litter. He sought an asylum in Turkey, where he was entertained by the grand seignior, who provided for him a residence at Bender. Here his conduct was so violent, that he was ordered to leave the Turkish territories, which he refused to do. On this, the grand seignior directed that he should be forced away; but Charles, with his retinue, formed an encampment, and resisted the attack of the janizaries till superiority of numbers obliged him to take shelter in his house. Thence he sallied out, sword in hand; but being entangled by his long spurs, fell, and was taken prisoner. He was still treated with respect, and after being kept as a prisoner for ten months, he requested leave to return to his dominions, which was readily granted. On arriving in Sweden, he was received with universal joy, but found his kingdom reduced to a state of great wretchedness. Getting together an army, in 1716 he invaded Norway, but after penetrating to Christiana, was obliged to return to Sweden. He resumed the attack in the winter of 1718, but was killed by a cannon-shot at the siege of Frederickshall, on December 11 of the same year. B. at Stockholm, 1682; fell 1718.—Charles was liberal, active, and firm; but rash, obstinate, and cruel. He was never intimidated even in the midst of the greatest dangers. At the battle of Narva he had several horses shot under him, and as he was mounting upon a fresh one, he said, "These people find me exercise." When he was besieged at Stralsund, a bomb fell into the house while he was dictating to his secretary, who immediately dropped the pen in a fright. "What is the matter?" said Charles. "Oh, the bomb!" answered his secretary. "The bomb," says the king, "what have we to do with the bomb? go on."

CHARLES XIV., whose real name was Jean Baptiste Jules Bernadotte, enlisted in a regiment of the French royal marines in 1780, and served two years in Corsica. In 1790, when the revolution began, he was at Marseilles, and when the war broke out with Austria and Prussia, he was dispatched to the Rhine, and, under General Custine, soon distinguished himself. He became chief of brigade, and afterwards general of division, under Kleber and Jourdan. In 1797, with 20,000 men, he reinforced General Bonaparte in Italy, and took a principal part in the battle of Tagliamento. Soon after this, he was chosen by Bonaparte to present to the Directory the standards which had been taken from the Austrians, and, on his return to headquarters, advised Bonaparte to sign the treaty of Campo-Formio. Being offended at the conduct of Napoleon, who, when he left Italy, took from him one half of his troops, he resigned his command, and was appointed ambassador at Vienna, where he did not hoist the tricoloured flag above his hotel until ordered by the Directory. When this was done, it created a riot, soon after which Bernadotte left for Paris, where, in 1798, he married Eugénie Clary, the younger sister of the wife of Joseph Bonaparte. In the following year he was appointed minister-at-war; but on the return of Bonaparte from Egypt, he was without employment. When Napoleon became first consul, he had command of the Army of the West; but when the emperorship was assumed, he was made a marshal and stationed at Hanover, with the command of the army. Here he repressed irregularities, provided for his soldiers without plundering the people, and laid the foundation of that high character for honour, humanity, and justice, which, at a future day, materially influenced his election to the throne of Sweden. In 1805 he left Hanover to join Napoleon against Austria, and at the battle of Austerlitz broke the centre of the Russians. In the following year he was created Prince of Pontecorvo, which Napoleon designated as the immediate fief of the imperial crown. In the war against Prussia he fought with his usual success, and in 1808 was ordered against Denmark. On the 5th and 6th July, 1809, he fought against the Austrians at Wagram, after which he demanded permission to retire, and obtained it. He had had high words with Napoleon, who, at that battle, had deprived him of his reserve division, and not treated him well. He returned to Paris, but was soon again employed, and notwithstanding several eruptions between him and the emperor, neither of whom ever seems to have quite understood the other, he, in 1810, accepted the governor-generalship of the Roman states. By this time, Gustavus IV., king of Sweden, had, on account of incapacity, been forced to abdicate his crown, and he and his descendants were, by the Swedish States, declared excluded from the throne for ever. The uncle of this sovereign assumed the reins of government as Charles XIII., but was childless; and the States chose Augustus of Holstein-Augustenburg to be heir to the throne. This prince, however, died in 1810, and Charles XIII. proposed Bernadotte to the Swedish diet, as a proper person to be appointed prince royal of Sweden. The choice was unanimously approved, on condition of his accepting the Communion of Augsburg, which he did, and, on the 2nd of November, 1810, entered Stockholm amid the acclamations of the people and the salutes of artillery. On the 5th he addressed the king and the assembled States, and concluded with this excellent passage: "Brought up in the camp, I have been familiar with war, and am acquainted with all its calamities. No conquest can console a country for the blood of its children, shed in foreign wars. It is not the physical dimensions of a country that constitute its strength. This lies rather in the wisdom of its laws, the greatness of its commerce, the industry of its people, and the national spirit with which it is possessed. Sweden has lately suffered greatly; but the honour of her name is unsullied. She is still a land sufficient to supply our wants, and we have iron to defend ourselves." In defence of the rights of the country of his adoption, he was soon called upon to take up arms against Napoleon, and from 1812 to the fall of that great man, he was actively engaged in the principal wars and events which occupied the attention of continental Europe. In 1814 Sweden and Norway were united under Charles XIII., and Bernadotte approved as the prince royal. In 1818 Charles XIII. died, when Bernadotte was proclaimed king of Norway and Sweden, under the title of Charles XIV. He was in the May of that year crowned at Stockholm by the archbishop of Upsal, and subsequently at Drontheim by the bishop of Aggerhuys. Having now attained the summit of human ambition, he directed his attention to the development of the resources of his adopted country, and after a long reign of unusual prosperity, he passed quietly from this world, after playing no ordinary part in it, and completing his eightieth year. B. at Pau, in the Bearn, 1764; D. 1841, and was succeeded by his son, Oscar I.

Sovereigns of Naples and the Two Sicilies.

CHARLES I., count of Aragon and king of Naples, was the son of Louis VIII. of France. He married the daughter of the count of Provence, and thereby inherited that country. He accompanied his brother Louis to Egypt in 1248, and both were made prisoners at Damietta at the same time. On his return, he defeated Manfred, the usurper of the Sicilian crown, assumed the title of king of Naples, and put to death Conradin, duke of Suabia, and the duke of Austria, whom he had taken prisoners. After this he laid the prince of Tunis under tribute, and suppressed the Ghibelines. In 1276 the title of king of Jerusalem was conferred on him, after which he meditated an expedition against Constantinople. His arbitrary conduct to the Sicilians caused them to conspire against him, headed by Giovanni de Procida. On Easter Monday, 1282, all the French who could be found in Palermo were massacred at the hour of vespers; and this event is known in history as the "Sicilian Vespers." Sicily was thus lost to Charles, its inhabitants choosing Peter III. of Aragon for their king. B. 1220; D. 1285.

CHARLES II., called the Lame, the son and successor of the above, was, at the time of his father's death, a prisoner in the hands of the Sicilians, who would have put him to death but for the intercession of Constantia, queen of Peter of Aragon. He recovered his liberty in 1288, on condition of renouncing his claim to the Sicilian crown; but being absolved from this condition by the pope, he made several unsuccessful attempts to gain possession of Sicily. D. 1309.

CHARLES III., of Durazzio, was the great-grandson of the preceding, and, by his marriage with Margaret, niece of Joan, queen of Naples, obtained that kingdom from the pope, on the excommunication of Joan in 1380. He put Joan to death, and afterwards quarrelled with the pope, who excommunicated him in his turn. Charles next claimed the crown of Hungary, but fell in attempting to conquer it. D. 1386.

DUKES OF SAVOY AND KINGS OF SARDINIA.

CHARLES I., duke of Savoy, succeeded his brother Philibert I. in 1482, being then only 14 years of age. He died at the age of 21, but achieved nothing remarkable, although the surname of the "Warrior" was given to him. He was educated at the court of Louis XI. of France. B. 1468; D. 1489.

CHARLES II., duke of Savoy, son of the above, was only 9 months old at the death of his father, and died at the age of 8 years.

CHARLES III., duke of Savoy, called the Good, succeeded Philibert II., his brother, in 1504. He had a long but unfortunate reign. He was of a versatile disposition, wavering between Francis I., his nephew, and Charles V., his brother-in-law, and was consequently mistrusted and punished by both. D. of chagrin, at Verceil, 1553.

CHARLES EMMANUEL I., duke of Savoy, called the Great, governed from 1580 to 1630. Taking advantage of the troubles of France, he possessed himself of the marquisate of Saluzzo, and caused himself to be acknowledged by the "leaguers" count of Provence, in 1590. But Henry IV. subsequently succeeded in taking Savoy and a portion of Piedmont. Of a boundless ambition, he laid claims to the empire, after the death of Matthias, then to the kingdom of Cyprus and the principality of Macedon. He died of grief, not being able to accomplish his projects, in 1630.

CHARLES EMMANUEL II., duke of Savoy, son of Victor Amadeus I., succeeded his brother Francis in 1638, under the regency of his mother, Christina of France, daughter of Henry IV. of France. In his reign commerce and the arts flourished. B. 1634; D. 1675.

CHARLES EMMANUEL III., 2nd king of Sardinia of the house of Savoy, was the son of Victor Amadeus II., and, in 1730, mounted the throne, on the abdication of his father. In 1733 he united himself to France and Spain, who desired to weaken Austria; and at the head of the allied forces, conquered the Milanese, defeated the imperialists at Guastalla, and obtained, as a reward, Novarese and some fiefs of the empire. In 1742, the promise of an addition to his dominions determined him to take part with the queen of Hungary against France and Spain. He possessed himself of Modena and Mirandola, after evincing great military abilities. He lost, however, in 1744, at Coni, 5,000 men, and subsequently busied himself with the internal affairs of his kingdom. B. 1701; D. 1773.

CHARLES EMMANUEL IV., 4th king of Sardinia, was the son of Victor Amadeus III., and succeeded his father in 1796, just as France had seized the greater portion of his dominions. Mixed up in the misfortunes of the Bourbons, with whom he was connected, Charles Emmanuel vainly exerted himself to suppress the revolutionary elements in his kingdom. He was forced to cede to the French republic his continental possessions, and, in 1798, retired to the island of Sardinia. In 1802 he abdicated in favour of his brother Victor Emmanuel, and repaired to Rome, where he died, 1819.

CHARLES FELIX became king of Sardinia in 1821, on the forced abdication of his brother, Victor Emmanuel. He suppressed rebellion, introduced order into his kingdom, and compiled a military code. D. 1831, without children, leaving the crown to Charles Albert, duke of Carignano.

CHARLES ALBERT, king of Sardinia, was the son of Charles Emmanuel, prince of Carignano. Educated in France, he early imbibed liberal ideas and a desire for the independence of Italy. In 1821 he commanded the Sardinian artillery, on the breaking out of the insurrection in that year. Victor Emmanuel, when he abdicated, nominated him regent till the arrival of the new king, Charles Felix (see above). An Austrian intervention, however, obliged him to retire, and, exiled in Tuscany, he continued there for some time, in disgrace, a victim to the resentment of the Carbonari, who thought he had betrayed them. In 1820, however, he was appointed viceroy of Sardinia, and in 1831 was called to the throne, in default of direct heirs to Charles Felix. He now ardently devoted himself to administrative reform in the various departments of law, commerce, and the army. In 1848, the year which witnessed revolutions in nearly all the kingdoms of Europe, he gave his subjects a liberal constitution, and openly embraced the cause of Italian independence and unity. Supporting by the force of arms the insurgents of Lombardy, Venetia, Parma, Placentia, and Modena, he, at first, obtained various brilliant successes, defeating the Austrians at Pastrengo, Goito, Rivoli, and Somma Campagna. He succeeded also in taking Pizzighettone and Peschiera; but, badly seconded by the Lombard troops, he was, in his turn, beaten at San Donato by the Austrian Radetzky, and forced to quit Milan precipitously. He was now compelled to solicit an armistice, the terms of which lost him all his former advantages. Yielding to the remonstrances of the ultra party, he imprudently recommenced the war at the expiration of the armistice; but he now experienced nothing but reverses. Losing, in spite of great personal bravery, the decisive battle of Novara, on 23rd March, 1849, he abdicated on the same day in favour of his son, Victor Emmanuel II. D. a few months after, at Oporto, Portugal. This prince was singularly religious, and it was said of him, "He fought like a hero, lived like a monk, and died like a martyr." He, doubtless, meant well for Italy, but was hardly equal to his intentions of establishing her unity and independence.

VARIOUS RULERS.

CHARLES II., king of Navarre, called the Bad, was the son of Philip, count of Evreux, who became king of Navarre by his marriage with the daughter of Louis Hutin, king of France. At the age of eighteen, he succeeded his mother, who reigned alone after her husband's death. Of a restless disposition, he passed through a variety of fortune, and ultimately met with a remarkable death. Being ill of a leprosy, the physicians caused him to be wrapped in sheets dipped in spirits of wine and covered with brimstone. These were sewed about his body, and his page, endeavouring to loosen the bandage, accidentally set fire to it with a taper which he held in his hand. The king was so dreadfully scorched, that he died in great agony, 1387.

CHARLES "THE BOLD," duke of Burgundy, was the son of Philip the Good, whom he succeeded in 1467. He early displayed great courage, verging on rashness, and was constantly at war with Louis XI., king of France. The latter instigated Charles's subjects (the inhabitants of Liège and Ghent) to revolt against him; but they were defeated, and cruelly punished by the duke. Learning that Louis XI. was again tampering with his people, he seized him, and forced him to assist in suppressing the insurrection. Charles then took Guelderland and Zutphen, and, desirous of increasing his dominions, invaded Switzerland, where he committed the most inhuman outrages. The Swiss, however, collected their forces, and the duke was first defeated at Granson, and afterwards at Morat, 1476, where his army was completely destroyed. In 1477, whilst besieging Nancy, in the territory of the duke of Lorraine, he was killed. B. 1433. (See LOUIS XI.) He left one daughter, Marie, who inherited his estates, and added a portion of them to Austria by her marriage with Maximilian, son of the emperor Frederick III.

CHARLES I., duke of Lorraine, was brought up at the French court under Charles V., and reigned from 1391 to 1431. He sustained the rights of his father-in-law, Robert, to the empire, against Wenceslas, fought in the French army at Agincourt, and in 1417 was made constable of France. By some he is called Charles II. D. 1431.

CHARLES II., called the Great, duke of Lorraine, was the son of Duke Francis I. and Christina of Denmark, niece of Charles V. Being only three years old at the death of his father, a joint regency was established under Christina and the bishop of Verdun. This prince was the benefactor of his people, and possessed great administrative abilities. He founded the university of Pont-à-Mousson, and the towns of Clermont, Lunéville, and Stenay. He married Claude, daughter of Henry II. of France, and in 1589 aspired to that throne. B. 1543.

CHARLES III., duke of Lorraine, succeeded to the dukedom in 1624, and unwisely incurring the hostility of France, was despoiled of his estates by Louis XIII. He, however, recovered a portion of them by the treaty of St. Germains in 1641, and that of the Pyrenees in 1659. Having violated these treaties, he was again dispossessed of his provinces. He then joined the army of the emperor, and gained a victory at Treves, where he took prisoner Marshal de Crequi. B. 1603; D. 1675.—By a will, signed 1660, he constituted Louis XIV. of France his heir.

CHARLES IV., duke of Lorraine, nephew of the above, succeeded to his rights in spite of the opposition of Louis XIV. Not being able, however, to retain possession of the dukedom, he took service in Austria. Obtaining the friendship of the emperor Leopold, he received the hand of the archduchess Marie-Eleonora, the emperor's sister. He became one of the first generals of the empire, and gained, amongst many other victories, that of Mohatz over the Turks, in 1687. B. at Vienna, 1643; D. 1690.

CHARLES I., king of Navarre. (See CHARLES IV. of France.)

CHARLES II., king of Navarre, called the Bad, was crowned in 1349. Descended from Philip the Bold, king of France, he possessed the right to the throne in case of the extinction of the Valois line. He constantly fomented troubles in the kingdom, with the view of arriving at the crown. Allying himself, with this aim, to Henry V. of England, he urged his pretensions to various provinces, raised Paris to insurrection against the dauphin (Charles V.), endeavouring even to poison him, and became, at last, tranquil only when he saw that prince firmly seated in the enjoyment of power. Then turning to Spain, he became entangled in the contest between Peter the Cruel and Henry of Transtamara, who disputed each other's right to Castile. Betraying, in its turn, each party, he was at length compelled to give up a portion of his dominions, in 1379. Adversity at last instructed him, and he passed his latter years in peace, engaged in governing his country. B. 1332; D. 1387.

CHARLES III., king of Navarre, called the Noble, was the son of the above, and succeeded him in 1387. Desiring to live in peace with all his neighbours, he gave up the pretensions of his father to several provinces of France, and received, in return, considerable sums of money. D. 1425, after a long and tranquil reign.

CHARLES, ST., LAKE, is in Lower Canada, 12 miles from Quebec. Ext. 5 miles long. A river of the same name has its source here, and joins the St. Lawrence at Quebec.

CHARLESTON, charls'-ton, a city and seaport of Charleston district, South Carolina, U.S. It is built on a low point of land between the rivers Ashley and Cooper, which unite immediately below and form a spacious and convenient harbour, communicating with the ocean at Sullivan's Island, 7 miles from the city. Among the public buildings are a state-house, city-hall, a custom-house, theatre, orphan-house, hospital, almshouse, banks, numerous places of worship for various denominations, and several charitable institutions. The city is regularly laid out in parallel streets, from 35 to 70 feet in width, running from river to river, and intersected by others at right angles. The new houses are of brick, and many of them are elegant. COMMERCE. Extensive and flourishing. Manf. Cotton, woollen, linen fabrics, shoes, hardwares, colonial produce, and provisions of all kinds. Exp. Rice, cotton, and tobacco. Pop. with the suburb of St. Philip's, about 65,000. Lat. 32° 41′ 2″ N. Lon. 79° 52′ 7″ W.—Charleston was founded in 1680, and in 1690 was colonized by French refugees, who, on account of the revocation of the edict of Nantes, fled here and settled. In 1779 it was taken by the British, but abandoned in the following year. It has frequently suffered by fire and the ravages of yellow fever. Charleston is connected with the principal states of the Union by railway.

CHARLESTON, a village on the S.W. coast of Cornwall, 2 miles from St. Austell. It exports large quantities of porcelain clay, artificially prepared from granite.

CHARLESTOWN, charls'-town, a town of Massachusetts, U.S., one mile from Boston. The principal part is beautifully situate on a peninsula, formed by Mystic and Charles rivers, which unite immediately below in Boston harbour. A bridge across Charles River connects the town with Boston, with which it was incorporated in 1847. Two other bridges across Mystic River join it to Malden and Chelsea. There is also a bridge across a bay of Charles River, on the west side of the town, connecting it with Cambridge. The public buildings are, the state prison, Massachusetts Insane Hospital, an almshouse, town-house, and houses for public worship. A navy-yard of the United States occupies the south-east part of the town. Pop. about 18,000. On Bunker's Hill, a monument commemorating the battle of that name is erected. (See BOSTON.)—The name also of several other townships in the United States, most of them insignificant.

CHARLESTOWN, the principal town of the island of Nevis, in the W. Indies. It is situate on the W. coast, and has many good houses and shops, well provided with every necessary. Pop. 2,000. Lat. 17° 8′ N. Lon. 62° 40′ W.

CHARLESTOWN, a town of Barbadoes, with a good port defended by two castles.

CHARLESTOWN, a village of Fifeshire, Scotland, on the N. shore of the Firth of Forth, 3 miles from Dunfermline. It has extensive lime-works and exports large quantities of coal. Pop. about 1,000.

CHARLESTOWN OF ABOYNE, a village of Scotland, 29 miles W. Aberdeen.

CHARLOTTE, shar'-lot, several places in the United States.—1. A county in the S. part of Virginia. Area, 600 square miles. Pop. 15,000, of whom two thirds are slaves.—2. A post-township, Vermont, on Lake Champlain, 12 miles from Burlington. Pop. 1,679.—3. A post village in Gates, Genesee county, New York, at the mouth of the Genesee. Some other small towns in Vermont and New York have the same name.

CHARLOTTE, princess of Wales. (See LEOPOLD, king of the Belgians.)

CHARLOTTE, AMALIE, or ST. THOMAS, the capital of the island of St. Thomas, in the Danish West Indies. It is, from the excellence of its harbour, one of the best trading ports in the W. Indies, and is defended by a citadel and two batteries. Pop. about 12,000, of whom one sixth are slaves.

CHARLOTTE ISLANDS (QUEEN), a group in the S. Pacific, of which the largest is Santa Cruz. They are all of volcanic formation, and the fires of one are still active. Desc. Well wooded, and yielding bread-fruit, cocoa-nuts, and other tropical fruits and products in abundance. Pop. Unascertained; but considerable. Lat. between 10° and 12° S. Lon. between 165° and 168° E.—These islands were, in 1595, discovered by Mandana; and on one of them, Malluolo, La Pérouse, the French navigator, and all his crew were wrecked and lost.

CHARLOTTENBURG, shar-lot'-ten-boorg, a town of Prussia, on the Spree, 5 miles from Berlin. It is a great resort of the citizens of Berlin, and consists mostly of villas and taverns. Manf. Chiefly cottons and hosiery. Pop. about 10,000.—The king of Prussia has here a palace, erected by Frederick I., who married Sophia Charlotte, daughter of George I. of England, after whom the town is named. In the gardens of the palace is a small Doric temple, in which are the remains of the unfortunate Louisa, queen of Prussia, over which is a monument, considered one of the most successful efforts of modern art. It was executed by Rauch, who executed, of the same queen, another statue, which is esteemed equally highly, and which is placed in the gardens of Potsdam.

CHARLOTTESVILLE, shar'-lots-veel', the capital of Albemarle county, Virginia, U.S., 63 miles from Richmond. It is the seat of the university of Virginia, and has a museum, an observatory, and a library. Pop. 1,500.

CHARLTON, charl'-ton, the name of numerous parishes in England, none of them with a population above 4,000.

CHARLTON, an island in British N. America, in St. James's Bay. Lat. 52° N. Lon. 79° 50′ W.

CHARLTON, the name of two towns in the United States, with small populations.—1. In New York.—2. In Massachusetts.

CHARMEZ, shar'-mai, a parish and village of Switzerland, 14 miles from Friburg. This place stands in a valley in which the finest Gruyère cheese is made.

CHARMOUTH, char'-mouth, a village and parish of Dorsetshire, 2 miles from Lyme Regis. Area, 790 acres. Pop. 700.—Here some severe shocks of an earthquake were felt in 1839.

CHAROLAIS, shar'-o-lai; one of the four counties of the ancient duchy of Burgundy, now included in the department of Saône-et-Loire.

CHARON, kair'-on, a god of Hades, son of Erebus and NOX, who carried, in a boat, the souls of the dead over the rivers Styx and Acheron for an obolus (a small silver coin), placed under the tongue of the deceased. He is represented as an old robust man, with a hideous countenance, long white beard, and piercing eyes. His garment is ragged and filthy, and his forehead covered with wrinkles. This fable of Charon and his boat is borrowed from the Egyptians.—Also the name of two eminent historians, one of Lampsacus, the other of Naucratis.

CHART, chart, the name of several parishes, with small populations, in the county of Kent.

CHARTRE (LA), shartr, a town of France, in the department of the Sarthe, on the Loire, 25 miles from Le Mans. Pop. 1,200.—It has a trade in grain and cattle.

CHARTRES, shartr, an ancient town of France, in the department of the Eure and Loire, 48 miles from Paris. It stands on the Eure, which divides it into two parts, and across which there is a bridge, planned by the celebrated Vauban. Most of the streets are narrow and crowded, but the cathedral is accounted one of the finest edifices of the kind in France. In it St. Bernard, in 1145, preached the second crusade. Manf. Leather and hosiery. Pop. 19,000. Lat. 48° 26′ 53″ N. Lon. 1° 29′ 20″ E.—This town was long held by the English, from whom it was taken by Dunois, in 1432. Anciently it was the capital of the Carnutes, and also, in the time of the Roman invasion, the capital of Celtic Gaul.

CHARYBDIS, kā-rib'-dis, a dangerous whirlpool on the coast of Sicily, opposite that of Scylla, on the coast of Italy, in the strait of Messina. It proved fatal to part of the fleet of Ulysses. The difficulty of escaping both these whirlpools gave rise to the proverb of "avoiding Scylla and falling into Charybdis;" meaning, that in our eagerness to fly from one evil, we may fall into another, equally great. According to fable, Charybdis was a Sicilian woman, who having stolen the oxen of Hercules, was struck with Jupiter's thunderbolt, and changed into a whirlpool.

CHASLES, Michel, shal, a distinguished French geometrician, who, by his power of generalization, greatly simplified and extended the most important theories. In 1841 he was appointed professor of astronomy and of applied mechanics in the Polytechnic school, and in 1846 was called to the chair of higher geometry, which was instituted in the faculty of Sciences. In 1851 he was elected a member of the Academy of Sciences, and in 1854 was chosen a member of the Royal Society of London. B. at Epernon, 1793.

CHASLES, Victor Euphémion-Philarète, a distinguished French littérateur, whose father, from being a professor of rhetoric, became a revolutionist, and subsequently a general in the French army. In his 15th year he was apprenticed to a printer, and at the time of the Restoration, was imprisoned for two months, on account of his master being suspected as a plotter against the security of the state. Chasles was set at liberty through the intercession of Châteaubriand, when he came to England, where for seven years he directed the printing department of the establishment of Mr. Valpy. Soon after this, he returned to Paris, and entered upon a literary career marked by considerable originality and success. His fecundity in authorship has been so great, that it would occupy a considerable space even to enumerate his works. Besides writing for the "Revue des Deux Mondes" the "Revue de Paris," and other publications, he has composed a number of volumes, embracing a wide range of subjects, under the title of "Studies," and is the author of several works on England and its literature. He is also a professor of languages and European literature in the modern College of France, and a knight of the Legion of Honour. B. at Mainvilliers, near Chartres, 1799.

CHASSÉ, Daniel Henry, Baron, shas'-sai, a brave soldier, who, in 1775, entered the Dutch army as a cadet, but who subsequently joined the French, and in 1793 became a lieutenant-colonel. In the war with Prussia, in 1806, he greatly distinguished himself, and in the Peninsula received the nickname of "General Bayonet," from the frequency with which he caused that weapon to be used in battle. In 1811, Napoleon I. made him a baron of the empire, and he continued to fight throughout the campaigns of 1813 and 1814. After the peace, he was appointed governor of Antwerp, and in 1832 defended that city against 75,000 French soldiers, with a garrison of 6,000. B. at Thiel, in Guelderland, 1765; D. 1849.

CHASSENEUIL, shas-sen'-e-(r)-e, a town of France, in the department of the Charente, 16 miles from Confolens. Pop. 2,500.—This is also the name of villages in the departments Vienne and Indre.

CHASSERAL, shas'-se-ral, one of the culminating points of the Jura range, in the canton of Berne, Switzerland, with an elevation of 5,280 feet.

CHASSERON, shas'-se-rawng, a mountain in the canton of Vaud, Switzerland, 6 miles from Yverdun. Height, 5,284 feet.

CHASTLETON, chas'-el-ton, a parish of Oxfordshire, 5 miles from Chipping Norton. Area, 1,640 acres. Pop. 300.—Here, in 1016, Canute defeated Edmund Ironside.

CHATAUQUE, cha-taw-ke(r), a county of New York, U.S., on Lake Erie. Area, 1,020 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, dividing the waters which flow into Lake Erie from those which roll towards the Gulf of Mexico. Pop. 51,000. There is a lake of the same name in its vicinity, 18 miles long, and connected with the river Alleghany by its outlet. It is navigable by steamboats.

CHÂTEAU, sha'-to, 'castle,' is a prefix to the names of many places in France, none of which are of great importance.

CHÂTEAUBRIANT, sha-to'-bre-a, a town of France, in the department of the Lower Loire, 36 miles from Nantes.

CHÂTEAUBRIAND, François Réné, Viscount de, a distinguished French writer, who was educated for the church, but who subsequently entered the army. After passing through some adventures, he, in 1791, went to America in search of the North-west passage, and had an interview with Washington in the United States. His wanderings through the primeval woods of that country have been described in his "Réné" and his "Atala." On his return to Europe, he joined the army of Condé, and, in 1793, was an exile in London, reduced to a state of great misery. He remained in England seven years, suffering great hardships, maintaining himself principally by teaching the French and Latin languages, and translating works for the booksellers. In 1797 his "Essay on Revolutions" appeared in London, and in the spring of 1800 he was enabled to return to Paris. He now published his "Atala" in the columns of the Mercury newspaper, and this was followed by his "Genius of Christianity," which was so fortunate as to attract the attention of the First Consul. The favours of Napoleon, however, were in a measure rejected; and although Châteaubriand continued to write, he produced little worth noting until the fall of the empire, when he published his celebrated pamphlet "De Bonaparte et des Bourbons," which Louis XVIII. declared was equal to an army of 100,000 men in paving the way for the return of his dynasty to the throne. He now became a favourite at the Tuileries. After serving in several ministerial capacities, he resigned titles and all he possessed, with the fall of the monarchy of 1830, and sank into a despondency, which deepened with his years. B. at St. Malo, 1768; D. 1848.

CHÂTEAUDUN, sha'-to-de(r), an ancient town of France, near the Loire, 25 miles from Chartres. This place has a castle, a commercial college, and a public library. Manf. Blankets are the principal. Pop. 7,000. This place was entirely burnt down in 1723, but was speedily rebuilt.

CHÂTEAU GONTHIER, gon'-te-ai, a well-built town of France, on the Mayenne, which is here crossed by a bridge, 18 miles from Laval. Manf. Woollen and linen fabrics, and there are bleaching-grounds. Pop. 7,000.

CHÂTEAUGUAY, sha'-to-gai, a river of N. America, which rises in the state of New York and falls into the St. Lawrence, at Lake St. Louis.

CHÂTEAU LANDON, lan'-dawng, a town of France, in the department of the Seine and Marne, 15 miles from Fontainebleau. Manf. Whiting, and it has a trade in wine and grain. Pop. 2,500.—In the 12th century this place was the occasional residence of the French kings. Coins, bearing the names of several of these sovereigns, were struck here.

CHÂTEAUNEUF, sha'-to-ne(r)f, the name of numerous parishes, towns, and villages of France, none of them with a population above 4,000.

CHÂTEAUROUX, sha'-to-roo', a town of France, on the Indre, and in the department of the same name. Since 1820, this place has been greatly improved, and has a society of arts, sciences, and agriculture. Manf. Woollens, hosiery, paper, and parchment. Pop. about 14,000.

CHÂTEAU-THIERRY, te'-air-re, a town in the department of Aisne, 38 miles from Laon. It is built on the slope of a hill, capped by the ruins of a castle, said to have been erected by Charles Martel in 730. Pop. about 4,000.—In 1814 this place was the scene of several conflicts between the allied army and the French troops. It has a handsome statue to the memory of La Fontaine, who was born here, in 1621.

CHATHAM, chăt'-ham, a town and parish of England, in the county of Kent, adjoining the city of Rochester, of which it is considered a suburb, and situate on the river Medway, 30 miles from London. Here is a fine naval and military arsenal, disposed in vast magazines and warehouses, which contain every kind of stores, and where all the operations necessary for the most extensive naval architecture are carried on. These cover a space of ground a mile in length. There is an hospital, founded by Sir John Hawkins in 1592, for decayed seamen and their widows. In 1588, a fund was instituted by Queen Elizabeth, called the Chatham Chest, for the relief of the sufferers in the Spanish armada. It was removed to Greenwich in 1802. Chatham is defended by forts on the heights, by which it is partly surrounded. The church contains some elegant marble monuments; and there is a chapel of ease, of Norman architecture, supposed to have been part of an hospital for lepers. The Dock chapel is a neat, elegant, and extremely light building, erected for the accommodation of the officers, artificers, and their families. Fort Pitt, a strong fortress, contiguous to the New Road, was erected in 1803, and has been used as a military hospital. Here are also very extensive fortifications, called the Lines, which are defended by ramparts, palisadoes, and a broad deep ditch, with infantry, marine, engineer, and artillery barracks. In the river, opposite the town, hulks are moored for convicts, who labour in the yard. Pop. of parish, 22,400; of borough 28,424.—To the elder Pitt, Chatham gave the title of earl. In 1667 the Dutch, under De Ruyter, sailed up the Medway, and succeeded in burning many of the vessels and stores at this place. It is a station on the North Kent Railway.

CHATHAM, Earl of. (See PITT.)

CHATHAM ISLANDS, two groups in the N. and S. Pacific Ocean.—1. In the North, lat. 9° N.; lon. 179° 50′ E.—2. In the South, nearly 400 miles from New Zealand. They consist of a large island, about 90 miles in circumference, and several smaller ones, but are not largely productive. Lat. 43° 48′ S. Lon. 176° 58′ W.

CHATHAM, the name of several places in America. —1. A central county in North Carolina. Area, 858 square miles. Pop. 20,000, of whom a fourth are slaves.—2. In the eastern district of Georgia, on the seacoast. Pop. 24,000, of whom two thirds are slaves.—3. A post-township of Barnstable county, Massachusetts, on the south point of the elbow of Cape Cod, 20 miles from Barnstable. Pop. 3,000.—4. A township of Middlesex county, Connecticut, on the east side of Connecticut river, opposite Middletown. Pop. 2,000.—Shipbuilding has long been an important business in this town, and several vessels of war for the United States service have been built here.—5. A post-township of Chesterfield district, South Carolina, on the west side of Great Pedee river, 101 miles from Columbia. It is well situate for trade, the river being navigable to this place.—6. A post-township of Columbia county, New York, and 21 miles from Albany. Pop. 3,381.—7. A post-township of Morris county, New Jersey, on the Passaic, 13 miles from Elizabethtown. Pop. 2,500.

CHATILLON, sha'-teel-lone, a town of Piedmont, 10 miles from Aosta. Pop. nearly 3,000.

CHÂTILLON LES DOMBES, sha-tee'-yawng, a town of France, department of the Ain, 16 miles from Trevoux. Pop. 2,300.—2. SUR INDRE, a town of France, on the Indre, 28 miles from Châteauroux. Pop. 2,500.—3. SUR LOIN, a town of France, department of the Loiret, 13 miles from Montargis. Pop. 2,700.—4. SUR LOIRE, a town of France, 44 miles from Orleans.—5. SUR SAÔNE, a town of France, in the department of the Vosges, 10 miles from Lamarche. Pop. 2,000.—6. SUR SEINE, a town of France, in Burgundy, divided by the Seine into two parts, 45 miles from Dijon. Pop. 5,000.—The name also of various other small towns of France.

CHATLEY, chăt'-le, a hamlet of England, in the county of Essex. Pop. 634.

CHAT-MOSS, chăt'-moss, a morass of England, 10 miles from Manchester. Area, 6,000 acres.—A considerable portion of this bog has been drained and cultivated so as to produce good crops. The Liverpool and Manchester Railway crosses it, and here George Stephenson, the civil engineer, met with immense difficulties in laying the line, in consequence of its boggy nature, swallowing up, as it did, waggon-loads of material before a bottom could be found.

CHATRE (LA), shatr, a town of France, in the department of Indre, 22 miles from Châteauroux. Manf. Leather and woollen goods. Pop. 5,000.

CHÂTILLON CASTLE, sha-tee'-yawng, an old structure, of great beauty and magnificence, belonging to the town of CHÂTILLON-SUR-SEINE, 43 miles from Dijon, and surrounded by a beautiful park, through which flows the Seine, in its course to the English Channel, where it disembogues itself by an estuary 7 miles wide. —In the town of Châtillon, in February, 1814, a conference was held between Napoleon and the allies who had invaded France, but which produced no result. (See CHAUMONT EN BASSIGNY.)

CHATTAHOOCHEE, chăt'-ta-hoo-chee', a river of the United States, rising in the Appalachian mountains, and, after a course of 400 miles, joining Flint river, 40 miles from Tallahassee. It is navigable to Columbus.

CHATTELLERAULT, or CHATELLERAUT, sha-tel'-ro, a town of France, in Poitou, on the Vienne, 20 miles from Poitiers. The river is here crossed by one of the most handsome stone bridges in France, but the town is not well built. Manf. Cutlery, jewellery, hardware, and lace. There is a considerable trade carried on in wine, grain, brandy, clover, fruit, hemp, salt, iron, steel, staves, and millstones. Pop. 10,000.—The duchy of Chatellerault was given by Henry II. to James Hamilton, second earl of Arran, regent of Scotland, in 1548, as a sort of purchase of his consent to the projected union between his ward, the infant Queen Mary of Scotland, and Francis, the dauphin of France. It confers a ducal title on the house of Hamilton.

CHATTERPOOR, or CHUTTERPORE, chat-ter-poor', a town of Hindostan, 75 miles from Jhansi. Manf. Cutlery and paper. In the neighbourhood there are some iron-mines. Pop. Unascertained.—This town is the capital of a territory with an area of 1,240 square miles, and a population of 120,000.

CHATTERTON, Thomas, chăt'-ter-ton, the boy-poet, an extraordinary youth, whose father was the master of a charity-school, and the sexton at Redcliffe church,

THOMAS CHATTERTON.

Bristol. Thomas was educated in writing and arithmetic at Colston's charity-school; after which he was articled to an attorney, with whom he continued till he was 17. Soon after this he went to London, where, for some time, he earned a scanty subsistence by writing for periodical publications; but, being reduced to great distress, poisoned himself at his lodgings at Brook-street, Holborn, and was buried in the parish of St. Andrew, Holborn. B. at Bristol, 1752; poisoned himself, 1770.—In 1778 were published, in one volume 8vo, "Miscellanies in Prose and Verse, by Thomas Chatterton." What, however, has given celebrity to this youth, is the real or pretended discovery of poems, said to have been written in the 15th century, by Thomas Rowley, a priest of Bristol, and found in Redcliffe church, of which Chatterton's ancestors had been sextons nearly a century and a half. His father certainly removed a number of parchments from an old chest in that church, most of which were used in covering books. Young Chatterton, from the perusal of some of these, is supposed to have formed the design of a forgery. In 1763 appeared, in a Bristol newspaper, an article entitled "A Description of the Friars first passing over the Old Bridge; taken from an Ancient Manuscript." This attracted the notice of a Mr. Barrett, who was engaged in writing the history of Bristol (see BARRETT); and he obtained from Chatterton several pieces in prose and verse, purporting to be written by Thomas Rowley and Canynge, the founder of Redcliffe church. The year following, he began a correspondence with Horace Walpole, well known as an antiquary and connoisseur. This gentleman sent the papers to his friends Mason and Gray, who pronounced them forgeries. Chatterton had formed great expectations from the patronage of Mr. Walpole; but finding himself neglected, he wrote him a letter, which Walpole called "impertinent," and their intercourse ended. Rowley's poems were first collected by Mr. Tyrwhitt, in one vol. 8vo, and afterwards in one vol. 4to, by Dean Milles; but the former gentleman gave up the question of their genuineness. A sharp controversy was carried on for some time on the point, between Mr. Warton, Mr. Bryant, Mr. Mathias, and others; but the poems are now generally considered as Chatterton's own productions.

CHATTOOGA, chăt-too'-ga, a county of Georgia, U.S. Area, 420 square miles. Desc. Fertile, yielding wheat, corn, and tobacco. Minerals. Iron, lead, marble, and limestone. Pop. 7,000.

CHAUCER, Geoffrey, chaw'-ser, the father of English poetry, was the son of a wealthy merchant, who gave him a liberal education. He was, for some time, at Cambridge, and afterwards studied at Oxford. Afterwards he improved himself by visiting foreign countries, and on his return, studied law in the Inner Temple, but soon quitted Themis for the court, becoming a yeoman to Edward III., who granted him a pension. In 1370 he was appointed his majesty's shieldbearer. In 1373, being sent to Genoa to hire ships for the king's service, he obtained, when he came back to England, a grant of a pitcher of wine a day, to be delivered by the butler of England, besides the comptrollership of the customs of London, for wool, &c. Prior to this, he had had a pension of twenty marks (say £240) a year conferred on him. In the succeeding reign, having embraced the doctrines of Wickliffe, he was obliged to go abroad to avoid the resentment of the clergy. He, however, returned privately, but was taken and committed to prison, whence he was not released till he had made his submission, and discovered the names of those who had associated with him in embracing the new doctrines. For having done this, he was afterwards filled with remorse, and, in his "Testament of Love," deplores the disgrace into which his conduct had brought him. In 1386 he was elected knight of the shire of Kent, and, in 1389, clerk of the works at Westminster, of Windsor, and other palaces. He was now easy in his circumstances, and composed those immortal works which, from the knowledge they display of human nature, seem to have been produced for all time. B. in London, 1328; D. 1400, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.—Chaucer married Philippa de Rouet, a lady of good family, by which means he became allied to John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, who was his great patron while he was, himself, in power. The poet left two sons, one of whom was speaker of the House of Commons and ambassador to France. Of Chaucer's poems, his "Canterbury Tales" are entitled to the first rank, although many of his other pieces possess great beauties and merit. There have been several editions of his works, and some of his poems have been modernized by Dryden, Pope, and others.

CHAUDIERE, sho'-de-air, a river of Lower Canada, British North America. It has its source in Lake Megantic, which is an enlargement of the Ottawa river, and, after a northerly course of 102 miles, falls into the St. Lawrence, 6 miles above Quebec.—The FALLS OF CHAUDIERE are 3 miles from the mouth of the river.

CHAUFFAILLES, sho'-fail, a town of France, in the department of Saône-et-Loire, 24 miles from Macon. Manf. Chiefly linen. Pop. 4,000.

CHAUMONT, sho'-mawng, a town and parish of France, in the department of the Loire-et-Cher, 10 miles from Blois. There is here situate, on a hill, a castle, which formerly belonged to Catharine de Medicis, and which was occupied, for some time, by Madame de Staël.

CHAUMONT EN BASSIGNY, bas-seen'-ye, a town of France, in the department of Haute-Marne, about 2 miles above the confluence of the river Marne with the Suize, and 145 from Paris. It is well built, with broad streets, and having, among its public buildings, a college, an hospital, hôtel-de-ville, and a kind of triumphal arch, begun under Napoleon I. and finished under Louis XVIII. Manf. Woollen hosiery, caps, gloves, cottons, wax tapers; and there are some cotton-spinning-mills, bleaching-grounds, and tanneries. Pop. 6,000.—Here, on March 1, 1814, after the breaking up of the congress at Chatillon, the allied powers entered into an agreement against Napoleon I., which afterwards formed the basis of what was called the Holy Alliance.—Chaumont is the name of several other small towns in France.

CHAUNY, sho'-ne, a town of France, in the department of the Aisne. One half of the town stands on an island in the Oise, which is here navigable. Manf. Sacking, stockings, and chemicals. There are also some cotton-mills, and machines for polishing the plate-glass of St. Gobian. Pop. 6,300.

CHAUSSEY, sho'-se, a group of islands in the English Channel, opposite Granville, about 8 miles from the French coast. They furnish excellent granite, but otherwise are bare and unproductive.

CHAUVIGNY, sho-veen'-ye, a town of France, 12 miles from Poitiers. Manf. Druggets chiefly. Pop. 2,000.

CHAUX DE FOND (LA), sho, fuwng, a beautiful village of Switzerland, in the canton of Neufchatel, 10 miles from the town of that name. It is built at an elevation of upwards of 3,000 feet above the level of the sea, at the foot of a narrow defile of the Jura. Manf. Clocks and watches, of which it is one of the principal seats. Pop. 8,500.—CHAUX DU MILIEU, meel'-ye(r), a village, 10 miles from the above. Manf. Chains for the movements of watches.

CHAZZELLES, John Matthew, chaz-zel', a French mathematician, who assisted Cassini in drawing the meridian line, and in 1685 was made hydrographical professor at Marseilles. He subsequently paid a visit to Egypt, and measured the pyramids, when he discovered that the four sides of the largest answer to the cardinal points of the compass. He was elected a member of the Academy of Sciences in 1695. B. at Lyons, 1657; D. 1710.

CHAZY, shai'-ze, a township of New York, U.S. It stands on Lake Champlain, adjoining Plattsburg, 186 miles from Albany. Pop. 4,500.—Also a river of the same name, falling into Lake Champlain.

CHEADLE, chee'-del, a town of Staffordshire, 15 miles from Stafford. It is surrounded by coal-pits, and near it are extensive manufactories in brass, copper, and tin. Pop. 5,000.—Also a parish of Cheshire, 3 miles from Stockport. Manf. Principally cotton-spinning and weaving. Pop. 11,000. It is a station on the Manchester and Birmingham Railway.

CHEADLE BULKELEY, and CHEADLE MOSELEY, two townships in the same parish. Pop. of the former, 6,000; of the latter, 3,000. The former stands on the Macclesfield branch of the North-Western Railway.

CHEAT RIVER, cheet, a river of Virginia, U.S., which rises in Haystack Peak, and after a course of about 100 miles, joins West River, an affluent of the Ohio, within the state of Pennsylvania.

CHEBUCTO and CHEDABUCTO, che-buk'-to, two bays on the coast of Nova Scotia; the first near Halifax, the second opposite Cape Breton.

CHEDDAR, ched'-dar, a village and parish of Somerset, 2 miles from Axbridge. Pop. 2,300.—In this parish the celebrated Cheddar cheese is produced.

CHEDORLAOMER, ked'-er-lai-o'-mer, 'as a generation of servitude,' a king of Elam, or ancient Persia.

CHEDUBA, ched'-u-ba, an island of further India, in the Bay of Bengal. Ext. 20 miles long, and 10 broad. Area, 250 square miles. Desc. Diversified with hills and dales, and attaining, in the south, an elevation of 1,450 feet above the level of the sea. Pro. Cotton, sugar, hemp, and tobacco. Pop. about 10,000. Lat. 18° 52′ N. Lon. 93° 31′ E.—This island was, in 1824, taken from the Burmese by the British.

CHEKE, John, cheek, a learned Englishman, who, in 1544, became tutor to Prince Edward, at whose accession he was rewarded with a pension and a grant of lands. He was also made provost of King's College, Cambridge, and received the honour of knighthood. Subsequently he was much persecuted on account of his Protestant principles, and died of grief in 1557. B. at Cambridge, 1514.—He wrote a number of learned works, and successfully laboured to reform the mode of pronouncing the Greek language.

CHE-KIANG, che'-ki-ang, a maritime province of China, bounded on the E. by the Pacific Ocean, and on the other sides by the Kiang provinces Ngan-hoei and Fo-kien. Desc. Irregular in its surface, but one of the most fertile and commercial portions of the empire. Pro. Cotton, silk, indigo, tea, fruits, camphor, and coal. Manf. Paper, gold and silver stuffs, silk, and crape. Pop. 26,500,000. Lat. between 28° and 31° N. Lon. between 118° and 121° E.—This province comprises the Chusan Islands, and is subdivided into eleven departments.

CHELMER, chel'-mer, a river of Essex, rising near Thaxted, and, after a course of 30 miles, joining the Blackwater at Maldon.

CHELMSFORD, chelms'-ford, the principal town of the county of Essex, at the confluence of the Chelmer and Cann, which are here crossed by a fine bridge of one arch, 20 miles from London. It consists of four main streets. At the west end of the church there is a square tower of flint, with a neat spire. The public buildings are a shire-hall, a theatre, an assembly-room, a corn exchange, and a house of correction. The town is the seat of assizes and local courts. Pop. about 8,000.

CHELMSFORD, a township of Middlesex county, Massachusetts, U.S., 26 miles from Boston. Pop. 2,300. — Middlesex Canal opens into the Merrimac river at this place. It has, in its neighbourhood, extensive quarries of fine granite.

CHELSEA, chel'-se, a parish of Middlesex, on the Thames, forming a populous suburb of London, 4½ miles from St. Paul's. Here is Chelsea Hospital, the national asylum for decayed and maimed soldiers, the noblest building, and one of the best foundations of the kind in Europe. This structure, designed by Sir Christopher Wren, was founded by Charles II. in 1682, proceeded with by James II., by William and Mary, and completed in 1692, at a cost of £150,000. Its principal part is a large quadrangle, open on the south side, having in the centre a bronze statue of the founder, Charles II., in Roman attire. The whole length, from east to west, is 790 feet. Attached to it is an inclosure of about 13 acres, besides extensive gardens. The whole extent of the premises is about 50 acres. It supports about 550 in-pensioners and about 80,000 out-pensioners, at an annual expenditure of nearly £1,500,000. Connected with the hospital is a royal military asylum, founded in 1801, by the duke of York, for the education and maintenance of soldiers' children. The botanical garden here, belonging to the company of Apothecaries, is enriched with a great variety of plants. It was a present to the company, made, in 1721, by Sir Hans Sloane, who was lord of the manor, and to whom there is a monument in the old church, as there is also to Sir Thomas More. It has waterworks for supplying London, and the Cadogan chain-pier here crosses the Thames. There are also extensive floor-cloth manufactories. Pop. 57,000.—Here, in former times, was the much-celebrated place of amusement called Ranelagh; and here, now, is Cremorne, also a place of amusement, with large gardens, much resorted to in the summer season.

CHELSEA, a township of Suffolk county, Massachusetts, U.S., 3 miles from Boston. There is a ferry from Boston across the harbour to this place, and it is also connected with Charlestown by a bridge. Pop. 7,000.—Also a post-township of Orange county, Vermont, 37 miles from Windsor. Pop. 2,000.

CHELTENHAM, chel'-ten-ham, a fashionable town and parish of the county of Gloucester, on the Chelt, 90 miles from London. It is noted for its medicinal springs, which are chiefly composed of sulphates of soda and magnesia, iron and iodine, held in solution by carbonic acid. Its public buildings are a church, a venerable structure; baths of every description, libraries and saloops, attached to the Montpellier well; a general hospital, a female orphan asylum, founded by Queen Charlotte in 1806; a mechanics' and Literary and Philosophical Institution, a theatre, an assembly-room, and concert-rooms. There is also a zoological garden. Pop. about 35,000.

CHEMARIMS, kem'-a-rims, 'the black ones,' idols of Chemar, or the moon.

CHEMILLÉ, she-me'-yai, a town of France, in the department of Maine-et-Loire, 20 miles from Angers. Manf. Handkerchiefs and linen cloths. It has a considerable trade in cattle. Pop. 5,000.

CHEMING, che'-ming, a county in the south part of New York, U.S. Area, 530 square miles. Pop. 30,000. —There is a town of the same name in the same county, 10 miles from Elmira. It stands on the New York and Erie Railway, which is connected with Seneca Lake by a canal. Pop. 3,000.

CHEMNITZ, or KEMNITZ, kem'-nitz, an old but well-built town of Saxony, on the river of the same name, 36 miles from Dresden. It contains several churches, an hospital, and an academy. Manf. Linens, stockings, mitts, and machinery. Near it are extensive bleaching-fields. Pop. about 30,000.—This is the birthplace of Puffendorf.

CHEMOSH, ke'-mosh, a 'conqueror,' or 'subduer,' an idol deity of the Moabites, in whose worship the most revolting abominations were practised.

CHENANGO, che-nan'-go, a county of New York, U.S. Area, 792 square miles. Desc. Fertile, diversified with hill and dale, and watered by a river of the same name. Pop. 41,000.

CHENANGO, the capital of Broome county, New York, U.S., on the E. branch of the Susquehannah, 109 miles from Albany. It contains the village of Binghamton, in which are the county buildings. Pop. 9,000.—A river of New York, U.S., which, after a course of about 90 miles, falls into the Susquehannah, 18 miles from Owego.

CHENAUB, che-nawb', a river of the Punjab, estimated at 760 miles long. It is increased in its course by several tributaries, and finally joins the Ghara in lat. 29° 21′ N.; lon. 71° 4′ E.

CHEOPS, or CHEOSPES, ke'-ops, a king of Egypt, after Rhampsinitus, who built the famous pyramids, upon which 1,000 talents (£362,520) were expended in supplying the workmen with leeks, parsley, garlic, and other vegetables. According to some authorities, he flourished in the 12th century B.C., but monuments lately discovered would seem to place his period before even that of Abraham.

CHEPHREN, kef'-ren, a brother of Cheops, who also built a pyramid. The Egyptians so inveterately hated these two royal brothers, that they publicly reported that the pyramids which they had built had been erected by a shepherd.

CHEPSTOW, chep'-sto, a well-built market-town and seaport of Monmouthshire, standing on the Wye, 15 miles from Bristol. It is built on a slope, where there is a bridge over the Wye, and has a castle, which was erected soon after the Norman conquest, and of which there are still extensive remains. The public buildings are a church, a theatre, and a union workhouse. Chepstow exports a considerable quantity of timber, bark, iron, and cider. Its imports are wine from Oporto, and planks, hemp, flax, pitch, and tar from the Baltic. Pop. 4,500.—In the castle of this place, Henry Martyn, one of the judges of Charles I., died, after being confined in it thirty years. The scenery in the neighbourhood is very picturesque, and the ride from Chepstow to Monmouth has been described as surpassingly beautiful.

CHER, shair, a river of France, which rises in the department Creuse, and, after a course of 195 miles, joins the Loire immediately below Tours. For the last 50 miles it is navigable.

CHER, a central department of France, inclosed by the departments Allier, Loiret, Nièvre, Loir-et-Cher, and Indre. Area, 2,853 square miles. Desc. Fertile, level, and well wooded. Pro. Wine and corn; sheep are numerous, and the trade generally consists of country produce. Minerals. Iron and coal. Manf. Principally woollens. Pop. 310,000. Lat. between 46° 25′ and 47° 39′ N. Lon. between 1° 55′ and 3° 10′ E.

CHERAC, shair'-ak, a town of France, department of the Lower Charente. Pop. 2,900.

CHERASCO, she-ras'-ko, a fortified town of Piedmont, at the conflux of the Tanaro and Stura, 30 miles from Turin. It is well built, and contains several churches within and without its walls. Its trade is mostly carried on in wine and silk. Pop. 10,000.—In April, 1796, this place was taken by the French, and in the same month, the Sardinian commissioners concluded with Napoleon I. the "Armistice of Cherasco," which gave to the French troops a free passage through the dominions of Sardinia.

CHERBOURG, or CHERBURG, sher'-boorg, an important seaport of France, in the department of La Manche. It is situate on the north coast, at the bottom of a large bay, formed by Capes La Hague and Levi, and stands in the hollow of the valley of the Divette, which opens out to the sea under the hill of Roule. Cherbourg has long been considered one of the principal stations of the French marine, and its improvement has, from time to time, occupied the attention of government for no less than a century and a half, it having been commenced in the reign of Louis XVI. In 1859, its building space exceeded any one of the building dock-yards of Great Britain, it having then eleven building-slips, all available, and within a certain concentric distance. Besides these, it had seven docks for equipment and repairs, whilst its capacity of harbourage, according to some English authorities, was capable of accommodating, in its three basins, 60 sail of the line. This, however, is an over-estimate, as the French themselves only admit of 38. Its roadstead is well defended by large ports and batteries, and is protected by a digue, or breakwater, 4,120 yards in length. In the centre of this breakwater there are both a fort and a lighthouse, and also lighthouses at each entrance to the roadstead. The town mostly consists of narrow and dirty streets, notwithstanding that it has a number of public fountains. Its principal edifices are the arsenals, civil and marine hospitals, churches, a prison, baths, barracks, and the buildings connected with the dock-yards. Manf. Sugar and soda refineries and tanneries. An active trade in cattle, eggs, provisions generally, and wine, is carried on. Pop. about 30,000. Lat. of Fort Royal, 49° 40′ 3″ N. Lon. 1° 35′ W.—Edward III. of England unsuccessfully laid siege to Cherbourg in 1346, but in 1418 it was given up to the British. The French regained it in 1450, but the English again took it in 1758. In August, 1858, a grand naval fête was held here to inaugurate the completion of the works. At it were present Queen Victoria and her court, by the invitation of the emperor Louis Napoleon.

CHERETHITES, ker'-e-thites, 'who cut or tear away,' a title of the Philistines, some of whom were the life-guards of David.

CHERIBON, or SHERIBON, sher-i-bon', a town on the south coast of the island of Java, 125 miles from Batavia. It is the capital of a residency of the same name, and is situate at the end of a deep bay, now nearly deserted. It has a trade in teak-wood, coffee, and indigo; and is the residence of a Dutch governor. Pop. of town, 12,000; of the residency, 550,000.

In Texas. Area, 740 square miles. Pop. 7,000, of whom a fourth are slaves.—There are some small towns and villages of the same name in the United States.

CHEROKEES, an Indian tribe in the northern parts of Georgia, formerly of great note, but now on the decline. They are the most enlightened of all the Indian tribes, and are generally occupied with agricultural pursuits. Their numbers, in 1859, were about 25,000.

CHERONEA, ker-o-ne'-a, a ruined city of Bœotia, Greece, 5 miles from Lebadea, noted for the defeat of the Athenians by Philip, in 338 B.C., and for that of Mithridates by Sylla, 86 B.C.—It is the birthplace of Plutarch.

CHERRYVALLEY, cher'-re-văl'-le, a township of Otsego county, New York, U.S., 33 miles from Albany. It contains an academy, and many handsome houses. Pop. 4,500.

CHERSO, kair'-so, an island, a dependency of the Trieste government, situate in the Adriatic, between the coasts of Dalmatia and Istria. Area, 105 square miles. Desc. Irregular, rugged, and stony. Pop. 15,000. Its capital is of the same name, and stands on the W. coast. Pop. 4,000.

CHERSON, or KHERSON, ker'-son, a fortified town of European Russia, the capital of the government of the same name, on the Dnieper, about 90 miles from Odessa. It was founded in 1778, and was intended to be a great seaport on the Black Sea; but from the difficulty of navigating the Dnieper, and the unhealthiness of the climate, it gradually fell into decline, and was completely eclipsed as a commercial station by Odessa. It has still, however, extensive dockyards and an arsenal. Pop. 30,000. Here the philanthropic Howard died, January 20, 1790.—The government of Cherson has an area of 28,305 square miles, with an undulating surface, interspersed with vast steppes and forests. In its W. part it is fertile, and there sheep-rearing is pursued to a large extent. Its other products are, tobacco, mustard, liquorice, saffron, salt, flax, hemp, nitre, and corn. Manf. Cloth, leather, cheese, butter, caviare, and tallow. Pop. exclusive of Odessa, 767,000. Lat. between 46° and 49° N. Lon. between 29° and 34° E.—There are, in this government, a great number of foreign colonists, chiefly German, and also a great many gipsies.

CHERSONESUS, ker'-so-ne'-sus, a Greek word, rendered by the Latins 'Peninsula.' There were many of these among the ancients, of which the most celebrated are the Peloponnesus; the Thracian, at the south of Thrace and west of the Hellespont, where Miltiades led a colony of Athenians; the Taurica, now the Crimea, situate near the Palus Mœotis; the fourth called Cimbrica, now Jutland, in the northern parts of Germany; and the fifth, surnamed Aurea, now Malacca, in India, beyond the Ganges.

CHERTA, chair'-ta, a town of Spain, in the province of Tarragona, and 40 miles from the town of the same name. Pop. 2,500.

CHERTSEY, chert'-se, a town and parish of Surrey, near the Thames, which is here crossed by a bridge of seven arches, 19 miles from London. Pop. 6,000.—The abbey of this place is said to have been founded in the year 604. Cowley, the poet, died here, 1667.

CHERUBINI, Maria-Luigi-Carlo-Zenobi-Salvador, kair-oo-be'-ne, an Italian musician, distinguished as a composer of masses, psalms, motets, and operas. He had also a European fame as an instrumental composer, and rose to the highest honours in his profession. Among his celebrated operas are "La Finta Principessa" and "Giulio Sabino," which he composed in London; "Lodoiska," "Elisa," "Medée," "Les Deux Journées," "Anacreon," "L'Hôtellerie Portuguaise," "Ali Baba," and "Faniska," which last he brought out at the imperial theatre in Vienna. The others were composed in Paris, where he was held in high estimation, and became composer to the Chapelle du Roi, professor of composition at the Ecole Royale, a member of the Académie Royale des Beaux Arts, and a chevalier of the Légion d'Honneur. B. at Florence, 1760; D. at Paris, 1842.

CHESAPEAKE, ches'-a-peek, the largest bay of the United States. It divides the state of Maryland into two parts; and the Susquehannah, Patapsco, Potomac, Rappahannock, and York, all large and navigable streams, fall into it. Ext. 200 miles long, and from 8 to 20 broad.

CHESED, ke'-sed, 'as a destroyer,' or 'as a breast,' a nephew of Abraham.

CHESHAM, chesh'-am, a town and parish of Buckinghamshire, 30 miles from London. Area of parish, 11,880 acres. Manf. Straw-plait and shoes, and there are some paper-mills. Pop. 6,200.

CHESHIRE, chesh'-eer, a maritime county of England, bounded N. by Lancashire, N.W. and W. by the counties of Flint and Denbigh, S.E. and E. by the counties of Derby, Stafford, Salop, and part of Flintshire. Ext. 58 miles in extreme length, by 30 in breadth. Area, 1,040 square miles. Desc. The surface is in general flat, with some considerable hills towards the east end, and a high ridge of sandstone crossing it from north to south. Rivers. The Mersey, Tame, Dee, Weaver, and Bollin. It is intersected by several navigable canals. Pro. Chiefly dairy produce, this being one of the principal grazing districts of England; Cheshire cheese being famous throughout the United Kingdom. The stock of cows is estimated at 100,000, and the annual manufacture of cheese is computed at 1,300 tons. Minerals. Copper, lead, cobalt, and coal; but the principal consists of inexhaustible strata of rock-salt. Manf. Silk, cotton, linen, ribbons, thread, buttons, and tanning leather, in various parts of the county. Pop. 456,000.—Cheshire was made a county-palatine by William the Conqueror, and remained such until an act of George IV. abolished its independent courts. It is connected by railway with all the principal parts of the kingdom, and is traversed by the Grand Trunk and Bridgewater canals.

CHESHIRE, a county in the S.W. part of New Hampshire, U.S. Area, 460 square miles. Desc. Fertile in the usual cerealia. Manf. Woollen and cotton, and there are flour and saw-mills, and iron and glass-works. Pop. 33,000.—It is connected by railway with several of the northern states.

CHESHIRE, a township of the United States, in Berkshire county, Massachusetts, 140 miles from Boston. Pop. 2,000.—2. A township of New Haven county, Connecticut, 25 miles from Hartford. Pop. 1,700. The Episcopal Academy of Connecticut is established here.

CHESHUNT, ches'-hunt, a town and parish of Hertfordshire, 14 miles from London. Area, 8,430 acres. Pop. nearly 6,000. It has a station on the Eastern Counties Railway.—Richard Cromwell, son of the great Protector, retired here after his abdication, and died, 1712.

CHESNEY, Francis Rawdon, ches'-ne, an English major-general, and distinguished explorer in the East. In 1830 he examined the route across the desert from Cairo to Suez; and, in the same year, accomplished a journey in Syria and Palestine, crossing the Syrian desert, and descending the Euphrates on a raft, supported by inflated skins, to the Persian Gulf. In 1836 he received the command of an expedition to examine the route from the Mediterranean to the Euphrates, and the course of that river to the Persian Gulf. Amid great difficulties he accomplished his task, and in December, 1836, took a mail across the Arabian desert, from the Persian Gulf to Beirout, on the Mediterranean, without being accompanied by a single European. In 1846 he was made a lieutenant-colonel, and in 1850 published an account of his survey of the Euphrates, &c. In 1851 he became colonel, and in the following year published a work on "Firearms." In 1854 appeared his "Russo-Turkish Campaigns of 1828 and 1829." B. in Ireland, 1789.

CHESTER, ches'-ter, an episcopal city, the capital of Cheshire, 18 miles from the sea, on the Dee, which is navigable here, and crossed by two bridges, 16 miles from Liverpool. It is surrounded by walls, which form a favourite promenade of the citizens. Four principal streets, with piazzas called the "Rows," lead from four gates, all terminating, as it were, in a centre at the Cross. Its cathedral was founded by Henry VIII., and has a tower, springing from four beautiful pillars, 127 feet high. The construction of the whole building exhibits many subjects interesting to the architect and antiquary. There are several parish churches, and the Unitarians, Quakers, Baptists, and Methodists have meeting-houses. There are also several almshouses and endowments for charitable purposes. The remains of the old castle have been taken down, and a new structure erected in its stead. Opposite to this is the Shire-hall, a fine edifice. Here, also, is the county gaol, built on an improved plan, with apartments for classing the criminals. At the north-east end of the castle-yard are barracks; and on the south-west side is an arsenal for 30,000 stand of arms. This castle is a royal fortress. The other public buildings are the Exchange, the Union-hall, appropriated for Manchester and Yorkshire goods; the Linen-hall, the Theatre, the Infirmary, the County Lunatic Asylum, and Mechanics' Institute. Shipbuilding is carried on to a considerable extent, and cheese, cast-iron, coal, and copper-plates are exported. The imports are wines and other produce. Pop. 28,000.—Chester is a very ancient place, and its walls appear to have been erected by the Romans. The tombs of Mathew Henry, the commentator on the Bible, and the poet Parnell, are in Trinity Church. The city gives the title of earl to the Prince of Wales; and Eaton Hall, the seat of the marquis of Westminster, is in its neighbourhood. It is a station on the Crewe and Birkenhead Railway. Races, which are in high repute amongst the lovers of that sport, are held here in the spring of every year.

CHESTER, the name of several places in the United States. 1. A county in Pennsylvania. Area, 792 square miles. Desc. Fertile and highly cultivated. Minerals. Marble, lead, copper, and silver. Pop. about 70,000. —2. A district of South Carolina, bordering on North Carolina. Area, 560 square miles. Pop. 11,000, of whom a third are slaves.

CHESTERFIELD, Philip Dormer Stanhope, fourth earl of, was, in his day, considered a man of the finest wit, and a model of bon ton. In early life, he was treated almost with indifference by his father, and, at the age of eighteen, entered Trinity College, Cambridge, where he pursued his classical studies with great assiduity. In 1714 he left the university, and set out upon the grand tour of Europe, during which he contracted many of the then fashionable continental vices, which may have had the effect of afterwards giving that loose tone of morality which pervades his celebrated "Letters to his Son." On his return he was made a gentleman of the bedchamber to the prince of Wales, afterwards George II., and was returned member of parliament for St. Germains, in Cornwall. In 1726, the death of his father removed him to the House of Lords, where he was considered one of the most effective debaters of his time. On the accession of George II., whom he had long faithfully served, he expected to reap considerable advantages; but in this he was disappointed, as that sovereign allowed himself to be swayed by the counsel of his queen rather than by the advice of his mistress, afterwards Lady Suffolk, to whom Chesterfield, as an expectant, had devoted much of his attention. In 1728 he became ambassador to Holland, and being successful in averting a war with Hanover, George II. made him high steward of the household and a knight of the Garter. In 1732 he obtained his recall from Holland, and took an active part against Sir Robert Walpole, who was then at the head of the affairs of the country. On the resignation of that minister, in 1742, Chesterfield was excluded from the new government, as the king held him in the light of a personal enemy; but he received the appointment of lord-lieutenant of Ireland. In this post he greatly distinguished himself, reducing Ireland to a state of tranquillity, such as it had not hitherto enjoyed. His meritorious services had now greatly allayed the prejudices of the king, who recalled him in 1746, and had him appointed secretary of state. His health, never very strong, was now on the decline, and in 1748, much to the regret of the king, he resigned his office. On this occasion, his sovereign offered to confer the dignity of a duke upon him, but the earl declined the honour. B. in London, 1694; D. 1773.—Chesterfield still enjoys a certain literary reputation, as much, perhaps, from his being the associate of literary men, as from any productions of his own. He was, at different times of his life, the friend of Addison, Arbuthnot, Pope, Swift, Gay, Voltaire, and Montesquieu. His conduct towards Samuel Johnson is as well known as the remarkable manner in which the great doctor resented it. The villa of Pope, at Twickenham, was the place where he and those others who had hoped to rise through Mrs. Howard, the favourite of George II., were wont to assemble, for the purpose of regaling her with the incense of their flattery. (See JOHNSON, Dr.)

CHESTERFIELD INLET, a bay on the W. side of Hudson's Bay, U.S. Ext. 250 miles long, and from 15 to 25 wide. Lat. 63° 30′ N. Lon. of its mouth, 90° 40′ W.

CHICHELE, or CHICHLEY, Henry, chich'-le, archbishop of Canterbury, was, in 1407, sent ambassador to the pope, who gave him the bishopric of St. David's. In 1414 he was raised to the see of Canterbury, and in that high position obtained many privileges for the clergy, resisting at the same time papal encroachments. B. at Higham Ferrers, 1362; D. 1443.—He was a liberal encourager of learning, and was the founder of All-Souls College, Oxford. He also built, at his own expense, the western tower of Canterbury Cathedral.

CHICHESTER, chich'-es-ter, a city and county of itself, and the capital of the county of Sussex, 29 miles from Brighton. It is surrounded by walls, which are formed into promenades and shaded with elms. It consists of four wide and well-paved streets, built in the form of a cross, and kept remarkably clean. The cathedral is an elegant Gothic structure, 410 feet long, with a central tower, and a steeple 297 feet high. The other public buildings are the bishop's palace, Guildhall, Custom-house, workhouse, several schools, theatre, market-house, and market-cross. It is a see which, with the exception of twenty-two parishes, is co-extensive with the county of Sussex. Pop. about 9,000.—Chichester was originally a Roman station. In 491 it was partially demolished by the S. Saxons under Ella, but rebuilt by his son Cissa, from whom it takes its name.—CHICHESTER HARBOUR is 2 miles from the city, and is nothing more than an inlet of the English Channel, containing Thorney Island.

CHICHESTER, a township of Rockingham county, New Hampshire, U.S., 10 miles from Concord. Pop. 1,000.

In the public square stand the church, the royal treasury, the town-house, and the richest shops. The principal church is most superb, its whole front being covered with statues, and the windows and doors being also ornamented with sculpture. The town is surrounded with mines of silver. Pop. 12,000. The STATE belongs to the Mexican confederation, and may be described as a lofty table-land, generally unproductive of crops, but abounding in rich mines of gold and silver. The soil is highly impregnated with nitre and other salts. Area, estimated at 107,500 square miles. Pop. about 200,000. Lat. between 27° and 32° N. Lon. between 104° and 108° W.

CHIKIRI, chi-ki'-ri, a river of China, rising in the Stanavoi mountains, near Siberia, and, after a course of nearly 500 miles, falling into the Amoor, above Saghalin Oola.

CHILCA, chil-ka, a seaport of Peru, on the Pacific, 40 miles from Lima. Near it are the remains of ancient Peruvian edifices.

CHILDEBERT, chil'-de-bair, the name of three kings of France, who reigned over that kingdom at various periods, from the middle of the 6th to the commencement of the 8th centuries.

CHILDERIC, chil'-de-rik, the name of three kings of France, who severally ascended the throne in 456, 670, and 742.

CHILI, or CHILE, chil'-e, an independent state of S. America, bounded W. by the Pacific Ocean, N. by the desert of Atacama, E. by the Argentine confederation, and S. by the land of Magellan. Ext. Estimated at 1,160 geographical miles long, with a varying breadth of from 90 to 200, as the great range of mountains called the Cordilleras, or the Andes, approach or recede from the sea. Divisions. It is naturally divided into three parts; the first comprehending the islands, which the republic claims, as far as Cape Horn, with the coast to the Straits of Magellan, and including a portion of Patagonia; the second, Chili properly so called; and the third, the Andes, or the country occupied by that range of mountains. Politically, it is divided into thirteen provinces, which are again subdivided into fifty-two departments. The provinces are Atacama, Aconcagua, Arauca, Coquimbo, Colchagua, Concepcion, Chiloe, Maule, Nuble, Santiago, Talca, Valdivia, and Valparaiso. Desc. As the country rises towards the Andes, the soil becomes remarkably fertile, and the fertility increases in proportion to its distance from the sea. Owing, however, to the great quantity of nitrous and sulphureous substances with which the country abounds, it is subject to volcanic eruptions; and there are many volcanoes in a state of constant activity, whilst others, at intervals, emit volumes of smoke. Earthquakes are common, but they are, in general, very slight. The great earthquakes happen but rarely, five only having occurred from the arrival of the Spaniards to the year 1782; comprising a period of 244 years. In 1822, however, one took place which laid Valparaiso, Casa Blanca, Quilleta, and Limachi in ruins. Its shock was felt at distances of 500 miles from its centre. In 1851 another occurred, which destroyed 200 houses in Valparaiso, and many of the principal buildings. Mountains. The great chain of the Andes runs along the E. limit of Chili, at an average height of from 13,000 to 14,000 feet above the level of the sea. Several mountain-passes traverse this chain, the most frequented being that of Aconcagua, which is 12,500 feet above the level of the sea. Another is Partillo, which is 14,000; besides several others of less note and various heights. Rivers. These have mostly their sources in the Andes, and many of them are nothing more than streams, which become dry in the summer season. The largest are the Maule, in the province of the same name; the Biobio, which is 200 miles long, and 2 wide at its mouth; the Calacalla; the Valdivia, in the country of Arauca; and the Sinfondo, which discharges itself into the archipelago of Chiloe. Lakes. None, properly so called, although collections of water, both salt and fresh, are common. Zoology. Chili is not quite so abundant in animals as the other countries of America. Among the beasts of prey, the puma is the most formidable; and the llama and guanacoe abound in the plains of the S. provinces. Almost all the European quadrupeds, such as horses, asses, cattle, sheep, goats, many kinds of dogs, cats, and even mice, have been brought hither by the Spaniards, and have multiplied exceedingly. Birds exist in great and beautiful variety, and those that inhabit the coast amount to many species. There are but few reptiles. On the coast are caught various kinds of excellent fish, consisting of many species, and some of them peculiar. Pro. In the north, vegetation is limited, on account of the dryness of the soil; but in the southern provinces, dense forests spread over the land, and cover the sides of the Andes with their abundant foliage. Flowers of the richest and loveliest hues everywhere delight the eye; whilst the laurel, the cypress, and the myrtle, attain to colossal dimensions. Hard woods also abound; but agriculture, in all its forms, is in a most backward state. "No one must imagine," says Mr. Miers, "that any of the modes of farming which have been carried to such perfection in Europe, have been adopted in Chili." On the contrary, everything is in the most pristine condition, the implements of husbandry being of the roughest and most primitive kind. In the northern districts, maize is grown, and in the southern, wheat and barley; hemp is also raised, and legumes are abundant. Vegetables are not much cultivated, but potatoes are grown in large quantities, also fruits of every description. Minerals. These are abundant; consisting of freestone, flint, rock crystal, and marble. The Chilian marbles are generally of an excellent quality, and take a fine polish. Of spars the species are infinite. The mountains contain precious stones, such as the agate and the jasper; and the rivers wash down rubies and sapphires. All the known kinds of semi-metals are met with in Chili, and are found either in mines by themselves, or combined with metallic ores, and generally in a state of mineralization. Lead is found mixed with gold or silver. There are also mines of tin, which are, however, neglected. The provinces of Coquimbo, Copiapo, and Aconcagua, are rich in iron, of the very best quality; and there are, besides, in the country, gold, silver, and copper mines. Almost all the copper in Chili contains a greater or less proportion of gold. Between the cities of Coquimbo and Copiapo, there were in work, at one time, more than a thousand mines, besides those in the province of Aconcagua. The silver-mines are found only in the highest and coldest parts of the Andes: the richest are in the provinces of Aconcagua, Coquimbo, and Copiapo. Manf. Earthenware, hempen cloths, leather, soap, copper wares, brandy, tallow, and charcoal. Exp. Silver, copper, hides, wool, and hemp. Imp. Cotton and woollen goods, hardware, iron, &c., principally from Great Britain; linens, from Germany; silks, paper, perfumery, leather, and brandy, from France; tea, sugar, nankeens, &c., from the East Indies and China; tobacco, oil, sugar, spermaceti, and manufactured goods, from the United States; dyes, coffee, pearls, cocoa, rice, cotton, salts, and spirits, from Peru and Central America. Gov. Republican, and esteemed the best-regulated in South America. Rel. Roman Catholic. Pop. 1,134,000. Lat. between 25° and 42° S. Lon. between 69° and 74° W.—In 1541, Baldivia, a Spanish leader, entered Chili without the least opposition: the inhabitants, however, took up arms in defence of their independence, and fought with such resolution, that the Spaniards were unable, for a long period, to subdue them. Continual hostilities took place, and submission was not made by the Chilians until 1773. In 1810 the struggle for independence commenced, and continued till 1818, when it was decided by the battle of Maypù, and the republic formed. In the beginning of 1859, a strong revolutionary party endeavoured to overthrow the government; but the force under General Vidaurre Leal, in a battle at Coquimbo, defeated the insurgents; which event, with other successes in the south, had the effect of checking, if not entirely suppressing, the revolutionary movement.

CHILI, or PE-CHE-LE, pe'-che-le, the most N. but least productive province of China. It owes its importance to its containing the capital, Pekin, and the great depôts of salt and rice for the internal supply of the empire. Pop. 28,000,000. Lat. between 35° and 41° 30′ N. Lon. between 114° and 120° E.—The gulf of the same name is an inlet of the Yellow Sea, with a length and width of 150 miles each. Lat. between 37° 10′ and 39° 20′ N. Lon. between 118° and 121° E.

CHILICITO, chil'-e-se'-to, a village of the Plata confederation, 45 miles from Rioja, the head-quarters of the mining district in the Famatina valley. Its height above the sea is estimated at 3,000 feet. Lat. 28° 50′ S. Lon. 68° 30′ W.

CHILICOTHE, chil'-e-koth, a township of the United States, and capital of Ross county, Ohio, on the west bank of the Scisto, 35 miles from Columbus. The streets are spacious, and cross each other at right angles. It contains a court-house, market-house, banks, gaol, houses of public worship, and an academy. In the town and vicinity are many valuable mills and manufactories. Pop. 8,000.—There are other places of the same name in Illinois and Missouri.

CHILION, kil-i-on, 'finished,' or 'perfect,' a Bethlehemite, who married Orpah.

CHILKA, chil'-ka, a salt and shallow lake of British India, with several islands, lying between the presidencies of Bengal and Madras. Ext. 42 miles long and 15 broad.

CHILKEEA, chil'-ke-a, a town of British India, in the Bengal presidency, 70 miles from Bareilly. It is one of the principal marts of the trade between Kumaon Tibet, and the British territory. Pop. Unascertained.

CHILLIANWALLAH, chil'-le-an-wal'-la, a village of the Punjab, 27 miles from Goojerat, and 5 miles from the left bank of the Jhelum. This place has obtained celebrity from a sanguinary battle which was fought here on January 13, 1849, between the British, under Lord Gough, and a large army of Sikhs. The greatest valour was displayed on both sides, and the loss of the two armies was terrible. Although the British remained in possession of the field, the victory was dearly purchased, and the annals of Indian warfare do not record a fiercer conflict. The news of this battle occasioned great dissatisfaction in England; and Sir Charles James Napier was immediately appointed to supersede Lord Gough. In the meanwhile, however, the battle of Goojerat had been fought, and the Sikh power broken.

CHILLINGWORTH, William, chil'-ling-wurth, an eminent English divine, who went to Douay for the purpose of embracing the Catholic faith; but the letters of Bishop Laud, his godfather, caused him, in 1631, to return to England and the Protestant communion. The Romanists, after this, attacked him with great severity, and he replied in a work entitled, "The Religion of Protestants a Safe Way to Salvation;" printed in 1638. The same year he was made prebendary of Salisbury, and afterwards master of Wigston's Hospital, in Leicestershire. In the civil war he adhered to the royal cause, and, in 1643, was at the siege of Gloucester as an engineer. In the same year he was taken prisoner in Arundel Castle, Sussex, and conveyed to Chichester, where he died at the bishop's palace in 1644. B. at Oxford, 1602.

CHILLON, Castle of, shil'-lawng, a fortress of Switzerland, in the canton Vaud, 6 miles from Vevay. It stands on an isolated rock at the east end of the Lake of Geneva, the waters of which are, according to Byron,

"A thousand feet in depth below."

It was built in 1238, by Amadeus IV. of Savoy, and was long used as a state prison. In 1859 it was occupied as an arsenal. By this castle Rousseau fixed the catastrophe of his Heloise; and in it, Bonnivard, Byron's Prisoner of Chillon, was confined for several years. (See BONNIVARD.)

CHILO, ki-lo, a Spartan philosopher, and one of the seven wise men of Greece. He died through excess of joy, in the arms of his son, who had obtained a victory at Olympia, 597 B.C.

CHILOE, chil'-o, an island on the W. coast of S. America., situate in a large gulf or bay at the S. extremity of Chili. With upwards of sixty smaller islands, it forms a province of the Chilian republic, and many of them have been peopled by the Spaniards or Indians. They are all adjacent to the main island of Chiloe, from which the archipelago takes its name. Ext. This island is about 120 miles in length, and 40 in breadth. Desc. Hilly, but not mountainous, and thickly-wooded, save in the few valleys among the hills, and along the shores, where partial cultivation is carried on. Pro. Wheat, barley, potatoes, and some fruits. Sheep, cattle, and swine are reared; but the inhabitants being naturally indolent, have recourse to fishing for a great portion of their subsistence. Pop. of province, 49,000. Lat. between 41° 40′ and 43° 20′ S. Lon. 74° W.—In 1558 this island was discovered by the Spaniards.

CHILPERIC I. and II., shil'-pe-rik, two kings of France, one of whom reigned from 561 to 584, and the other from 715 to 720.

CHILTERN HILLS, chil'-tern, a ridge of chalky hills, traversing the county of Bucks, between Tring in Herts, and Goring in Oxfordshire. Their principal summit is Wendover, which is about 900 feet above the level of the sea.—The office of "the Stewards of the Chiltern Hundreds" was established for the purpose of suppressing bands of depredators, who, in former times, infested the forests with which the sides of these hills were covered; and it has been retained to enable members of the House of Commons to resign their seats in that assembly by accepting this office under the Crown. Its duties are merely nominal, and the pay nil, it being retained for no other purpose, a member of Parliament being unable to relinquish his seat under any other condition. This is the only office of which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has the patronage.

CHILTON, chil'-ton, the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 4,000.

CHIMÆRA, kim'-e-ra, a celebrated monster, sprung from Echidna and Typhon. It had three heads, a lion's, goat's, and dragon's, and continually vomited flames. The fore part of its body was that of a lion, the middle a goat, and the hinder a dragon. Its usual abode was Lycia, and in the reign of Jobates, it was conquered by Bellerophon, mounted on the horse Pegasus. This fabulous tradition is explained by the account given of a burning mountain in Lycia, whose top was a desolate wilderness, the resort of lions; the middle, being fruitful, was frequented by goats; and, at the bottom, the marshy ground abounded with serpents. Bellerophon is said to have conquered the Chimæra, because he first made his habitation on that mountain. Plutarch says that by it is meant a pirate captain, who adorned his ship with the images of a lion, a goat, and a dragon. (See BELLEROPHON.)

CHIMAY, shé'-mai, a town of Belgium, in the province of Hainault, 32 miles from Mons. Manf. Beer and iron goods. There are some marble-quarries in its neighbourhood. Pop. 3,200.

CHIMBO, chim-bo, a town of South America, at the foot of the mountain of Chimborazo, 50 miles from Guayaquil.

CHIMBORAZO, chim'-bo-ra'-zo, the most elevated summit of the Andes, in Quito. Height, 21,440 feet. Lat. 1° 30′ S. Lon. 79° W.—In 1802, this mountain, to an elevation of 19,286 feet, was ascended by Humboldt, and in 1831 by Boussingault and Hall, to 19,695. (See AMERICA, SOUTH.)

CHIMHAM, kim-hum, 'as a trouble,' a son of Barzillai.

CHINA, chi'-na, an immense empire in the S.E. of Asia. The territories subject or tributary to its emperor are of vast extent, including Mantchooria, Mongolia, Tibet, and the whole of Central Asia between Hindostan on the S. and Asiatic Russia on the N. These countries will be noticed under their respective headings.—CHINA PROPER is bounded on the E. and S. by the Yellow Sea and the Sea of China; on the W. by the imperfectly-known tracts of Great Tibet and other dependencies, and on the N. by Mongolia and Mantchooria. Ext. Variously estimated at from 1,600 to 2,000 miles, with a breadth of from 900 to 1,300. Area, 1,300,000 square miles. Coast-line, about 2,500 miles. Political Divisions. For administrative purposes, China is divided into eighteen provinces,—Chili or Pechele, Shantung, Shansee, Honan, Kiangsoo, Nganhoei, Kiangsee, Chekiang, Fokien, Houpe, Hoonan, Shense, Kansoo, Sechuen, Quangtong, Quangsee, Koeichoo, and Yunnan. Desc. Until the treaty of Tien-Tsin, in 1858, the rigid exclusion of foreigners from this country was carried to such an extent, that there was hardly a possibility of gaining authentic information regarding much of its interior. A great portion of it, therefore, must still, to us, be regarded as a terra incognita. For general purposes, however, it may be sufficient to describe it as a level, fertile, and highly-cultivated region, varied by mountain-chains of considerable magnitude, though they seem to be only low r stages of those enormous masses which stretch across Central Asia. The principal chain is Yun-lin, which runs N. and S., throwing out numerous ramifications of greater or less proportions. The most important of these take an E. direction, and become the leading watersheds of the country, dividing it into three great basins, through which the accumulated waters roll in mighty rivers to the sea. Even the average height of these mountains is unascertained, but many of their summits are crowned with perpetual snow. Taking the largest rivers as an indication of the slope of the country, it inclines from W. to E., the mountains gradually decreasing towards the coast, and finally losing themselves in level tracts, the largest of which, called the Great Plain, covers an area of 210,000 square miles. In China proper there are no active volcanoes. Rivers. China is distinguished for the magnitude and extent of her rivers. The Hoangho, or Blue River, and the Yang-tse-kiang, or Yellow River, like two great arteries running parallel with each other, water the whole extent of its central regions. These have numerous tributaries, several of which equal the greatest rivers of Europe. Besides these, there are the Hong-kiang, which debouches at Canton, and the Eu-ho, having a N. course, and falling into the Gulf of Pechele. In its course it forms a portion of the line of the Imperial Canal. Lakes. Numerous, but many of them mere expansions of the rivers. The largest is the Tung-ting, in the province of Honan, which receives a vast number of small streams, and discharges itself into the Yang-tse-kiang. It is upwards of 200 miles in circumference The Poyang, in the province of Kiangsee, is the next in size, being 90 miles long and 20 broad. The scenery of this lake is described as extremely beautiful. All the lakes are well stored with fish. Climate. The climate of China varies between the extremes of heat and cold. The former prevails in the southern provinces, which experience a higher temperature than Bengal; while the vicinity of Pekin is colder than countries under the same latitude in Europe. In the south, typhoons, or hurricanes of wind, are frequent, devastating the island of Hainan, but not extending far to the north of Canton. Although they usually last twenty-four hours, and seldom longer than forty-eight, their effects are terrific. Zoology. The high cultivation of its land, and the density of its population, have long since nearly extirpated whatever wild animals may formerly have existed. The tiger is still found in the forests of Yunnan, and wild cats still prowl through the woods of the south. Bears are said to be occasionally seen, and camels and elephants are largely domesticated. The domestic dog is uniformly of one variety, and there are several species of rats. The deer family are now rare. Bats are numerous, and the feathered tribes abound, and some of them are extremely gorgeous in their plumage. Pheasants are particularly fine, and aquatic birds are plentiful. The reptilia comprise some species of serpents of large size, though not considered dangerous. A smaller species, called the pak-y-hak, is described as extremely venomous. Tortoises are common, and locusts prove sometimes destructive to the crops. In fish, no country is said to be so abundantly supplied. Pro. In China, agriculture takes the lead of every other pursuit; and the emperor himself encourages it, by repairing, at a stated period of the year, to a field, for the purpose of ploughing it. The great object is to bring every spot under cultivation; consequently, every expedient is resorted to for the achievement of this object. Canals are made, and the sides of lofty mountains are formed into terraces, to which the water is conveyed by buckets; or the rain is collected in reservoirs at the top, and allowed to run down by conduits. The chief object of agriculture, and the general food of the empire, is rice. In the more northerly provinces, this is supplied by wheat, barley, and other European grains. The next staple is the tea-plant, of which vast plantations are found in the provinces to the south of the Yang-tse-kiang. In the southern provinces, large tracts are covered with the white mulberry, for the production of silk; and for the use of the lower ranks, vast quantities of cotton are raised in the middle provinces, which do not, however, supersede an extensive importation from India. Tobacco, camphor, sugar-cane, rhubarb, ginseng, and a variety of leguminous plants, may be added to the list of Chinese agricultural products. Minerals. Copper, rock crystal, lapis lazuli, a small but fine species of ruby, quicksilver in the form of cinnebar, iron, tin, sulphur, and coal, both bituminous and anthracite: alum, nitre, gypsum, and kaolin, or porcelain earth, in inexhaustible beds. The possession of this last mineral, and the skill with which it has been worked by the Chinese, gave the name of China to the beautiful ware which, for a long period, monopolized the European markets. This country also abounds with salt; silver and gold have been found, but not in great quantities. Manf. Important. The principal are porcelain, which, in the whiteness, hardness, and transparency of its substance, and in the beauty of the colours laid upon it, surpasses any imitation that has been made of it; silks and satins; cottons, in the form of nankeen, which is dyed blue, black, and brown. In the art of carving, great excellence and ingenuity are shown, especially in the cutting of ivory into fans, baskets, &c.; cutting of tortoise-shell and mother-of-pearl; also in silver filigree and lacquered cabinets; and in the mode of ornamenting cabinet-wares and tea-chests; their paper, ink, and printing, may challenge comparison with those of any country in the world. COMMERCE. This has hitherto been mostly in the hands of the British. Exp. Tea, porcelain, raw and spun silk, sugar, rhubarb, embroidery, lacquered wares, and carved articles of domestic ornament. Imp. Cotton and woollen goods, opium, raw cotton, furs, and edible birds-nests, which form an expensive article of luxury, and are held in great esteem. Public Works. In these, China is remarkable. No nation can produce a parallel to the Great Canal, which, in actual length, is nearly 700 miles. Like the other Chinese canals, it is not constructed on the same artificial and scientific principles as those of Europe, nor composed, like them, of standing water, fed by reservoirs, elevated and lowered by locks. The want of locks obliges the Chinese to conduct the canal, by a winding line, round the different elevations which are encountered in its course. The fertility of the soil, resulting from the internal navigation supplied by this canal and its branches, renders the country through which it is cut, the most populous spot on the face of the globe. In different parts of the empire, also, there occur bridges remarkable for their magnitude, and for the difficulties overcome in their construction. The great roads are likewise magnificent works; but the most stupendous of all the public undertakings of China, is that known by the name of the Great Wall. This mighty rampart has been drawn along the whole northern, and part of the western frontier, over a vast chain of mountains, the sinuosities of which it follows throughout a course of about 1,400 miles. On the plain it is 30 feet high; but when carried over rocks, 15 or 20 feet are found a sufficient height. The thickness of the whole wall at the base is 25 feet, diminishing to 20 and 15 at the platform. It is defended by towers, placed at given distances, 40 feet square at the base, and nearly the same in height. This immense work was built about 200 years before the Christian era, as a defence against the wandering tribes of Tartars who have inhabited the wild country beyond it from time immemorial. It is constructed of earth or rubbish, cased on each side by stone or brick-work. Inhabitants. The Chinese, in their physiognomy and general appearance, exhibit unequivocal proofs of Mongol origin, along with some features peculiar to themselves. The face is square and flat, the nose small, but broad at the root, the eye elongated and oblique, and the colour a pale yellow. Their long black hair is plaited into a tail, reaching from the crown of the head to the waist, and sometimes to the calf of the leg, the rest of the scalp being closely shaven. The people in general are well clothed, the higher ranks in silks and satins, the lower in cotton

Some of the boatmen, however, who ply on the shores of the Yellow Sea, are destitute even of such clothing as decency requires. They are extremely dirty in their persons, and seem to have a rooted aversion to cold water, either for drinking or ablution. Manners and Customs. The national character seems to partake of a large share of that kind of watchful jealousy which might be supposed to be cherished under the eye of a constant, though not a violent despotism. Every indication of energetic or vehement action is studiously discouraged; and the whole system of life seems reduced to an endless routine of parade and ceremony, legally regulated to its minutest points, by the application of the bamboo rod. To speak but seldom, and only on great occasions, is considered highly becoming; whilst a certain gravity sits upon the countenance, wholly at variance with European ideas of gaiety. Dancing they have not the remotest idea of. There are no fairs or meetings for the lower ranks; no balls, routs, or concerts, for the higher. They cannot conceive how any one should find delight in the exercise of wrestling, boxing, or fencing, or in active games, such as cricket, golf, or tennis. The Tartars, indeed, delight in hunting; but this taste has never been communicated to the Chinese. The only amusements, therefore, are their feasts, which are conducted in as grave and ceremonious manner as can well be imagined. Public intoxication is of very rare occurrence, though they are accused of privately indulging in strong liquors. Their greatest and best good quality is a steady and unremitting industry. To balance this, however, they exhibit all the vices of mean and degraded minds. From the throne to the lowest subject, an utter and abhorrent disregard of truth prevails, and their unrivalled skill in every branch of the art of cheating, has been remarked, with astonishment, by all their mercantile visitors. That active and enlightened humanity which is such a distinguishing feature in European manners, is entirely unknown; whilst the female sex are quite excluded from general society, and seem to be held in very low estimation. The feet of many of these are compressed from the earliest age, that their growth may be repressed; a small foot being one of the greatest ornaments which a Chinese beauty can possess. Arts and Sciences. Literature is, from the highest offices to the lowest, the great passport to political promotion. An annual examination is held, when every candidate, according to the measure of learning which he has displayed, is promoted to a corresponding place in the government. In the case of princes of the blood, or of some Tartar chieftains, interest and favour may operate; but for all the rest, the scrutiny is said to be conducted with very great impartiality. There is nothing more singular than the language of China, which, having lost its original and simple character of picture-writing, now consists of a mere collection of arbitrary symbols. The art of printing from blocks, the mariner's compass, and gunpowder, were known in China before they were discovered in Europe. In science the Chinese have made little progress; whilst the fine arts cannot be considered as in a flourishing state. The public buildings throughout the empire display no sort of taste; and the porcelain tower at Nankin, varnished over like china-ware, and with bells at every corner, can suggest no higher idea than that of a huge toy. In gardening they have attained to greater eminence; but as to painting, they are totally ignorant of its first principles, and can only make a close and servile copy of any natural object. Their music is extremely simple, and destitute both of science and system. The drama is a favourite amusement; but it is not performed in accordance with European ideas of such representations. The players are generally united in companies, and are hired by individuals to enliven the scene of domestic festivity. They ply continually on the canals, waiting for this employment; but their exhibitions, in general, consist of low and disgusting buffoonery. Rel. None established. The multitude universally believe in a species of spirits, some good and some bad, who preside over the seasons, mountains, rivers, and other natural objects, their doors and hearths, and everything in which mortals are concerned. There is no such thing as congregational worship, no public sacrifices, nothing by which men can be assembled together, an object studiously avoided by the jealousy of the government. The tenets of Confucius are those adopted by the court and upper classes; Buddhism is the religion of the great mass of the people; and there are many followers of Taou and of Mahomet. Gov. Absolute. The emperor combines in his person the attributes of supreme magistrate and sovereign pontiff, and, as "Heaven's Son," is to Heaven alone accountable. His authority is, perhaps, the most complete and deeply rooted that exists anywhere on the globe. There is no nobility, no priesthood, no privileged body of any description which can diminish, by sharing, the respect and influence claimed by the sovereign. In no class, or rather in no individual, does there exist any sentiment of honour or pride which can deter him from laying himself in the dust beneath his imperial master. The bamboo, as the chief instrument of government, is applied, without distinction, to the highest and the lowest Chinese. Yet this government, amidst the excess of its despotism, presents, in many respects, a mild and moderate aspect quite unknown to the other absolute monarchies of Asia. This is accounted for by the principle which runs through all its transactions, and which is expressed in all its public acts, that the emperor is the father of his people. Mandarins. These are divided into nine orders. The lowest is intrusted with the collection of the revenue. Others are governors of cities, on the magnitude of which their consequence depends; others are overseers, visitors, or inspectors; and the highest class are governors of provinces, or viceroys. Each mandarin exercises over those under him an authority equally absolute with that of the monarch. Besides ruling, he also preaches to the people; and strict instructions are transmitted from the imperial court as to the matter of his sermons. The penal code of China is severe, and many offences are punished with death. For inferior transgressions, the instrument of correction, as we have said, is the bamboo; so that all China has been compared to a school governed by the rod. Pop. Immense. A French paper, Le Moniteur de la Flotte, published the following in 1859:—"A recent document, the source of which is authentic, allows a great blank to be filled up, as the last official census dates as far back as the reign of Kia King, in 1815. At the period of the attack on Canton by the squadron of Admiral Seymour, the English took possession of the palace of the viceroy, where they found a book in the Chinese language, produced at the imperial printing-office of Pekin, and entitled 'List of the Population of China and of her Colonies, according to the Census made by Order of the Sublime Emperor, Hien Fung, and in the fourth year of his reign (1852).' The emperor Hien Fung is now on the throne, and the census which he has had made, is thirty-seven years more recent than that executed in the reign of Kia King. During that period of time, the population of China has increased in a considerable proportion. In 1815 it was 371,000,000, and in 1852 it had reached to 396,000,000. It may now be calculated, without exaggeration, at 400,000,000." Lat. between 20° and 42° N. Lon. between 98° and 122° E.—The early history of China is involved in obscurity. It is certain, however, that at an early period it attained to a great degree of civilization. The most memorable modern conquest was that of Genghis Khan, who, in the 11th century, entered China in all the array and terror of a barbarous conqueror. His successors, however, sought to improve by policy what they had acquired by arms, and diligently applied themselves to repair the ravages made by their first irruption. Their dynasty gradually lost its energy, and was supplanted by one of native Chinese princes, called the dynasty of Ming. In the beginning of the 17th century, this dynasty was overthrown in an irruption of the Mantchoo Tartars, who have ever since continued to hold the sovereignty of the empire. The first attempt made by the British to open a trade with China was in 1637, but it was unsuccessful. Subsequently, the East India Company began to trade with the empire, but no direct recognition of each other took place between the governments, till 1792, when Lord Macartney was sent as an ambassador to the Chinese court. In 1816 Lord Amherst was sent on a second embassy, but was treated with such insolence that it greatly irritated the British people. No collision, however, of importance occurred till 1841, when hostilities commenced, to the utter discomfiture of the "Celestials." In the following year, peace was concluded at Nankin, the treaty stipulating that a British consul should be allowed to reside at the ports of Canton, Amoy, Fou-tchow, Ningpo, and Shanghai. Other advantages were gained; but, in 1847, fresh outrages, on the part of the inhabitants of Canton, led to the capture of the Bogue Forts and a new convention, by which further redress was obtained. In 1851 a great rebellion broke out in the empire, and many of the most important towns on the banks of the Yellow River, called by the Chinese the "Girdle of China," fell into the hands of the insurgents. In the following year they took Nankin and Amoy, which, however, were soon retaken by the imperial troops. In 1853, Shanghai, the next commercial city in importance to Canton, was captured, and success after success seemed to follow their arms in their progress towards Pekin. Here, however, their triumphs ended. They were, after some hard fighting, driven back from the imperial city, and have excited little interest since. In 1856 a misunderstanding between China and Great Britain arose on account of the Chinese boarding a vessel lying in the Canton river, with a British colonial register. This led to the treaty of Tien-tsin, in 1858, which is one of the most important events of the 19th century. By it the Chinese empire is opened to the civilization of the Western world. This treaty was entered into by Great Britain, France, Russia, and the United States, on one side, and by the emperor of China on the other; and although these powers did not all participate in the war, yet they all share in the benefits of the treaty. By its terms many advantages were obtained; but the greatest were—1. The opening of new ports to commerce; 2. the toleration of Christianity and protection of Chinese converts; 3. the residence at Pekin of our official representative. Whatever may be the shortcomings of the treaty in a material and moral point of view, this last concession secures progressive development and ultimate triumph. The opening wedge of civilization has found an entrance into the Chinese empire, and steam and electricity will soon drive it home.

CHINCHILLA, chin-chil'-la, a town of Spain, 10 miles from Albacete. Manf. Chiefly cloths. Pop. about 13,000.

CHINCHOOR, chin-choor', a town of Hindostan, province of Aurungabad. Pop. 5,000.

CHINH (LA), sheen, a village of Lower Canada, 70 miles above Montreal. It is the centre of the commerce between the Lower and the Upper provinces, and one of the points of a canal which leads to Montreal, and avoids the rapids of St. Louis.

CHING, or XI-HOAM-TI, ching, an emperor of China, who united the various states in one empire. He repulsed the attacks of the Tartars or Mongols, and built the "great wall," to divide China from Mongolia. Reigned 240 B.C.

CHING, a prefix of numerous Chinese cities, the chief of which are Ching-kiang, Ching-te, Ching-ting, and Ching-ton. Near Ching-te is the summer residence of the emperor, and Ching-ton was, at one time, an imperial residence, but, in 1646, it was ruined by the Tartars.

CHING-KING, a province of China, north of the "great wall," comprising the "Regent's Sword," a peninsula in the Yellow Sea. Desc. Mountainous, but producing cotton, pulse, flour, and live stock. Pop. Unascertained.

CHINGLEPUT, ching-le-put', a town and fortress of British India, and capital of a district of the same name, on the Palar river, 35 miles from Madras.—The district immediately surrounds the city, and is bounded on the E. by the Bay of Bengal, and on the other sides by the Arcot districts. Area, 3,020 square miles. Desc. Unfertile, and generally low, with here and there some hills. The principal river is the Palar, and the Pulicat lake and other lagoons skirt the coast. Manf. Unimportant, consisting mostly of pottery and cotton cloths. Pop. 584,000.

CHIN-HAE, chin'-hai, a maritime city of China, in the province of Che-kiang, 12 miles from Ningpo. This town was captured, with 157 pieces of cannon, by the British in 1841. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 25° 58′ N. Lon. 121° 35′ E.

CHINI, che'-ne, a village of British India, on the right bank of the Sutlej, 8,770 feet above the level of the sea. Lat. 31° 30′ N. Lon. 78° 19′ E.—Another in Scinde, 30 miles from Schwan, 10,000 feet above the level of the sea.

CHIN-KIANG-FOO, chin'-ke-ang-foo, a fortified maritime city of China, 60 miles from Nankin. Pop. Uncertain. There is here a pagoda of cast iron 80 feet high, and supposed to be upwards of 1,200 years old. In 1842 this city was taken by the British.

CHINNERETH, kin'-e-reth, 'harps,' a town of Galilee, afterwards called Genesareth and Tiberias, with a large lake of the same name.

CHINNOCK, chin'-nok, the name of three English parishes, none of them with a population above 800.

CHINONDEGA, NEW and OLD, che-non-dai'-ga, two contiguous towns in the state of Nicaragua, Central America. Pop. respectively 10,000 and 4,000, employed in agricultural pursuits, and in trading with the interior.

CHIOGGIA, ke-odg'-e-a, an old fortified town of Northern Italy, on an island of the same name in the Adriatic, 14 miles from Venice. Pop. including the rest of the island, 26,000.

CHIONE, ki'-o-ne. The most celebrated of this name is the daughter of Dædalion, of whom Apollo and Mercury became enamoured. For conceiving herself more beautiful than Juno, that goddess killed her, and changed her into a hawk.

CHIOS, ki'-os, an island in the Ægean Sea, between Lesbos and Samos, on the coast of Asia Minor. Ext. 32 miles long, with a varying breadth of from 8 to 18 miles. Area, 400 square miles. Pop. perhaps 30,000. —The wine of this island, so much celebrated by the ancients, is still in general esteem. It belongs to the Turks, who, in 1822, committed terrible slaughter upon its inhabitants. Homer was, according to some authorities, born here. (See HOMER.)

CHIPPENHAM, chip'-pen-ham, a town and parish of Wiltshire, on the Avon, over which is an elegant free-stone bridge, 13 miles from Bath. The church is a large, ancient, and interesting structure, and contains some very old and curious monumental devices and inscriptions. Manf. Silks and woollens. Pop. of parish, 5,000; of town, 6,280.

CHIPPEWAY RIVER, chip'-pe-wai, a river of North America, which, after a course of 150 miles, falls into the Mississippi, and has a communication with the Montreal river by a short passage.—A county in the north part of Michigan. Area, 2,376 square miles. Pop. 900.—A township of Ohio, 9 miles from Columbus. Pop. 3,000. There is a tribe of native Indians called Chippeways, said to be about 20,000 in number, and who, for the most part, dwell between Lake Michigan and the Mississippi river.

CHIPPING-NORTON, chip'-ping-nor'-ton, a town and parish of Oxfordshire, 18 miles from Oxford. Its public buildings are a church, a town-hall, national and British schools, and an endowed grammar-school. Manf. Woollen shawls, tweeds, and horse-cloths. Pop. town and parish, 3,100.

CHIPPING-ONGAR, on'-gar, an ancient town and parish in Essex. Pop. 768.

CHIPPING-SODBURY, sod'-ber-e, a town and parish of Gloucestershire, 11 miles from Bristol. Pop. 1,300. —Near it is a station on the railway from Bristol to Gloucester.

CHIQUITOS, che-ke'-tose, a territory of Bolivia, in the department of Santa Cruz, extending N. and S. of the eastern base of the Andes. The country is generally uncultivated, and only partially inhabited, its inhabitants being, for the most part, fishers and hunters. Lat. between 15° and 17° S.

CHIRIQUI, che-re'-ke, an archipelago of Central America, in the department of Veragua. It is between a large lagoon of the same name and the Caribbean Sea. The lagoon extends along the coast about 90 miles, and from 40 to 50 inland, and is capable of containing vessels of the largest class. It receives the waters of a river of the same name.

CHIRK, chirk, a village and parish of N. Wales, 5 miles from Rhiggabon. Pop. 1,600.—Near the village, an iron aqueduct, supported by 10 arches, and raising the Ellesmere Canal 70 feet, crosses the Dee.

CHIRKAREE, chir-ka-re', a protected state of India, 40 miles from Banda. Area, 880 square miles. Pop. 82,000.—This state pays an annual tribute to the British of nearly 9,500 rupees, and supports 1,000 infantry, 300 cavalry, and 30 artillery.

CHIRON, ki'-ron, a centaur, half a man and half a horse, son of Philyra and Saturn, was famous for his knowledge of music, medicine, and shooting. He taught mankind the use of plants and medicinal herbs, and he instructed, in all the polite arts, the greatest heroes of his age, such as Achilles, Æsculapius, Hercules, &c. Having received from Hercules an incurable wound in the knee, he begged Jupiter to deprive him of immortality. His prayers were heard, and he was placed by the god among the constellations, under the name of Sagittarius.

CHIRRA POONGEE, chir'-ra poon-ge', a town of Eastern India, on the Cossya hills. It has an elevation of 4,200 feet above the level of the sea, and its neighbourhood abounds with orange and pineapple-trees. Coal and iron also abound. Up to 1834 it was a British convalescent station; but in that year it was abandoned.

CHISHOLM, Caroline, chis'-home, an English lady of an active humanity, who, in her twentieth year, was married to Captain Alexander Chisholm, of the Indian army. Soon after their marriage, they proceeded to Madras, where she greatly exerted herself in behalf of the daughters and orphans of the British soldiers. The state of Captain Chisholm's health was such as to require a change of climate, when, in 1838, they removed to Australia, and taking up their abode in Sydney, Mrs. Chisholm was struck with the destitution of many emigrant girls, whom she took under her protection, and found for them a place of shelter. Her benevolent exertions were, to some extent, assisted by the colonial government, and by 1845 she had succeeded in obtaining situations and employment for 11,000 females and men in the colony. Many of these she had assisted with the loan of small sums to the extent of £1,200, of which she only lost £16; a fact which speaks volumes in favour of their honesty. In 1846 Captain Chisholm and she came to England, and took up their abode in London, where she greatly exerted herself in behalf of the poorer classes of intending emigrants. She established a "Family Colonization Society," by which passage-money was collected by weekly instalments, and lectured through the country in favour of emigration. The result of this was an impulse to the emigration cause, and the improvement of the accommodation on board emigrant vessels, successive ships being dispatched with females properly provided for. In 1851 she herself, with her family, proceeded again to Australia, where, she stated, she intended to pass the remainder of her life. B. in the parish of Wootten, Northamptonshire, about 1810. —To the early and judicious training of her mother, Mrs. Chisholm always acknowledged herself deeply indebted. To her precepts was due much of the success of her daughter's benevolent attempts.

CHISWICK, chis'-ik, a parish and village in Middlesex, on the Thames, 7½ miles from St. Paul's. Pop. 6,500.—The gardens of the Horticultural Society are in this parish, and in Chiswick House the statesmen Fox and Canning died.

CHITTAGONG, or ISLAMABAD, chit'-ta-gong, a district on the S.E. extremity of Bengal, inclosed by Tipperah, Burmah, Aracan, and on the W. by the Bay of Bengal. Area, about 3,000 square miles. Desc. Traversed by the Mugh mountains, and by numberless streams flowing towards the Bay of Bengal. Along the coast and in the valleys there is considerable fertility. Pro. Rice, salt, timber, ivory, indigo, cotton, hemp, pepper, some coffee, and a small quantity of spices. Hogs, goats, and poultry are reared, and, on the seacoast, the government has a salt manufactory. Pop. Uncertain; perhaps 1,000,000. Lat. between 21° and 23° N. Lon. between 91° and 93° E.—Its capital is of the same name, and has, of late years, greatly declined.

CHITTENDEN, chit'-ten-den, a county of Vermont, U.S., on Lake Champlain, intersected by Onion river. Area, 500 square miles. Pop. 30,000.—Also, a township in Rutland county, in the same state. Pop. 700.

CHITTIM, or KITTIM, chit'-tim, 'those that bruise,' a son of Javan, the descendants of whom peopled the islands of the Mediterranean Sea.

CHITTLEDROOG, chit-tel-droog', a celebrated fortress and town of Hindostan, 130 miles from Seringapatam. Lat. 14° 10′ N. Lon. 76° 29′ E.—The fort of this place is considered one of the strongest in India.

CHITTOR, chit-tor', a town and fortress of the south of India, 80 miles from Madras. It stands on the Puni river; but in the dry season is very unhealthy, on account of the miasma which arises from the banks of the river being left dry at that period of the year. It is the seat of a judicial establishment. Pop. Unascertained.—This town came into possession of the British in 1801, and in its neighbourhood are some remarkable antique tombs, of which no traditional or authentic history exists. The natives attribute their erection to dwarfs and fairies.

CHITTOR, a town of India, standing on the river Biruch, or Beris, 270 miles from Agra. The fortress is built on an isolated rock, from 300 to 400 feet high, with its base encompassed by jungle and infested by tigers. Pop. Uncertain. Lat. 24° 52′ N. Lon. 74° 41′ E.

CHIUN, ki'-un, an idol, also called Rampham, worshipped by the Israelites.

CHIUSA (LA), ke-oo'-sa, the name of several places in Italy.—1. A town of the Sardinian states, 8 miles from Coni. Manf. Silk and glass wares. Pop. 7,000.—2. A town of Sicily, 30 miles from Palermo. Pop. 6,000.—3. A village 18 miles from Turin.—4. A defile 10 miles from Verona. This is one of the greatest routes between the Tyrol and Italy.

CHIVASSO, ke-vas'-so, a town of Sardinia, situate on the Po, 15 miles from Turin. It contains several churches and cloisters. Pop. 8,500.—This town was taken by the French in 1800.

CHLOE, klo'-e, a surname of Ceres, at Athens. Her yearly festivals, called Chloeia, were celebrated with much mirth and rejoicing, and her name thus came to be associated with feasting and drinking. A ram was always sacrificed to her.—A Christian matron of Corinth.

CHLORIS, klo'-ris, the goddess of flowers, who married Zephyrus. She is the same as Flora.

CHOASPES, ko-ăs'-pes, a river of Media, flowing into the Tigris. Its waters were so sweet that the kings of Persia drank no other, and in their expeditions always carried some with them, which had been previously boiled.

CHOBHAM, chob'-ham, a parish of Surrey, on the Mole, 8 miles from Guildford. Area, 9,470 acres. Pop. 2,200. —In the neighbourhood is a fishpond comprising 150 acres. Here, in the summer of 1853, a military camp was formed, consisting of some 10,000 men.

CHOC, or CHOQUE BAY, choke, is on the N. W. coast of St. Lucia, one of the Windward Islands, in the W. Indies. There is a river of the same name.

CHOCTAW, chok-taw', two counties of the United States.—1. In the centre of Mississippi. Area, 990 square miles. Pop. about 12,000, of whom a fourth are slaves.—2. In Alabama bordering the Mississippi. Area, 800 square miles. Pop. 9,000, of whom a third are slaves.

CHOCZIM, chok'-zim, a fortified town of Southern Russia, on the Dniester, 20 miles from Kamenietz. Pop. about 2,000.—This was formerly a town of some importance, and was the northernmost fort of the Ottoman empire. It is still an important military post. In 1673 the Turks were here defeated by Sobieski and his Poles, and in 1739 again by the Russians.

CHŒRILUS, keer'-i-lus, a tragic poet of Athens, who wrote 150 tragedies, of which 13 obtained the prize.—An historian of Samos.—The name of two other poets, one of whom was very intimate with Herodotus, and wrote a poem on the victory which the Athenians had obtained over Xerxes. On account of the excellence of the composition, he received a piece of gold for each verse from the Athenians, and was publicly ranked with Homer as a poet.—The other was one of Alexander's flatterers. It is said that that prince promised him as many pieces of gold as there should be good verses in his poetry, and as many slaps on the forehead as there were bad. On examination, scarcely six of his verses were found entitled to the coins, while the rest were rewarded with castigation.

Choisrul, Etienne Francis, Duc de, shwoi'-zu(r)l, the principal minister of state during the greater portion of the reign of Louis XV. of France. His administration, however, was very unfortunate. By the peace of Paris, in 1763, Canada was ceded to England, and in the "seven years' war," against Frederick of Prussia, France was unsuccessful, in conjunction with Austria, her ally. In 1760 he expelled the Jesuits from France, and is said to have encouraged the British colonies of North America, during the first symptoms of their rebellion against the mother country. He was partial to the arts and literature, being the friend of Voltaire and other men of learning. B. 1719; D. in Paris, 1785.

Choiseul, an island in the South Pacific Ocean, belonging to the Solomon group. Lat. 7° 29′ S. Lon. 157° 55′ E.

Choisy-sur-Seine, shwoi'-se, a town of France, on the Seine, 6 miles from Paris. Manf. Porcelain, soap, glass, leather, and chemicals. Pop. 3,300.—Another, in the department Seine-et-Marne, 6 miles from Coulommiers. Pop. 1,400.

Cholechel, cho-lai'-chel, an island in S. America, in the Plata confederation, 220 miles from Carmen. It is formed by the Rio Negro.

Cholet, or Chollet, sho'-lai, a town of France, in the department of the Maine and Loire, 11 miles S. of Beaupreau. Manf. Mixed cloths and fine woollens. Pop. about 11,000.—The word "Challies," in haberdashery, derives its name from this town.

Cholula, cho-loo'-la, a city of the Mexican confederation, formerly the capital of an independent district of the same name, 15 miles from La Puebla. It was famed as the seat of piety and religion during the Mexican empire, and had a magnificent temple, which still remains, and to which the Mexicans resorted in crowds, at the festival of the Virgin. The perpendicular height of this edifice is 164 feet, and at the base it measures at each side 1,440 feet. This temple, which is to the E. of the city, on the road leading to Puebla, is the most ancient and the most celebrated of all the Mexican religious monuments; but it is now fast crumbling to dust, and those who were wont to look upon it with the utmost veneration, have nearly all passed from the face of the earth. Pop. 10,000.

Chonos Archipelago, cho'-nos, a group of islands lying off the W. coast of Patagonia. Almost all the islands present a bare and repelling appearance, although some of them are large and sparsely populated. Lat. between 44° and 46° S. Lon. between 74° and 75° W.

Choo-keang, choo-ke'-ang, the Chinese name for Canton River.

Choper, cho-per', a river of Russia, which, after a course of 260 miles, joins the Don near the village of Ust-Chopersk.

Chopersk, cho-persk', a fortified town of Russia, 115 miles from Veronej.

Chorley, chor'-le, a tolerably well-built town and parish of Lancashire, 9 miles from Preston. Manf. Cotton goods and yarns chiefly. In the vicinity of the town is an abundance of coal, lead, alum, flag and mill stones. Pop. 12,700. A station on the Preston and Bolton Railway.

Chorlton-on-Medlock, chorl'-ton, a township of Lancashire, and a suburb of Manchester. Pop. 36,000.

Chosroes I., or Khosrou the Great, kos'-ro-es, king of Persia, succeeded Cabades in 531. He concluded a peace with the Romans, but afterwards invaded their territories, and was repulsed by Belisarius. In the reign of Justin II., he attacked the Romans again, but was defeated by Tiberius. D. of vexation, in 579.—He was fierce, cruel, and rash; but possessed many great qualities, and liberally encouraged the arts and sciences. (See Belisarius.)

Chosroes II. ascended the throne on the deposition of his father Hormidas, in 590. He is accused, on plausible grounds, of murdering his father. His nobility conspired against him on account of his cruelties, and obliged him to fly to the Romans, who replaced him on the throne. He afterwards carried his arms into Judæa, Libya, and Egypt, and made himself master of Carthage; but was defeated by the emperor Heraclius, and thrown into prison by his son, where he died, in 627.

Chouans, shoo'-a, the name given, during the Vendean civil war in France, to the peasants of Brittany and Lower Maine. This name was gradually extended to all the Vendeans, and was originally derived from chat-huant, which cry was used by some of their number as a signal to their confederates.

Chourar, choo'-rar, a small district of India, belonging to the Jareegah Rajpoots. Ext. 25 miles long, and about 18 broad. Desc. Level and open, producing salt in abundance. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. between 23° 35′ and 23° 56′ N. Lon. between 70° 53′ and 71° 11′ E.

Chowan, chow'-an, a county of N. Carolina, U.S., on the N. side of Albemarle Sound. Area, 218 square miles. Desc. Flat and fertile. Pop. 7,000, of whom half are slaves.—Also, a river in N. Carolina, falling into the N.W. corner of Albemarle Sound. It is 3 miles wide at its mouth.

Christ, the 'consecrated or anointed one,' the official title of the Saviour of men.

Christchurch, kriste'-church, a town of Hampshire, situate between the Avon and the Stour, about 2 miles above their confluence. It has a considerable trade in hosiery and watch springs. Pop. 7,500.—A Bay at this place has a double tide every 12 hours. Christchurch is also the name of several parishes in and around London.

Christian, krist'-yăn, the name of two counties of the United States.—1. In Kentucky. Area, 540 square miles. Desc. Fertile in maize, wheat, and tobacco. Pop. 20,000.—2. In Illinois. Area, 560 square miles. Desc. Fertile in the usual cerealia. Pop. 4,000.—This county is intersected by the Central Railway.

Christiana, kris-te-ă'-na, a township of Newcastle county, Delaware, U.S., on Christiana Creek, 37 miles from Philadelphia. Pop. 4,000.—Christiana Creek is a river in the same state, uniting with the Brandywine below Wilmington, and flowing into the Delaware.

Christiana, kree-ste-a'-na, the capital or seat of government of Norway, situate at the extremity of a gulf or flord, in the province of Aggerhuus, 25 miles from Stockholm. The town, though not large, is the best built and among the most thriving places in the kingdom. The public buildings are the great military hospital, erected in 1806; an arsenal, citadel, university, observatory, house of correction, an academy, a military school, a royal residence, and two theatres. It has an excellent harbour, and carries on a considerable trade. Manf. Coarse cloth, cordage, tobacco, hardwares, and paper. It has, besides, breweries and distilleries. The chief exports are fish, tar, soap, vitriol, alum, iron, copper, and timber to Britain, France, and Denmark. Pop. 35,000. Lat. 59° 55′ 20″ N. Lon. 10° 48′ 45″ E.

Christianople, kree'-ste-a-no'-pel, a fortified seaport of Sweden, on Kalmar Sound, 20 miles from Carlscrona. Pop. Unascertained.

Christians, kree'-ste-ans, a central district of Norway, inclosed by Drontheim, Bergen, and Hedemark. Pop. 107,000. Lat. between 60° and 62° N. Lon. between 8° and 11° E.

Christiansand, kre'-ste-an-sand', a fortified seaport of Norway, and capital of a government of the same name. It is situate on the south coast, on a flord of the Skager-rack, 160 miles from Christiana. The houses are generally neat and well built, and the streets broad and straight. The most remarkable buildings are the cathedral and the citadel, called Frederick's-holm. The town has one of the best-sheltered harbours in Norway. The inhabitants are principally employed in shipbuilding, and particularly in the repairing of vessels forced, by the storms of the Cattegat, to take refuge here to refit. Pop. 9,000. Lat. 58° 8′ N. Lon. 8° 3′ E.—This place was founded in 1641, and was taken by the British in 1807.

and woollen fabrics. Pop. 5,000.—Also a district, of which this town is the capital. Area, 2,490 square miles. Desc. Fertile, containing the valley of Helge. Pro. Hemp, flax, corn, and hops. Pop. 180,000.

CHRISTIANSTED, kre'-ste-an-sted', a town on the N.E. coast of the island of St. Croix, in the Danish West Indies. It is the principal entrepôt for the commerce of Copenhagen, and its harbour is defended by a fort and a battery. Pop. 6,000, of whom a fifth are slaves.

CHRISTIANSUND, kre'-ste-an-soond, a seaport-town on the E. coast of Norway, 36 miles from Drontheim. It has an active fish-trade. Pop. 3,500.

CHRISTIERN, or CHRISTIAN, I., kris'-te-ern, king of Denmark, succeeded Christopher of Bavaria in 1448. In the following year he was elected king of Norway, and, in 1456, of Sweden. In the latter kingdom, however, he had but a title without power, and in 1463 was finally driven out by Charles Canutson. In Denmark he became popular by his prudence, moderation, and liberality. D. 1483.—He instituted the order of the Elephant.

CHRISTIERN II., called the Cruel, and also the Northern Nero, succeeded his father John on the throne of Denmark, in 1513, and in 1520 was elected king of Sweden. The cruelties which he displayed in the latter country alienated all hearts from him, and he was shortly deposed by an insurrection excited by Gustavus Vasa. He afterwards, in 1523, lost the crown of Denmark for the same causes. D. in prison, 1559

CHRISTIERN III. succeeded to the Danish crown in 1534, on the death of his uncle, Frederick I. He embraced Lutheranism, and made it the established religion. B. 1502; D. 1558.

CHRISTIERN IV., king of Denmark, succeeded his father, Frederick II., in 1588. He made war successfully against Sweden, and in 1625 was elected chief of the Protestant league. The following year, however, he was defeated at Lutter, by Tilly, and forced to sign a humiliating peace at Lubeck. At home he was an able administrator. He fostered commerce and industry, built new cities, and left Denmark peaceful and happy. B. 1577; D. 1648.

CHRISTIERN V. ascended the Danish throne in 1670, on the death of his father, Frederick III. He united with the princes of Germany, and declared war against the Swedes, in which he was unsuccessful. In 1673 he allied himself with the Dutch against Louis XIV., and also declared war against Sweden. He took Pomerania from the latter power; but restored it by a treaty made in 1679. In the midst of the wars which he carried on, he compiled a code of laws, which forms the basis of the jurisprudence of Denmark. B. 1645; D. 1699.

CHRISTIERN VI., king of Denmark, succeeded his father, Frederick IV., in 1730. During his reign, the kingdom enjoyed continuous tranquillity. Copenhagen, which in 1721 had been destroyed by fire, was rebuilt with great magnificence. B. 1699; D. 1746.

CHRISTIERN VII., king of Denmark, succeeded his father, Frederick V., in 1766. In the same year he married Caroline Matilda, sister of George III. of England. He appointed, as his minister, his doctor, Struenzée, whose influence soon became paramount. At the end of two years, however, this minister was disgraced and put to death, all authority passing into the hands of the queen dowager, Julie Marie of Brunswick. The end of his reign was disastrous. In 1807 Copenhagen was bombarded and taken by the British, and the king's latter days were clouded by insanity. B. 1749; D. 1808.

CHRISTINA, kre-ste'-na, queen of Sweden, was the only child of Gustavus Adolphus, whom she succeeded in 1632, when only in her sixth year. She possessed an elevated understanding, and invited to her court the most learned men in Europe. Among these were Grotius, whom she sent ambassador to France; Salmasius, Descartes, Bochart, Huet, Vossius, and Meibom. In 1654 she abdicated in favour of her cousin Charles Gustavus, on the pretence of being already weary of the splendid slavery which attaches to a crown, although only in her 28th year. It is affirmed, however, that the principal reason was her having embraced the Roman Catholic religion. From Sweden she went to Rome, but, after residing there some time, she removed to France, where she was well received by Louis XIV. Whilst residing in this country, she caused Monaldeschi, her favourite master of the horse, to be put to death in her own house, for some alleged crime which, in her estimation, amounted to high treason against his sovereign, whom she still considered herself to be. Even in this act she found defenders; among whom was Leibnitz, who justified the deed in an elaborate pamphlet. Her conduct, however, excited the disgust of the court, when she applied to Cromwell for permission to visit England; but the sturdy Protector turned the shadow of his countenance upon her, and denied the boon. She now returned to Rome, where she resided till the death of Charles Gustavus, when she went to Sweden, with the view of reascending the throne. Her subjects, however, were by this time entirely alienated from her, and she was once more forced to return to Rome, where she died, in 1689. B. 1626.—She left a collection of maxims, and reflections on the life of Alexander the Great, of whom she was a great admirer.

CHRISTINA, Maria, mother of Isabel II., queen of Spain, took an active part in the affairs of that country from 1830 to 1854. As queen regent she governed arbitrarily, and in 1854 was compelled to quit Spain, when she retired into exile. B. at Naples, 1806.

CHRISTINAHAM, kre-ste'-na-ham, a thriving town of Sweden, in the province of Carlstad, 16 miles E. Carlstad. Pop. 2,020.

CHRISTINASTAD, kre-ste'-na-stat, a small seaport of Russian Finland, 55 miles from Wasa, on the Gulf of Bothnia. Pop. 1,500.

CHRISTIONYDD-KENRICK, kris-te-on'-id ken'-rik, a town of N. Wales, in Denbighshire, 2 miles from North Chirk. Pop. 5,000.

CHRISTMAS HARBOUR, a good and safe bay on the N. coast of Kerguelen's Land, in the Indian Ocean. Lat. 49° 20′ S. Lon. 69° 24′ E.

CHRISTMAS SOUND, a bay on the S. coast of Terra del Fuego, discovered in 1774. Lat. 55° 27′ S. Lon. of the entrance, 70° 16′ W.

CHRISTOPHE, St., kre'-stof, a town of France, 15 miles from Tours. Pop. 2,000.—The name of several other small towns.

CHRISTOPHE, Henry, negro king of Hayti, began life as a cook at a tavern in Cape Town, St. Domingo. Being of colossal stature, and possessed of considerable force of character, he seemed marked out by nature for prominence among those, whose uneducated perceptions enable them to penetrate little beyond what appears on the surface of human character. In 1790 an insurrection of the Blacks in St. Domingo took place. He was employed by Toussaint Louverture, the generalissimo of the Blacks, and was successful in suppressing various revolts, which darkened the dawn of negro freedom. In 1802 he defended Cape Town, with valour, against General Leclerc, the brother-in-law of Napoleon I., and when forced to evacuate the place, took 3,000 men with him and joined Toussaint. Christophe now fought vigorously for the liberation of his countrymen, and in 1806 became generalissimo of the army, and president for life of Hayti. In 1811 he was proclaimed king of Hayti, under the title of Henry I., the crown, at the same time, being made hereditary in his family. He took the French court for his model, and constituted an hereditary negro nobility. In 1812 he was solemnly crowned, and reigned successfully for some years. In 1818 reverses came upon him, and the republican Blacks rose against his authority. Whilst lying ill, from the effects of a stroke of apoplexy, in his fine palace of Sans-Souci, he was surrounded by insurgent troops. The duke of Marmalade, one of the highest of his nobles, proclaimed the abolition of monarchy, and Christophe shot himself through the heart. He left a widow and children, but his eldest son and most of his inferior officers were slaughtered. B. 1767; D. 1820.—This sable sovereign was by no means destitute of governing qualities, whilst he encouraged the freedom of the press, and promoted education. He also framed a code of laws, which he dignified with the title of the "Code Henri," in imitation of the "Code Napoléon."

CHRISTOPHER'S, St., or ST. KITTS, kris'-to-fers, one of the Leeward group of the British W. India Isles, 45 miles from Antigua. Ext. 20 miles long, by about 4 in breadth. Area, 68 square miles. Desc. Volcanic, and traversed by a mountain-ridge, in the middle of which is the crater of an extinct volcano, which is overlooked by Mount Misery, about 3,700 feet high. About half of the island only is fit for cultivation. It is, however, remarkably fertile, and produces the most abundant crops of sugar. Pop. 25,000. Lat. 17° 17′ N. Lon. 60° 42′ W.—This island was, in 1493, discovered by Columbus, and the peace of Utrecht, 1713, gave it to Great Britain. In 1782, it was taken by the French, but restored in 1783.

CHRISTOVAL, ST., kre'-sto-val, one of the five lakes at the extremity of the valley of Mexico, in the vicinity of that city. Ext. 10 miles long, by 5 broad.

CHRISTOVAL, ST., a town of Venezuela, nearly 100 miles from Merida. Pop. Unascertained.

CHRYSIPPUS, kri-sip'-pus, a Stoic philosopher, who succeeded Cleanthus as head of that school, and was looked on as a column of the "Porch." He combated the philosophy of the Epicureans and Academicians, his principal opponent being Carneades. His industry was great, and his erudition profound. He is said to have left behind him 705 works, of which only fragments have come down to us. B. at Soli, 280 B.C.; D. 207 B.C.

CHRYSOSTOM, St. John, kre-sos'-tom, the most eloquent of the fathers of the Christian church, and bishop of Constantinople. His father's name was Secundus, but the son is known only by the surname of Chrysostom, or 'golden-mouthed.' He was reared to the bar, which he quitted for a religious life, and lived as a hermit in a cave six years; after which he returned to Antioch and was ordained. He became so famous for his eloquence, that, on the death of Nectarius, patriarch of Constantinople, he was, in 397, elected his successor. He there built several hospitals, and gave most of his income to the poor; but in his endeavours to enlarge his episcopal jurisdiction, was involved in a dispute with Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria. This churchman gained the empress Eudoxia to his side, and the consequence was, that Chrysostom was deposed and sent into Bithynia, which occasioned an insurrection at Constantinople. To appease the people, he had to be recalled in triumph. The wrath of the empress, however, was not modified, and happening to oppose the placing of her statue near the church, he was again sent into exile, on a desolate tract on the Euxine Sea. B. at Antioch, 354; D. at Comana, in Asia Minor, overcome by the fatigues of a forced journey, 407.—Thirty-five years after the death of Chrysostom, his remains were carried to Constantinople, and buried with great pomp by Theodosius II.; it is said they were subsequently removed to Rome. His feast is celebrated by the Roman church on the 27th January, and by the Greek on the 13th November. His works were edited by Saville, at Eton, in 8 vols. folio, 1613; and by Montfaucon in 13 vols. 1718, Paris. His book on the priesthood is a valuable work, and has been translated into English.

CHUCUITO, choo'-koo-e'-to, a province of Peru, bounded E. by the great lake of the same name, which is situate between the two Cordilleras of Peru, in the N.W. part of the province of Los Charcos. Lat. from 15° 35′ to 17° 20′ S.—A town in the above province. Pop. 5,000.

CHUDLEIGH, chud'-le, a parish and town of Devonshire. Pop. 2,500.—The neighbourhood is famous for its orchards of cider apples.

CHUENPEE, chu-en'-pe, a fortified port of China, on an island 35 miles from Canton. It was taken by the British in 1841.

CHUMBUL, choom'-bool, a large river of Hindostan, rising in Malwa, in the Vindhyan mountains, and falling into the Jumna 25 miles below Etaweh. It receives numerous tributaries. Length, 540 miles.

CHUNAR, or CHUNARGUR, choo-nar-gur', a town and celebrated fortress of Hindostan, in the province of Mirzapoor, on the Ganges, 16 miles from Benares. It has an Episcopal church and a Roman Catholic chapel. Within the walls is the governor's house, the state prison, an hospital, and an ancient Hindoo palace, supplied by a well of bad water, sunk deep in a rock. Pop. 12,000.—The territory annexed to this town was, in 1768, ceded to the British.

CHUPRAH, choo'-pra, a large town of Hindostan, on the Ganges, 35 miles from Patna. It is the capital of the district of Sarun. Pop. 50,000.

CHUQUISACA, choo'-ke-sa'-ka, a city of S. America, and capital of the province of the same name, formerly called Los Charcos, or La Plata. The town is built in a valley 9,000 feet above the sea, and the houses are covered with tiles, very roomy and convenient, with pleasant gardens. It has a large cathedral, ornamented with painting and gilding, a university, and mining-schools. Pop. 25,000. Lat. 19° 30′ S. Lon. 66° 40′ W.

CHUR, choor, the capital town of the Swiss canton Grisons, in the valley of the Upper Rhine. Manf. Zinc wares, tools; and it has an active transit trade. Pop. 5,500. Lat. 46° 30′ N. Lon. 9° 35′ E.

CHURCH, the prefix of numerous parishes of England and Wales, none of them with a population above 4,000.

CHURCH, STATES OF THE. (See PAPAL STATES.)

CHURCH CREEK, a township of Dorchester county, Maryland, U.S., at the head of Church Creek, a branch of Hudson river, 7 miles from Cambridge.

CHURCHILL, church'-hill, John. (See MARLBOROUGH, Duke of.)

CHURCHILL, Sir Winston, an English historian, who wrote a "Chronicle of the Kings of England," published in 1675, folio. B. in Dorsetshire, 1620; D. 1688. He was the father of the celebrated duke of Marlborough, and his daughter Arabella became mistress to James II., by whom she had two sons and two daughters.

CHURCHILL, Charles, an English poet, the son of a curate of St. John's, Westminster. He received his education at Westminster school, but was refused matriculation at Oxford, on account of his insufficiency in classical knowledge. At the age of twenty-three he was ordained, and served a curacy in Wales; but, becoming a dealer in cider, was unfortunate, and fell into bankruptcy. After this he came to London, and succeeded his father as curate of St. John's, to which he added the profits of a seminary, in which he taught young ladies to read and write. His first-published literary performance was a poem called "Rosciad," written against the principal theatrical managers, which had so great a success that it stimulated him to further exertions in the satirical line. His next was the "Apology," which was succeeded by "Night," intended to serve as an apology for his own nocturnal habits, which were sometimes marked by such bibacious excesses as to damage his reputation. After several other performances, in one of which—"Pomposo"—he attacked Dr. Johnson, he wrote, to please Wilkes, "The Prophecy of Famine, a Scotch Pastoral," which met with great success. There seems nothing, however, more difficult to bear with equanimity than sudden prosperity, and Churchill fell into greater irregularities of conduct than ever. His parishioners were forced to remonstrate strongly with him against his vices, and he quitted the clerical profession. He now gave himself up to a dissipated course of life, parted from his wife, and kept a mistress. He continued, however, the friend of John Wilkes, and wrote further satires. Among others he attacked Hogarth, who revenged himself in his picture of "The Reverend Mr. Churchill as a Russian Bear;" but he has written nothing which has left a permanent impression upon the literature of his country. B. at Westminster, 1731; D. at Boulogne, 1765.

CHURCHILL CAPE, a headland on the W. coast of Hudson's Bay. Lat. 58° 54′ N. Lon. 93° E.

CHURCHTOWN, or BRUHENNY, the name of several Irish parishes, none of them with a population above 3,100.

CHUSAN, choo-san', one of a group of islands off the E. coast of China, 50 miles from Ningpo. Ext. 10 miles, with a varying breadth of from 6 to 18. Desc. Mountainous, interspersed with highly-cultivated valleys, producing tea, rice, wheat, sweet potatoes, walnuts, chestnuts, cotton, and tobacco. The island is studded with a great many towns and villages. Pop. 200,000. Lat. 30° N. Lon. 122° E.—This island, called the "Key of China," was taken by the British in 1840 and 1841, and held by them until the terms of their treaty with China were fulfilled by the latter power.

CHUTTERBAI, choot'-ter-bai', a stronghold of Afghanistan, belonging, with Fort Am, to a powerful chief, who claims a territory of about 250 square miles. Lat. 34° N. Lon. 72° E.

CIBAO, sib'-a-o, the principal mountain in Hayti, near the centre of the island, at one time celebrated for its gold-mines. Height, 4,590 feet.

CIBBER, Caius Gabriel, sib'-ber, a German sculptor, who, about the time of the Cromwellian Protectorate, came to England, and began to pursue his profession in London with some success. The statues of the kings, and of Gresham, in the Royal Exchange, which was burned, were by him, and also the two figures of "Melancholy" and "Raging Madness," at the principal gate of old Bethlehem Hospital. He also executed the bassi-rilievi on the pedestal of the London Monument. During the latter years of his life, he was chiefly employed by the duke of Devonshire in decorating the seat of that nobleman at Chatsworth. In the revolution of 1688, he took up arms under the duke, in favour of the prince of Orange, and lived to see the cause for which he fought successful. B. about 1630; D. in London, 1700, leaving a considerable fortune.

CIBBER, Colley, an English poet and play-writer, the son of Gabriel Cibber, the sculptor. He served in the army of the prince of Orange at the Revolution, and afterwards went on the stage; but not attaining to eminence as an actor, turned his attention to dramatic writing. His first play was "Love's Last Shift," which was performed in 1695, and met with great applause; after which he wrote a number of others. His best work is considered to be the "Careless Husband," performed in 1704; but the "Nonjuror" brought him the most fame and profit. George I., to whom it was dedicated, presented him with £200, and appointed him to the office of poet laureate. B. in London, 1671; D. 1757.—His comedies are light, airy, and pleasant, but his royal odes possess many faults. He wrote an "Apology" for his own life, which is very amusing, as it depicts many of his own foibles and peculiarities with considerable candour.—His son THEOPHILUS followed, for a short time, the theatrical profession, and wrote a ballad opera called "Pattie and Peggy." B. 1703; D. on his passage to Ireland, 1758.

CIBBER, Susannah Maria, was the wife of Theophilus Cibber, and the sister of Dr. Thomas Arne, the musical composer. She, as an actress, became a great favourite with the public, and was considered by many as the best representative of the tragic muse in her time on the stage. D. 1766, and was buried in the cloisters of Westminster Abbey.

CICERO, Marcus Tullius, sis'-e-ro, a learned philosopher, and the greatest of Roman orators, honourably descended both by his father and mother's side. He was instructed in philosophy by Philo, in law by Mutius Scævola, and acquired his military knowledge under Sylla, in the Marsian war. When young, he translated the Greek poem "Phænomena," of Aratus, into Latin, of which some fragments remain. At the age of twenty-six he appeared at the bar, and pleaded the cause of Quinctius, and a year afterwards defended Roscius of Ameria in such a manner as won the applause of the Romans. He then travelled into Greece and Asia, and spent some time at Athens with his friend Atticus in studying the best models of Grecian oratory. On his return to Rome he became distinguished above all other pleaders. After passing through the offices of ædile and prætor, he offered himself as a candidate for the consulship; and, though powerfully opposed, was successful. One of his competitors was the famous Catiline, whose conspiracy against the state he was afterwards the great means of unveiling; for which he was called by the citizens "the father of his country, and the second founder of the republic." (See CATILINE.) His vehemence, however, against Clodius, who was accused of having violated the mysteries of the Bona Dea (see CÆSAR, Julius), brought upon him a train of evils, which finally forced him into voluntary exile; but his banishment was of short duration, for the Clodian faction becoming odious, the senate and people unanimously recalled him. In the quarrel between Cæsar and Pompey, he espoused the side of the latter, and followed him into Greece; but, after the battle of Pharsalia, returned into Italy, and obtained the friendship of Cæsar. He now retired from the arena of politics, and devoted himself to the calmer elegancies of literary pursuits, when the assassination of the dictator once more called him upon the political stage. He advised the senate to grant a general amnesty; but when he saw Antony gaining the ascendancy, he removed to Athens, to escape the effects of the enmity of that general. In a short time, however, he returned to Rome, and seemed to enjoy the friendship of Octavius, who nevertheless was induced to sacrifice him to the malice of Antony. Cicero was at Tusculum when he received the news of his proscription. In order to escape the vengeance of his enemies, he set out in a litter for the seacoast, but was overtaken and slain. His head and hands were carried in triumph to Antony, who was mean enough to place them on the rostra in the Forum, where Cicero had so often defended the lives, fortunes, and liberties of the Roman people. B. at Arpinum, 106 B.C.; assassinated near Gaeta, 43 B.C.—The talents of this great man have been the subject of universal admiration, and he possessed eminent public and private virtues, although they were, in some degree, obscured by his excessive vanity. He married Terentia, whom he afterwards divorced, and by whom he had a son and daughter. His second wife was a young woman to whom he was guardian.—His son MARCUS served under Pompey, with great reputation, and Augustus made him augur; but his conduct was licentious, and Pliny says that he was the greatest drunkard in the empire. The works of Cicero have been repeatedly published both collectively and separately.

CID CAMPEADOR, The, sid kam-pai'-a-dor, from the Arabic el seid, 'the lord,' and the Spanish campeador, 'champion,' was a Castilian hero, whose exploits are so largely mingled with fable and romance, that it is difficult, now, to determine how much of his life was true. It would appear, however, that his real name was Don Roderigo Dias de Bivar, and that he was reared in the court of the kings of Castile. On account of the great prowess he displayed in early years, the honour of knighthood was bestowed on him; and, in 1063, he proceeded with Don Sancho of Castile against Ramiro, king of Aragon, who was slain in battle. On the accession of Sancho, he accompanied him to the siege of Zamora, where the king was killed by treachery, and the Cid led back the troops to Castile, carrying with him the dead body of his monarch. Alfonso, the brother of Sancho, was then placed on the throne; and in 1074 the Cid married Donna Ximena Dias, daughter of Count Diego Alvarez, of the Asturias, whom he had slain in single combat, to avenge an insult which Diego had offered to Roderigo's father. Soon after this he revolted against Alfonso, and committed great ravages in Aragon, penetrating nearly as far as Saragossa, and fixing his residence in a fortress still called Peña del Cid, 'the rock of the Cid,' where he became an independent chief. In 1094 he took Valentia, and held it till the time of his death. B. at Burgos, 1040; D. 1099.—Corneille has written a famous tragedy, embodying the exploits of this warrior. Mr. Southey also published a "Chronicle of the Cid," illustrative of his adventures. There is, however, a Spanish poem of the Cid, which was written in the 12th century by the "Homer of Spain," of whom we have no further knowledge; but whose performance is said, by Southey, to be "the oldest poem in the Spanish language, and, beyond comparison, the finest."

CILICIA, si-lish'-e-a, an ancient division of Asia Minor, now comprised in the Turkish pashalic Itshili. Formerly, its boundaries were the Taurus range on the N., the Cilician Sea on the E., the Gulf of Issus on the S., and Pamphylia on the W. Lat. between 36° and 38° N. Lon. between 32° 10′ and 37° 8′ E.

CILLY, CILLI, or ZILLI, sil'-le, a town of Styria, 57 miles from Gratz. It has a high school and gymnasium, and trades in oil and wine. Pop. 1,700.—It is a station on the railway between Trieste and Vienna.

CIMABUE, sim'-à-boo-ai, a Florentine painter and architect, considered as the restorer of the art of painting in Italy. He was instructed by the Greek painters whom the senate had summoned to Florence; but he very quickly surpassed his masters. There are still some remains of his works in fresco and distemper, showing signs of genius. His principal picture, however, is the "Madonna," painted for the church of St. Maria Novella. This production, when finished, was escorted to the church by a triumphal procession of the citizens. B. at Florence, 1240; D. 1300.

CIMAROSA, Domenico, sim-a-ro'-sa, a musician, who early achieved, by his compositions, great success, and was invited to the courts of the German sovereigns, and also to the court of Russia. He is the author of more than 120 operas, serious and comic; amongst which may be remarked "Abraham's Sacrifice," "Penelope," the "Horatii and the Curiatii." He principally excelled, however, in the Opera Buffa. B. at Naples, 1754; D. at Venice, 1801.

CIMBRI, sim'-bri, a Teutonic race, who originally occupied Jutland and part of Denmark, and who seem to have belonged to the same family as the Cimmerians of the Greeks and the Cymri of the Gauls.

CIMBRICUM BELLUM, sim'-bri-kum, was begun by the Cimbri and Teutones, by an invasion of the Roman territories, 109 B.C. These barbarians, in the first battle, destroyed 80,000 Romans, under the consuls Manlius and Servilius Cæpio. But Marius, in a second engagement at Aquæ Sextiæ, left dead of the Teutones, on the field of battle, 20,000, and took 90,000 prisoners, 102 B.C. The Cimbri, in the following year, penetrated into Italy, where, at the river Athesis, Marius and his colleague Catulus defeated them, slaying 140,000 of their number. This last battle put an end to this destructive war, and the two consuls entered Rome in triumph.

CIMMERIANS, sim-me'-ri-ăns, a barbarous people of eastern Europe, who for a time inhabited the neighbourhood of the Palus Mæotis (Sea of Azof), and from whom, perhaps, the Crimea takes its name. Driven out of Asia by the Scythians, they spread themselves along the east coast of the Black Sea, and then turned to the west and south-west, taking possession of Cappadocia, &c. They even penetrated into Lydia, but Alyattes conquered them, 610 B.C., when they disappear from history.

CIMON, si'-mon, an Athenian general, the son of Miltiades. He behaved with great courage at the battle of Salamis, and was afterwards appointed to the command of all the naval forces of Greece. He defeated the Persian fleets and took 200 ships, and totally routed their land forces on the same day, near the river Eurymedon, in Pamphylia. He was shortly after, by the intrigues of Pericles, banished Athens, but was recalled, and adjusted the dispute existing between the Athenians and Lacedæmonians. He was now appointed to carry on the war against Persia, in Egypt and Cyprus, with a fleet of 200 ships; and, on the coast of Asia, gave battle to the enemy, and totally destroyed their fleet. D. besieging the town of Citium, in Cyprus, 440 B.C.—He may be called the last of those Greeks whose spirit and boldness defeated the armies of the barbarians. He fortified and embellished Athens with the captured spoils, and has been highly extolled by his biographers, as well for his liberality as his valour.—There were others, also, of this name, but of inferior note.

CINALOA, or CINOLLO, sin'-a-lo'-a, a department of the Mexican confederation. Desc. Flat and unfertile. Pop. Unascertained. It lies on the W. coast, in lat. 26° N.

CINALOA, a town in the above province, on a river of the same name, which falls into the Gulf of California. Pop. 9,500. Lat. 25° 50′ N. Lon. 108° 8′ W.

CINCINNATI, sin'-sin-na'-te, the capital of Hamilton county, Ohio, U S., situate on the N. bank of Ohio river, 20 miles above the mouth of the Great Miami. It is regularly laid out, in a pleasant and healthy situation, and is one of the most flourishing towns W. of the Alleghany mountains. Its public buildings are a courthouse, lyceum, mechanics' institute, museums, theatres, several hospitals, upwards of one hundred churches, several colleges, many schools, insurance companies, offices, and banks. Manf. Cotton, woollen, and tobacco in various forms; and there are type, iron, and brass foundries, shipbuilding-yards, and flour-mills. It is the principal pork-market in the Union. The vintage of its neighbourhood is also very great. Pop. The growth of Cincinnati has been rapid, almost without a parallel. In 1805 the population was 500; in 1810, 2,540; in 1815, 6,500; in 1820, 9,732; in 1830, 24,831; and in 1850, 115,436.—It is connected with Lake Erie by the Miami Canal, and by railway with all the important cities in the Union.

CINCINNATUS, sin'-sin-nai'-tus, L. Quinctius, a celebrated Roman, who was informed, as he was in the act of ploughing his field, that the senate had chosen him dictator. Upon this, he left his farm, and repaired to the field of battle, where his countrymen were closely besieged by the Volsci and Æqui. Conquering the enemy, he returned to Rome in triumph. Sixteen days after his appointment, he laid down his office, and resumed his agricultural pursuits. In his 80th year he was again summoned against Prænestе as dictator; and, after a successful campaign, once more resigned the absolute power he had enjoyed only 21 days, disregarding the rewards that were offered him by the senate. Lived about 460 B.C.

CINNA, Lucius Cornelius, sin'-na, a Roman consul, who, with Marius, filled Rome with the blood of their slaughtered enemies. He was consul four successive years. Assassinated at Ancona, 83 B.C.—Cornelia, the wife of Cæsar, was the daughter of this consul.

CINQ-MARS, Henry Coiffier, Marquis of, sănk mars, a favourite of Louis XIII., befriended by Cardinal Richelieu, who introduced him to the king. Cinq-Mars, however, irritated against the cardinal for his opposition to his marriage with Maria de Gonzagua, instigated Gaston, duke of Orleans, the king's brother, to rebellion. Between them a secret treaty was set on foot, by which Spain was to render them assistance; but the plot being discovered by Richelieu, the marquis was seized and beheaded, in September, 1642. B. 1620.

CINQUE PORTS, The, sink ports, certain seaports of England, on the coasts of Kent and Sussex: viz. Dover, Sandwich, Hithe, and Romney, in Kent; and Rye, Winchelsea, Hastings, and Seaford, in Sussex. They were originally five in number, as their name imports, and were, in former times, bound to furnish to the sovereign a certain number of ships of war in any emergency, in return for which their freemen were styled barons, and ranked among the nobility. Each of the ports sent two members to parliament, and enjoyed other privileges and immunities.—Their first charter was granted by William the Conqueror, in 1067. An officer was appointed over them, who was called the Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, and who was also Constable of Dover Castle.

CINTEGABELLE, sint'-ga-bel, a town of France, 17 miles from Toulouse. Pop. 4,000.—Here, in 1814, Lord Hill's division of the army crossed the Ariège, on the right bank of which the town stands.

CINTRA, or SINTRA, sin'-tra, a town of Portugal, in the province of Estremadura, 15 miles from Lisbon.

CINTRA.

It is built on the slope of the mountain-chain of Cintra, which terminates at Cape Roca. Pop. 2,600.—Here was concluded, after the battle of Vimiera, in 1808, the convention betwen Sir Hugh Dalrymple and the French marshal Junot. By it the French were suffered to evacuate Portugal unmolested. Byron, in the first canto of his "Childe Harold," thus commemorates the event:—

"And ever since that martial synod met,
Britannia sickens, Cintra, at thy name;
And folks in office, at the mention, fret,
And fain would blush, if blush they could, for shame.
How will posterity the deed proclaim!"

The convention was signed in the palace of the Marchese Murialva.

CIOTAT, se'-o-ta, a town of France, in the department of the Mouths of the Rhone, on the Mediterranean, 14 miles from Marseilles. Pop. 5,300, trading chiefly in fruits, wine, and oil.

CIRCARS, NORTHERN, sir'-kars, an extensive province of Hindostan, lying on the W. side of the Bay of Bengal. Area, estimated at 17,000 square miles. Desc. About one half is supposed to be capable of culture or pasture, and the remainder consists of wood, water, barren hills, and a sandy waste, 3 miles broad, bordering the whole of the seacoast. The towns and villages are chiefly composed of mud huts. Pop. 3,000,000, all Hindoos. Lat. from 15° to 20° N.—This province is divided into five circars, and, in 1765, was annexed by Lord Clive to British India.

CIRCASSIA, or TCHERKESSIA, sir-kăsh'-e-a, a country of Asia, occupying a great part of the territory between the Black and Caspian seas. It comprises the northern and part of the southern declivity of the Caucasus, and is now nominally embraced within the limits of the Russian empire. Desc. Mountainous, intersected by extensive fertile valleys, producing wheat, grapes, and most of the fruits of the temperate zone. Cattle-rearing, however, is the principal branch of industry, and the breed of horses is of superior quality. Minerals. Iron, lead, nitre, and salts. Manf. Unimportant. Pop. Perhaps 230,000.—The Circassians are distinguished by the elegance of their appearance. The men are tall, and of an athletic, though slender form; their features expressive, and their air haughty and martial. The beauty of the females has long been celebrated throughout Europe; and Circassian captives are considered as the brightest ornaments of an Eastern seraglio. The favourite employment of the Circassians consists in expeditions of war against the neighbouring tribes, or of plunder into the Russian territory, which they have long held as legitimate ground for spoil. At home their time is mostly employed in hunting and feasting, whilst their chief pride is placed in their arms and horses. (See CAUCASUS.)

CIRCE, sir'-se, a daughter of Sol and Perse, celebrated for her skill in magic and poisonous herbs. She married a Sarmatian prince of Colchis, whom she murdered to obtain the kingdom; but was expelled by her subjects, and carried, by her father, to an island called Æa, on the coast of Italy. Ulysses, on his return from the Trojan war, visited her coasts; and all his companions, who ran headlong into pleasure and voluptuousness, were changed by Circe's potions into swine. Ulysses, fortified against all enchantments by an herb called moly, which he had received from Mercury, demanded from Circe the restoration of his companions to their former state. She complied, loading the hero with honours; and, for one whole year, he forgot his glory in his devotion to pleasure. (See ULYSSES.)

CIRCENCKS LUDI, sir-sen'-seez lu'-di, games performed in the circus at Rome, dedicated to the god Consus, and first established by Romulus, at the rape of the Sabines. They were in imitation of the Olympian games, and were not appropriated to one particular exhibition, but were equally devoted to leaping, wrestling, throwing the quoit and javelin, races on foot as well as in chariots, and boxing. The celebration continued five days, beginning on the 15th of September.

CIRCUS, sir'-kus, a large and elegant building in Rome, where plays and shows were exhibited. They were eight in number; the first, called Maximus Circus, being the grandest. It was raised and embellished by Tarquin Priscus, and it could contain, it is said, about 300,000 spectators. It was about 2,187 feet long, and 960 broad.

CIRENCESTER, si-ren-ses'-ter, commonly pronounced sis'-is-ter, a market and borough town of Gloucestershire, on the Churn, 16 miles from Gloucester. Of the three churches which once decorated this town, one only remains; but that is scarcely surpassed in magnificence by any structure of the same kind in the kingdom. Of the abbey no vestiges exist, except an ancient gateway. Manf. Carpets, woollens, and cutlery. Pop. 6,100.

CIRTA. (See CONSTANTINE, Algeria.)

CISALPINA GALLIA, sis'-ăl-pi'-na, a part of Gaul, called also Citerior and Togata. Its farthest boundary was near the Rubicon, and it touched the Alps on the Italian side.

CISALPINE REPUBLIC, sis-ăl'-pine, a state of Italy, comprising parts of Mantua, Milan, the Valteline, the Venetian territory W. and S. of the Adige, Modena, and the N. part of the Pontifical States. It was founded by Napoleon in 1797, and in 1802 was named the Italian Republic. In 1805, it formed the greater part of the kingdom of Italy.

CISNEROS, Alphonzo de. (See XIMENES.)

CITADELLA, se'-ta-dail-la, a town of Venetia, on the Brentella, 14 miles from Vicenza. Manf. Woollens and paper. Pop. 7,000.

CITHÆRON, si-the'-ron, a king, who gave his name to a mountain of Bœotia. This mountain was at the south of the river Asopus. It was sacred to Jupiter and the Muses. Actæon was torn to pieces by his own dogs upon it; and Hercules there killed an immense lion. It is now called Helatea, and forms a part of the boundary between Attica and Thebes. Height, 4,620 feet.

CITTA VECCHIA, or NOTABILE, cheet-ta vel'-ke-a, a strong town of Malta, situate on a hill in the centre of the island, 6 miles from Valetta. Pop. 4,000.—It was formerly the capital of the island, and, in its suburb, is Rabato, the grotto of St. Paul.

CIUDA DELLA, the'-oo-da dail'-la, a town of Minorca, on its N.W. coast, about 30 miles from Port Mahon. The cathedral is a spacious and imposing edifice. Pop. about 8,000.

CIUDAD, or CIVIDAD RODRIGO, the'-oo-dath, a fortified town of Spain, in Leon, on the Agueda, which is here crossed by a magnificent bridge, 30 miles from Coimbra. The streets are tolerably regular, and the public buildings numerous. The principal are a citadel, governor's residence, cathedral, and other churches. On the Plaza Mayor, or principal square, are three Roman columns, with inscriptions. Pop. 5,000.—It was taken by the French in 1810, and in 1812 the British retook it by storm.

CIUDAD REAL, rai'-al, a province of Spain, occupying the S. of New Castile, and inclosed by Toledo on the N., Albacete on the E., Cordova and Jaen on the S., and Badajos and Caceres on the W. Area, 11,768 square miles. Desc. Mountainous and sterile, except on the banks of the rivers, where maize, wheat, barley, oats, rye, and flax are grown. Live stock are also reared to a considerable extent. Minerals. Iron, copper, lead, antimony, silver, coal, granite, jasper, and marble. Manf. Woollens, cottons, linens, silk, saltpetre, soap, hardware, and earthenware. Pop. 305,000.

CIUDAD REAL, the capital of the above, 100 miles from Madrid. The streets are broad, straight, and well paved. The principal square is 150 paces long, by 75 broad. Manf. Woollens and glove-leather; and there is a trade in mules, wine, fruits, and oil. Pop. about 10,000.

CIVILIS, si-vi'-lis, a brave chief of the Batavians, the ancient inhabitants of a portion of Holland, who, about 70 B.C., put himself at the head of his countrymen, and drove out the Romans, beating many of their best generals. He finally made peace with Cerialis, Vespasian's commander. (See "The Rise of the Dutch Republic," by J. L. Motley.)

CIVITA CASTELLANA, kas-tel-la'-na, a town of Italy, 24 miles from Rome. Pop. 4,000.—In its neighbourhood the Neapolitans defeated the French, on December 4, 1798.

CIVITA SANT-ANGELO, che'-ve-ta sant anj'-at-lo, a town of Naples, in the province of Abruzzo Ultra, near the Adriatic. It trades principally in grain, wine, and oil. Pop. 7,300.

CIVITA VECCHIA, chē'-ve-tavek'-ke-a, the principal seaport of Italy, in the Papal States, built on a bay of the Mediterranean, 38 miles from Rome. It has a good harbour, inclosed by two moles; and another on the S. at the extremity of which there is a lighthouse. Its chief buildings are churches and convents, a theatre, arsenal, building-docks, and a convict establishment. Exp. Wheat, cheese, skins, alum, staves, and bark. Imp. Provisions, wine, spirits, and haberdashery. Pop. 8,000.—In April, 1849, a French force of 6,000 men, under General Oudinot, landed here on its way to Rome, where the republic had been proclaimed, and a triumvirate appointed. The avowed purpose of this expedition was, that the government of Louis Napoleon, then president of the republic, desired that "the flag of France might be planted on the Roman territory, as a marked testimony of their sympathy."

CLACKMANNAN, the capital of Clackmannanshire, 7 miles from Stirling. It stands on an eminence, not far from the confluence of the Devon with the Forth. Pop. 6,000.

CLACKMANNANSHIRE, klăk-măn'-nan, a county of Scotland, bounded S.E. by Fife, S. and S.W. by the river Forth, W. by Alva, an isolated district of Stirlingshire, and on every other side by Perthshire. Ext. 8 miles, with a mean breadth of 6. Area, 48 square miles. Desc. The northern district is traversed by the Ochil Hills; and the principal rivers are the North and South Devon. The soil is fertile, many acres of rich carse land having been recovered from the Forth by means of embankments. Minerals. Coal, ironstone, and green-stone. Pop. 23,000.

CLAGENFURT, or KLAGENFURTH, klă'-gen-foort, a town of Austria, the capital of the duchy of Carinthia, on the Glan, 40 miles from Laybach. It is well built, having broad streets and several squares. The public buildings are a cathedral, several churches, a residence of the prince-bishop of Gurk, the hall of the Carinthian Assembly, and many charitable institutions. Manf. Fine cloth, silk, ribbons, and muslin. Pop. 14,500.—In 1809 the French entered this place, and razed its fortifications.

CLAIR, ST., klair, a county of Illinois, U.S., on the Mississippi. Area, 648 square miles. Pop. 22,000.—Also, a township of Alleghany county, Pennsylvania, 112 miles from Harrisburg. Pop. 1,700.—The name of several other small townships in the United States.

CLAIR, ST., a river and lake of N. America, lying between the territories of Great Britain and the United States. The river is the channel of communication between lakes Huron and Erie.—The LAKE is of sufficient depth for ships of the largest burden. It lies between the state of Michigan and Upper Canada. Ext. 30 miles long, and 12 broad. Area, 360 square miles. It has many islands, and receives numerous streams.

CLAIR, ST., the name of several parishes, towns, and villages of France, none of them with a population above 1,800.

CLAIRAC, klair'-ak, a town of France, in the department of the Lot and Garonne, and on the Lot, 16 miles from Agen. Manf. Paper; and it has a trade in fruits and wines. Pop. 4,500.—Under Louis XIII., during the religious wars, this place was taken and burnt several times, more particularly in 1621.

CLAIRAUT, Alexis, klair'-o, a precocious French mathematician, who, at the age of 4, could read and write, at 9 had made some progress in algebra and geometry, and solved several difficult problems; and at 11 produced a memoir on curves, which appeared in the "Miscellanea Berolinensia," with an honourable certificate of the Academy of Sciences. That learned body admitted him an associate at the age of 18; and he was one of the academicians who went to the north to measure a degree, with the view of ascertaining the figure of the earth. B. at Paris, 1713; D. 1765.—He wrote Elements of Geometry and of Algebra, a treatise on the Figure of the Earth, Tables of the Moon, &c.

CLAIRBORNE, klair'-born, the name of two counties of the United States.—1. In Mississippi. Area, 480 square miles. Pop. 15,000, of whom two thirds are slaves.—2. In Tenessee. Area, 580 square miles. Pop. 10,000, of whom about a tenth are slaves.

CLAIRFAIT, Count de, klair'-fai, a famous Austrian general, who first distinguished himself against the Turks. In the wars which signalized the close of the 18th century, he fought with great valour against the French; and, in 1795, commanded the army of Mayence, which attacked the French camp formed before that city. This he forced, and took a number of prisoners. Whilst following up his success, he received, at Mannheim, an order to retire, on which he resigned his command. Subsequently, he became a member of the Aulic council of war, and shortly afterwards died, at Vienna, 1798. B. at Brussels, 1733.—Clairfait was considered by the French the ablest general opposed to them during the war.

CLAIRON, Claire Josephine de la Tude, klair'-awng, a distinguished French actress, who, in her 12th year, first made her appearance on the stage. She subsequently became the greatest tragic performer of her age and country, but lived a licentious life. B. near Condé, 1723; D. 1803.

CLANDONACH, klăn'-do-nak, a barony of Ireland, in Queen's county, Leinster. It is the middle part of the former barony of Upper Ossory. Pop. 12,000.

CLANWILLIAM, a district of Cape Colony, S. Africa, bounded on the N. by the Kousie river, S. by the Great Berg river, E. by the Great Riet river, and W. by the Atlantic Ocean. Area, 22,112 square miles. Pop. about 10,000.—The capital of this district is of the same name, and is about 140 miles from Cape Town.

CLAPHAM, klăp'-ham, the name of several parishes of England, the most important of which is that which forms a suburb of London, 4 miles from St. Paul's. Area, 1,070 acres. Pop. 16,290.

CLAPPERTON, Hugh, Captain, klăp'-per-ton, a distinguished African traveller. At the age of 13 he was apprenticed to the captain of a ship; but having been caught violating the excise laws, by taking a few pounds of rock-salt to the mistress of the house frequented by the crew of his ship, consented, rather than be subjected to a trial, to go on board a man-of-war, and accordingly joined the Clorinda frigate, commanded by Captain Briggs. Through the interest of his friends, he was promoted to the rank of a midshipman, and in 1814 was made lieutenant. He was now appointed to the command of the Confiance schooner, on Lake Erie, in N. America, and was held in high estimation as an honourable member of his profession. In 1822 he accompanied Lieutenant Denham and Dr. Oudney on an expedition to Central Africa; and, on his return, received a captaincy. In this enterprise, he and Denham determined the positions of Bournou, Houssa, and Mandara. Oudney had died at an early stage of the journey, in 1824. The principal object of the expedition had been to ascertain the course and the termination of the Niger; but, as they were unsuccessful, he was dispatched again, in 1825, on the same journey. He and his party landed, in the month of November, in the Bight of Benin; but they were all more or less attacked with a sickness which proved fatal to several of them. He had proceeded to Chungary, a village four miles from Saccatoo, where he was seized with dysentery, which carried him off. B. at Annan, Scotland, 1788; D. at Chungary, 1827.

CLAPTON, klăp'-ton, a village of Middlesex, about 4 miles N.E. of London, continuous with the suburbs of the metropolis. Pop. 6,000.—Also, the name of several parishes of England, none of them with a population above 200.

CLARA, klair'-a, a town of the island of Cuba, 50 miles from Trinidad. Pop. about 6,000, of whom a sixth are slaves.—Also, an island of the Mergui group, off the Canaries.

CLARE, klair, a parish and town of Suffolk, on the Stour, 15 miles from Bury St. Edmunds. It has a handsome church. Pop. 1,800.

CLARE, a maritime county of Ireland, in the province of Munster. It is separated by the river Shannon from the county of Limerick on the S.E.; the Atlantic Ocean bounds it on the W., the Bay of Galway on the N., and a portion of the counties of Galway and Tipperary on the E. Area, 1,294 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, and the soil light, but extremely fertile, producing potatoes, oats, and barley. It is watered by the Fergus and its affluents. Minerals. Lead, iron, and inexhaustible coal-mines. Manf. Coarse linens, hosiery, and flannels. Pop. 213,000.—The name of several other places in Ireland, and also of a river in Connaught.

CLARE, John, the son of a Northamptonshire farm-labourer, who was early sent to work in the fields, whilst in by-hours he received occasional instruction at a neighbouring parish school. When he became able to read, he purchased a few books, and, by degrees, initiated himself into composition in verse. In 1818 he produced a "Sonnet to the Setting Sun," which attracted the notice of a bookseller at Stamford, and led to the publication of a small volume entitled "Poems descriptive of Rural Life and Scenery," which was favourably received. He subsequently produced the "Village Minstrel, and other Poems;" the "Shepherd's Calendar, and other Poems;" and in 1836 the "Rural Muse." These are all pleasing effusions, but exhibiting neither strength nor much originality. Clare unfortunately lost his reason, brought on by brooding over some unsuccessful trading speculations, which, although comparatively trifling, to a mind like his were sufficiently overwhelming. B. at Helpstone, Northamptonshire, 1793.

CLARE GALWAY, a parish of Ireland, in the county of Galway, 6 miles from Galway, and drained by the river Clare. Pop. 2,800.

CLAREMONT, klair'-mont, a domain and royal palace of England, near Esher, in the county of Surrey. It belongs to the king of the Belgians, and was the residence in which Louis Philippe, the ex-king of the French, died in exile. After his death, the ex-royal family of France continued to reside there.

CLAREMONT, a town of Cheshire county, New Hampshire, U.S., on Connecticut river, 11 miles from Charlestown. Pop. 4,000.

CLARENDON, Earl of, Edward Hyde, klär'-en-don, lord high chancellor of England, studied the law under his uncle, Nicholas Hyde, chief justice of the King's Bench. Being an ardent royalist, he attached himself, during the civil war, to the cause of Charles, and greatly contributed to the Restoration. In the exercise of his judicial functions his conduct was above reproach, yet he became unpopular, and was forced to resign his official situations. To escape the penalties of a threatened impeachment, he prudently retired into exile, and passed the remainder of his days in France. B. at Dinton, Wiltshire, 1608; D. at Rouen, 1674.—Clarendon wrote the well-known "History of the Rebellion," which is held in high estimation, and will transmit his name to a distant posterity. His daughter Anne was married to the duke of York, who by her had two daughters, Anne and Mary, both of whom ascended the English throne.

CLARENDON, George William Frederick Villiers, fourth earl of, succeeded to the title in 1838. He was educated at Cambridge, and in 1823 was appointed a commissioner of excise in Dublin, in which capacity he displayed abilities sufficient to recommend him to some higher employment by the government. Accordingly, in 1831, he arranged a commercial treaty with France, and in 1833 became minister plenipotentiary at the court of Madrid. When he succeeded to his title, he came to England, and took his seat in the House of Lords. Here he soon distinguished himself, and in 1840 became lord privy seal in the Melbourne administration, and, before the end of the same year, chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster. In the following year Sir Robert Peel came into power; but in 1846, when Lord John Russell was appointed to the premiership, Lord Clarendon was made president of the Board of Trade, which office he resigned for the lord-lieutenancy of Ireland, on the duties of which he entered in the following year. He continued to exercise his viceregal authority through a very trying course of years till 1852, when, with the other members of the ministry, he resigned, and was succeeded by the earl of Eglinton. On the accession to power of the Coalition ministry, under the earl of Aberdeen, he accepted the seals of the Foreign Office, which he also continued to hold under the administration of Lord Palmerston, cementing the French and Sardinian alliance in reference to the Russian war. If, before that contest, he displayed some disposition, as was said, to yield to the czar, yet his firmness at the congress of Paris in 1856, in respect to the boundaries of Russia and her right to the Isle of Serpents, showed that he well knew how to uphold the honour and interests of his country. B. in London, 1800.

CLARENDON, a township of Rutland county, Vermont, U.S., 28 miles from Windsor. Pop. 1,798.

CLARENDON PARK, anciently a royal forest of England, in Wiltshire, 3 miles from Salisbury. Area, 4,160 acres. In this park there are still to be seen the vestiges of a hunting-seat, or royal palace, in which Henry II., with his council, enacted, in 1194, the "Constitutions of Clarendon," designed to check the encroachments of the clergy, and which occasioned a strong resistance from the churchmen, with Thomas à Becket at their head.

CLARK, Sir James, klark, physician in ordinary to Queen Victoria, and equally distinguished for his public humanity and private benevolence. He received the rudiments of his education at the grammar-school of Fordyce, a maritime parish of Scotland, and afterwards entered King's College, Aberdeen, where he took his degree of M.A. He then went to Edinburgh, where he pursued his medical studies, and, in 1809, received an appointment in the navy, in which he remained till 1815, when he returned to Edinburgh, and, in two years more, took his degree of M.D. in the university of that city. He now set out on a continental tour, and settled in Rome, where he practised for eight years, during which he pursued his professional duties with unwearied zeal, earnestly devoting himself to the great cause of humanity in investigating modes for the alleviation of its suffering, or the cure of those numerous ills to which "flesh is heir." He visited the principal universities and medical schools of Germany, France, and Italy, directing his especial attention to the influence of those climates, chiefly resorted to by invalids, upon the various kinds of their diseases. The result of these investigations, and his otherwise large experience, was the publication, in 1829, of his work "On the Sanative Influence of Climate," a fourth edition of which appeared in 1856, and is now an authority. Indeed, according to the language of the "London Medical Chirurgical Review," it is "an indispensable companion to every invalid who seeks restoration of health or prolongation of life beneath a milder sky than that which lowers over his native land." Whilst in Rome, Dr. Clark became known to Prince Leopold of Saxe-Coburg, and, in 1824, was by him appointed his physician. In 1826 he came to England, and settled in London; and was, shortly afterwards, made physician to St. George's Parochial Infirmary. In 1832 he was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society, and, in 1835, physician to the duchess of Kent and the Princess Victoria. On the accession of her majesty to the throne, he continued her physician. In the same year of his appointment to that position, he published his treatise "On Pulmonary Consumption," in which he shows that this insidious disease has its origin in a deteriorated condition of the system, an opinion not generally entertained until first clearly demonstrated in this treatise. On the establishment of the London University, Dr. Clark was elected one of the senate; and, with the view of remedying some defects in the system of English "Clinical Instruction," he wrote a pamphlet on that subject. In 1838 he was created a baronet, a title well earned, seeing it has been won in the field of humanity, in endeavouring to promote health and preserve life by every means which a sound judgment, great knowledge, and a large practical experience can place at his command. B. at Cullen, Banffshire, 1788.

CLARK, William Tierney, a civil engineer, who, in 1808, went as a draughtsman from Bristol to London, and entered into the service of Mr. Rennie, with whom he remained till 1811, when he was appointed engineer of the West Middlesex Waterworks. This post he retained throughout his life, making great improvements in the establishment, and realizing large profits to the company. In 1819 he undertook the completion of the Thames and Medway Canal, which he successfully accomplished; and, in 1824, commenced the suspension-bridge over the Thames at Hammersmith. In 1827 he finished this work, after which the duke of Norfolk employed him to construct another over the Arun. In 1839 he began another over the Danube, at Pesth, which was not completed till 1849, at a cost of £622,000. This was the greatest work of his life, and it gave so much satisfaction to his royal patron, the emperor of Austria, that he presented him with a box set in brilliants. For a design for a suspension-bridge over the Neva, the emperor of Russia sent him a first-class gold medal. B. in Somersetshire, 1783; D. 1852. He was a member of several learned societies.

CLARKE, Samuel, a learned English philosopher and divine, who became chaplain to Bishop Moore, of Norwich, and received from that prelate the rectory of Drayeot, in Norfolk. In 1701 he published his "Paraphrase of the Gospel of St. Matthew," which was afterwards extended to the remaining Gospels. In 1706 appeared his Latin translation of Newton's "Optics," for which Sir Isaac complimented him with £500. About this time he was presented to the rectory of St. Bennet's, Paul's Wharf, London, and appointed chaplain to Queen Anne. In 1709 he obtained the rectory of St. James's, Westminster, and took his degree of D.D. at Cambridge. From this period he continued to publish works upon various subjects, some of them of a doctrinal, and others of a deeply philosophical kind, when, in 1727, he was offered the place of master of the mint, vacant by the death of Sir Isaac Newton, but refused it. He was previously presented to the mastership of Wigston's Hospital, in Leicestershire. In 1729 he published the first twelve books of Homer's "Iliad," with a Latin version and annotations. The remaining books were published by his son in 1732. B. at Norwich, 1675; D. in London, 1729.—Dr. Clarke was a profound scholar, a close reasoner, an acute critic, well versed in mathematics, philosophy, and metaphysics. He was also a man of unaffected manners; mild, amiable, and charitable to those who differed from him.

CLARKE, the name of several counties in the United States, with populations varying between 6,000 and 22,000. They are situate in the following states: Alabama, Mississippi, Ohio, Kentucky, Illinois, Indiana, Missouri, and Arkansas.

CLARKE, Adam, LL.D., an eminent divine, deeply skilled in Oriental languages and Biblical antiquities. His studies were pursued at the school founded by John Wesley, at Kingswood, near Bristol, and at the age of eighteen he became a travelling preacher in the Methodist connection. In the ministerial character, his preaching was both attractive and useful; but it is principally on account of his writings that he is noticed in this work. In 1802 he published, in six volumes, "A Bibliographical Dictionary," which at once procured for him a literary reputation; and although it does not now rank as a very profound work, still it contains a vast body of well-arranged information, and has been once or twice reprinted. He now continued to produce other works, among which may be noticed a laborious "Commentary on the Bible;" a "Narrative of the Illness and Death of Richard Porson;" "Memoirs of the Wesley Family;" "Baxter's Christian Directory," which he edited, and several others of a religious class. His industry was very great; for, besides these and many pamphlets and sermons, he wrote four reports on the state of the public records, and edited the first volume of a new edition of Rymer's "Fœdera." Independently of these labours, his life was devoted to the active promotion of the well-being of his species; and it is impossible to review his character without being impressed with the idea that he was not only a good but a great man. B. 1762; D. at Haydon Hall, 17 miles from London, 1832.

CLARKE, Edward Daniel, LL.D., a distinguished modern traveller, who in 1794 accompanied Lord Berwick to Italy, and in 1799 commenced a tour through Denmark, Sweden, Lapland, Finland, Russia, Tartary, Circassia, Asia Minor, Syria, Palestine, Egypt, Turkey, and Greece. In 1802 he returned by Germany and France, bringing with him many valuable manuscripts, which he presented to the library at Cambridge. He also presented to this university a fragment of the colossal statue of the Eleusinian Ceres, of the best period of Grecian art, and brought with him, besides, a sarcophagus of Alexander, and a magnificent collection of mineralogical specimens. In 1808 he was appointed professor of mineralogy at Cambridge, in which city and its neighbourhood he passed the rest of his life. B. at Willingdon, Sussex, 1769; D. in London, 1822. —A complete edition of his works, in 11 vols., was published after his death.

CLARKE, Mrs. Cowden, whose maiden name was Mary Novello, was the daughter of a distinguished musician. In 1828 she married Mr. Cowden Clarke, who had intimate connections with Charles Lamb, Keats, Leigh Hunt, and other literary celebrities. In 1829 Mrs. Clarke commenced her Analysis of Shakspeare's works, and after sixteen years of patient labour and research, produced, in 1845, her "Concordance to Shakspeare," which obtained, deservedly, a great success. B. 1809.—Her husband is the author of one or two books, and her sister, Clara Novello, has attained considerable distinction as a singer.

CLARK'S RIVER rises in the Rocky Mountains, United States, and after a course of 500 miles joins the Columbia, in lat. 48° 40′ N.; lon. 117° 30′ W.

CLARKSON, Thomas, klark'-son, an English philanthropist, one of the first advocates of the emancipation of the negroes, was educated with a view to the church, but relinquished his chances of preferment, to advocate the abolition of negro slavery. He laboured, in conjunction with Mr. Wilberforce and other benefactors of mankind, in the cause he had espoused, and lived to see a law for the entire abolition of the traffic in slaves, passed on the 25th March, 1807. It took the labour of another twenty years, however, to effect the abolition of slavery in the islands of the West Indies; but it was accomplished in 1833, when the Emancipation Act liberated, for a compensation of twenty millions to the owners, nearly a million of slaves. Declining health prevented Mr. Clarkson taking so active a part at this period as he had hitherto done; but in the achievement of the work to which he had so long devoted himself, he continued to labour to the last. B. at Wisbeach, 1760; D. at Playford Hall, Sussex, 1846.

CLAUDE, St., klode, a town of France, in the department of the Jura, 25 miles from Lons-le-Saunier. Manf. Toys, jewellery, watches, hardware buttons, and articles of ivory, horn, and wood. Pop. 6,000.

CLAUDE, Lorraine, klawd, a famous painter, so called from the place of his birth. His real name was Claude Gelée, and the poverty of his parents early compelled them to find some employment for their child; and accordingly, he was made a pastrycook. Receiving some instructions in drawing, however, he went to Rome, and was employed by the painter Tassi, who grounded him in the principles of his art. Determined to take nature for his master, he passed whole days in the fields, watching their various aspects under the mutations of the skies, and became one of the greatest of landscape painters. He painted in fresco as well as in oil. His works are numerous, and to be found in most of the principal galleries of Europe. B. in Lorraine, 1600; D. at Rome, 1682.—England is specially rich in the landscapes of this artist. The National Gallery alone has ten of his paintings, and some of them rank among the finest of his works.

CLAUDIANUS, klaw'-di-ai'-nus, a Latin poet, of Egyptian birth, who, at an early age, settled in Italy, and attached himself to Stilicho, the minister of the emperor Honorius, but was in 408 disgraced, together with his patron. He enjoyed, amongst his contemporaries, so distinguished a reputation, that they proclaimed him equal to Homer and Virgil. What, however, has come down to the moderns of his works does not seem to justify these extravagant eulogies. His verses possess harmony, but are monotonous; there is also imagination in them, but little invention and genius. The best of his performances are his "Elogies of Stilicho," and his poems on "Rufinus and Eutropius." B. at Alexandria, about 365; D. at the beginning of the 5th century. (See STILICHO.)

CLAUDIUS, a name common to many illustrious Roman emperors, consuls, generals, censors, &c.; of whom the most worthy of remark are the following:—

CLAUDIUS I., Tiber. Drusus Nero, surnamed Germanicus and Britannicus, the fourth emperor of Rome, was elected by the soldiers after the murder of Caligula. He made himself popular at first by adorning and beautifying the city with buildings. He passed over into Britain, and received a triumph for victories which were gained by his generals, whilst he, with his favourites, was revelling in licentiousness. He married four wives, one of whom, named Messalina, he put to death on account of her lust and debauchery. He was, at last, poisoned by another, called Agrippina, who had made him name her son, Nero, as his successor. D. 54.

CLAUDIUS II., surnamed the Goth, was a Dalmatian, and succeeded Gallienus, in 268. He conquered the Goths, Scythians, and Heruli, and killed no less than 300,000 in a battle. D. in Pannonia, 270.—This prince has been called the second Trajan, as much on account of his valour in battle, as his justice in administration.

CLAUDIUS, Appius, a Roman Decemvir, became enamoured of Virginia, the daughter of Virginius, an officer in the army employed against the Æqui. Endeavouring by every base means in his power to prevail over her virtue, but being constantly baffled, he had recourse to the extraordinary expedient of suborning a man named Claudius to demand her, under the pretence that she was the child of his slave, and brought up as her own, by the wife of Virginius. This claim was brought before the tribunal of the Decemvir, who decreed, that till all the witnesses should appear, Virginia should be delivered to the claimant. The people opposed this decree, when Virginius was privily sent for, and appeared before the tribunal. Being unable, however, to get the sentence revoked, he snatched up a butcher's knife, and stabbed his daughter to the heart. An insurrection ensued. The army having joined Virginius, the senate was unable to resist them. Accordingly, the decemvirate was dissolved, and Appius committed to prison, where he died, 449 B.C.—Upon these events, James Sheridan Knowles founded his celebrated tragedy of "Virginius."

CLAUSEL, Bertrand, Count, klo'-sel, entered the French army at an early age, and as aide-de-camp to General Pérignon, served in the army of the Pyrenees in 1794-95. With General Leclerc he went to St. Domingo, and there commanded a division in endeavouring to suppress an insurrection of the blacks. He next served in Spain, and was severely wounded at the battle of Salamanca. In 1813 he was almost daily engaged with the English during the retreat of the French, before Wellington, into France. On the return of Napoleon I. from Elba, he rejoined his standard; but on his fall, he was compelled to leave his country and retire to America. He subsequently returned, and in 1830 succeeded Marshal Bourmont as commander-in-chief in Africa, and, in the following year, was created a marshal. In 1832 he was made governor of Algeria, but, being baffled in his attempt on Constantine, in 1836 he returned to Paris with a broken spirit, from which he never revived. B. at Miropoix, 1777; D. at Toulouse, 1841.

CLAUSENBURG, KLAUSENBURG, or KOLOSVAR, klo'-sen-boorg, one of the free royal capital cities of Transylvania, and of a county of the same name, on the Little Szamos, 70 miles from Hermanstadt. It contains a handsome public square, and several elegant streets, churches, and private houses. The gardens and public walks are also elegant. It is divided into Old and New, and is inclosed by a wall and ditch. It is the seat of the Transylvanian diets, of the Unitarian superintendence of Transylvania, and of a Protestant consistory. Manf. China-ware, woollens, and paper. Pop. 20,000. This is the birthplace of Mathias Coronius, king of Transylvania.

CLAUSTHAL, or KLAUSTHAL, klo'-stal, a town of Hanover, in the Upper Hartz, close by Zellerfeld. The public buildings are, a mine-office, two churches, a public school, an orphan-house, a museum, and a mint. It is the principal mining town in the Hartz, and near it are the richest lead and silver mines in that country. Pop. about 10,000.

CLAVIJO Y FAXARDO, Joseph, kla-ve'-cho e fax-ar'-do, a Spanish writer, who was named keeper of the royal records, and translated from the French the Natural History of Buffon, a work highly esteemed. This procured for him the vice-directorship of the Cabinet of Natural History of Madrid, which post he retained till his death, in 1806. B. in the Canary Isles, 1730.—Behaving very unworthily to a sister of Beaumarchais, a French writer, the latter fought a duel with Clavijo, and made the Spaniard sign a declaration that he had been guilty of a misdeed, and Clavijo was, in consequence, disgraced by the king for a term. This episode has been dramatized by Göthe and others.

CLAXBY, klăx'-be, the name of several parishes of England, none of them with a population above 300.

CLAY, klai, the name of several counties in the United States, with populations varying from 6,000 to 12,000. They are situate in the following states:—Kentucky, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri.

CLAY, Henry, an American statesman, who was called to the bar at an early age, and distinguished himself as an advocate. In 1803 he was elected member of the Kentucky legislature, and in 1806 a member of the senate at Washington. He afterwards was elected a member of Congress, and became president of that body. In 1814 he was one of the commission sent to Ghent to negotiate peace with Great Britain, and in 1825 was appointed, by President Adams, foreign secretary. In 1828 he contested the presidency with General Jackson, but was defeated, and again in 1832, 1836, and 1844, he was a candidate, but did not meet with success. Retiring, for a time, from public affairs, he returned to take his seat in the senate, and there enjoyed, until a short time before his death, a very great influence. B. in Virginia, 1777; D. 1852.—Henry Clay was the head of the Whigs. Of a conciliatory disposition, he on two occasions, in 1820 and in 1850, succeeded in effecting a compromise between the slave states and the abolitionists, and his death was felt as a public loss.

CLAYDON, klai'-don, the name of several parishes of England, none of them with a population above 1,000.

CLAYTON, klai'-ton, a county of Iowa, U. S. Area, 758 square miles. Pop. 4,000.—Also a township in New York, on the St. Lawrence, 12 miles from Waterton. Pop. 4,300.

CLAYTON, the name of several parishes and townships of England, none of them with a population above 5,300.

CLEANTHES, kle-ăn'-thes, a Grecian philosopher, a disciple of Zeno. While pursuing his studies, he maintained himself by his manual labour,—succeeded his master in the school, and had for pupils kings Antigonus and Chrysippus. Starved himself to death at the age of 90, 240 B.C.

CLEARCHUS, kle-ar'-kus, a Lacedæmonian general, who was condemned to death for having abused his authority at Byzantium, where he had been sent as an ally. Retiring into Persia, he offered his services to the younger Cyrus, and raised a body of Greek mercenaries, with whom he acted against Artaxerxes, the brother of Cyrus, and king of Persia. After the battle of Cunaxa, where Cyrus fell, and whilst he was leading the retreat of the 10,000 immortalized by his successor Xenophon, Tissaphernes, the Persian general, inveigled him into an interview, and slew him, 401 A.C.

CLEARFIELD, kleer'-feeld, a county in the central part of Pennsylvania, U.S., on a creek which runs into the W. branch of the Susquehannah. Area, 1,425 square miles. Pop. 13,000.

CLÉMENCE, Isaure, klai'-mawnce, a wealthy and illustrious lady of Toulouse, who was descended, it is supposed, from the counts of that city. Towards the year 1490, she instituted at Toulouse the "Jeux Floraux" (Floral Fêtes), and left considerable revenues for the support of these gatherings. D. about 1450; D. 1500 or 1513. These fêtes were established to encourage the art of poesy, and at them were distributed prizes for the best effusions. These prizes consisted of different flowers in gold or silver. Something of the same kind had been commenced in 1322, and in 1695 an academy was founded from the funds, and exists at this day.

CLÉMENT, ST., klai'-maw, the name of numerous villages and parishes of France, none of them with a population above 2,000.

CLEMENT I. and II., klem'-ent, popes of Rome, of whom one died about 100, and the other 1047.

CLEMENT III. succeeded Gregory VIII. in 1187, and preached a crusade against the Saracens. D. 1191.

CLEMENT IV. was elected in 1265. He signed, with St. Louis of France, the "Pragmatic Sanction," which put an end to the differences existing between Rome and France. D. at Viterbo, 1268.

CLEMENT V. was elected in 1305, and removed the residence of the popes from Rome to Avignon. He was the tool of Philip the Fair of France, and, at his desire, suppressed the order of Knights Templars. D. 1314.

CLEMENT VI. was elected in 1342. In his pontificate, Rienzi attempted to establish the republic at Rome. This pope was a learned man, and had a prodigious memory. D. 1352.

CLEMENT VII., cousin of Leo X., succeeded Adrian VI. in 1523. He entered into the "holy league," with Francis I. of France, the Italian princes, and Henry VIII. of England, against the emperor Charles V. In the war which ensued, Rome was taken and plundered, and the pope himself was shut up in the castle of St. Angelo. He had, consequently, to make terms with Charles. Subsequently, Henry VIII. having repudiated Catharine of Aragon and married Anne Boleyn, Clement excommunicated him in 1534. This occasioned a schism, and ultimately resulted in the separation of England from the Romish church. D. 1534.

CLEMENT VIII. was elected in 1592. He absolved Henry IV. of France, upon that monarch making public profession of Catholicism, and was chiefly instrumental in bringing about the peace of Vervins in 1598. He elevated to the rank of cardinal, Baronius, Bellarmin, and other distinguished men, and was a learned and sagacious pontiff. D. 1605.

CLEMENT IX. was elected in 1667. During his pontificate, Candia was taken from the Venetians by the Turks. D. 1669.

CLEMENT X. was the successor of the above. Being of great age, the government was left in the hands of Cardinal Paluzzi, a distant relative. D. 1676.

CLEMENT XI. was elected in 1700. His pontificate was disturbed by the quarrels of the Jesuits and the Jansenists, and on issuing the famous bull "Unigenitus," a schism was produced, which lasted many years, between France and Rome. D. 1721.

CLEMENT XII. succeeded Benedict XIII. in 1730, and reformed many abuses of the church. D. 1740.

CLEMENT XIII. was elected in 1758. The Jesuits having been expelled from France, Spain, Portugal, and Naples, he made great but useless efforts to reinstate them. In 1768 he lost Avignon and Benevento. D. 1769.—There is a splendid mausoleum to him in St. Peter's, executed by Canova, who was eight years employed on it.

CLEMENT XIV. was the successor of the above. Of a conciliating disposition, he lived on good terms with all the European courts, and recovered Avignon and Benevento, which had been lost under the preceding pontiff. Pressed to decide the question of the abolition of the order of the Jesuits, he, in 1773, after temporizing for several years, issued the bull ordaining their suppression. D. 1774.

CLEMENT, Francis, a learned French Benedictine monk, who continued the "Literary History of France," commenced by Rivet. He composed the 11th and 12th volumes of that compilation, and also published the 12th and 13th volumes of the collection of French historians begun by Boquet. His greatest achievement, however, was the extension and improvement of the work entitled "L'Art de vérifier les Dates, après J.C.," which had been originated by Dantine, and re-written and published by Clémencet. After thirteen years' labour, he raised it to three large vols. folio, which appeared from 1783 to 1792. He was meditating the production of a similar work on ancient chronology, with the title of "L'Art de vérifier les Dates avant J.C.," when he died, in 1793. B. at Bèze, in Burgundy, 1714.—Clement was a laborious writer, and was the author of several other works besides those mentioned above.

CLEMENT DANES, ST., a parish of London, a little to the W. of Temple Bar. It has a church in the Strand. Area, 52 acres. Pop. 16,000.

CLEMENTI, Muzio, kle-men'-te, an eminent Italian musical composer, and considered the father of pianoforte music. At an early age he evinced a decided predilection for his art, and even in his ninth year passed his examination as an organist. In his thirteenth, he wrote a mass for four voices, and attracted the notice of Mr. Peter Beckford, an English gentleman travelling in Italy, who became his patron, and took him to his seat in Dorsetshire, in England. Here he devoted himself to other studies, and became accomplished in several languages, as well as in various branches of science, without neglecting the cultivation of his talents in the more particular art in which he seemed, by nature, designed to excel. In his 18th year he composed his celebrated opera, which is considered the basis on which the whole fabric of modern pianoforte sonatas is founded. His fame now extended to the continent, and he rose to the highest rank in his profession. In 1800 he engaged in the music trade, still continuing, however, to devote himself to his art throughout the remainder of his days. B. at Rome, 1752; D. in London, 1832.—He was buried in the cloisters of Westminster Abbey.

CLEOBIS and BITON, kle'-o-bis, bi'-ton, two youths, sons of Cydippe, the priestess of Juno, at Argos. When oxen could not be procured to draw their mother's chariot to the temple of Juno, they put themselves under the yoke, and drew it, amidst the acclamations of the multitude, who congratulated the mother on the piety of her sons. Cydippe entreated the goddess to reward them with the best gift that could be granted to mortals. When Cydippe came forth from the temple, she found her sons "asleep for ever" in each other's arms.

CLEOBULUS, kle-o-bu'-lus, one of the seven wise men of Greece, was the son of Evagoras, of Lindos, and was famous for his fine form. His maxims were, "Do good unto your friends, that you may attach them to you the more; do good unto your enemies, that you may make friends of them." D. 560 B.C.

CLEOBURY MORTIMER, kle-o'-ber-e, a parish and town of Shropshire, 10 miles from Ludlow, beautifully situate in a valley. The Clee hills, in the vicinity, abound in coals and ironstone. Pop. 1,716, mostly engaged in the collieries and agriculture.

CLEOMBROTUS, kle-om'-bro-tus, king of Sparta, gave battle, at Leuctra, to the Thebans, headed by Epaminondas, and was there killed, 371 B.C.—This battle, where the Spartan army was almost entirely destroyed, put an end to the pre-eminence of Sparta in Greece.

CLEOMENES III., kle-om'-e-nes, king of Sparta, succeeded his father Leonidas. He was of an enterprising spirit, and resolved to restore the ancient discipline of Lycurgus in its full force, by banishing luxury and intemperance. He made war against the Achæans, and attempted to destroy their league. Aratus, the general of the Achæans, who supposed himself inferior to his enemy, called Antigonus to his assistance; and Cleomenes, when he had fought the unfortunate battle of Sellasia, 222 B.C., retired into Egypt, to the court of Ptolemy Evergetes, where his wife and children had gone before him. Ptolemy received him with great cordiality; but his successor, weak and suspicious, soon expressed his jealousy of this noble stranger, and imprisoned him. Cleomenes killed himself, and his body was flayed and exposed on a cross, 219 B.C.—There were others of this name, but of inferior note.

CLEON, kle'-on, a name common to many eminent Greeks, of whom the most famous is an Athenian, who, though originally a tanner, became, by his intrigues and eloquence, general of the armies of the state. He took Thoron, in Thrace, and was killed at Amphipolis, in a battle with Brasidas, the Spartan general, 422 B.C.

CLEOPATRA, kle-o-pä'-tra, queen of Egypt, famous for her great beauty, crimes, and misfortunes, was the daughter of Ptolemy Auletes, who died 51 B.C., leaving his eldest son, Ptolemy Dionysius, and his daughter, Cleopatra, to reign conjointly over the kingdom. They, however, disagreed, and Cleopatra was compelled to seek for safety in Syria. Here she met Cæsar, whilst engaged in the pursuit of Pompey, after the battle of Pharsalia, and, by her fascinating manners, completely won him over to her cause. Accordingly, he determined that she should be reseated on the Egyptian throne, which led to an attack upon his own quarters by the king's troops. This resulted in the overthrow of her brother's forces, and himself being drowned in the Nile. Cleopatra then ascended the throne in conjunction with her younger brother Ptolemy, whom she subsequently poisoned. On the return of Cæsar to Rome, she followed him, and lived there till his assassination,

44 B.C. After this event she returned to Egypt, and about 40 B.C., after the battle of Philippi, was summoned by Antony, to answer the charge alleged against her, of having assisted Brutus. When she made her appearance before him, however, he could not resist her charms, and was induced to marry her, repudiating his former consort, Octavia, the sister of Augustus. War now ensued between Augustus and Antony, and, at the battle of Actium, Cleopatra fled, and her paramour was defeated. The fallen queen, to escape the humiliation of gracing the triumph of Augustus, applied an asp to her breast, and died of the wound, 30 B.C. —She was a woman of genius, versed in several languages, but ambitious and voluptuous, although in her greatest extravagances there was a splendour and grandeur which seemed almost to refine them. With her ended the dynasty of the Greek kings in Egypt, which began with Ptolemæus, the son of Lagus, 323 B.C. (See ANTONY and CÆSAR.)

CLEOSTRATUS, kle-os'-trā-tus, an ancient philosopher and astronomer of Tenedos. He is said to have introduced the constellations of the zodiac, and reformed the Greek calendar. Lived between 548 and 432 B.C.

CLER, LE, General, le(r)klair, a distinguished French officer, who fell, mortally wounded, on the field of Magenta, June 4, 1859.

CLERK, John, of Eldin, klerk, the inventor of an improved system of naval tactics, in reference to what is called "breaking the line." This idea was first acted upon by Sir George (afterwards Lord) Rodney, on the 12th April, 1782, when the French, under De Grasse, were defeated in the W. Indies. His plan was subsequently acted upon by both Howe and Nelson, and uniformly met with success. He published an account of his system in "An Essay on Naval Tactics, &c.," but his claim to the originality of the idea has been disputed by General Sir Howard Douglas, whose father was captain of Rodney's fleet at the time of the action, and who claims the merit for Lord Rodney. Mr. Clerk had never made a single voyage on sea, and was therefore no practical sailor. B. in Scotland; D. 1812.

CLERMONT-FERRAND, klair'-mawnt, a town of France, in the department of the Puy de Dôme, situate between two small rivers, 212 miles from Paris. It has rather a gloomy appearance, and may be said to consist of two towns, Clermont and Mont Ferrand, united by a promenade. The cathedral, which stands in the centre of the town, is one of the finest in France, though it is in an imperfect state. The college is a beautiful edifice, and there is a cabinet of natural history, a botanic garden, a neat theatre, and several hospitals. There are four public squares, the largest of which serves as a market-place. In one of them is an elegant obelisk, erected by the town to the memory of General Desaix, who was born in the neighbourhood; and in one of its suburbs is the fountain of St. Alyne, which for 700 years has deposited its incrustations upon one spot, until they have formed a singular natural bridge. Manf. Paper, hats, leather, pottery, linen, serge, ratteens, druggets, and other woollen stuffs. Pop. 34,000. —Here, in 1095, Peter the Hermit, assisted by Pope Urban V., proclaimed the first crusade.—It is the name of several other small towns in France.

CLERMONT, a county in the S.W. of Ohio, U.S., on Ohio river. Area, 484 square miles. Desc. Fertile in the usual cereals. Pop. 32,000.—Also a township in Columbia county, New York, U.S., on the Hudson, 45 miles below Albany. Pop. 1,200.

CLERMONT-TONNERE, an island of the Pacific Ocean, presenting a slight elevation above the sea. Ext. 10 miles long, by about 2 broad. Lat. 18° 32′ 49″ S. Lon. 136° 21′ 12″ W. The French claim its discovery by Admiral Duperry in 1825.

CLEVEDON, kleve'-don, two parishes in England, neither of them with a population above 2,000.

CLEVELAND, kleve'-land, a county of the United States, in N. Carolina. Area, 640 square miles. Pop. 11,000.—Also a post-township of Ohio, at the mouth of Cuyahoga river, on Lake Erie, 54 miles from Warren. The Ohio Canal has its terminus in this town, and its harbour is one of the best on the lake. The trade is also extensive. Pop. 18,000.

CLEVELAND, a subdivision of the North Riding of the county of York, bounded by the German Ocean on the E., by the river Tees on the N., by the Cleveland Hills on the S., and by Allertonshire on the W. Ext. 40 miles long, with an average breadth of 16 to 18. It comprises the port of Middlesbrough, the market-towns of Gisborough, Stokesley, and Yarm, and the watering-places of Redcar, Cotham, and numerous villages and hamlets.—At one of these (Marton) the celebrated Captain Cook was born, and the not less distinguished Lawrence Sterne, author of "Tristram Shandy," held the curacy of Skelton, a village in the same district. The Cleveland Hills are remarkably abundant in iron-stone, and several blast-furnaces for the reduction of the ore are established in their neighbourhood. From them, also, and especially from a remarkable conical hill, about 2,000 feet high, called Rosebury Topping, a fine view of the sea, the river Tees, and the vale of Cleveland, is obtained. Pop. about 40,000, chiefly engaged in agricultural pursuits.

CLEVELAND, or CLEIVELAND, John, an English poet, joined the army of the cavaliers, and was the first poet who sung in favour of the royal cause. In 1655, being taken prisoner, he was released by Cromwell, to whom he sent a moving petition. B. at Loughborough, 1613; D. in London, 1659. The best edition of his works is that of 1687.—Fuller, in his "Worthies of Leicestershire," says of this poet that he was "a general artist, pure Latinist, exquisite orator, and eminent poet." We have, however, an opportunity of judging, and think that his genius will hardly sustain such extravagant praise. When he was in the zenith of his fame, the sheets of "Paradise Lost" were struggling into a dim light through the mists of bigotry and party prejudice. The great epic was scarcely read, whilst impression after impression of Cleveland's poems were pouring from the press. But how changed are these things now! Milton lives, and shall endure as long as the language; whilst the effusions of the other are never heard of among the people.

CLEVES, klaives, a town of Rhenish Prussia, about 2½ miles from the Rhine, and 12 miles from Nimeguen. It is neatly built in the Dutch style, and surrounded by walls, but not strongly fortified. Pop. about 9,000.—Cleves was formerly the capital of the ancient duchy of Cleves, which formed a portion of the German empire.

CLEW BAY, kloo, an inlet of the Atlantic, in the county of Mayo, Connaught, Ireland. Opposite its entrance is Clare Island, and at its upper end an archipelago of about 300 small fertile and cultivated islands.

CLIFFE, klif, the name of several townships and parishes of England, none of them with a population above 1,500.

CLIFTON, klif'-ton, a parish and village of Gloucestershire, about 1 mile from Bristol. Area of parish, 910 acres. The town is a watering-place, standing on the summit of a limestone rock, separated from another by the river Avon. It has hot baths which contain an unusual quantity of carbonic acid gas, with salts of magnesia. Over the Avon, it was in contemplation to erect a suspension-bridge, which would admit under it the largest ships; but although the supports were raised some years ago, the bridge has not been proceeded with. Pop. 18,000.

CLIFTON, the name of numerous parishes in England, none of them with a population above 3,000.

CLINTON DE WITT, klin'-ton, an active public citizen of New York, who filled the office of mayor in 1815, when he became a candidate for the presidency of the United States, but was unsuccessful. Between 1817 and 1826 he was frequently elected governor of the state of New York; but he is noticed here principally on account of his being the most ardent promoter of the scheme for cutting the great canal from Lake Erie to the Atlantic Ocean. B. at Little Britain, Orange county, New York, 1769; D. 1828.

CLINTON, Henry, K.C.B., an English general, who, in 1788, was appointed to the command of the army in N. America, but in 1781 was so unsuccessful that his conduct was severely censured, and he returned to England in the following year. Soon after, he published a narrative of his conduct, which was replied to by Earl Cornwallis, and again vindicated by Sir Henry. In 1784 he published a farther defence of himself. He then filled the appointment of governor of Limerick, and was just made governor of Gibraltar when he died, in 1795.

CLINTON, the name of several counties in the United States, with populations varying between 4,000 and 40,000. They are situate in the following states: New York, Pennsylvania, Kentucky, Ohio, Michigan, Illinois, Missouri, and Iowa. There are, besides, a number of townships, with populations varying between 800 and 2,000.

CLIO, kli'-o, one of the nine muses, who presides over history. She is represented crowned with laurels, holding in her right hand a trumpet, and in the left a scroll.

CLISHEIM, or CLISSEVAL, klis'-hime, the highest mountain of the Outer Hebrides. It is situate in the island of Harris, 6 miles from Tarbet. Height, 2,700 feet.

CLIST, klist, the name of several parishes of England, none of them with a population above 1,600.

CLISTHENES, klis'-the-nees, an Athenian, of the family of Alcmæon. It is said that he invented the ostracism, and that he was the first who was banished by that institution.

CLITHEROE, klith'-e-ro, a town of Lancashire, on the Ribble, 28 miles by railway from Manchester. It is built at the base of Pendle Hill, which rises 1,800 feet above the level of the sea. Its public buildings are a chapel of ease, a grammar-school, founded in 1554 by Queen Mary, a mechanics' institute, and a gaol. Manf. Cotton fabrics. Pop. 12,000.

CLITUMNUS, kli-tum'-nus, a river of Campania, whose waters, when drunk, made oxen white.

CLITUS, kli'-tus. The most conspicuous of this name was the friend and foster-brother of Alexander the Great. He had saved the king's life in a battle, yet Alexander killed him with a javelin, in a fit of anger, when he was intoxicated, because, at a feast, he preferred the actions of Philip to those of his son. Alexander was afterwards inconsolable for the loss of a friend whom he had so wantonly sacrificed in the hour of drunkenness. Lived in the 4th century B.C.

CLIVE, of Plassy, Robert, Lord, klive, was educated at several schools, but with so little success, that his father, despairing of his becoming eminent in any profession, obtained him a place as a writer in the Honourable East-India Company's service. Disgusted with this occupation, however, he quitted the desk in 1747, and entered the army, in which he so highly distinguished himself at the taking of a fort belonging to the rajah of Tanjore, that he obtained the post of commissary-general. Soon afterwards, the French, under Dupleix, began to discover their ambitious designs on India, which roused the jealousy of the English, when war was entered upon, and when the genius of Clive had many opportunities of displaying itself. The French and their allies, however, gained numerous advantages. In 1751, Trinchinopoly, the seat of Ali Khan, the ally of the English, was besieged by the French; on which Clive's superior genius suggested the advantage of attacking the city of Arcot, and the attempt succeeded beyond expectation. This circumstance drew off the enemy from Trichinopoly to retake Arcot, which Clive defended in such a manner that the siege was raised. This success was followed by a series of victories, and the overthrow of the enemy. In 1753 Clive embarked for England, to rest awhile and recruit his health, when he was presented, by the Court of Directors with a sword set with diamonds. In 1755 he returned to India as governor of Fort St. David, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and, shortly after, he assisted Admiral Watson in reducing Angria, the pirate, taking Gheriah, his capital, and all his treasures. In the mean time, Surajah-u-Dowlah, the nabob, had made a successful attack on the British, captured a number of prisoners, and immured upwards of a hundred of them in the "Black Hole" of Calcutta. This brought Clive at once to that place, which he took, completely defeating the army of Surajah, whom, after the victory of Plassy, in 1757, he compelled to sue for peace. Clive now entered Moorshedabad, and placed Meer Jaffier, one of the nabob's officers, on the throne. The Mogul conferred on him the title of omrah of the empire, with a grant of lands, said to produce £27,000 a year. In 1759 he destroyed a large Dutch armament, sent against him, in Bengal; and, in the following year, returned to England, and was created an Irish peer. In 1764 he went to Bengal as president, where he soon restored tranquillity, and returned home in 1767. In 1769 he was made knight of the Bath. In 1773 a motion was made in the House of Commons to resolve that, "in the acquisition of his wealth, Lord Clive had abused the powers with which he had been intrusted." He defended himself with spirit and modesty; and the motion was not only rejected, but the house resolved, that "Lord Clive had rendered great and meritorious services to his country." This ungrateful treatment, however, penetrated his soul, and in a fit of gloom he put an end to his existence, in 1774. B. at Styche, near Market Drayton, in Shropshire, 1725.—Lord Chatham called him "a heaven-born general, who, without experience, surpassed all the officers of his time." He represented Shrewsbury in parliament from 1760 to his death. He left £70,000 to the invalids in the Company's service. His lordship married a sister of Dr. Maskelyne, astronomer-royal, by whom he had five children. A statue was, in 1859, erected temporarily to his memory, opposite the government offices in Whitehall, with the view of its being ultimately transferred to Shrewsbury.

CLOACINA, klo-a-si'-na, a goddess at Rome, who presided over the cloacæ, or receptacles for the filth of the whole city, begun by Tarquin the Elder, and finished by Tarquin the Proud. Public officers, called curatores cloacarum urbis, were chosen to take care of the cloacæ.

CLOCH, or CLOUGH POINT, klok, a headland of Renfrewshire, Scotland, 4 miles from Greenock. It has a lighthouse upon it, 70 feet above the water-line.

CLODOALD, or ST. CLOUD, klo'-do-ald, son of Clodomir, and grandson of Clovis, king of France. After the death of his father, and the murder of his two brothers (see CLODOMIR), he became a monk, and found refuge in a monastery near Paris, which took from him the name of St. Cloud. D. at St. Cloud, 560.

CLODIUS, PB., klo'-de-us, a turbulent Roman citizen, descended of an illustrious family. He made himself notorious by his licentiousness, avarice, and ambition. He introduced himself in women's clothes into the house of J. Cæsar, whilst Pompeia, Cæsar's wife, of whom he was enamoured, was celebrating the mysteries of Ceres, or Bona Dea, at which no man was permitted to be present. Tried for this violation of human and divine laws, he succeeded in corrupting his judges. From a patrician he became a plebeian, in order to be eligible for a tribune; and was an inveterate enemy to Cato and Cicero. By his influence he procured the banishment of the latter, who, was, however, soon afterwards recalled. Killed by the slaves of Milo in a quarrel, 51 B.C.

CLODOMIR, klo'-do-meer, son of Clovis, succeeded, on the death of his father in 511, to the kingdom of Orleans. He fought against Sigismund, king of Burgundy, took him prisoner, and put him to death. He, himself, was afterwards slain in a battle with Gondemar, Sigismund's successor in 524.—He left three children, of whom two were murdered by their uncles, and the third, Clodoald, saved himself by flight.

CLOGHER, klog'-er, an ancient episcopal city of Ireland, 82 miles from Dublin. It has greatly fallen into decay; but has still a cathedral, bishop's palace, a prison, a workhouse, and is the head of a poor-law union. Pop. 600.—The barony in which this town stands has an area of 97,569 acres, and a population of 39,000.—Also the name of several parishes of Ireland, none of them with a population above 1,800.

CLON, klon, a prefix to numerous places in Ireland. It signifies a fertile strip of land, entirely inclosed by a bog, or by water, on the one side, and a bog on the other. The number of names with which it is allied is about ninety; and the following are those towns which have the largest populations, or are otherwise remarkable.

CLONAKILTY, klon'-a-kil'-te, a town of Ireland, in the county of Cork, situate in a bay of the Atlantic, called Clonakilty Bay, 20 miles from Cork. Its public buildings are a church, court-house, barracks, bridewell, and a linen-hall. It has a good market for yarn. Pop. 3,500.

CLONALLON, klon-al'-lon, a parish in Downshire. Pop. 5,800.

CLONARD, klon-ard', a town in the county of Meath, Ireland, 11 miles from Trim. Pop. 4,000.

CLONCLARE, klon-klair', a parish in Leitrim. Pop. 9,500.

CLONDAVADDOCK, klon'-da-văd-dok, a parish of Donegal. Area, 27,376 acres. Pop. 8,500.

CLONES, klones, a town in the county of Monaghan, Ireland, 10 miles from Monaghan. It is the head of a poor-law union, and has a trade in corn and linen. Pop. 2,500.

CLONFERT, klon-fert', a parish and village in the county of Galway, Ireland, 36 miles from Galway. Pop. 3,884.—The name also of two bogs in the same county, traversed by the Grand Canal.—A parish in Cork county. Pop. 15,605.

CLONMELL, klon-mel', a town of Ireland, in the counties of Waterford and Tipperary, pleasantly situate on the river Suir, 14 miles from Cashel. It consists of four cross streets, regularly built, having its public buildings of stone. The principal of these are a church, Roman Catholic and other chapels, an asylum, a county-house, gaol, infirmary, mechanics' institute, and several banks. Manf. Cotton fabrics. Pop. 15,500.

CLONTARF, klon-tarf', a village of Ireland, in the province of Leinster, about 2½ miles from the castle of Dublin. Pop. 200.—In the neighbourhood of this village the troops of Brian Boru defeated the united forces of the Irish and the Danes in 1014, he himself, however, being slain.

CLONTHAL, or KLONTHAL, klon-tal', a lake of Switzerland, 3 miles from Glarus. Ext. 2 miles long, by 1 broad. It is elevated 2,526 feet above the sea.

CLONTIBRET, klon'-ti-bret, a parish of Monaghan, Ireland. Area, 26,554 acres. Pop. 12,300.

CLOOTZ, John Baptist de, klootz, better known by the name of "Anacharsis Cloots," was a Prussian baron, who, at the beginning of the French revolution, distinguished himself by his impiety and extravagances. After performing various feats of madness, calling himself Anacharsis, and the "Orator of the Human Race," he gave a large sum to the Assembly to make war against all kings, and demanded that a price should be put on the king of Prussia. He also denied the authority of all rulers, even that of the Creator, and published a work to that effect. Guillotined under Robespierre, 1794.—He was nephew to the learned Cornelius Pauw, of Berlin.

CLOTAIRE I., klo-tair', king of France, was the son of Clovis and Clotilda. He, at first, was only king of Soissons, in 511, but became, in 551, master of the whole of France, on the death of his brothers. B. 497; D. 561.

CLOTAIRE II. succeeded his father, Chilperic I., in the kingdom of Soissons, at the age of four months. His mother maintained the kingdom for him against the efforts of Childebert, and afterwards becoming possessed of Austrasia, he reigned over the whole of the kingdom. B. 584; D. 628.

CLOTAIRE III. came to the throne of Burgundy in 656, on the death of his father, Clovis II. B. 652; D. 670. Batilda, his mother, governed during his minority with great wisdom.

CLOTAIRE IV. reigned only in name from 717 to 719, Charles Martel, mayor of the palace, having the real power.

CLOTZE, or KLOTZE, klotze, a village of Prussian Saxony, 40 miles from Magdeburg. Pop. 2,500.

CLOUD, ST., kloo, a parish and town of France, in the department of the Seine-et-Oise, and situate on the banks of the Seine, on the railway from Paris to Versailles. Pop. 4,000.—The historical associations of this place are intimately connected with the royalty of France. Its palace, which is very beautiful, was originally the property of the dukes of Orleans, and, for a long period, was a summer residence of the kings of France. Its fountains are extremely elegant, and its park extensive. Here, in 1799, Napoleon I. dismissed the Assembly of Five Hundred, and caused himself to be proclaimed first consul; and here, in 1830, Charles X. put his signature to the ordinances which cost him his throne.

CLOVIS I., klo'-vis, the founder of the French monarchy, succeeded Childeric, his father, in 481. His kingdom then was bounded by the sea and the river Scheldt on the N. and E., on the W. by the dioceses of Thérouanne and Boulogne, and on the S. by Cambray. He was not, however, slow in extending these territories. In 486 he attacked Soissons, and made that place his capital. In 493 he took Paris, and removed his residence to that city. Three years later he turned his arms against the Germans, and defeated them at Tolbiac. After that victory he embraced Christianity, at the solicitation of his wife Clotilda, and was baptized at Rheims. He afterwards defeated the king of Burgundy, and, in 507, gained a great victory over Alaric, king of the Goths, whom he killed with his own hand, thus obtaining Aquitaine. He was now at the height of his power; but he sullied the successes of his reign by putting to death several chiefs, whose ambition he feared. B. 465; D. 511, dividing his estates between his four children, Thierry, Clodomir, Childebert, and Clotaire.

CLOVIS II., second son of Dagobert, king of Neustria and Burgundy, whom he succeeded in 638. B. 633; D. 656.

CLOVIS III., the son of Thierry III., king of France, whom he succeeded in 691, at the age of nine, and reigned five years, under the guardianship of Pepin Heristal, master of the palace. D. 695.

CLOYNE, kloin, a town of Ireland, in the county of Cork, 12 miles from Cork. Its chief buildings are a cathedral, Roman Catholic cathedral, monastery, nunnery, and round tower. In its neighbourhood are some valuable marble-quarries. Pop. 1,800.

CLUNIE, kloo'-ne, a river in Aberdeenshire, Scotland, falling into the Dee.—A parish, 13 miles from Perth, and containing a loch of the same name. Area of parish, 8,000 acres. Pop. 800.

CLUNY, a parish of Scotland, in Aberdeenshire, 16 miles from Aberdeen. Area, 7,000 acres. Pop. 1,200.

CLUNY, a town of France, in the department of the Saône and Loire, 46 miles from Lyons. It stands on the banks of the Grône, which is here crossed by two bridges. Manf. Linen, leather, and gloves; paper, earthenware, and oil-mills. It has also a considerable trade in corn, cattle, and timber. Pop. 4,500.

CLUSES, kloose, a town of Savoy, 23 miles from Geneva. Manf. Clocks and watch-movements. Pop. 2,000.

CLUSONE, kloo-so'-nai, a town of Lombardy, 18 miles from Bergamo. In its neighbourhood are copper-foundries and vitriol-works. Pop. 5,500.—A river of Italy, joining the Po 18 miles from Turin.

CLWYD, kloo'-ud, a river of N. Wales, running through Denbighshire and Flintshire, and falling into the Irish Sea about 6 miles below St. Asaph. Its valley is one of the most beautiful in Wales.

CLYDE, klide, one of the largest rivers of Scotland, rising in the S. part of Lanarkshire, and forming an arm of the sea, called the Firth of Clyde, near the castle of Dumbarton. It becomes navigable at the city of Glasgow. Length, from its source, near Rodger Law, to Glasgow, 70 miles; from Glasgow to the S. point of the island of Bute, 40. In the parish of Lanark are the FALLS of the Clyde, 230 feet high. In 1812 the first boat in Europe, successfully propelled by steam, was launched on this river, and the DALE of the CLYDE, or CLYDESDALE, is celebrated for its orchards and its horses. It gave the title of Lord Clyde to Sir Colin Campbell. (See CLYDE, Lord.) In 1859 a fort called Matilda was erected for the defence of the Clyde, on the projecting point midway between Greenock and Gourock, opposite Rosneath-point.

CLYDE, Colin Campbell, Lord. On the 29th of December, 1858, a Glasgow paper announced the death of the father of Lord Clyde, who, towards the end of the last century, was nothing more than an apprentice to an eminent cabinet-maker in the city of Glasgow. His name was John McLiver, and he became a journeyman in his trade, whilst the future Lord Clyde was yet a lively black-headed boy running about the workshop as Colin McLiver. His mother's maiden name was Campbell, which Colin afterwards assumed, as having, in his conception, a more dignified, if not a more military sound. Colin, by the advice of his mother's relations, entered the army in 1808, and served throughout the peninsular war. He was in the battle of Vimera, was twice wounded at San Sebastian, and also received a hurt at the passage of the Bidassoa.

In 1814-15 he went to America, but does not appear to have been in much active service till 1842, when he commanded the 98th foot regiment in the Chinese war. In 1848 he was sent to Hindostan, where he remained till 1852, being present at Chillianwallah and Goojerat, and received for his services the thanks of the East-India Company and the British parliament, with the order from his sovereign of K.C.B. In 1854 he became brigadier-general, colonel of the 67th regiment, and a major-general, and accompanied the army sent to the aid of Turkey. In 1855 he was made a knight grand cross of the order of the Bath, and in the Crimea greatly distinguished himself against the Russians. At the battle of the Alma he led the Highland brigade; and at Balaclava ranged the 93rd Highlanders into a "thin red line" of single file, which, by the deadly precision of its fire, succeeded in repelling a charge of Russian cavalry. In 1857 he was dispatched to India as military commander-in-chief, to endeavour to stay the torrent of the sepoy rebellion, which was then desolating that part of the British empire. Here his measures were characterized by great prudence and sagacity. He gradually but effectually drove the rebels from their strongholds, and in November of the same year relieved the garrison of Lucknow, with Sir James Outram and Sir H. Havelock at their head. For this, in conjunction with his other brilliant deeds and the whole tenour of his conduct in India, he was raised to the peerage in 1859, with the title of Lord Clyde. B. at Glasgow, 1792. (See AGRA, BENGAL, &c.)

CLYTEMNESTRA, klī-tem-nes'-tra, a daughter of Tyndarus, king of Sparta, by Leda, and the wife of Agamemnon, king of Argos. (See AGAMEMNON.)

Co, Coos, and Cos, kos, one of the Cyclades, situate near the coasts of Asia, about 15 miles from Halicarnassus. It gave birth to Hippocrates and Apelles, and was famous for its fertility, and the wine and silk-worms which it produced.

COA, ko'-a, a river of Portugal, which rises in the Sierra de Gata, and, after a course of 80 miles, falls into the Douro 5 miles from Torre de Moncorvo.

COAHUILA, or COHAUILA, ko'-a-oo-e-la, a department of the Mexican confederation, inclosed by the departments of Nuevo-Leon, Durengo, and Zacatecas, except on the N., where it is separated from the Texas by the Rio Bravo del Norte. Area, 30,740 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, intersected by fertile valleys, although cattle-rearing is the principal branch of industry. It has some silver-mines. Pop. 76,000. Lat. between 24° and 30° N. Lon. between 100° and 102° W.

COANZA, ko-an'-za, a large river of Congo, in Western Africa. After a rapid course of perhaps about 500 miles, it falls into the Atlantic, in lat. 9° 10′ S., lon. 14° 22′ E.

COATES, kotes, the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 500.

COBAN, ko'-ban, a city of Central America, on the Rio Dulu, 90 miles from Guatemala. Pop. estimated at 14,000.

COBB, kob, a county in Georgia, U.S. Area, 520 square miles. Desc. Fertile in corn, wheat, oats, and cotton. Pop. 14,000.

COBBE, the principal town of the country of Darfur, in Central Africa. Lat. 14° 11′ N. Lon. 28° 8′ E.

COBBETT, William, kob'-bet, one of the boldest and purest English political writers, was the son of a small farmer and publican in Sussex. He was bred to country life, but going to Portsmouth, in 1782, he first beheld the sea, which seems, at once, to have unsettled all his notions of rural existence, for the next day he made application for employment on board a man-of-war. In this, however, he was not successful, and in the following year, being at Guildford fair, he took the sudden determination of proceeding to London, where he was engaged as a copying clerk to an attorney. Becoming disgusted with this employment, he went to Chatham, where he enlisted in a regiment of foot, and, in a short time, was, as a corporal for good conduct, landed on the shores of New Brunswick, N. America. Here he rose to the rank of sergeant-major, and after a service of eight years, returned to England, where, at his own earnest request, he got his discharge, on account of his good behaviour and the services he had rendered the regiment. Shortly afterwards he went to France, to avoid prosecuting a charge which he had preferred against four officers of his regiment for peculation. He then sailed for New York, where he arrived in 1792. Two years after this, he commenced his political career as a writer, by attacking Dr. Priestly, who had just arrived from England, and who was fiercely denounced in a pamphlet entitled "Observations on the Emigration of a Martyr to the cause of Liberty, by Peter Porcupine." This was written by Cobbett, who rapidly followed it up by others in the most violent anti-democratic strain. He now became as bold as he was unsparing in his sarcasm, upon all who offered opposition to his views; and the consequence was several prosecutions for libel, which forced him to leave America, and return to England in 1800. Here he commenced, in London, a daily Tory paper, which did not succeed. He next started his "Weekly Register," which commanded a large circulation, and which, we believe, without the intermission of a single week, he continued till the day of his death, a period of thirty-three years. It was commenced as an aid to the Tory party; but it began to change its views in 1803, and finally became thoroughly reforming in its principles. In 1804 two verdicts were obtained against him by the government for libel, and, in 1810, another for a paper which he had written against flogging some local militia-men at Ely. On this occasion he was condemned to pay a fine of £1,000 to the king, and to be imprisoned for two years. Having suffered this punishment, he came forth from the house of his confinement as vigorous as ever, and, as might be expected, more hostile against the powers that had incarcerated and amerced him. To annoy the administration, he, at once, began his "Twopenny Trash," a series of political papers, which had a circulation of 100,000 copies. In 1817, to escape impending danger, he once more visited America, yet still continued the "Register" by transmitting his "copy" regularly across the Atlantic. In 1819 he returned, and commenced a daily paper, which lived only two months. He was again cast in two actions for libel, when, in 1820, he first tried to get into parliament. In this, however, he did not succeed till 1832, when he was returned to the first reformed parliament for Oldham, which he continued to represent till his death. B. at Farnham, 1762; D. 1835.—Cobbett passed an active life, and wrote an excellent Grammar of the English language, besides many other works of high common sense and excellence, independent of his political labours as an editor.

COBDEN, Richard, kob'-den, was the son of a small Sussex farmer, who died whilst Richard was a boy. He was, therefore, taken charge of by an uncle who had a wholesale warehouse in London, into which Richard was, in due time, introduced. He afterwards became a partner in a Manchester printed-cotton factory, and occasionally "took the road," as commercial traveller for the house. He subsequently visited Egypt, Greece, and Turkey, and in 1835 went to N. America. The result of his observations in this country, to some extent, appeared in a pamphlet entitled "England, Ireland, and America," by a Manchester Manufacturer. Another pamphlet of his, entitled "Russia," also appeared about this time. In 1837 he contested the borough of Stockport, but was unsuccessful, when he made a journey through France, Belgium, and Switzerland. In the following year he went through Germany, and, soon after his return, commenced his advocacy of the repeal of the taxes on corn. In 1839 the National Anti-corn-law League was formed, and in 1841 Mr. Cobden was elected member of Parliament for Stockport. He now continued to advocate, with all his energy, the repeal of the corn laws, and, as he was an effective public speaker, he won over a great many to his views. His influence gradually rose in the House of Commons, where, on June 29th, 1846, Sir Robert Peel made his memorable speech, wherein he gave all the credit of the repeal of the corn laws to Mr. Cobden. "The name which ought to be," said Sir Robert, "and which will be associated with the success of these measures, is the name of a man, who, acting, I believe, from pure and disinterested motives, has advocated their cause with untiring energy, and by appeals to reason, enforced by an eloquence the more to be admired because it was unaffected and unadorned,—the name which ought to be and will be associated with the success of these measures, is the name of Richard Cobden." After this, Mr. Cobden once more visited the continent, and £70,000 was collected by his grateful countrymen and presented to him. In 1847 he became member for the West Riding of Yorkshire, which he continued to represent for several years, when he retired for some time from active public life. In 1859 he revisited America, and during his absence was chosen member for Rochdale. On his return, he was offered the presidency of the Board of Trade, under the Palmerston administration, which he refused to accept. His reasons for not joining the noble lord's government were explained at length by him at a public meeting in Rochdale, August, 1859. The general purport of these was, that he had been, for many years, a decided opponent of the foreign policy of Lord Palmerston, and which he designated as a warlike one. D. at Dunford, near Midhurst, 1804.

COBELSKILL, ko'-bel-skil, a township of New York, U.S., on Cobus Creek, 35 miles from Albany. Pop. 2,494.

COBHAM, kob'-ham, two parishes of England, one in Kent, and the other in Surrey. Neither of them has a population above 1,700.

COBHAM, a township of Surrey county, Virginia, U.S., on the S. bank of James river, opposite Jamestown, 8 miles from Williamsburg. Pop. Uncertain.

COBIJA, ko-be'-ja, the only legal seaport of Bolivia, in the department La Mar, 112 miles from Atacama. It is a depôt for bullion, ore, and coin, besides mercury, woollen stuffs, and paper. Pop. 800. Lat. 22° 34′ S. Lon. 70° 21′ 2″ W.

COBLENTZ, ko-blentz', a fortified town of Prussia, the capital of the grand-duchy of the Lower Rhine, at the conflux of the Rhine and Moselle, opposite the great Prussian fortress of Ehrenbreitstein, 36 miles from Mentz. The bridge across the latter river is of freestone, but that over the Rhine is of boats. The town is well built, the streets being regular, the houses of stone, and the public buildings handsome. The chief of these is the magnificent palace erected in 1779, for the residence of the elector of Treves; an ancient Jesuits' college, a Catholic seminary, and theatre. The two handsome quays on the Rhine and the Moselle are used as public promenades, whilst round it are several detached forts. Pop. 24,000.—In 1794 this place was taken by Napoleon I., and made the capital of the department Rhine and Moselle.

COBLENTZ, a government of Rhenish Prussia, bounded on the N. by the government of Cologne, on the W. by Treves and Aix-la-Chapelle, on the S. by Rhenish Bavaria, and on the E. by the duchies of Nassau and Hessen-Darmstadt. Area, 1,754 square miles. Pop. 500,000.

COBURG, ko'-burg, the capital of a principality of the same name, in Germany, on the river Its or Itsch, 26 miles from Bamberg. It has a castle, government offices, the Ehrenberg Palace, containing a collection of paintings; an observatory, arsenal, a theatre, and a workhouse. It is the seat of the high courts of the duchy. Manf. Linen, cotton, and woollen goods, gold and silver articles, bleaching and dye works, stone-quarries, besides an active general trade. Pop. 10,000. —The principality of Coburg forms a portion of the duchy of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha.

COBURG PENINSULA, an irregular strip in Australia, separated from Melville Island by Dundas Strait, and connected with the mainland by a narrow isthmus. Ext. 50 miles long, by 20 broad. Lat. 11° 22′ S. Lon. 132° 10′ E.

COCHAMBAMBA, ko-cha-bam'-ba, a department of the republic of Bolivia, inclosed by the departments La Paz, Sacré, and Santa Cruz de la Sierra. Area, 55,120 square miles. Desc. Fertile, producing sugar, cotton, dyewoods, timber, and the precious metals. Pop. 250,000. Lat. between 17° and 19° S. Lon. between 65° and 68° W.—A town of the same name, and capital of this department, stands at the foot of the Andes, 145 miles from Chuquisaca. Manf. Cotton fabrics and glass wares. Pop. 35,000.

COCHIN, ko'-chin, a seaport and principal town of the province of Cochin, which is on the S.W. of the peninsula of Hindostan. The town, which is fortified, stands on an island at the mouth of the Cali Coylang river, and is about a mile and a half in circumference. The streets are wide and commodious. The principal buildings are the church, the governor's house, the barracks, and a public hotel. The trade carried on is extensive, and ships are as well built here as in any part of Europe. It was taken by the English in 1796. The PROVINCE is a rajahship extending along the Malabar coast. Area, 1,988 square miles. Desc. Well wooded, and some parts mountainous, with a considerable elevation above the sea. A number of shallow lakes, called backwaters, intersperse the country, and inclose low alluvial islands. Pro. Rice, arrowroot, yams, coffee, sugar, cotton, pepper, ginger, and fruit. The principal sources of wealth are the forests, which are extensive and valuable. Pop. 290,000. Lat. between 9° 48′ and 10° 50′ N. Lon. between 76° 5′ and 76° 58′ E. —This country is rapidly improving, and has already reached a high state of prosperity. Its rajah pays an annual tribute of 240,000 rupees to the British, and it has upwards of 100 Christian places of worship. Roads, bridges, canals, and public works of every kind are in progress, and a high degree of energetic intelligence is everywhere manifested throughout its limits.

COCHIN-CHINA, a country situate in the S.E. of Asia, forming part of the peninsula between China and Hindostan, and comprised in the empire of Anam. Ext. About 1,000 miles long, with a varying breadth of from 100 to 300. Area, variously stated at 98,000 and 140,000 square miles. Desc. It consists of a long plain or strip of land, included between the seacoast and a chain of mountains running parallel to, and often approaching within a short distance of it. This plain is of most exuberant fertility, producing copiously all the tropical productions, but more particularly rice and sugar. The forests are also very fine, and abound with a variety of aromatic woods, and a kind of cinnamon, in high favour with the Chinese. The coast teems with gelatinous animal substances, as sharks' fins, bêche de mer, and a peculiar species of birds-nests, which are eagerly sought for in China. A considerable quantity of gold is brought down from the mountains, or collected in the sands of the rivers, and silver also of late has become plentiful. Climate. The wet season occurs in the months of September, October, and November.

At this time the rivers overflow, and a great part of the plain is inundated. In the three following months a cold north wind blows, accompanied with more moderate rains. Rivers. The Sai-gon and the Malkaume. Manf. Lacker-ware, coarse cotton and silk cloth, cast-iron goods, earthenware, and filigree-work. Exp. Rice, cotton, silk, eagle-wood, and spices. Imp. Tea, cotton and silk goods, opium, and English broadcloth. Pop. Unascertained: it has been estimated at from 5,000,000 to 22,000,000. Lat. between 8° 40′ and 23° N. Lon. between 102° and 109° 20′ E.—In 1858, the French, on account of alleged cruelty to the bishop of Diaz in Tonquin, sent an expedition to Cochin-China to demand redress. This gave no specific result, and in 1859 another was despatched, no doubt in the expectation that something favourable to French interests would accrue from it.

Cochran, Robert, kok′-răn, a Scotch architect, who was employed by James III. of Scotland in building several great structures. That monarch created him earl of Mar, and distinguished him by so many marks of his favour, that several of his nobles rose, seized the favourite in the royal presence, and made short work of him. They summarily hanged him on the bridge of Lauder, in 1184.

Cochrane, Captain John Dundas, R.N., kok′-răn, a traveller, who made a journey on foot "through Russia and Siberian Tartary, from the frontiers of China to the Frozen Sea and Kamtchatka." He published, in 1824, a narrative of this extraordinary undertaking, and afterwards went to America, where he died, in Columbia, 1825. B. 1780.—The original intention of this explorer was to travel round the globe, as nearly as it could be done, by land. When he left London for St. Petersburg, his design was to cross from Northern Asia to America at Behring's Straits, and the whole of the journey was to be accomplished on foot; "for the best of all possible reasons," he says,—"that my finances allowed of no other."

Cochrane, Lord. (See Dundonald, Earl of.)

Cockburn, Henry Thomas, Lord, ko′-burn, was the son of Archibald Cockburn, of Cockpen, one of the barons of the Exchequer of Scotland. He followed the profession of the law, and became in Scotland one of the lords of Session. In 1830 he was made solicitor-general for Scotland, and in 1834 was promoted to the bench. As a member of the Scottish bar he achieved many triumphs, and was an early contributor to the pages of the "Edinburgh Review." He also wrote a life of his friend Lord Jeffrey, which was published in 1852. B. 1779; D. while on the Ayr circuit, 1854.

Cockburn, Sir Alexander James Edmond, lord chief justice, was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1825 he was admitted of the Middle Temple, and in 1829 was called to the bar. In 1841 he became queen's counsel, and on account of the great ability with which he defended Lord Palmerston's foreign policy in the Don Pacifico debate, and the assistance which he gave to the liberal party from time to time, he was appointed solicitor-general, in 1850, by Lord John Russell, and received the honour of knighthood. He then became attorney-general under Lord Aberdeen, and subsequently chief justice of the court of Common Pleas. On the overthrow of the Derby administration in 1859, he was appointed to the lord chief justiceship by the government of Lord Palmerston. B. in London, 1805.

Cockburn, Admiral the Right Honourable Sir George, G.C.B., entered the navy in 1781, and early began to distinguish himself. After serving on the East-India, home, and Mediterranean stations, in 1795 he shared in the blockade and capture of Leghorn. He subsequently served in the West Indies, where he was the principal means of Martinique being ceded to Britain as a colony. For this he received the thanks of the House of Commons. In 1812, the duty of reconciling Spain and her trans-Atlantic colonies was committed to him, and in 1813 and 1814 he was actively engaged in the American war. After Waterloo, he was deputed to convey Napoleon to St. Helena, and in 1818 entered parliament, representing Portsmouth, Weobly, and Plymouth, till 1830. In 1841 he was returned for Ripon, for which he sat till 1846, when he retired from public life. Before his death he inherited the baronetcy of his brother. B. 1772; D. 1853.

Cocke, kok, a county of East Tenessee, U.S. Area, 374 square miles. Pop. 9,000, of whom about 1,000 are slaves.

Cocker, kok′-er, a river in Cumberland, rising in Lake Buttermere, and joining the Derwent at Cockermouth.

Cocker, Edward, an industrious schoolmaster and penman. He published fourteen copy-books, a small English dictionary, a book for writing, called "Cocker's Morals," and a useful treatise on arithmetic, which had a great success. Almost every similar treatise since his time has been "according to Cocker." B. 1632; D. 1675.

Cockerel, ko′-ke-rel, a hamlet of France, 12 miles from Evreux, where, in 1364, Du Guesclin gained a victory over the king of Navarre.

Cockerell, Charles Robert, R.A., kok′-e-rel, an eminent architect, who made the usual tour of the continent, and in Italy, as well as in Asia Minor, made the grander architectural remains a subject of study. From Ægina and Phygalia, and other places, he brought to England several antiquarian fragments, which have found a place in the British Museum. He early attracted notice in his profession, and has had a great many public buildings intrusted to him. Among these may be named the New Library at Cambridge, the university galleries at Oxford, the college at Lampeter, and several others in the provinces. In London, the Sun Fire Office, in Bartholomew Lane, the Westminster Fire Office, in the Strand, and, in conjunction with Mr. Tite, the London and Westminster Bank, St. George's Hall, and the assize courts at Liverpool, were also carried out by Mr. Cockerell; and many other buildings of public interest. In 1829 he was chosen an A.R.A., in 1836 R.A., and in 1840 he became professor of architecture in the Royal Academy. B. in London, 1788.

Cockfram, kok′-er-ham, a parish of Lancashire, 5 miles from Garstang. Area, 10,420 acres. Pop. 2,600.

Cockerington, kok′-e-ring-ton, two contiguous parishes in Lincolnshire, neither of them with a population above 400.

Cockermouth, kok′-er-mouth, a town and chapelry of England, in Cumberland, at the confluence of the Cocker and Derwent, 25 miles from Carlisle. The town is divided into two parts by the Cocker, over which there is a bridge of one arch. The streets, though spacious, are irregular; yet many of the houses are neatly built. The public edifices are a chapel of ease, a grammar-school, town-hall, house of correction, court-house, and market-house. There are several excellent schools, and a dispensary for indigent patients. Manf. Hats, coarse woollen cloths, shalloons, checks, coarse linens, and leather. Pop. 7,500. —Wordsworth the poet was born here.

Cockpen, kok-pen′, a parish of Scotland, 7 miles from Edinburgh, containing coal-fields and the powder-manufactory of Stobbs. Pop. 3,500.—A station on the Edinburgh and Hawick Railway.

Cocles, Pub. Horat., ko′-klees, a celebrated Roman, who alone, in 507 B.C., opposed the whole army of Porsenna at the head of a bridge, while his companions were destroying it behind him. When this was effected, Cocles, though wounded by the darts of the enemy, and impeded by his arms and armour, leapt into the Tiber, and swam safely across. Of this episode, Lord Macaulay thus sings in one of his "Lays of Ancient Rome:"—

> "Never, I ween, did swimmer,
> In such an evil case,
> Struggle through such a raging flood,
> Safe to the landing-place;
> But his limbs were borne up bravely
> By the brave heart within,
> And our good father Tiber
> Bore bravely up his chin."

Cocos, or Keeling, Islands, ko′-kos, two small islands named Horsburgh and Keeling, near the W. coast of Sumatra. They abound in cocoa-palms, and have a few English settlers and Malays upon them. Lat. 12° 5′ S. Lon. 96° 53′ E. They were discovered in 1609 by Keeling.—The name, also, of several small islands in the Pacific and Indian oceans.

CODOGNO, ko-done'-yo, a neat town of Lombardy, 15 miles from Lodi, near the conflux of the Adda and Po. Manf. Silk stuffs. Pop. about 10,000.

CODRINGTON, Admiral Sir Edward, G.C.B., kod'-ring-ton, entered the British navy in 1783, and in 1793 became lieutenant. On June 1, 1794, he served under Lord Howe in the Queen Charlotte, when the French were defeated off Brest, and was deputed to be the bearer of the duplicate dispatches to England. For this service he was promoted to the rank of captain, and continued to be actively employed till 1797. From this period till 1805 he was unemployed; but in that year he received the command of the Orion, 74, and fought at Trafalgar. In 1808 he was appointed to the command of the Blake, and, under Lord Gardner, accompanied the expedition to Walcheren, and in 1809 forced the Scheldt. For this service he was publicly thanked. In the three following years he was employed off the coast of Spain, and in 1813 returned to England. In 1814 he sailed for N. America, and took part in the attack on New Orleans. In 1815 he returned to England, and was created a knight commander of the Bath. His services had now been considerable, and in 1821 he was made a vice-admiral. In 1826 he was appointed to command the squadron in the Mediterranean, and, in conjunction with the Russian and French fleets, destroyed the Turco-Egyptian fleet at the battle of Navarino, fought October 20th, 1827. For this he was made a knight grand cross of the Bath, but was recalled from the Mediterranean in 1828. In 1832 he was elected member of parliament for Devonport, which he represented in several successive parliaments. In 1837 he was made an admiral, and in 1839 resigned his seat, on being appointed commander-in-chief at Portsmouth. B. 1770; D. in London, 1851.

CODRINGTON, Sir William John, K.C.B., son of the preceding, entered the army in 1821. In 1836 he became lieutenant-colonel in the Coldstream Guards; in 1846, colonel; and in 1854 was raised to the rank of major-general. Being at Varna before the expedition departed for the Crimea, he was there appointed, by Lord Raglan, to the command of the first brigade of the light division, and afterwards led his troops with great steadiness at the battle of the Alma, although he had never before seen active service. At Inkermann his bravery was conspicuous; and when, in consequence of a wound, Sir George Brown had to leave the Crimea, Major-General Codrington was appointed to the command of the light division. On the subsequent retirement of Sir George Brown, he succeeded to this command, and led the unsuccessful attack on the Redan, at Sebastopol, September 8, 1855. On the resignation of General Simpson, he was appointed commander-in-chief of the British army in the Crimea; and, for his services, was created a knight-commander of the Bath. He afterwards represented Greenwich in the House of Commons, and was subsequently appointed to the chief command in Gibraltar. B. 1800.

CODRUS, ko'-drus, the last king of Athens, celebrated for his patriotism, was the son of Melanthus. Having learnt from the oracle that, in the war waged by the Dorians against Athens, victory would remain with those whose chief should fall in battle, he threw himself into the midst of the conflict, and was slain, 1070 B.C. —To pay more honour to his memory, the Athenians made a resolution, that no man after Codrus should reign in Athens under the name of king; and therefore the government was put into the hands of perpetual archons. (See ATHENS.)

CŒLE SYRIA, se'-le sir'-e-a, a valley of Syria, between the mountain-ranges of Anti-Libanus and Lebanon. It is traversed by the river Libany, the ancient Leontes, and contains the towns of Baalbec, Bekaa, and Zahleh.

CŒLUS, or URANUS, se'-lus, the heavens personified, and the most ancient of the gods, was, at the same time, the offspring and the husband of Terra, the earth, by whom he had eighteen children. Amongst them were Saturn, the Cyclops, and the Titans. His children rebelling against him, wounded him; and from the blood which sprinkled the ground sprang the giants, furies, and nymphs.

COFFEE, kof'-fe, two counties in the United States. 1. In Tennessee. Area, 276 square miles. Desc. Fertile in the usual cerealia, with an undulating surface. Pop. 9,000, of whom a sixth are slaves.—2. In Alabama. Area, 1,008 square miles. Pop. 6,000, of whom a fifth are slaves.

COGGESHALL, GREAT, kog'-ge-shal, a town of Essex, 42 miles from London, on the Blackwater, which is here crossed by a bridge. It has several charities, a church, and an endowed grammar-school. In Little Coggeshall, on the opposite side of the river, are the remains of an abbey, founded in 1142, by King Stephen. Pop. 3,500.

COGNAC, kone-yak', a town of France, in the department of the Charente, on the Charente, 20 miles from Angoulême. This is the great entrepôt of the brandy of the Charente, called Cognac, and which has an extensive sale. Manf. Paper and earthenware. Pop. about 6,000.—Francis I. of France was born here, and often made it his residence, and in 1526 was signed here the treaty of the "Holy League." A village, 10 miles from Limoges. Pop. 1,800.

COGOLETO, ko'-go-lai-to, a village of the Sardinian states, 14 miles from Genoa. Pop. 2,300.—This is the birthplace of Columbus.

COHANZY, or CÆSAREA CREEK, ko-hăn'-ze, a river in New Jersey, U.S., which joins the Delaware opposite Bombay Hook.

COHASSET, ko-hăs'-set, a seaport in Norfolk county, Massachusetts, U.S., 20 miles from Boston. Pop. 1,800. —COHASSET ROCKS, which have been fatal to many vessels, lie off this place, 3 miles from the shore.

COHORN, Memnon, ko'-horn, a Dutch engineer, surnamed the Dutch Vauban, who early became a soldier, and rose to the ranks of general of artillery, director-general of fortifications, and governor of Flanders. In 1692 he defended the fort of Namur against Louis XIV. with great gallantry, although he was forced to surrender. He defended other places with equal bravery, and was a skilful engineer. The fortifications of Bergen-op-Zoom are considered his master-piece. B. in Friesland, 1641; D. at the Hague, 1704.—In 1685 he published his "Three Systems of Fortification," which are adapted only to the defence of ground of little elevation above the sea-level.

COIMBATOOR, ko-im-ba-toor', the capital of a district of the same name in the S. of British India, 270 miles from Madras. It is defended by a citadel or small fort, and contains a handsome mosque, built by Tippoo Sahib. The water in its neighbourhood being bad, it is unhealthy. Pop. Unascertained.—The DISTRICT is inclosed by the districts of Salem, Madura, Malabar, Trinchinopoly, Mysore, and Cochin. Area, 8,280 square miles. Desc. A high table-land, with mountains attaining the elevations of from 8,000 to 10,000 feet above the level of the sea. The soil, however, is fertile. Pro. Cotton, rice, tobacco, and the plant from which castor-oil is extracted. Cattle and sheep are reared, and elephants are bred for the sake of their tusks. Minerals. Iron and saltpetre. Manf. Cottons and woollens. Pop. 1,154,000. Lat. between 10° 14′ and 12° 19′ N. Lon. between 76° 36′ and 78° 16′ E.—In 1799 this district was taken possession of by the British.

COIMBRA, ko-eem'-bra, an ancient city of Portugal, the capital of the province of Beira, on the Mondego, which is here crossed by an elegant stone bridge, with a double row of arches, 60 miles from Oporto. In the interior it is narrow, ill-paved, dirty, and very steep. It is the see of a bishop, and has, exclusive of the cathedral, several parish churches, a number of convents, and a famous university. This is the only institution of the kind in Portugal, and was founded originally at Lisbon, in 1290, but transferred here in 1306. Manf. Linen and woollen fabrics, earthenware, combs, and willow tooth-picks. Pop. 13,500.—It was, for many years, the residence of the Portuguese kings, and their tombs may be seen here. In 1755, the earthquake which destroyed Lisbon, considerably damaged this town.

COIRE. (See CHUR.)

COJUTEPEQUE, ko-joo'-te-paik, a town of Central America, 15 miles from San Salvador. Pop. Estimated at 15,000.—A LAKE of the same name, several miles distant, takes in windy weather a deep-green colour, and frequently casts great quantities of dead fish upon its shores.

COKE, Edward, koke, an English judge, educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, whence he removed to Clifford's Inn, and afterwards to the Inner Temple. In 1578 he was called to the bar, and chosen reader at Lyon's Inn, in which office he so soon distinguished himself by his learning and intelligence, that his practice became enormous. In 1586 he was chosen recorder of Norwich, and in 1591-92 was unanimously elected to the same office in London. This, however, he resigned in 1592, on receiving the appointment of solicitor-general. In 1594 he became attorney-general, about which time the enmity, which continued throughout the life of Lord Bacon, arose between him and that distinguished man. In 1600 he prosecuted the earl of Essex, in which he behaved with uncommon asperity. Three years afterwards, he received the honour of knighthood, and, in 1603, conducted the prosecution against Sir Walter Raleigh in such a manner as severely to reflect upon his character for prudence and humanity. His speeches at the trial of Father Garnett, and the other conspirators in the Gunpowder Plot, in 1605, are deemed his forensic master-pieces, and with them his career as an advocate terminated. In 1606 he was appointed chief justice of the Common Pleas, and in 1613 was removed to the King's Bench, at which time he was sworn of the privy council. In the prosecution of the murderers of Sir Thomas Overbury, in 1615, he conducted himself with such spirit as to raise him many enemies, and soon afterwards fell into disgrace for opposing the king's prerogative, and holding his opinion with an honesty and determination of purpose which, in the eye of posterity, must do him high honour. In 1616 he was removed from his office, as Lord Chancellor Egerton, one of his enemies, said, on account of his "excessive popularity." After this Sir Edward never filled a judicial situation, although he was, in some measure, restored to the royal favour. He was now engaged in several commissions of a public nature, and in 1620 was returned member of parliament for Liskeard, in Cornwall. In this parliament he joined the popular side against the court, and was greatly instrumental in getting the Commons to pass the celebrated resolution "that the liberties, franchises, privileges, and jurisdictions of parliament, are the ancient and undoubted birthright and inheritance of the subjects of England." For this and other alleged causes the king was highly incensed against him, and had him committed to the Tower, where he lay only a short time, but never recovered the good opinion of King James. In 1628 he was chosen member for Suffolk and Buckingham, but he took his seat for the latter, and, although in his 79th year, defended the constitutional rights of the people with all the vigour of youth and the experience of age. He was the principal framer of the Bill of Rights, and mostly through his influence, both the Lords and the king were brought to assent to its becoming the law of the land. One of the last acts of his public life was to denounce the duke of Buckingham as the author of all the calamities of the nation; when, on the dissolution of parliament, he retired to his seat in Buckinghamshire, where he spent in peace the remainder of his days. B. at Mileham, Norfolk, 1550; D. 1634.—Coke lived in trying times, and through many changes, but, on the whole, merits the gratitude of his country. The first part of his reports appeared about 1600, and the last, or thirteenth, about 1655. His "Institutes of the Laws of England" are invaluable; the first is a translation and comment on Sir Thomas Littleton's Tenures, and is commonly known as "Coke upon Littleton, or the First Institute." There are also other law pieces of his in print.

COKER, kō'-ker, two parishes of England, both in Somersetshire, and neither with a population above 1,400.

COL, kol, signifying 'a neck,' is the name, with various affixes, of many passes across the Alps of Savoy and Piedmont. (See ALPS.)

COLAPOOR, or KOLAPOOR, kol'-a-poor, a rajahship on the W. coast of India, under the government of the presidency of Bombay. Area, 3,445 square miles. Desc. Rugged, watered by numerous streams, which, in many parts, become torrents, falling into the Kistnah, and flowing into the Bay of Bengal. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. between 15° 58′ and 17° 17′ N. Lon. between 73° 47′ and 74° 46′ E.

COLBERG, or KOLBERG, kol'-bairg, a seaport of Prussian Pomerania, with a harbour in the Baltic, 26 miles from Koslin. The chief edifices are the town-house, a large cathedral, several churches, and a house of correction. Manf. Woollens. It has several distilleries, salt-works, and a lucrative salmon and lamprey fishery. Pop. 8,000.—In 1760 it surrendered to the Russians, and in 1807 it was invested by the French, but without success.

COLBERT, John Baptist, kol'-bair, a distinguished French statesman, was the son of a silk-merchant, and in 1648 became clerk to Le Tellier, secretary of state, whose daughter he married. He next entered into the service of Cardinal Mazarin, who sent him to Rome on some important business, which he managed with great dexterity. The cardinal, at his death, recommended him to his master, Louis XIV., as the most proper person for comptroller-general of the finances, which post he obtained, and he is generally considered as the inventor of the theory of the balance of trade. In 1664 he was appointed superintendent of the buildings, and greatly improved Paris by erecting elegant structures. But architectural pursuits did not engross the whole of his attention. He laboured to improve the state of the arts, and to extend French commerce and manufactures. He founded Quebec and Cayenne, made settlements in India and Africa, and fostered the colonies of St. Domingo and Martinique. He also founded the dockyards of Brest, Toulon, and Rochefort, and, in every possible manner, gave a new impetus to the commerce of his country. Besides these works, he instituted the Academy of Painting and Sculpture, and the Academy of Sciences, and, by his recommendation, the Royal Observatory was built. In 1669 he was made secretary of state and marine minister, which offices he discharged to the satisfaction of his sovereign and the benefit of the people. B. at Rheims, 1619; D. at Paris, 1683.—Notwithstanding the immense benefits which Colbert had conferred on his country, he had to be buried in the night with a military escort. On account of the taxes he was forced to impose for the wars and pleasures of Louis, the people threatened to tear his body in pieces. He was, however, a great man, with a line as well as a comprehensive mind. The gardens of the Tuileries, the Hôtel des Invalides, the façade of the Louvre, the triumphal arches of the Boulevards, St. Denis, and St. Martin, were all executed under him. He was, however, absolute in his temper, repellent in his manners, and destitute of feeling in carrying out his plans.

COLBY, Thomas, kol'-be, an eminent English engineer, and a major-general in the army. He rose successively through the various subordinate ranks, and surveyed a large portion of England and Ireland. He accompanied Biot, the French engineer, on his trip to Shetland, in 1817, and afterwards assisted in connecting the French with the English triangulation across the Straits of Dover. In 1821 he was made a major, and, in 1825, became lieutenant-colonel. In 1846 he rose to the rank of major-general, when his connection with the survey ceased. He was a member of several scientific associations, and took an active part in establishing the Astronomical Society; but, perhaps, his greatest work was a series of tidal observations, which he made round the coast of Ireland, "and which," said the astronomer-royal, "are the most important that ever were made." B. at Rochester, 1784; D. at Liverpool, 1852.

COLCHAGUA, kol-chag'-oo-a, a department of Chili, extending from the Andes to the Pacific, and having N. and S. the departments Santiago and Maule. Area, 8,130 square miles. Desc. Fertile in the plains, and watered by the Maypù and the Maule. Pop. 175,000. Lat. between 34° and 35° S. Lon. between 70° and 72° W.

COLCHESTER, kol'-ches-ter, the ancient Camulodonum, is the chief town of Essex, on the Colne, here crossed by several bridges, at a distance of 50 miles from London. It has been encircled by walls, still partly standing, though greatly decayed, and contains a castle and a number of parish churches. St. Peter's is considered the chief, and existed previous to the Norman conquest. There are various charitable foundations, and the other public buildings are a town-gaol, a custom-house, barracks, a theatre, a county house of correction, market-house, and literary and scientific associations. Manf. Silks; and it has a malting trade. Oysters, dredged from the Colne, are carried, as an article of traffic, to London, Colchester "natives" being there highly esteemed. Several large vessels have been built here. There is a fine quay on the river, and vessels of 150 tons can approach it. Pop. about 20,000.—A station on the Eastern Union Railway.

COLCHESTER, Charles Abbot, Lord, was the younger son of the Rev. John Abbot, D.D., rector of All Saints, Colchester, and, in 1755, was elected a student of Christ Church, Oxford. In 1777 he won the chancellor's medal for Latin verse, and in 1783 took his degrees, and shortly afterwards was called to the bar. In 1795 he left the bar and became clerk of the rules in the court of King's Bench, and, in the same year, was returned member of parliament for Helston, in Cornwall. He now laboured in introducing practical reforms of the law, and the improvement of the public records. In 1800 he obtained leave to bring into the house a bill for taking a census of the population of the kingdom, and, the following year, the census was taken, and has continued to be taken ever since, decennially. He was now appointed chief secretary for Ireland, and keeper of the Irish privy seal; but these offices he scarcely held a year, when, in 1802, he was elected speaker of the House of Commons, which he continued to be till 1817, when, in May, a stroke of erysipelas forced him to resign. On the following 3rd of June he was raised to the peerage as Baron Colchester, with a pension of £4,000 a year, and £3,000 a year to his next successor to the title. B. at Abingdon, 1757; D. in London, 1829.

COLCHESTER, several townships of the United States. —1. In Chittenden county, Vermont, on Lake Champlain, at the mouth of Onion river, 5 miles N. Burlington. Pop. 1,000.—2. A post township of New London county, Connecticut, 15 miles W. Norwich. Pop. 2,697.—3. A post township of Delaware county, New York, 21 miles S. Delhi. Pop. 2,184.

COLCHIS and COLCHOS, kol'-kis, a country of Asia, to the S. of Asiatic Sarmatia, E. of the Euxine Sea, N. of Armenia, and W. of Iberia. In ancient history it is famous for the expedition of the Argonauts, and for being the birthplace of Medea. It was fruitful in poisonous herbs, and produced excellent flax. In the 15th century it was subdivided into several principalities, and is now comprised in the Russian government of Trans-Caucasia.—The pheasant is said to be originally from this district.

COLDINGHAM, kol'-ding-ham, a parish of Scotland, in Berwickshire, about 3 miles from Eyemouth. Area, 57,000 acres. Pop. 3,300. A station on the North British Railway.

COLDITZ, or KOLDITZ, ko(r)l'-ditz, a town of Saxony, on the Mulde, 25 miles from Leipsig. Manf. Linens, stockings, felt, and earthenware. Pop. 4,000.

COLDSTREAM, kold'-streme, a town and parish of Berwickshire, Scotland. It stands on the N. bank of the Tweed, where it is crossed by a bridge, about 15 miles from the town of Berwick. It has a church, several libraries, and benevolent institutions. Pop. of parish, 3,300; of town, 2,300.—The ford of Tweed, so celebrated in history as the crossing-place of the former armies of England and Scotland, is in the vicinity. The "Coldstream Guards" take their name from their originally having been raised here by General Monk in 1659-60. Approached by the Kelso branch of the North British Railway.

COLE, Henry, kole, an ardent labourer in the field of art-industry, connected with the Record Office, took an active part in bringing the Exhibition of the Industry of all Nations in 1851 into the order which it assumed before the eyes of the public. For his great exertions in this noble undertaking he received the honour of companion of the Bath, and was appointed to the direction of the schools of design throughout the country. He next became inspector of the schools of design, and in 1855 was appointed English commissioner at the Universal Exhibition at Paris, where he ably performed the duties expected of him. As an author, he is known by some agreeable guide-books for tourists, issued under the name of Felix Summerly. B. 1810.

COLEBROOK DALE, kole'-brook, a district of England, in Shropshire, on the Severn, 2 miles from Brosely. It is noted for its iron-works, and for the magnificent cast-iron bridge which was thrown over the Severn here in 1799. Pop. 5,000.—The extensive iron-works in this district caused, in 1620, railroads of wood to be here first used. A century later these were supplied by iron plates placed upon the wooden rails; both of which inventions may be viewed as the gradual progress made towards the railway system now adopted throughout the country.

COLEBROOKE, Henry Thomas, an eminent Oriental scholar, was in 1782 sent out to Calcutta, where, after serving several years, he became attached to the revenue department at Tirhoot. He was afterwards removed to Purneah, and began to devote himself to the study of those languages in which he afterwards attained to considerable eminence. Shortly after the foundation of the college at Fort William, he was appointed professor of Sanscrit, from which situation he was raised to a chief judgeship of one of the law-courts. He next became president of the Board of Revenue, and a member of the Supreme Council of Bengal. He now began to publish a great number of papers connected with Hindoo literature and science; but their mere enumeration would occupy a considerable space. B. 1765; D. 1837.

COLERAINE, kole-rain, a seaport-town of Ireland, in the county of Londonderry, agreeably situate on both sides of the river Bann, about 4 miles from the sea, and 25 from Londonderry. Here is one of the most extensive salmon-fisheries in the island. The town is of tolerable size, is neatly built, and has a barrack. It exports provisions and fine linens, and steamers ply from it to Liverpool, Fleetwood, and Glasgow. Pop. 6,000.

COLERAINE, the name of several townships in the United States.—1. In Franklin county, Massachusetts, 5 miles N.W. Greenfield. Pop. 2,000.—2. In Hamilton county, Ohio, on Miami river, 15 miles above its junction with the Ohio. Pop. 3,200.—3. In Pennsylvania, in the county of Bedford. Pop. 5,200.

COLERIDGE, Samuel Taylor, kole'-ridj, was the youngest of a large family, and an orphan at the age of nine. He was educated at Christ's Hospital, and at "a very premature age," he says of himself, "even before my fifteenth year, I had bewildered myself in metaphysics and in theological controversy. Nothing else pleased me. History and particular facts lost all interest in my mind. Poetry itself, yea novels and romances, became insipid to me." The "Sonnets" of Mr. Bowles, however, had such a charm for him that he turned from metaphysics to the study of poetry. In 1791 he entered Jesus College, Cambridge, which he left during the second year of his residence there, came to London, and, under the name of Comberbatch, enlisted in the 15th Dragoons. From the life of a soldier, he was, almost immediately, released by his friends purchasing his discharge. He then went to Bristol, and shortly after, started a periodical called the "Watchman," which enjoyed an existence only to its ninth number. In 1795 he married Miss Sarah Fricker, and in the following year, published a small volume of poems, which went through a second edition. By this time he had gone to live in a cottage at the foot of the Quantock hills, in Somersetshire, where, in conjunction with Mr. Wordsworth, who was his neighbour, he formed the plan of the famous Lyrical Ballads. In 1797 he wrote his "Ancient Mariner," the first part of "Christabel," and his tragedy of "Remorse." About the same time he was preaching in a Unitarian chapel. In the following year, through the kind liberality of the Messrs. Wedgewood, he was enabled to visit Germany, in company with Wordsworth, and at Gottingen he attended Blumenbach's lectures on physiology, whilst, at the same time, making himself intimately acquainted with German literature. On his return, in 1798, he took up his residence at the Lakes, where both Southey and Wordsworth had settled, and published his translation of Schiller's "Wallenstein." In 1800 he began to contribute to the London Courier newspaper, which he continued to do till 1814. In the interval he had visited Malta, had lectured on the fine arts at the Royal Institution, and had produced "The Friend," a periodical which did not live beyond its twenty-seventh number. He now published several works on different subjects, and, during the latter years of his life, became domesticated with his friend Mr. Gillman, of Highgate Grove. For some years, as an academician of the Royal Society of Literature, he was in the receipt of £100 a year from George IV., which, on the death of that sovereign, he lost. B. at St. Mary Ottery, Devonshire, 1772; D. 1834.—The fame of Coleridge principally rests on his powers as a critic in poetry and the fine arts.

COLERIDGE, Hartley, the eldest son of Samuel Coleridge, produced some excellent poems, and from 1820 to 1831 was a contributor to "Blackwood's Magazine." He also wrote some excellent biographies of "The Worthies of Yorkshire and Lancashire." He lived mostly in the neighbourhood of the lakes Grasmere and Rydal, pleasing himself, rather than pleasing others, by the indulgence of an unfortunate propensity to intemperance, which he had contracted at college, and which never left him through life. B. 1796; D. 1849.—DERWENT, the younger brother of Hartley, became principal of St. Mark's College, Chelsea, and a prebendary of St. Paul's Cathedral. He is the author of a work "On the Scriptural Character of the English Church," and wrote some pieces, under the signature of Davenant Cecil, for "Knight's Quarterly Magazine." B. at Keswick, 1800.—SARA was the only daughter of Samuel Coleridge, and inherited much of the rich genius of her father. Her education was superintended mostly by Southey, who had married a sister of her mother, and to whose fostering care, the whole family of Coleridge owed a deep debt of gratitude. She was reared under his roof, and, as she grew up, she endeavoured to lighten the literary labours of Southey by giving him all the assistance she could. In 1822 she produced "An Account of the Abipones, an Equestrian People of Paraguay, from the Latin of Martin Dobrizhoffer." This was her first literary performance, and had been undertaken at the suggestion of Southey, who pronounced it admirable. In 1829 she married her cousin, Henry Nelson Coleridge, and on the death of her father, in 1834, in conjunction with her husband, undertook the task of giving to the world the poet's unpublished works. Whilst engaged in this duty, her husband died, when the completion of the task they had undertaken together, devolved wholly upon herself. She, however, proved quite equal to its performance, and executed it with great ability. It is upon her commentaries on her father's works that her fame chiefly rests, although she produced the "Phantasmion," a fairy tale, rich in invention, and redolent of poetic beauty. B. at Keswick, 1803; D. 1852.

COLERIDGE, Henry Nelson, was the son of Colonel Coleridge, a brother of the poet, and after distinguishing himself at school, became a contributor to "Knight's Quarterly Magazine." His subjects in that periodical were chiefly historical, biographical, and critical. In 1825 he took a voyage to the West Indies for the improvement of his health, and, on his return, produced "Six Months in the West Indies," which ran through several editions. Shortly afterwards he was called to the bar by the society of the Middle Temple, and then married Sara, the daughter of the poet Samuel Coleridge. He rose to a good chancery practice, and in 1830 published an "Introduction to the Study of the Greek Classic Poets." In 1835 he produced his "Specimens of the 'Table Talk' of the late Samuel Taylor Coleridge." In 1836 appeared, in two volumes, the first instalment of "The Literary Remains of S. T. Coleridge;" and, in 1838, another volume was given to the world. Immersed in his business whilst pursuing these literary labours, and with health scarcely sound, he was, in 1842, again taken ill. For many months he was confined to his bed, and at length passed into the "undiscovered country," and was buried by the side of his uncle, in Highgate old churchyard. B. 1800; D. 1843.

COLEROON, kole-roon', the largest and most northern branch of the Cauvary river, in British India. It enters the Indian Ocean at Devicotta, 24 miles from Trinquebar.

COLESBERG, koles'-berg, a district of the Cape Colony, S. Africa, bounded on the N. by the country of the Hottentots, and on the S. by the districts of Cradock and Graaf-Reynet. Area, 11,654 square miles. Desc. A high level country, rearing large herds of live stock. Pop. perhaps 8,000.

COLESHILL, a parish and town of Warwickshire, situate near the river Cole, here crossed by a bridge, 15 miles from Coventry. The houses are, in general, respectable in appearance, and the church is a beautiful specimen of the decorated Gothic style. Pop. 2,000. A station on a branch of the West Midland Railway.

COLET, John, kol'-et, an English divine, educated at Magdalen College, Oxford, where he obtained his degree of D.D. In 1502 he was installed in the deanery of St. Paul's, where, by his preaching and other labours, he greatly advanced the Reformation. He was a liberal encourager of learning, particularly of the Greek language, and founded St. Paul's school. B. in London, 1466; D. 1519.—He was buried in St. Paul's Cathedral, where a monument was erected to his memory, but was destroyed in the fire of 1666. He wrote some grammatical pieces for the use of his school, and was the author of several religious tracts of a practical kind.

COLIGNY, ko-leen'-ye, a town of France, in the department of the Ain, 14 miles from Bourg. Pop. 1,800.

COLIGNY, Admiral Gaspard de, a French general and statesman, greatly distinguished in the religious wars of his country, and who was created an admiral in 1552. He served in Italy under Francis I., in the campaign of 1543, and was at the battle of Ceresole in 1544. He afterwards served in Flanders, where he greatly contributed to the victory at Renty, and subsequently prosecuted the war with vigour against the Spaniards in Artois and Picardy. He valiantly defended St. Quentin, and after the death of Henry II. joined the Huguenots, and, next to the prince of Condé, was at the head of the Protestant party. He now took up arms against the Guises, and fought at the battles of Dreux, St. Denis, Jarnac, and Moncontour. In these conflicts he was unsuccessful, but showed great celerity in repairing his losses, and in always being ready again to meet the enemy. In 1570 he made an advantageous peace for the Huguenots, and afterwards was invited to court. Here he was graciously received only to be betrayed. Charles IX. affected great regard for him; but, a few days after the marriage of the king's sister with the young king of Navarre, Coligny was wounded by a musket-ball, shot from a window. This attempt was instigated by the duchess of Nemours, whose first husband, Francis, duke of Guise, was assassinated by a Huguenot fanatic, and Coligny was unjustly suspected of being the mainspring in the deed. Two days after this attempt on the life of Coligny, the massacre of St. Bartholomew took place, and he was among the first of its victims. Whilst sitting in his room, a party, headed by Besme, one of the domestics of the duke of Guise, rushed into his room with a drawn sword, and piercing him, the admiral fell, wounded to death, at the feet of the duke. His body was hung by the feet at a gibbet, and his head cut off and sent to Catharine de' Medici. B. at Châtillon-sur-Loing, 1516; killed in Paris, 1572.

COLIMA, ko-lee'-ma, a territory of the Mexican confederation, extending about 100 miles along the coast of the Pacific Ocean, south of the department Xalisco. Desc. Fertile, but exceedingly hot. Pop. about 30,000, mostly consisting of Indians. Lat. between 19° and 20° N.—The volcano of Colima, rising to a height of 12,000 feet, is in this district.

COLIN, Alexander, ko'-lă, a Belgian sculptor, who executed the celebrated tomb of Maximilian I., at Innspruck. The sculpture on this tomb records the principal acts and victories of the emperor Maximilian, and is surrounded by twenty-eight gigantic statues of the heroes of the middle ages. He also executed two monuments of his patron, the archduke Ferdinand of the Tyrol, and his first wife, Philippa. These are likewise to be seen at Innspruck, and are extremely elaborate works. He became court sculptor to the emperor Ferdinand I., and also to his son, Ferdinand of the Tyrol. B. at Mechlin, 1526; D. at Innspruck, 1612.

COLISEUM, kol'-i-se'-um, an immense and magnificent amphitheatre in Rome, commenced by Vespasian, and finished by Titus. It took its name from the colossal statue of Nero, which was close by. It was in the Coliseum that the combats of the gladiators took place, and where, also, the first Christian martyrs were delivered to the wild beasts. It was partially destroyed at the taking of Rome by the barbarians; but, to this day, its ruins are very imposing.

COLL, or COLLA, kol, one of the Western Isles of Scotland, annexed to the county of Argyle, and about 3 miles from the island of Tiree. Ext. About 14 miles long, and from 1 to 3½ in breadth. Pop. 1,200, engaged in rural and maritime industry.

COLLATINUS, L. Tarquinius, kol-la-ti'-nus, a nephew of Tarquin the Proud, who married Lucretia, to whom Sext. Tarquin offered violence. He, with Brutus, drove the Tarquins from Rome, and were made first consuls. He afterwards laid down his office, and retired to Alba in voluntary banishment. Lived in the 6th century B.C.—One of the seven hills of Rome.

COLLE, kol'-lai, the name of several towns in Italy, none of them with a population above 6,500.

COLLETON, kol'-le-ton, a district of South Carolina, U.S., on the Atlantic. Area, 2,100 square miles Desc. Fertile, and productive in rice and cotton. Pop. 40,000, of whom three fourths are slaves.

COLLIER, Jeremy, kol'-yer, a learned divine, and the son of a clergyman at Stow Qui, in Cambridgeshire. He was educated by his father, and then removed to Caius College, Cambridge, where, in 1676, he took his degree of M.A., and entered into orders. In 1679 he received the rectory of Ampton, in Suffolk, which he afterwards resigned, and came to London, where, in 1685, he was chosen lecturer at Gray's Inn. At the Revolution, he not only refused the oaths, but wrote in vindication of the abdicated monarch, for which he was imprisoned in Newgate. He was, however, discharged without being brought to trial. In 1692 he was again committed to the Gate-house, on suspicion of corresponding with the exiled king; but was, shortly afterwards, admitted to bail. In 1696, when Sir John Friend and Sir William Perkins were executed for what was called the Assassination Plot, Mr. Collier and two other nonjuring clergymen attended them to the place of execution, where all three joined in absolving them by the imposition of hands. This circumstance made a great noise, and two of the ministers were arrested, but Mr. Collier absconded, and was declared an outlaw. When this storm subsided, he published three volumes of excellent Essays upon Miscellaneous Subjects. These appeared severally in 1697, 1705, and 1709, and passed through many editions, being valued not only on account of the freedom of their style, but for the wit and humour with which they abounded. He next directed his attention to the immorality of the stage, which was very licentious. This drew him into a controversy with several eminent poets, amongst whom was Dryden; but the latter made an honest confession of his fault, and Collier came off completely victorious. The town was on his side, and the dramatic writers afterwards wrote with more regard to decency. His next work was a translation and continuation of Moreri's "Historical Dictionary," under the title of "Geographical, Genealogical, and Poetical," which met with a very favourable reception, and was, in 1721, completed in 4 vols. folio. At the accession of Queen Anne, he had great offers of preferment, which he steadily refused. In 1713 he published, in 2 vols. folio, "The Ecclesiastical History of Great Britain," brought down to the death of Charles II.; and, in 1713, was privately consecrated a bishop by Dr. George Hickes, who had been himself consecrated suffragan of Thetford by the deprived bishops of Norwich, Ely, and Peterborough, in 1694. Old age was now fast drawing upon him; but he did not cease his active labours till affliction put it out of his power to do more than he had done. B. at Stow Qui, in Cambridgeshire, 1650; D. in London, 1726.—Besides the above works, he published a volume of sermons, a translation of Marcus Antoninus, and numerous pamphlets. He was buried in St. Pancras churchyard.

COLLIER, J. Payne, an ardent labourer in the field of dramatic literature, was educated for the bar. In 1820 appeared his "Poetical Decameron; or, Ten Conversations on English Poets and Poetry, particularly of the Reigns of Elizabeth and James I." These conversations indicated the prevailing direction of his taste; and in 1825 he issued an allegorical poem, entitled "The Poet's Pilgrimage," which will hardly transmit his name to posterity. In 1827 appeared his edition of Dodsley's "Old Plays," to which were added some others; and, in 1831, his "History of English Dramatic Poetry, &c." This has been pronounced a valuable record of the British stage. In 1835-6-9 appeared successively "New Facts regarding the Life of Shakspeare;" and, in 1844, his edition of Shakspeare, founded upon an entirely new collection of the old editions. Being an active member of the Shakspeare Society, Mr. Collier had an extensive knowledge of the dramatic literature of his country, and largely contributed to extend the taste which now generally exists for the works of England's great national dramatist. In 1848 appeared "Shakspeare's Library; a Collection of the ancient Romances, Novels, Legends, Poems, and Histories used by Shakspeare as the Foundation of his Dramas." This work was accompanied with introductory notices, and must be pronounced a treasure to the Shakspearian antiquary. In 1849 he purchased an old folio Shakspeare of 1632, which had many emendations, and about which there has been much controversy, but into which it would be superfluous to enter here. B. in London, 1789.

COLLINGWOOD, Cuthbert, Lord, kol'-ling-wood, an English admiral, who, in his thirteenth year, entered the navy, and gradually rose through the subordinate ranks, when, in the action of June 1, 1794, we find him flag-captain to Admiral Bowyer, on board the Prince. In 1797 he commanded the Excellent at the battle of Cape St. Vincent, and subsequently rose to the rank of vice-admiral of the blue. This placed him second in command to Nelson at the battle of Trafalgar, where, on October 21, 1805, in the Royal Sovereign, he was the first to attack and break the enemy's line. It was on this occasion that Nelson exclaimed, "See that gallant fellow, how he carries his ship into action!" When England's greatest naval hero fell, mortally wounded, Collingwood completed the victory, and continued in command of the fleet. His services were now deemed worthy of a peerage, which he received. For nearly three years he continued the blockade of Cadiz, the Straits of Gibraltar, and the neighbouring coasts, and evinced a perseverance almost unexampled in the annals of naval warfare. Remaining at his post to the last, he sailed up the Mediterranean, where he became involved in some political complications, which, however, he managed with great sagacity. Wearied and worn out in the service of his country, he was at last compelled to "strike his colours" to the King of Terrors. B. at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, 1750; D. near Port Mahon, in his ship, the Ville de Paris, 1810.

COLLINS, William, kol'-lins, an English poet, educated at Winchester school, whence he removed to Queen's College, Oxford. In 1741 he was chosen demy of Magdalen College, where he took his degree of B.A., and, while there, published his "Oriental Eclogues." About 1744 he went to London, where he suffered extreme poverty; but an uncle, dying, left him £2,000, which saved him from utter wretchedness, although he did not live to enjoy it. Before his death, his mind sunk into a state of complete imbecility. B. at Chichester, 1720; D. 1756.—Dr. Johnson has included Collins in his "Lives of the Poets," and says that he paid him a visit at Islington, and found him with a book in his hand. This turned out to be the New Testament, which he said was the best in the world. His ode on "the Passions" is the poem by which he is best known, and which has long ago been ranked among the order of the sublime. His "Dirge to Cymbeline" is likewise an excellent effusion, although in another style.

COLLINS, William, R.A., a modern English artist of high eminence. In 1807 he entered a student at the Royal Academy, and, in the same year, became an exhibitor, by contributing two small "Views on Millbank." From that time, for nearly forty years, he was an annual exhibitor, with the exception of a couple of youth, when he was pursuing his studies in Italy. At first he distinguished himself by his groups of rustic children, engaged either in play or some juvenile trick; but after he had become an associate of the academy in 1814, he began his representations of coast scenery, in which he gained a most distinguished position. Amongst the numerous works which time, well employed, enabled him to produce, we may mention, as perhaps the most popular, his children swinging on a gate, and entitled "Happy as a King;" "The Stray Kitten;" "Putting Salt on the Bird's Tail;" and "The Newly-found Nest." B. in London, 1787; D. 1847.—Mr. Collins had two sons. The eldest, WILLIAM WILKIE, is the author of several novels, and a life of his father. CHARLES ALSTON, the younger, is an artist, and a disciple of the pre-Raffaelite school.

COLLOT D'HERBOIS, Jean Marie, kol'-lo dair'-bwaw, a ferocious French revolutionist, was for twenty years a strolling player. In 1792, however, he received a prize from the Jacobin society, became one of its members, and also of the Convention. He was the first who moved for the abolition of royalty, and, on the trial of the king, sat next to Robespierre. In 1793, he accompanied Fouché to Lyons, and was one of the principals in the destruction of 1,600 persons by the guillotine and artillery. History hardly presents us with such a monster as this. He actually made it a crime to show sympathy, by the countenance, for the unfortunate. In proof of this, he issued an order "that all those whose countenances testified to any inward emotions of grief or pity, should be treated as suspected." In 1794, an attempt made to assassinate him only increased his popularity. He became president of the Convention, and took part in the impeachment of the infamous Robespierre. He aided in bringing that monster to the scaffold; but his own time had come. He was denounced in the October of 1794, and in the following March was transported to Cayenne, where he shortly afterwards died of the fever natural to the climate. B. in Paris, 1750; D. 1796.—This human destroyer was not entirely destitute of talent. He wrote the almanack of Father Gerard, which obtained for him the prize from the Jacobin society, and some dramatic pieces, the best of which is an imitation from the Spanish of Calderon, entitled "Lo Paysan Magistrat."

COLLUMPTON, kol-lump'-ton, a town of Devonshire, on the Culme, 11 miles from Exeter. It consists chiefly of one long street. The church is a respectable Gothic structure. Pop. 3,410.

COLMAN, George, kol'-man, usually called the "Elder," was the son of Thomas Colman, Esq., resident at the court of the grand-duke of Tuscany, by a sister of Anna-Maria Pulteney, the countess of Bath. He received his education at Westminster school, and Christ-church, Oxford, where he engaged with Bonnel Thornton in writing a periodical paper called "The Connoisseur." On leaving the university, he entered at Lincoln's Inn, and was called to the bar, but quitted the law for dramatic composition. In 1760, his first piece, "Polly Honeycomb," was successfully performed at Drury-lane theatre; and the next year his comedy of the "Jealous Wife" was similarly received. In 1764, Lord Bath died, and left him an annuity, which was increased by General Pulteney. In 1768, he became a patentee of Covent-garden theatre, but, soon after, sold his share, and purchased Foote's theatre in the Haymarket, which he held to his death, in 1794. B. at Florence, 1733.—Besides the above pieces, he wrote the "Clandestine Marriage," and altogether adapted and wrote upwards of thirty pieces for the stage, besides translating "Terence," and "Horace's Art of Poetry," with a considerable degree of elegance and fidelity.

COLMAN, George, the "Younger," was the son of the preceding, and was also designed for the profession of the law. Themis, however, proved an uncongenial companion, when compared with the charms of Thespis, and he commenced writing for the stage. On the demise of his father, George III. transferred the patent of the Haymarket theatre to him. He produced a number of excellent plays and farces; among which may be mentioned "John Bull," "Inkle and Yarico," "The Heir-at-Law," "Love laughs at Locksmiths," "The Iron Chest," "The Poor Gentleman," "Blue Beard," and "Broad Grins." He also published his own "Memoirs," up to the time of his undertaking the management of the Haymarket. B. in London, 1762; D. 1836.—George IV. appointed Colman, Exon of the yeoman guard, but he resigned this, and became lord chamberlain's examiner of plays, which office he retained till his death.

COLMAR, kol'-mar, a town of France, formerly the capital of Upper Alsace, and now of the department of the Upper Rhine, on the Lauch, 40 miles from Strasburg. It contains a great public school, an hospital, an arsenal, and very agreeable public walks. Manf. Cotton, linen, and woollen goods, cutlery, paper, and combs. Pop. 22,000. In 1697 it was ceded to France by the peace of Ryswick.

COLMENAR, kol-mai-nar, the name of several towns in Spain, none of them with a population above 6,000.

COLNE, koln, three rivers of England.—1. In Hertfordshire, falling into the Thames at Staines.—2. In Essex, passing Colchester, and expanding into an estuary near that town.—3. In Gloucester, and, after a course of 25 miles, joining the Isis, near Lechlade.

COLNE, a town of Lancashire, 32 miles by railway from Manchester. Manf. Chiefly cabcoes and dimities. Coal, slate, and lime are plentiful in the neighbourhood. Pop. 9,000. The Leeds and Liverpool Canal passes this town.—Also, the name of several parishes, none of them with a population above 2,000.

COLOGNA, ko-lone'-ya, a town of the Venetian territory, 20 miles from Vicenza. Manf. Principally silk. Pop. 6,500.

COLOGNE, kol'-lone, an ancient city of West Germany, formerly the capital of the electorate of the same name, is situate on the Rhine, where there is a bridge of boats, connecting it with its suburb, Deutz, 45 miles from Coblentz. It is built in the form of a crescent, close to the river. The walls have a number of towers, and form a circuit of nearly seven English miles; but a part of the included space is laid out in promenades, gardens, and vineyards. The streets are in general narrow, winding, and gloomy, and the houses ill built. Its public edifices are a cathedral, numerous churches, chapels, a town-hall, court-house, an archbishop's palace, exchange, and arsenal. The cathedral or minster of St. Peter is a vast and imposing edifice of Gothic architecture, and was begun about the year 1218. The church of St. Mary is remarkable for its antiquity, and that of St. Gestian for a subterraneous church under its choir. In the arsenal are shown many curious specimens of ancient armour. Its university was established so far back as 1388; but the French suppressed it, and erected in its place a central school, or lyceum. Cologne has long been noted for its commerce. The principal objects of export are wine, timber, earthenware, slates, and other minerals; hardware, firearms, and various kitchen utensils. Manf. The principal are linen, woollen, and silk stuffs, with lace, thread, the famous eau de Cologne, tobacco, hats, wax-lights, needles, clocks, and gold and silver articles. Pop. about 95,000.—Cologne was the Colonia Agrippina of the Romans. In the 4th century it was made a bishopric, and in the 8th, an archbishopric. In 957 it was declared, by Otho the Great, a free and imperial city; and, from the 12th to the 15th century, it held a high rank amongst the cities of the Hanseatic league. Its population amounted to 150,000, and its archbishops, who were very powerful, had the title of electors. Their intolerant and persecuting spirit, however, finally brought about its ruin, and in 1792 it ceased to be a free city. Taken by the French in 1795, it was, from 1801 to 1814, the capital of the department of the Roer. Since that date it has belonged to Prussia. Cologne carries on an active steamboat trade by the Rhine, and has railway communication with Aix-la-Chapelle, Bonn, Hamm, and Mechlin. Here were born Cornelius Agrippa and Rubens, and here died Marie de Medicis.

COLOMBE, St., ko'-lomb, the name of several inconsiderable towns in France.

COLOMBIA, ko-lom'-be-a, an extensive region in the N. part of S. America, now comprised in the republics of Ecuador, New Grenada, and Venezuela.

COLOMBO, or COLUMBO, ko-lom'-bo, the modern capital and principal seaport of the island of Ceylon. It stands on the W. coast, and is nearly two miles in circumference, surrounded on three sides by the sea. It is built somewhat on the principle of a European town, the fortified part being the seat of the residence of the military authorities, and the most influential European residents of Ceylon. The other part is chiefly occupied by the descendants of Dutch and Portuguese, whilst the native Cingalese inhabit the suburbs. It is the entrepôt of most of the foreign trade of Ceylon. Pop. 32,000. Lat. 6° 56′ N. Lon. 79° 49′ E.—This place came into the possession of the English in 1796. Previously, it had been successively occupied by the Portuguese and the Dutch.

COLONIA DEL SANTISSIMA SACRAMENTO, ko-lo'-ne-a dail san-tees'-se-ma sa'-kra-main'-to, a maritime town of Uruguay, on the N. bank of the estuary of the Plata, opposite Buenos Ayres. Pop. 3,000.—The English and French fleets took this town from the troops of Rosas in 1845.

COLONNA, CAPE, ko-lon'-na, the most southern point of Attica, in Greece, 25 miles from Athens. Lat. 37° 8′ 51″ N. Lon. 24° 1′ 48″ E.—It takes its name from the "columns" of a temple of Minerva, which anciently occupied a site here.

COLONNA, CAPE, on the east coast of Calabria, at the entrance of the Gulf of Tarento. Lat. 39° 6′ N. Lon. 17° 29′ E.—This is the Lacinium Promontorium of the ancients.

COLONNA, the name of an old and illustrious family of Italy, which, in the middle ages, produced many distinguished members, among whom were the following.

COLONNA, Prospero, an Italian general, who, with Fabricio, a relative, entered the service of Charles VIII., king of France, and assisted him in the conquest of Naples. They afterwards left him and contributed to the recovery of that kingdom for the house of Aragon. Prospero, after distinguishing himself in many battles, was, in 1515, made prisoner at Villafranca. On regaining his liberty, he attacked the French with vigour, and having defeated them at the battle of Bicocca, relieved Milan in 1522. B. 1452; D. 1523.

COLONNA, Pompeo, a Roman cardinal, who, although a follower of the church, was strongly imbued with a military disposition. After he became bishop of Rieti, he had a quarrel with a Spaniard, whom, on account of his profession, he dared not fight, and therefore revenged himself upon his own episcopal garments, by tearing them in pieces. On a false rumour of the death of Pope Julius II. in 1512, Colonna, with Savillo, a young nobleman, excited the Roman people to a revolt, and seized the Capitol, for which he was deprived of his preferments. He recovered the pope's favour afterwards, and Leo X. made him a cardinal. In 1526, he engaged in another conspiracy to surprise Rome, and to put the pope to death, which, however, was defeated, and he suffered deprivation. This occurrence was the occasion of the sack of Rome by the constable Bourbon. Colonna, however, had sufficient influence to obtain the liberty of the pope, who restored him to his rank. He afterwards became viceroy of Naples, and died in 1532. He wrote a poem, entitled "De Laudibus Mulierum."

COLONNA, Marc Antonio, duke of Paliano, served with such reputation in the famous battle of Lepanto, gained over the Turks in 1571, as to be honoured with a triumphal entry into Rome by the pope. He was made constable of Naples and viceroy of Sicily. D. 1584.

COLONNA, Fabio, an Italian philosopher, who made great progress in the languages, mathematics, law, and the fine arts; but applied himself principally to physic and botany. At the age of 24 he published an elegant botanical work, the plates of which he executed himself. In 1610 he issued another, which was not completed till 1616. He was the first who distinguished the petals of flowers by names distinct from the leaves, and used the method of arrangement afterwards adopted by Tournefort. He was also the inventor of a musical instrument called a pentachordon. B. at Naples, about 1567; D. 1647.

COLONSAY and ORANSAY, kol'-on-sai, two of the small islands called the Hebrides of Scotland, about 9 miles from Islay. Area of both islands, about 9,000 acres. Pop. 900.

COLOPHON, kol'-o-fon, a town of Ionia, at a small distance from the sea, first built by Mopsus, the son of Manto, and colonized by the sons of Codrus. It was the native country of Mimnermus, Nicander, and Xenophanes, and one of the cities which claimed the honour of having given birth to Homer. Apollo had a temple in it.

COLORADO, ko-lo-ra'-do, a river of Mexico, rising in the Anahuac plateau, and, after a course of 700 miles, entering the Gulf of California at lat. 32° N.; lon. 114° W.—There is another in Texas, which, after a course of 800 miles through a cotton-producing country, falls into the Bay of Matagorda.

COLOSSE, ko-los'-se, 'punishment,' or 'correction,' a city of Phrygia, in Asia Minor.

COLOSSUS, ko-los'-sus, a celebrated brazen image at Rhodes, and one of the seven wonders of the world. Its feet rested on two moles, which formed the entrance of Rhodes harbour, and ships passed full sail between its legs. It was 70 cubits, or 105 feet, high, and was the work of Chares, the disciple of Lysippus. This artist was twelve years in making it. A winding staircase ran to the top, from which could be easily discerned, by the help of glasses, the shores of Syria, and ships on the coast of Egypt. It was partly demolished by an earthquake, 224 B.C., and remained in ruins for nearly 900 years. In 672 it was sold by the Saracens, who were masters of the island, to a Jewish merchant, who loaded 900 camels with the brass, the value of which has been estimated at £36,000.

COLUMB, ST., MAJOR, kol'-umb, a parish and town of Cornwall, 30 miles from Launceston. It is the head of a poor-law union, and the seat of a petty sessions. Pop. 3,000.—COLUMB, ST., MINOR, is in the same county, and 6 miles from the other. Pop. 2,500.

COLUMBIA, ko-lum'-be-a, the name of several counties in the United States, with populations ranging between 5,000 and 45,000. The following are the states in which they are:—New York, Pennsylvania, Georgia, and Florida.—The name, also, of several townships, with populations ranging between 2,000 and 6,000.

COLUMBIA, DISTRICT OF, a tract of country on both sides of Potomac river, 120 miles from its mouth, between Maryland and Virginia. Area, 100 square miles. Desc. Unproductive; generally with an undulating surface. Pop. 52,000, of whom 4,000 are slaves and 10,000 free coloured.—It was ceded to the United States, by Maryland and Virginia, in 1790, and in 1800 became the seat of the general government. It is under the direct government of Congress.

COLUMBIA RIVER, a large river of N. America, rising in a part of the British territory, in the Rocky Mountains, in lat. 51° 23′ N.; lon. 121° W.; and, after a course of 1,000 miles, falling into the Pacific Ocean, in lat. 46° 10′ N.; lon. 122° 45′ W.—By the Oregon treaty, the entire navigation of this river is open to British vessels.

COLUMBIA, BRITISH, an extensive tract of almost uninhabited country, on the N.W. coast of N. America, bounded on the W. by the Pacific and Queen Charlotte's Sound, on the E. by the Rocky Mountains, and on the S. by Oregon, U.S. Ext. 500 miles long, and nearly 400 broad, exclusive of Vancouver's Island, which is quite independent of British Columbia, and will be treated of under its proper heading. Desc. The country may be described as divided into three great districts, by ranges running parallel to each other and with the Rocky Mountains. The two E. districts are broken up into immense valleys, and are watered by the river Columbia, whilst the W. district is watered by the Frazer. Pro. Having a climate like that of England, it produces all the usual crops of that country in great abundance. Minerals. Gold and coal; but the whole territory may be said to be yet unexplored. That gold is plentiful, however, amongst the sands of the rivers has been proved, several adventurers, since it was first discovered, in 1849, having realized as much as £90 worth in a single week, with very little trouble. Zoology. Mostly fur-bearing animals, especially beavers and martens, which find a good cover in the Rocky Mountains. Various descriptions of bears are the only kinds of animals at all common. Fish are abundant, literally swarming in all the lakes and rivers, and salmon is the chief food of the natives. It is said, however, that every fourth year the salmon becomes scarce; whereupon their place, as food, is immediately supplied by plenty of rabbits, which continue abundant till they are destroyed by a sudden and unaccountable appearance of an army of lynxes. This, however, is hardly credible. Inhabitants. Principally adventurers, or gold-diggers, from all countries, and a small number of trappers and Indians. Lat. between 49° and 57° N. Lon. between 120° and 127° W.—Up to 1858 this country formed part of the territory held by the Hudson Bay Company; it was then formed into a colony, and the name of British Columbia was given to it by Sir E. Bulwer Lytton, at that time secretary for the colonies. It is now under the administration of a governor representing the British government.

COLUMBIANA, ko-lum'-be-a'-na, a county of the United States, in the E. part of Ohio. Area, 740 square miles. Desc. Undulating, but fertile. Pop. 35,000.

COLUMBUS, ko-lum'-bus, the name of several places in the United States.—1. A county in N. Carolina. Area, 625 square miles. Pop. 6,000, of whom one sixth are slaves.—2. The capital of the state of Ohio, on the Scioto river, 210 miles from Cincinnati. The principal edifices are a state-house, court-house, churches, and several charitable institutions. Pop. 18,000.—The name of several other towns, with populations ranging between 1,500 and 6,000.

COLUMBUS, Christopher, a celebrated Genoese navigator, whose origin was humble, and in whose life there is little of interest till 1470, when he settled at Lisbon, where his brother Bartholomew was employed as a maker of charts. Here Christopher married the daughter of an Italian naval commander, called Patestrello, who had been employed in voyages of discovery. From the journals and charts of this seaman, he acquired a considerable share of nautical knowledge, and traded, himself, several years to the Canary islands, Madeira, the Azores, and the coast of Africa. Meanwhile, he began to entertain the idea of the existence of a new continent beyond the Atlantic Ocean. The more he considered the subject, the more he became confirmed in his opinion, when, communicating his plan to the republic of Genoa, it was rejected as extravagant. He next applied to John II., king of Portugal, who dishonourably sent other navigators to test the value of the scheme of Columbus, but who, despairing of its success, returned to Lisbon in disgust. The great Genoese was enraged at such treatment, and dispatched his brother Bartholomew to Henry VII. of England; but, on the voyage, he was taken by pirates. In the mean time, Columbus, after many disappointments, obtained an audience of Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain. These sovereigns received him favourably, and in 1492 granted him three vessels to prosecute discoveries in those regions which, it was generally believed, had no existence, save in his own imagination. The conditions stipulated between him and his royal employers were, "that if he made no discoveries, he should have no reward; that if he did, he should be viceroy by land and admiral by sea, and have the tenths of the profits of all the countries discovered by him; and that these privileges should descend to his family." On August 3, 1492, Columbus and his little squadron set sail on their perilous voyage, from the bar of Saltes, near Palos, and, after some misgivings and many trials, on account of the superstitious terrors of his crew, landed, October 12, on an island in Guana Bay, and erected the Spanish flag. This island, one of the Bahamas, he called St. Salvador. Hence he sailed to Cuba, and afterwards to Hispaniola. Having discovered other islands and taken possession of them in the name of their Catholic majesties, Columbus set sail for Europe on January 4, 1493, bringing with him some of the natives. On March 15 he arrived at Seville, and immediately went to Barcelona, where Ferdinand and Isabella received him under a canopy of cloth of gold, and made him sit beside them whilst they conferred on him several marks of favour. Columbus sailed on his second voyage from Cadiz, September 25, 1493, and discovered the Caribbee islands, Puerto Rico, and Jamaica. On his return, he suffered great hardships from sickness and disaffection among his men. Nevertheless, he conducted himself manfully, and arrived at Cadiz, June 11, 1496. On his arrival, he found that, during his absence, calumny had been doing its work against him; but he refuted all that had been alleged, and, on May 13, 1498, embarked on his third voyage with only six vessels. In this expedition he discovered the island of Trinidad, the mouths of the Orinoco, the coast of Paria, the Margarita, the Cubagua islands, and, on his arrival at Hispaniola, found the colony which he had settled there, in a state bordering on civil war. He succeeded in restoring peace; but some of the settlers, envious of him and his brother Bartholomew, whom he had appointed his lieutenant, sent home such accusations against them that Queen Isabella revoked the appointment of Columbus, and sent out Francis de Bovadilla to take his place. This man, on his arrival, caused the brothers to be put in chains, and, in that condition, sent them to Europe. The captain of the ship in which Columbus was now a prisoner would have taken off his fetters; but he refused to be liberated, except in the presence of his sovereigns. "I will wear them till the king otherwise commands, and then I will preserve them as memorials of his gratitude;" an expression indicative of a mind by far too lofty to be in the power of kings to humiliate. All Spain felt, with indignation, the insult offered to so great a man. He was instantly set at liberty, and rewarded, instead of being punished, Ferdinand himself avowing shame at the transaction. Columbus, however, always preserved his fetters, and ordered that they should be buried with him. In 1502 he made another voyage, in which he traced the coast of Darien, thinking to find a passage to the East Indies, coasted Honduras, the Mosquito shore, Costa Rica, and Veragua. He returned to Spain in 1504, and found Queen Isabella dead, and the king once more prejudiced against him. Worn out in body and broken in spirit, he lingered out the short remainder of his existence in neglect, poverty, and pain. B. at Genoa, 1445-6; D. at Valladolid, 1506.—His remains were interred in the cathedral of Seville, where a monument was erected to his memory, bearing this inscription: "To Castile and Leon, Columbus has given a new world." Yet this brave adventurer had not the honour of giving his name to the world he discovered; for that was enjoyed by Amerigo, or Americus Vespucius, a Florentine. This voyager, it is said, did not see the New World till he sailed with Ojeda, as a pilot, to the coast of Paria, in 1499. (See AMERICA.)—BARTHOLOMEW COLUMBUS died in 1514.—DIEGO, the son of Christopher, was ennobled, and obtained his father's honours and grants.—FERDINAND, another son, embraced the ecclesiastical state, and formed a rich library, which he left to the cathedral of Seville. He wrote the life of his father, and died about 1530.

COLUMELLA, L. Jun. Moderatus, kol'-u-mel'-la, a native of Gades (Cadiz, in Spain), who wrote twelve books on agriculture, of which the tenth, on gardening, is in verse. The style is elegant, and the work displays the genius of a naturalist and the labours of an accurate observer. Lived in the 1st century.

COMACCHIO, ko-mak'-ke-o, a fortified town of the Pontifical States, Italy, 30 miles from Ferrara. Pop. 6,000.—The right of maintaining a garrison in this town and Ferrara was ceded to Austria by the treaty of 1815. The waters around this place are famous for the abundance of fish they contain.

COMBE, koom, the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 1,800.

COMBE, George, a distinguished Scotch phrenologist, educated for the legal profession, in which he practised for upwards of twenty years. Made a convert to the principles of Gall and Spurzheim, when about thirty years of age, he began to apply himself zealously to their further elucidation, and in 1819 published his "Essays on Phrenology." From that time he continued to expound the phenomena of mental organism, and in 1828 published "The Constitution of Man, in relation to External Objects." This work became extremely popular, and both in Britain and America enjoyed a large circulation. In 1833 appeared his lectures on "Popular Education," which he had previously delivered in various parts of Britain, and which have been translated into several continental languages. In 1836 he became a candidate for the chair of logic and metaphysics in the university of Edinburgh, but the honour was awarded to Sir William Hamilton. Subsequently, Mr. Combe made a tour through the United States, lecturing to distinguished audiences, and, at the same time, keeping himself before the public eye by the publication of several pamphlets. He also visited Germany, and in 1845 published "Notes on the New Reformation in Germany, &c.," and an essay on the "Relation between Religion and Science." In 1850 he edited the "Life and Correspondence" of his brother Andrew, and in 1855 produced a work entitled "Phrenology applied to Painting and Sculpture." These are his most prominent labours in literature and moral science; but he has written upon educational and other kindred subjects. B. at Edinburgh, 1788.—ANDREW COMBE was a distinguished medical practitioner, and became consulting physician to the king of the Belgians. He wrote and published several excellent works on physiological science. B. at Edinburgh, 1797; D. 1847.

COMBERMERE, kom'-ber-meer, a lake in Cheshire, not far from Nantwich.

COMBERMERE, Stapleton Cotton, Viscount, was the eldest son of Sir R. S. Cotton, M.P. for Cheshire, and in 1791 entered the army. Engaged, first in Flanders, next at the Cape of Good Hope, and then in India, he saw a good deal of service, when he returned to England, and accompanied the duke of Wellington to the Peninsula. Here he greatly distinguished himself, and in 1810 was appointed, under the duke, to the command of the allied forces. He continued actively engaged till the close of the war, and in 1817 was appointed governor of Barbadoes, with the command of the forces in the W. Indies. This position he, in 1822, exchanged for the command of the British troops in India, and in 1825 distinguished himself at the siege and capture of the fortress of Bhurtpore. On the death of the duke of Wellington, he became constable of the Tower of London, and lord-lieutenant of the Tower Hamlets. For his services in the Peninsula he had received a peerage, and for those in India he was created a viscount. In 1855 he became a field-marshal, and also held the appointment in the court as gold stick in waiting on her majesty Queen Victoria. B. 1770.

COMBERTON, kom'-ber-ton, three English parishes, none of them with a population above 800.

COMBIN, kom'-bi, one of the culminating peaks of the Pennine Alps, 9 miles from Martigny. Height, 14,124 feet.

COMBOURG, kom'-boorg, a town of France, in the department of the Ille and Vilaine, 20 miles from St. Malo. Pop. 5,100.

COMITIA, ko-mish'-e-a, an assembly of the Roman people for the election of magistrates and all the public officers of state.

COMMELINUS, or COMMELYN, kom'-me-lin, the name of a Dutch family who flourished between 1593 and 1750. They produced several approved historical and botanical works.

COMMERCY, kom'-mer-se, a town of France, in Lorraine, on the Meuse, 20 miles from Bar-le-Duc. This town was formerly fortified, and had a fine castle, which serves now as a cavalry barracks. Manf. Cotton and leather. Pop. 4,300.

COMMERSON, Philibert, kom'-mair-sawng, a celebrated French botanist, who made a voyage round the world, and collected a vast variety of plants. He did not live long enough to describe his discoveries, but his collection and drawings were deposited in the Jardin des Plantes, at Paris. B. at Châtillon, Ain, 1727; D. at Mauritius, 1773.—To him we are indebted for the beautiful flower "hortensia," which came originally from China.

COMMINES, kom-meen, a town of Belgium, in the province of West Flanders, 10 miles from Ypres. It stands on the frontier, and is connected by a bridge across the Lys, with the French town of the same name. Manf. Ribbons, handkerchiefs, thread, and tobacco. Pop. 4,000.

COMMINES, a town of France, situate on the Lys, opposite the Belgian town of the same name, 9 miles from Lille. Manf. Thread and ribbons. Pop. 6,000. —This is the birthplace of Philip de Commines.

COMMINES, Philip de, a French statesman and historian, who was descended from a noble family, and became eminent at the court of Louis XI. He was first attached to Charles the Rash, of Burgundy, but, in 1472, transferred his services to Louis. After the death of this monarch, he joined himself to the party of the duke of Orleans, who afterwards became Louis XII., but was unfortunate in being imprisoned and having his property confiscated. Shortly after the accession of Louis XII., who did not please to remember the sacrifices he had made for him, he retired to the country, and passed the remainder of his days in writing his memoirs. B. at the Château de Commines, near Commines, 1445; D. at Argentin, in Poitou, 1509.—His Memoirs of his Own Times show a great knowledge of men and things, an acuteness of judgment in tracing circumstances to their causes, and are enriched with a variety of excellent observations. The best edition of the original is that of Fresnoy, 1747, 4 vols. 4to; and in English the translation of Uvedale, with curious notes, in 2 vols. 8vo.

COMMODUS, L. Aurelius Antoninus, kom-mo'-dus, a Roman emperor, son of Marcus Aurelius, succeeded his father in 180. He was naturally depraved and licentious, committing the most terrible cruelties and crimes. Of great stature and strength, he would fight with the gladiators, and boasted of his dexterity in killing wild beasts in the amphitheatre. Poisoned by Martia, one of his concubines, whose death he had meditated, 193; B. 160.

COMMORRO ISLANDS, kom-mor'-ro, a group in the Mozambique Channel, between Madagascar and Africa. It consists of several mountainous and fertile islands, producing all the crops of a tropical climate. Large herds of cattle are reared upon them, and the rivers abound in fish. Pop. 80,000. Lat. between 11° and 13° S. Lon. between 43° and 45° 30′ E.—A British consul has now a residence on these islands.

COMNENUS. (See ALEXIS, ANNA, ISAAC, &c.)

COMO, ko'-mo, an old episcopal city of Lombardy, at the S. extremity of the lake of the same name, 20 miles from Milan. The houses are neatly built of stone, and the public buildings magnificent. There are several churches, exclusive of the cathedral, which is entirely of white marble. Manf. Velvet, taffetas, gloves, stockings, and other silk stuffs; here are also metal-foundries and statuaries. Pop. about 19,000.—It is the birthplace of the younger Pliny.

COMO, a lake of Lombardy, situate at the foot of the Alps. Ext. About 35 miles long, with a varying breadth of from 1 to 3. It is the most distinguished for the beauty of its scenery of all the northern Italian lakes. The river Adda enters it at the foot of the Lepontine and Rhetian Alps, and leaves it at Lecco.—Here Queen Caroline of England resided in the Villa d'Este, which was the name it received from her.

COMORIN, CAPE, kom'-o-rin, the S. extremity of the Indian peninsula. Lat. 7° 57′ N. Lon. 77° 35′ E.

COMORN, or KOMORN, ko'-morn, a royal free town of Hungary, 48 miles from Buda. Its citadel is considered one of the strongest in Europe. Pop. 21,000, chiefly Protestants.—This place withstood successfully a long siege by the Austrians in 1849.

COMPIÈGNE, kom'-pe-ain, a town of France, in the department of the Oise, on the Oise, 35 miles from Beauvais. This place has a considerable historical importance. Its palace was reconstructed under Louis XIV., XV., and XVI., and restored by Napoleon I. The parks and forests by which it is encompassed cover 30,000 acres. The other chief buildings are the abbey of St. Corneille, the Pont Neuf, and the Hôtel-de-Ville. Pop. 11,000.—Here Joan of Arc was, in 1430, made prisoner, and sold to the English, and here Napoleon I., in 1810, married the archduchess of Austria. It was possessed by the English from the early part of the 15th century till they were expelled by Charles VII. Under Napoleon III., the festivals at Compiègne, after the manner of the court of Louis XIV., attained quite a celebrity.

COMPOSTELLA, or ST. JAGO DE COMPOSTELLA, kom'-pos-tail'-la, a town of Galicia, in Spain, on the Soria, 98 miles from Astorga. The principal church is the cathedral, in which it is asserted St. James was buried. It has a university, founded in 1532. Pop. 14,000.—From this town the order of St. Jago, or St. James, took its origin.

COMPOSTELLA, a town of the Mexican confederation, in the department of Xalisco, and 100 miles from Guadalaxara. There are silver-mines in its neighbourhood, but its climate is very unhealthy.

COMPTON, Henry, kom'-ton, an English prelate, son of the earl of Northampton, who fell in the royal cause at the battle of Hopton Heath. Originally in the army, he entered into orders, and in 1674 was preferred to the bishopric of Oxford, and, the year following, translated to London. He now had the charge of educating the princesses Mary and Anne, afterwards queens of England. James II., on the bishop's refusal to suspend Dr. Sharpe, removed him from his episcopal functions; but, before the Revolution, he was restored. On the landing of the prince of Orange, he conveyed the princess Anne from London to Nottingham, and exhibited great zeal in placing William and Mary on the throne, at whose coronation he officiated, instead of Archbishop Sancroft. B. 1632; D. at Fulham, 1713.—This prelate was fond of botany, having the finest garden of exotics in England, and greatly assisted Ray, Plukenet, and other naturalists.

COMPTON, the name of numerous parishes in England, with populations ranging between 50 and 1,000.

COMRIE, kom'-re, a village and parish of Scotland, in Perthshire, about 5 miles from Crief. Pop. of parish, 2,500; of village, 900.—In this parish, shocks of earthquakes have repeatedly been felt.

COMTE, Auguste, konte, a modern French speculative philosopher, who commenced his public life as a follower of Saint-Simon, and, in 1820, prepared a work explanatory of the system of that enthusiast. He subsequently became mathematical professor at the Polytechnic school; but, on the accession of Louis Napoleon to the empire, he was deprived of that office. Between 1830 and 1842 he published, in six large volumes, his "Course of Positive Philosophy," the object of which was to show that the human mind passes through three successive stages in its meditations upon all subjects. The first is the theological; the second, the metaphysical; and the third, the positive, in which the mind is supposed to have attained its great power of comprehending all things connected with those laws by which the universe is governed. His system, however, is too elaborate to be entered upon here. In 1843 he published a mathematical work, and, in the following year, a "Discourse," intended to enforce the views of his larger work. M. Comte's theories, whatever may be their value, attracted a considerable number of ardent admirers, especially amongst the disciples of St. Simon and Fourier. At Paris a kind of institution was formed, of which he himself was the high priest, and of which all the members worked, with much activity, to spread the ideas of their master. These ideas were developed in a series of works, of which the first was his "Positive Philosophy." This was translated into English by Miss Martineau. B. at Montpellier, 1795; D. at Paris, 1857.

COMUS, ko'-mus, the god of revelry, feasting, and nocturnal entertainments. He is represented as a youth, flushed with drinking and crowned with roses.

CONAN, ko'-nan, a river of Scotland, in the county of Ross. After a course of 35 miles, it falls into Cromarty Firth, near Dingwall.

CONCAN, kon-kan', a narrow district of S. India, in the Bombay presidency, bounded E. by the Western Ghauts, and W. by the Arabian Sea. Ext. 340 miles long, with a varying breadth of from 25 to 52. Desc. Rugged and rocky, intersected with ravines, covered with jungle, and fields fertile in rice. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. between 15° and 20° N. Lon. between 72° 52′ and 73° 45′ E.

CONCEICAO, kon'-sai-ka'-o, the name of several towns in Brazil, with populations ranging between 2,000 and 12,000.

CONCEPCION, LA, kon-thep'-thi-on, a seaport of Veragua, 90 miles from Panama. Lat. 8° 52′ N. Lon. 81° 28′ W.—Also, an island of the Bahamas, 25 miles from St. Salvador.—The name of several unimportant places in S. America, in Texas, and in Spain.

CONCEPTION, kon-sep'-shon, a town of Chili, and capital of a province of the same name, on the N. shore of the Biobo. At its commencement it flourished greatly; but in 1751 it was nearly destroyed by an earthquake and an influx of the sea, which entirely covered it. A new city was then founded, at the distance of 3 miles from the sea, in a beautiful plain called Mocha. Pop. 10,000. Lat. 36° 49′ S. Lon. 73° 5′ 30″ W.—The PROVINCE consists of extensive plains, some of them almost deserts, and forests of small stunted trees. It has coal of an inferior kind. Area, 5,210 square miles. Pop. 110,000. Lat. between 37° 30′ S. Lon. between 70° and 74° W.

CONCEPTION BAY, a large bay on the E. side of Newfoundland island. Lat. 48° N. Lon. 53° W.

CONCHAS, or CONCHOS, kon'-chas, a river of Mexico, in Durango, rising in lat. 28° N., and, after an estimated course of 300 miles, joining the Rio del Norte in lat. 31° N.; lon. 104° W.

CONCHES, kawnsh, a town of France, in the department of the Eure, 10 miles from Evreux. Pop. 2,300.

CONCINI CONCINO, kon-se'-ne, called Marshal d'Ancre, went, in 1600, from Florence to France, with Mary de Medici, wife of Henry IV. After the death of that king he obtained a marquisate and some considerable appointments. At the same time, he was first minister of the young king, Louis XIII., over whom he exercised great influence. He, however, incurred the jealousy of the nobles, and, at their instigation, Concini was assassinated, 1617.—His wife was afterwards condemned to death for the practice of sorcery, and their son declared, by the parliament, disennobled, and incapable of holding any estates in the kingdom.

CONCORD, kon'-kord, the name of several towns in the United States, with populations ranging between 1,000 and 10,000.—The largest is the capital of New Hampshire, about 65 miles from Boston, with which it communicates by railway.—The best-known, however, is a town of Middlesex county, Massachusetts, 17 miles from Boston. Here, on April 19, 1775, one of the first conflicts took place between the Americans and the British troops. The first blood, however, was not shed at this place, as most gazetteers affirm, but at Lexington, 11 miles from Boston, which was on the line of march of the British, who had been dispatched to destroy the military stores which the provincials had collected at Concord. Monuments are erected in both towns to commemorate these events.

CONCORD, a river in Massachusetts, U.S., joining the Merrimac in Tewksbury.

CONCORDIA, kon-kor'-de-a, the goddess of peace. The Roman dictator Camillus first raised a temple to her in the Capitol; and in it the magistrates often assembled.

CONDÉ, kon'-dai, a town of France, in the department of Le Nord, at the junction of the Haine and Scheldt, 6 miles from Valenciennes. It is strongly fortified, and has a church, town-hall, military arsenal, and an hospital. Manf. Leather, chicory, and starch. Pop. 5,200.—In 1793 this town was taken by the Austrians.—A small lordship in the neighbourhood conferred the title of prince on a branch of the Bourbons, which the death of the duke d'Enghien, on March 21, 1804, rendered extinct.—Also, the name of several other towns, villages, and parishes in France.

CONDÉ, Louis, the first prince of, a chief of the Huguenots, was the son of Charles of Bourbon, duke of Vendôme. He displayed great courage at the battle of St. Quentin; but, on the death of Henry II. of France, he became so discontented with the measures of the dukes de Guise, that he joined the Huguenot party. He was wounded and taken prisoner at the battle of Dreux, in 1562, and slain in that of Jarnac, 1569; B. 1530.—The deeds of his son and grandson, Henry I. and II., do not call for any special notice. The latter's greatest glory, according to Voltaire, was that he was the father of the great Condé.

CONDÉ, Louis II., prince of, known as the "Great Condé," was the son of Prince Henry II. of Condé, and was first known as duke d'Enghien. In early years he showed great military genius, and at 22 entirely defeated, in 1643, the Spanish at Rocroy, although very inferior to them in numbers. The following year he gained the battle of Friburg, and, in 1645, that of Nordlingen, in Germany. Less fortunate in Catalonia, he failed in his attempt to take Lerida, but, soon after, defeated the archduke Leopold at Lens, which led to the peace with Germany, in 1648. During the troubles of the Fronde, Condé, who had, at first, taken part with the court, afterwards sided against Mazarin. In 1650 he was arrested and deprived of his liberty for thirteen months. Set free, he hastened to avenge his wrongs, and, levying a body of troops, marched on Paris, but, after some successes, was beaten by Turenne, in the faubourg St. Antoine. He then joined the Spaniards in the Netherlands, when, in 1659, the peace of the Pyrenees restored him to his country. War afterwards breaking out between France and Spain, he, in 1668, conquered Franche-Comté in three weeks, and in 1672 evinced great talents in the war with Holland. The hard-fought battle of Senef was his last exploit. His closing days he spent at Chantilly, enjoying the friendship of Boileau, Molière, and Racine. B. at Paris, 1621; D. 1686.—Bossuet delivered his funeral oration, which is considered a master-piece of eloquence.

CONDE, Jose Antonio, a Spanish Orientalist, who distinguished himself, in 1796, by his translations of some of the Greek minor poets, and in 1799 by a translation of "Al-Edrisi's Description of Spain," from the Arabic. He subsequently became a member of the Spanish Academy, and superintended, in conjunction with two other litterateurs, the continuation of the collection of early Castilian poetry by Sanchez. When the French invaded his country, he was appointed by Joseph Bonaparte chief librarian of the Madrid library. After the French were expelled from the Peninsula, he went to Paris, where he resided for some years, but returned to Spain only to pass the remainder of his days in obscurity, neglect, and poverty. B. at Paraleja, in the province of Cuença, 1765; D. at Madrid, 1820.

CONDER, Josiah, kon'-der, was the son of a bookseller, which trade he himself followed, and became the proprietor and editor of the "Eclectic Review." In 1819 he retired from the bookselling business, but continued to manage the Review till 1837. In 1824 his "Modern Traveller" was commenced, and extended to thirty-three volumes. He continued producing other works of a useful, and some of a religious tendency, till 1832, when, in the interest of the dissenters, he undertook the editorship of the "Patriot" newspaper. In this situation he continued for twenty-three years, occasionally publishing pamphlets on passing topics, and works of greater importance. Amongst these latter may be noticed "An Analytical and Comparative View of all Religions;" and "The Harmony of History with Prophecy." B. in London, 1789; D. 1855.

CONDILLAC, Etienne Bounot de, kon-de'-yak, a distinguished French metaphysician, whose admiration of the English philosopher John Locke led him, in 1746, to publish his "Essay on Human Perceptions," which, in 1749, he followed by his "Treatise on Systems." The former was designed to advance the opinions of Locke, and the latter to oppose the abstract theories of Leibnitz and Spinola, as being opposed to ideas received from experience. His third work was a "Treatise on the Sensations," which is considered his master-piece, and in which his philosophical system is fully unfolded. After the publication of these works, he was appointed tutor to the prince of Parma, and, in this situation, published his "Course of Studies," which he divides into the arts of writing, reasoning, and thinking, followed by a general history of men and empires. When he had finished the education of his royal pupil, he resigned himself once more to philosophical meditations, in which he passed the remainder of his days. Previous to his death, however, he published a work on "Logic." B. at Grenoble, 1715; D. 1780.—However ingenious Condillac may be, he is to be considered neither a faithful nor a profound expounder of the views of Locke. His system may be characterized as one of nearly absolute sensation, whilst that of Locke unites sensation with reflection.

CONDOM, kon'-dom, a town of France, in the department of Gers, 23 miles from Bordeaux. Manf. Cotton fabrics and earthenware. Pop. 7,500.

CONDOR, PULO, a small island in the Indian Sea. (See PULO.)

CONDORCET, John Anthony Nicholas Caritat, marquis of, kon-dor'-sai, a French philosopher, educated at the college of Navarre, where he soon distinguished himself as a geometer. In 1765 he published his first work, "On Integral Calculations," which was received with approbation by the Academy of Sciences. In 1767 he published his treatise, "Of the Problem of Three Bodies;" and the year following his "Analytical Essays." In 1769 he was chosen member of the academy, and in 1773 secretary, in which capacity he distinguished himself by the elegance of his eulogies on those academicians who had died since 1699. His "Life of Turgot" is reckoned an admirable piece of biography; but that of Voltaire, of whom he was an original disciple, is flattering beyond bounds. On the approach of the Revolution, he endeavoured, by his writings, to extend its principles, and, in 1791, became a member of the National Assembly, and of the Jacobin club. He offered many insults to King Louis in his misfortunes, though he opposed his being brought to trial. When Robespierre arrived at power, Condorcet was denounced as a Girondist, and concealed himself for some time in the house of Madame Verney. Fearing, however, that she might suffer on his account, he voluntarily quitted her roof, and became a houseless wanderer in the country around Paris, with nowhere to lay his head. At last the necessities of hunger drove him into a small inn at the village of Clunart, where he was taken and committed to prison. On the following morning he was found dead in his cell, having terminated his existence by taking poison, which, to save himself from the ignominy of the scaffold, he always carried about with him. B. near Nion, in Dauphiny, 1743; D. in the prison of Bourg-la-Reine, 1794.—He left "A Sketch of the Progress of the Human Mind," a "Tract on Calculation," and an "Elementary Treatise on Arithmetic." He had a lofty mind, and endeavoured to make his philosophy applicable to the happiness of his fellow-men, and influential in ameliorating the severities of social institutions. His manners were cold, but his heart was warm. D'Alembert said of him, that he was a volcano covered with snow.

CONECUH, kone'-ku, a county of Alabama, U.S. Area, 1,476 square miles. Pop. 10,000, of whom half are slaves.

CONEGLIANO, ko-nel-ya'-no, a town of Northern Italy, 12 miles from Treviso. It has a citadel and a cathedral. Manf. Silk and woollen fabrics. Pop. 6,500.

CONFEDERATION OF THE RHINE, a confederation of thirty-four of the secondary states of Germany, formed in 1806 under the protection of Napoleon I. On the fall of the emperor of the French, these united with the other German states to constitute the Germanic Confederation.

CONFIENZA, kon'-fe-end'-sa, an Italian village, in the province of Lomellina, not far from Palestro, where the Austrians were repulsed by a division of the French army, May 31, 1859.

CONFLANS ST. HONORINE, kon-flaw, a town of France, at the conflux of the Oise and Seine, on the Paris and Havre railway, 14 miles from Paris. Pop. 1,600.—Conflans is the name of various small towns in France.

CONFLANS, a town of the Sardinian states, and capital of the province of Upper Savoy, 24 miles from Chambery. In its neighbourhood are smelting-works for silver ore, found in the vicinity.

CONFOLENS, kaw'-fo-lens, a town of France, in the department of the Charente, 27 miles from Limoges. It stands on the Vienne, which is here crossed by a bridge, and it has a trade in cattle, corn, and timber. Pop. 3,300.

CONFUCIUS, or KOONG-FU-TSE, kon-fu'-she-us, a Chinese philosopher, whose extraordinary precocity enabled him to be a mandarin in the third year of his age. He lost his father before this; but he had a learned man for his grandfather, who bestowed great pains upon him, and early brought his understanding to maturity. When he was 19 he took a wife, by whom he had a son, who died at the age of 50, and left a son called Tson-tse, whose character stood high for wisdom and virtue. At the age of 23 he formed the project of a general reformation in the kingdom of Loo, and carried it out with success. At that time, however, the Chinese empire was not consolidated under one sovereign, but seems to have been divided into several separate kingdoms. Notwithstanding the respect which the king and the people of Loo had for the great wisdom of Confucius, he was driven from the country, and became an outcast and a wanderer. He continued, however, to disseminate his doctrines, passing through several states, endeavouring to bring mankind to wisdom and happiness. His followers became numerous, and of them he selected ten as his chosen disciples, to whom he imparted the treasures of wisdom. These assisted in spreading his tenets, until they were almost universally adopted by the people, when they became the great authority of Chinese politics and morals. Lived about the 6th century B.C.—When the king of Loo was informed of the death of the great philosopher, he burst into tears and said, "that Heaven, being displeased with him, had taken away Confucius." From that time his memory was cherished as that of a saint, and several magnificent structures were raised to his honour. His books are regarded by the Chinese as the fountain of wisdom; and, according to all authorities, they deserve the praise bestowed upon them, as far as regards a pure morality. Their instructions are cherished not only by the Chinese, but by the Cochin-Chinese and the Coreans, and other people, forming, altogether, perhaps not less than nearly half the population of the globe. His descendants are held in veneration, and enjoy extra privileges, at this day.

CONG, kong, a town and parish in Connaught, Ireland, 21 miles from Galway. Pop. of parish, 6,500; of town, 600.—It is noted for the large caverns which exist in its neighbourhood, composed of limestone, and having subterranean lakes and rivers.

CONGLETON, kon'-gel-ton, a town and chapelry of Cheshire, on the Dane, 8 miles from Macclesfield. It has several chapels, a gaol, a market-house, and an assembly-room. Manf. Silks, ribbons, and cottons. Pop. 11,000.

CONGO, kon'-go, an extensive country in the S.W. of Africa, bounded on the N. by the river Zaire, or Congo, which separates it from Loango; on the W. by the Atlantic; on the S. by the Dande, and on the E. by the countries in the interior. It formerly embraced Angola, Benguela, and Loango; but is now understood to consist of a limited tract of about 180 miles of coast. Its capital is San Salvador, which was the former residence of its chief; but the ravages of war have compelled that personage to remove to another town nearer the coast. Pro. Maize, millet, yams, sugar, tobacco, cabbages, spinach, pepper, the orange, the lime, and the pineapple. Pop. Unascertained.—It was first discovered in 1484, by Diego Cam, a Portuguese, and the most exaggerated accounts were published of its wealth and population. Captain Tuckey, however, whose narrative was published in 1818, was sent by the British government to explore this country. Accordingly, he sailed up the river Zaire, or Congo, and found on its banks only very small villages, and the country far from being highly improved. (See ANGOLA, BENGUELA, and LOANGO.)

CONGO RIVER. (See ZAIRE.)

CONGREVE, William, kon'-greve, an English dramatic poet, brought up in Ireland, and educated at Trinity College, Dublin; after which, he entered of the Middle Temple, but never followed the law. His first literary production was a romance called "Incognita, or Love and Duty reconciled," written at the age of seventeen. In 1693 appeared his comedy of the "Old Bachelor," which was received with great applause at Drury Lane, and drew from Dryden the remark that he had never seen such a first play. It was the means of recommending him to the earl of Halifax, who made him a commissioner of the Hackney-coach office. His next performance was the "Double Dealer;" and in 1695 he brought out his "Love for Love," and two years afterwards his "Mourning Bride." His next piece was "The Way of the World," which was so ill received, that it disgusted him with the stage, and determined him no longer to write for it. B. at Bardsa, near Leeds, Yorkshire, 1672; D. in London, 1729.—His remains were interred in Westminster Abbey. Besides the above pieces, he wrote the "Judgment of Paris," a Masque; "Semele," an opera, and some poems. He left his fortune to Henrietta, duchess of Marlborough.

CONGREVE, Sir William, Baronet, entered the army, and in 1816 was made a lieutenant-colonel, when he retired from the service. In 1808 he invented the congreve rocket, for which he received from the emperor of Russia the decoration of St. Anne, for the effects it produced at the battle of Leipsic in 1813. It proved similarly effective at Waterloo; but before either of these battles, it was employed by Lord Cochrane in his attack on the French fleet in the Basque Roads and at Walcheren. It is now in universal use in an improved form. Sir William sat in parliament for various constituencies, and was inspector of the royal laboratory at Woolwich. In 1826 he engaged in some mining transactions, which resulted in a suit in chancery and a decision against him of fraudulence. This was on May 3, 1828, when Sir William hastened to Toulouse, where, eleven days afterwards, he died. B. in Middlesex, 1772.

CONI, ko'-ne, a town of Piedmont, the see of a bishop and the capital of a province, at the conflux of the Stura and Gezzo, 48 miles from Turin. The principal street is tolerably wide, but the others are short and narrow, and there is no public building of interest. Manf. Silk and other fabrics. A considerable trade in agricultural produce is carried on. Pop. 21,000.—This was a place of great strength till it was dismantled by the French after the battle of Marengo, in 1800. The ramparts now serve for promenades.

CONIAH, ko-ni'-a, 'the strength of the Lord,' a king of Judah, called, also, Jehoiachim.

CONNAUGHT, kon'-nawt, the smallest of the four provinces into which Ireland is divided, bounded E. by Leinster, W. by the Atlantic Ocean, N. and N.W. by the ocean and Ulster, and S. by Munster. Ext. About 130 miles long, and 84 broad. Desc. Mountainous in the west, north, and south, but almost level in the centre. On the west shore there are a great many peninsulas indented with bays, whilst off the coast are numerous islands. Rivers. The Arrow, Bonnet, Moy, Clare, Renicon, and the Shannon forming its east boundary. Lakes. The Conn, Corrib, Carra, and Mask. Pro. The usual cerealia, vegetables, and roots. Pop. 1,012,006. —This was formerly one of the kingdoms of the Irish heptarchy. In 1590 it was brought under the administration of the English, and divided into counties.

CONNECTICUT, kon-nek'-te-kut, one of the United States, bounded N. by Massachusetts, E. by Rhode Island, S. by Long-Island Sound, and W. by New York. Ext. 90 miles long and 70 broad. Area, 4,674 square miles. Desc. Diversified by hills and valleys, and the soil, generally, rich and fertile, though interspersed with portions that are comparatively thin and barren. Rivers. The Connecticut, Thames, and Housatonic. Pro. Indian corn, rye, wheat in many parts, oats, barley, buckwheat, flax in large quantities, some hemp, potatoes, pumpkins, turnips, pease, beans, &c. Orchards are very numerous, and cider is made for exportation. The state is, however, generally better adapted to the purposes of grazing than to those of tillage. The quantity of butter and cheese made annually is great, and of well-known excellence. Minerals. Marble, freestone, iron, and plumbago. Manf. Wool, cotton, paper, iron in different forms, glass, snuff, powder, buttons, hats, clocks, &c. Tin ware is extensively manufactured, and sent to all parts of the United States. A great number of pleasant towns, both maritime and inland, are to be found within the precincts of this state. Pop. about 400,000. Lat. between 41° and 42° N. Lon. between 72° and 73° 50′ W.

CONNECTICUT RIVER, the largest in New England, U.S., rises near the borders of Lower Canada, and running south, divides New Hampshire from Vermont. It then passes through Massachusetts and Connecticut, and flows into Long-Island Sound, between Saybrook and Lyme. Length, 410 miles.—The W. branch of this river forms the boundary-line between the United States and Canada, in lat. 45° N.

CONNEMARA, kon-ne-ma'-ra, 'the Bays of the Ocean,' a district occupying the W. portion of the county of Galway, Ireland. It consists mostly of bogs, mountains, and lakes. Ext. 30 miles long, with a varying breadth of from 15 to 20. The population is extremely scattered, and is found principally along the coasts and on the islands. The interior is almost desolate.—During the famine of 1847, the result of the failure of the potato crop, the inhabitants suffered extreme privations; but, since then, great exertions have been made to promote the fisheries, whilst the operation of the Encumbered Estates Act was a great means of improving the district.

CONON, ko'-non, a famous general of Athens, who became governor of all the islands of the Athenians, and was defeated in a naval battle by Lysander, near Ægospotamos. (See ÆGOSPOTAMOS.) He voluntarily went into banishment to Evagoras, king of Cyprus, and afterwards to Artaxerxes, king of Persia, by whose assistance he delivered his country from the Spartan yoke. He defeated the Spartans near Cnidus, in an engagement where Pisander, the enemy's admiral, was killed. By his means the Athenians fortified their city with a strong wall. D. about 393 B.C.

CONRAD I., count of Franconia, was elected king of Germany in 912. D. 919.

CONRAD II., son of Herman, duke of Franconia, was elected king of Germany in 1024. In 1027 he was crowned at Rome, as emperor of the East. He also obtained, in 1033, the kingdom of Burgundy by the will of King Rodolphus III. D. 1039.

CONRAD III., son of Frederick, duke of Suabia, was elected emperor of Germany in 1138. After a long war with the duke of Saxony and Bavaria, he, in 1147, set out with Louis VII. of France for the Holy Land, laying siege unsuccessfully to Damascus. B. 1093; D. 1152.

CONRAD IV. was elected emperor of Germany after the death of his father, Frederick II., in 1250. Pope Innocent IV., who claimed the right of disposing of the crown, nominated William of Holland, and preached a crusade against Conrad. Conrad thereupon marched into Italy, took Naples, Capua, and other places, but died in the midst of his victories, 1254.

CONRAD V., or CONRADIN, kon-rād'-in, was the son of Conrad IV., and the acknowledged duke of Suabia; but his inheritance of Sicily and Apulia passed from his father finally by the battle of La Grandella, in 1265. In 1267, in his sixteenth year, Conradin took the field at the head of 1,000 men, and, after various successes, met Charles of Anjou at Tagliocozzo, where he was defeated, in 1268. He fled from the field, and, after passing through a series of misfortunes, not uncommon to crowned heads who have been unsuccessful in the field, he was caught and delivered into the hands of Charles for a sum of money. He was taken to Naples, and, with Frederick of Austria and several of his followers, condemned to suffer on the scaffold. Beheaded, 1268.—There is a story about Conradin's throwing from the scaffold a glove to be given to Peter of Aragon, the husband of Constance, the daughter of Manfred, who first held his inheritance of Sicily and Apulia, and who fell at La Grandella. It rests, however, on doubtful authority. The mother of Conradin, when she heard of her son's capture, hastened from Germany to ransom him. She, however, was too late; when she applied the money to the founding of the great convent del Carmine, where, behind the great altar, the remains of Conradin and Frederick were deposited.

CONSEGNIANA, kon'-sen-e-a'-na, a volcano of Central America, in Nicaragua, 10 miles from the Pacific. The crater is a mile and a half in circumference, and has a height of nearly 4,000 feet from the mean level. In 1835, when its last irruption occurred, a large tract of pasture land was rendered waste.

CONSTABLE, John, kun'-sta-bel, an eminent English artist, who began life as a miller with his father, but whose genius early led him into a very different pursuit. Having discovered a decided taste for drawing, he received much encouragement from Sir George Beaumont, and took instructions from R. R. Reinagle, R.A. Landscape-painting became his profession, and in 1795 he went to London, but does not seem to have received much encouragement. In 1799 he again visited the metropolis, and in 1800 was admitted a student in the Royal Academy. Previous to this he had chiefly lived in Suffolk. He now became a steady exhibitor at the Royal Academy, and gradually worked himself into notice and fame. It was not, however, till 1829 that his merits received the acknowledgment they had long deserved. In that year he was elected a Royal Academician. B. at East Bergholt, Suffolk, 1776; D. at Hampstead, 1837.—Constable made nature his study, and he painted many admirable pictures. Among these may be mentioned his "Cornfield" and his "Valley Farm." When yet a young man, he was asked by his patron, Sir George Beaumont, what style he intended to adopt. "None but God Almighty's, Sir George," was the reply. He could not have adopted a better. "I love," he used to say, "every stile, and stump, and lane in the village; and as long as I am able to hold a brush, I shall never cease to paint them."

CONSTABLE, an eminent Scotch publisher, to be remembered chiefly on account of his connection with Sir Walter Scott and the "Edinburgh Review." D. 1834.

CONSTANCE, or KONSTANZ, kon'-stance, a town of the grand-duchy of Baden, the capital of the circle of the Lake, situate on the Lake of Constance, 35 miles from Zurich. It is the see of a bishop, and contains an old episcopal castle, with a cathedral church, in which are several fine specimens of Gothic sculpture. Manf. Silk and cotton goods, and watches. Pop., with suburbs, 6,500.—Constance is memorable for the meeting of the famous council, between 1414 and 1418, which condemned John Huss and Jerome of Prague to the flames. The house where Huss was arrested, and where there is a bust of him, is still shown. The annexation of Constance to the Austrian dominions took place in 1549, and to Baden in 1805.

CONSTANCE, THE LAKE OF, lies between Suabia and Switzerland, and is traversed from E. to W. by the Rhine. Ext. 42 miles long, with an extreme breadth of 9. Area, 200 square miles. At its N.W. it divides into two branches, each about 14 miles in length. It is subject to the phenomenon of suddenly rising and falling, and only freezes when the winters are very severe. Great fertility exists upon its banks, which are remarkable for the many picturesque views they present.

CONSTANTINA, kon-stan-te'-na, a town of Spain, defended by a strong castle, 40 miles from Seville. Pop. about 7,000.—In its neighbourhood are silver-lead mines.

CONSTANTINE, kon'-stan-teen, a large province, composing the eastern part of the territory of Algiers, now belonging to the French. It is bounded E. by Tunis, W. by Titterie and Algiers proper, S. by the desert, and N. by the Mediterranean.

CONSTANTINE, the capital of the above province, stands on the site of the ancient Cirta, celebrated as the bulwark of Numidia, and as the birthplace of Massinissa and Jugurtha. It is built upon a high rock, formed into a species of peninsula by the Rummel. Here are found many beautiful remains of antiquity. Besides its natural strength, Constantine is defended by excellent walls, built of a kind of black stone, and has a strong garrison. The interior exhibits nothing remarkable; the streets are straight, but dirty; the houses low and without windows. In modern times it was the residence of a Bey, till assaulted and taken by the French, under the duke de Nemours and General Danrèmont, in 1837. Pop. about 30,000. Lat. 36° 22′ N. Lon. 6° 37′ E. (See ALGERIA.)

CONSTANTINE, a name very common to the emperors of the East, the most celebrated of whom was Flavius Valerius, the son of Constantius, and surnamed "the Great," from the grandeur of his exploits. He conquered Licinius, his brother-in-law and colleague on the throne, and obliged him to lay aside the imperial power. It is said that, as he was going to fight against Maxentius, one of his rivals, he saw a cross in the sky, with this inscription, en toutō nika,—in hoc vince. This was about the year 312, when he became a convert to Christianity, and obtained an easy victory, ever after adopting a cross or labarum as his standard. He soon rose to be sole emperor, and began to reform the state. He prohibited nocturnal assemblies, and abolished many of the obscenities of paganism. In 321 he ordered the observance of the Sunday, and abstinence from work on that day; caused the Christian churches which war had destroyed to be rebuilt, and in 325 assembled the first universal council of Nicæa; abolished the consulting of oracles, and the fights of gladiators; but in 326, upon a false accusation, caused his son Crispus to be beheaded for attempting to seduce Fausta, his own stepmother. She herself, however, was afterwards put to death. In 328 he founded the city where Byzantium formerly stood, and called it by his own name, Constantinopolis. Here he transported part of the Roman senate; and, by keeping his court in it, raised it to be the rival of Rome, in population and magnificence. From that time the two imperial capitals began to look upon each other with an eye of envy; and soon after the age of Constantine, a separation was made of the two empires, and Rome was called the capital of the western, and Constantinopolis the capital of the eastern. B. 274; D. at Nicomedia, 337.—This emperor has been distinguished for personal courage, and praised for the protection he extended to the Christians; but the murder of his son Crispus has been deservedly censured. His remains were carried to Constantinople, where he was sumptuously interred. He was placed by the senate of Rome among the gods, and by the Christians of the East, among the saints. His festival is celebrated on the 21st of May by the Greek, Russian, and Coptic churches. He left three sons, Constantinus, Constans, and Constantius, among whom he divided his empire. The other distinguished emperors of this name are the following.

CONSTANTINE II., called the "Younger," eldest son of the above, received, as his share of the empire, on the death of his father, Gaul, Spain, and Great Britain. Desirous, however, of possessing himself of the territory of his brother Constans, he invaded Italy, but was defeated, and killed near Aquileia, 340.

CONSTANTINE III. (See HERACLIUS CONSTANTINE.)

CONSTANTINE IV. (See HERACLEONAS CONSTANTINE.)

CONSTANTINE V. (or III., if the two above be not reckoned amongst the Constantines), surnamed Pogonatus, or the "Bearded," emperor of the East, mounted the throne in 668, with his two brothers, Tiberius and Heraclius, on the death of their father, Constans II. He waged war successfully against the Saracens, but rendered himself odious by the murder of his two brothers, and died 685.—It was under this prince that the "Greek fire" was first employed.

CONSTANTINE VI. (or IV.), emperor of the East, succeeded his father, Leo the Isaurian, in 741. He sided with the Iconoclasts, who hurled down the images of the saints, and persecuted the followers of the Romish church. D. of the plague, in an expedition against the Bulgarians, 775.

CONSTANTINE VII. (or V.), emperor of the East, succeeded his father, Leo IV., in 780, his mother Irene being regent. She at length took complete possession of the throne, and was cruel enough to put out the eyes of her young son, who died 797. B. 770.

CONSTANTINE VIII. (or VI.) was named emperor in 868, during the lifetime of his father, Basilius I., but died before him, 878.

CONSTANTINE IX. (or VII.), surnamed Porphyrogenitus, emperor of the East, son of Leo the Wise, mounted the throne in 912, at the age of eleven, under the regency of his mother Zoe. He was deposed in 919, regained the throne in 945, and died 959, poisoned, it is said, by his son Romanus.—This prince cultivated literature, and was the author of some works.

CONSTANTINE X. (or VIII.), son of Romanus I., reigned with his father and his two brothers, from 919 to 945, during the time that Porphyrogenitus was deposed.

CONSTANTINE XI. (or IX.), son of Romanus II., succeeded John Rimisces, and was proclaimed emperor of the East, with his brother, Basilius II., who held the principal authority till 1025, when he died. Constantine was, after that, sole emperor. D. 1028. (See BASILIUS II.)

CONSTANTINE XII. (or X.), surnamed the "Gladiator," obtained the empire in 1042, having married the empress Zoe, widow of Romanus III. This prince is known alone for his debaucheries. He allowed the Turks to increase their territories at his expense, and to establish themselves in Persia.

CONSTANTINE XIII. (or XI.), surnamed Ducas, succeeded, in 1059, Isaac Comnenus, who had adopted him. In his reign the Scythians ravaged the empire, and some cities were destroyed by earthquakes. D. 1067.

CONSTANTINE XIV. (or XII.), the last emperor of the East, was the son of Manuel II., succeeded his brother John Paleologus in 1448. In 1453, Mahomet II. laid siege to Constantinople with a formidable army. Constantine defended the city bravely, but, abandoned by the princes of Christendom, he was unable to hold the place, and died, fighting like a hero, in the breach, 1453. His death was followed by the capture and pillage of Constantinople, and Mahomet made it the capital of the Ottoman empire.

CONSTANTINE, Flavius Julius, an usurper, who was proclaimed, in 407, although a private soldier, emperor of the East, by the Roman soldiery in Great Britain, and for some time sustained his dignity by the victories he won. He fixed his court at Arles, in France; but the emperor Honorius laid siege to this place, forced him to surrender, and put him to death, 411.—This usurper does not take rank with the Constantines.

CONSTANTINE, Paulovitch, the second son of the emperor Paul of Russia. The name of Constantine was given him at baptism, in the hope that he would one day reign at Constantinople. This, however, was not destined to come to pass, for, from some unaccountable cause, he took a disgust at the honour designed for him, and at the age of seventeen, married a sister of the duchess of Kent, with whom, however, he did not live happily. In four years they parted by mutual consent. In 1799 he fought under Suwarrow in the Italian campaign, and distinguished himself by his personal bravery, though not by his capacity for command. In 1805 he headed the reserve on the field of Austerlitz, where he withstood the fierce and energetic charges of Bernadotte, and, when the battle was lost, retreated in good order. Throughout the remainder of the wars with Napoleon I. he preserved the character of a brave and resolute soldier. At the close of the war he became generalissimo of Poland, but had little sympathy with the nation over whose destinies he held the military power. In 1820 he procured a divorce from his wife, and married a beautiful Polish lady, and in 1825 the emperor Alexander died at Taganrog. He was the presumptive heir to the throne, and when the news of the death of the emperor reached St. Petersburg, Nicholas called the council of the empire together, and required them to take the oath of allegiance to his brother, who had now become viceroy of Poland. The council, however, produced a paper in which Constantine renounced his claim to the throne, and desired that it might be transferred to the next heir, who was the grand-duke Nicholas, and who, consequently, ascended the throne. Constantine was present at the coronation of his brother in Moscow, after which he returned to his government of Poland at Warsaw. Here he continued to reside till 1830, when an insurrection of the brave-spirited Poles took place, and he was driven from his palace of the Belvedere, and forced to quit Poland. War now commenced between the Russians and the Poles; but the best days of Constantine had passed. B. at St. Petersburg, 1799; D. of cholera, at Witepsk, 1831. (See NICHOLAS.)

CONSTANTINE, Pope, was elected to the papacy in 708. D. 715.—There was also an anti-pope of this name, who usurped the holy office in 767.

CONSTANTINE, Nicholaevich, the second son of the emperor Nicholas of Russia, was designed for the navy, and in 1831, when only four years of age, was declared admiral of the fleet. With increasing years he became more and more imbued with a desire to excel in his profession, and received nautical instructions from Admiral Lütke, a seaman as well as a man of science. In 1845 he paid a visit to Constantinople, being the first imperial prince of Russia that had done so; and in 1847 he visited England with Admiral Lütke, as commander of the Ingermanland, on his way to a voyage up the Mediterranean to visit his mother, then an invalid at Palermo. Whilst in England, on this occasion, he left a very favourable impression, being of a lively disposition, and speaking English as well as French with great fluency. In the war of 1854-56 he had the defence of the Baltic intrusted to his care, in conjunction with Admiral Lütke. Whilst engaged in this duty, however, he scarcely sustained his reputation for spirit, seeing that the Russian fleet did all that it could to avoid a contest with the British and French fleets, even in what might be called the duke's native seas. In 1859 he paid another visit to England, when he made an inspection of its great naval arsenal at Portsmouth, the Great Eastern steam ship, and many public works. B. 1827.

CONSTANTINE, a parish of the county of Cornwall, 6 miles from Falmouth. Area, 8,470 acres. Pop. 2,100.

CONSTANTINOPLE, or STAMBOUL, kon'-stăn-te-no'-pel, the capital of the Turkish empire, has a circumference of about 13 miles, inclosed by walls, and is beautifully situate on the W. side of the Bosphorus, or Straits of Constantinople, between the Black Sea and the Sea of Marmora. It stands chiefly on an undulating slope, having a gradual ascent, and presenting a fine view to the approaching spectator. Its harbour, the "Golden Horn," is not on the side of the sea, but is a long capacious inlet, running along the north side of the city. It is of sufficient depth for the largest vessels, and is estimated to receive 1,200 sail of the line, whilst it has an open navigation to the Euxine on the north, and to the Mediterranean on the south. The city has the form of a triangle, one side being on the harbour, another on the Sea of Marmora, and the third and longest towards the land. Whatever may be the exterior beauty of Constantinople, the interior is very different. The streets are in general narrow, gloomy, and slanting, badly paved, and encumbered with dust or mud; whilst the houses are mostly low, and built of wood and earth. The objects of greatest attraction are the bazars or market-places, the khans for the bankers, the fountains and the baths. The Cisterna Maxima is situate near St. Sophia; its pillars and arches supporting the roof still remain, and the area beneath them is very extensive, and devoted to purposes of usefulness. The aqueduct by which the city cisterns were principally supplied, was first erected by Adrian, and subsequently repaired by one of the Constantines and Solyman the Magnificent. It consists of a double tier of arches, built with alternate layers of stone and brick, like the walls of the city. The seraglio stands on the eastern side of the city, and is about three miles in circumference. It consists not only of the apartments of the women, but of the palace, and a vast range of buildings, inhabited by the sultan, his court, and the government officers. In the first, or outer court, are the mint, the principal mosque, an hospital, and offices connected with the palace. In the second are a divan, an arsenal, a hall of justice, the imperial kitchen and stables, the Corinthian column of Theodosius, and the principal offices of government. In the third are the apartments of the women, the terraces and flower-gardens, which are solely devoted to the use of the sultan and his harem. This court is entered from the city by a ponderous gate, called the "Porte," which now serves as a synonym for the divan of the sultan. In Constantinople there are 345 mosques, inclusive of 14 royal ones, 36 Christian churches, and 40 Mahometan colleges. The principal mosques are to be met with in the squares and public places, and are generally surrounded with cypress-trees, and provided with fountains. The oldest and most interesting is that of St. Sophia, which was originally built as a Christian cathedral by Constantine the Great, and, after being destroyed by fire, rebuilt with greater sumptuousness by the emperor Justinian. Its four minarets were added by the Turkish emperor Selim II. Of the Turkish mosques, the finest are those of Solyman the Magnificent and of Sultan Achmet, standing near the Hippodrome, of ancient celebrity. There are others, however, of great beauty, and one, the Valide mosque, containing pillars from the ruins of Troy. The Christian churches in Constantinople and its neighbourhood, have externally the appearance of private houses, no spires nor bells being permitted upon them. One of the finest of these is the patriarchal church of the Greeks, in which are the remains of St. Euthymia, and of the empress Theodora. The suburb of Galata stands opposite to the seraglio, on the north side of the harbour, and is connected with Constantinople by two bridges of boats. To the westward is the suburb Tophana and others, where are the imperial arsenal, dockyard, and cannon-foundry. On the heights above Tophana stands Pera, principally occupied by individuals in the suites of ambassadors to the Porte from the different European powers. On an adjacent hill is the suburb St. Demetri, chiefly inhabited by Greeks. Scutari, though standing in Asiatic ground, and separated from Constantinople by the Bosphorus, is still accounted a suburb of the great city. It is a town of considerable extent, built on the site of the ancient Chrysopolis. The castle of the Seven Towers is now used as a military storehouse, and stands near the Sea of Marmora, at the S.W. angle of the city. Manf. Morocco leather, saddlery, shoes, cherry-tree pipe-tubes, mouth-pieces, and meerschaum pipe-bowls. Pop. estimated at 500,000, including its suburbs; composed of Greeks, Armenians, Jews, Europeans, Turks, and Arabians. The four first comprise about one half of the population. Lat. 41° 0′ 16″ N. Lon. 28° 59′ 14″ E.—This city stands on the site of the ancient Byzantium, and was originally founded by Byzas, 656 B.C. In 328 it was rebuilt by Constantine, and named after him. It has been many times besieged, but has only been taken twice: the first time, in 1204, by the Crusaders; and the second, in 1463, by the Turks, who then extinguished the Roman empire in the East. In 1854, and throughout the short war with Russia, the soldiers of Western Europe may be said to have almost taken possession of Constantinople, not as foes, but as friends, in assisting the "turbaned Turk" to preserve the empire of his sovereign intact. (See SCUTARI, GALATA, BYZANTIUM, TURKEY, &c.)

CONSTANTINOPLE, STRAITS OF. (See BOSPHORUS.)

CONSTANTIUS I., kon-stan'-shi-us, a Roman emperor, was adopted, in 292, by Maximian, and became emperor in 305. He reduced the Britons to subjection, who had risen against the Romans, and died at York, 306.—He was the father of Constantine the Great.

CONSTANTIUS II. was the second son of Constantine the Great, and had, for his share of the empire, the East and Greece. His brothers having died in the West, he, after defeating Mynentius and Vetranion, became, in 350, sole possessor of the empire. D. on his march against the emperor Julian, who had been proclaimed by the soldiery, 361.

CONSUALES LUDI, or CONSUALIA, kon'-su-ai'-lees, festivals first instituted at Rome in honour of Consus, the god of counsel, whose altar Romulus discovered under ground.

CONSUL, kon'-sul, a magistrate at Rome, with regal authority for the space of one year.—There were two consuls (a consulendo), annually chosen in the Campus Martius. The two first consuls were L. Jun. Brutus and L. Tarquinius Collatinus, chosen A.U.C. 244, after the expulsion of the Tarquins. In the first times of the republic, the two consuls were always chosen from patrician families, or noblemen; but, in the year of the city 388, the people obtained the privilege of electing one of the consuls from their own body; and sometimes both were plebeians. The first plebeian consul was L. Sextius. It was required that every candidate for the consulship should be 43 years of age, called legitimum tempus, and should have discharged the functions of quæstor, edile, and prætor. In numerous instances, however, these qualifications were dispensed with. The power of the consuls was unbounded, and they knew no superior but the gods and the laws. The badge of their office was the prætexta, afterwards exchanged for the toga picta or palmata. They were preceded by twelve lictors, carrying the fasces, or bundle of sticks, in the middle of which appeared an axe. Their authority was equal; yet the Valerian law gave the right of priority to the older, and the Julian law to him who had the most children. He was generally called consul major, or prior. As their power was absolute, they presided over the senate, and could convene and dismiss it at pleasure. The senators were their counsellors; and among the Romans the manner of reckoning their years was by the name of the consuls. For example, by M. Tull. Cicerone et J. Antonio consulibus, the year of Rome 689 was always understood. This custom lasted from the year of Rome 244 till the year 1294, or to the 541st year of the Christian era, when the consular office was totally suppressed by Justinian. When appointed to their respective provinces by lot, or by the will of the senate, they were not permitted to return to Rome without the special command of the senate, and they always remained in the provinces till the arrival of their successor. The office of consul, so dignified during the times of the commonwealth, became a mere title under the emperors, and retained nothing of its authority but the useless ensigns of original dignity. The duration of the consulship was abridged by Tiberius and Claudius, and the emperor Commodus made no less than twenty-five consuls in one year. Constantine the Great renewed the original institution, and permitted them to be a whole year in office.

CONSUS, kon'-sus, a deity worshipped at Rome, who presided over counsels. His temple, in the Maximus Circus, was covered, to show that counsels ought to be secret and inviolable. Romulus instituted festivals to his honour, called Consualia, during the celebration of which the Romans carried away the Sabine women.

CONVERSANO, kon-vair-sa'-no, a town of Naples, 20 miles from Bari. It has a cathedral, a bishop's palace, a foundling asylum, and an hospital. Pop. 9,000.

CONWAY, kon'-wai, a river of Wales, which, after a course of 30 miles, falls into Beaumaris Bay at Aberconway.

CONWAY, or ABERCONWAY. (See ABERCONWAY.)

CONWAY, a county of Arkansas, U.S. Area, 1,860 square miles. Pop. 4,000.—The name, also, of two small townships in N. Hampshire and Massachusetts.

CONYBEARE, Very Reverend William Daniel, kon'-e-beer, was distinguished as a geologist, and was one of the earliest promoters of the Geological Society. He discovered the antediluvian monster called Plesiosaurus, for which he was highly complimented by Cuvier. He also directed his attention to the coal-fields of several districts, and pointed out many facts in their physical geography, which enabled practical adventurers to proceed upon more certain data in making their mineralogical discoveries. In 1819 he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society, and became dean of Llandaff in 1845. B. in London, 1787.

COOK, James, Captain, kook, a celebrated navigator, who, at an early age, was apprenticed to a shopkeeper at Staith, in Yorkshire, but being inclined to the sea, his master gave up his indentures, when he bound himself to a Mr. Walker, a shipowner in the coal trade at Whitby. He served nearly seven years in this line, after which he became mate in the same employ. On the breaking out of the war, in 1755, he entered on board the Eagle man of war, and in 1759, in the capacity of master of the Mercury sloop of war, was at the reduction of Quebec by Wolfe. While on that station, he was employed in taking the soundings of the river St. Lawrence, and, afterwards, was engaged in making a chart of the same river, which he executed with great accuracy. He was next with Lord Colvil as master, in the Northumberland man of war, and was at the retaking of Newfoundland, of which coast he made a survey. On his return to England, in 1762, he married a respectable young woman at Barking, in Essex, and in 1764, when Sir Hugh Palliser was appointed governor of Newfoundland, Cook became marine surveyor of that coast and of Labrador. The manner in which he performed his duties in this situation was the principal cause of his being chosen to conduct an expedition for astronomical and geographical purposes into the South Pacific Ocean. Accordingly, with the rank of lieutenant, he entered on board the Endeavour, and set sail in August, 1768. He was accompanied by Mr. Green, as astronomer, Sir Joseph Banks, and Dr. Solander, and arrived at Otaheite, where the transit of Venus was observed, and where he remained till the 13th of July, 1769, when he resumed his voyage, and discovered a number of islands, to which he gave the name of Society Islands. October 6th he anchored at New Zealand, which he circumnavigated. Thence he sailed to New Holland, his account of which was the cause of the settlement of Botany Bay, so long known as a penal colony. He returned to England in June, 1771, and was, shortly afterwards, appointed a commander in the navy. An account of this voyage was published from the captain's journals and those of Mr. Banks, by Dr. Hawkesworth. The existence of a southern continent being still an undecided question, in order, if possible, to ascertain that point, Captain Cook was employed in another voyage, and sailed with two ships, the Resolution, commanded by himself, and the Adventure, by Captain Furneaux, in the July of the following year. In this voyage they explored the southern hemisphere as high as latitude 71° 10′, and, after making many additions to our geographical knowledge, but without attaining the main object, he arrived safe at Spithead in July, 1775, having lost only one man out of 118. He was now raised to the rank of post captain, and appointed to a post in Greenwich Hospital. The Admiralty having resolved to determine the disputed question as to there being a northern communication between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, Captain Cook volunteered his services for the enterprise, and in the July of 1776 sailed from Plymouth in the Resolution. After sailing as high as lat. 74° 44′ N., the ships were obliged to shift their course to the south, and in November, 1778, reached the Sandwich Islands to pass the winter. Here Captain Cook was slain in a quarrel with the natives, at Owhyhee, the largest of the Sandwich Islands, February, 1779. B. at Marton, Yorkshire, 1728.

COOK, a county of the United States, on Lake Michigan, Illinois. Area, 836 square miles. Pop. 45,000.

COOK, an inland county of New South Wales, mostly consisting of a large extent of table-land, between 2,000 and 3,000 feet high. Desc. Fertile in the valleys, but otherwise abounding in rocks. Pop. 5,000.

COOK ISLANDS, a group in the Pacific Ocean, lying to the S.W. of the Society Islands, between Tahiti on the E., and the archipelago of Tonga on the W. The inhabitants are of the Malay race, and English missionaries have, in some degree, been successful in converting many of them to Christianity. Pop. Unascertained, perhaps 40,000.

COOK STRAIT separates the two principal islands of New Zealand, and was discovered in 1770 by Captain Cook.

COOK'S INLET, or RIVER, a large inlet on the W. coast of Russian N. America. Length, 130 miles, with a varying breadth up to 70. Lat. between 58° and 61° N. Lon. between 151° and 154° W.

COOKE, George Frederick, an English actor, who was bred to the trade of a printer, at Berwick-upon-Tweed; but imbibing a passion for the stage, made his first public appearance at Brentford, in the character of Dumont, in "Jane Shore." In 1778 he appeared in London, but was not successful. After an absence of twenty-two years, however, he reappeared in the character of Richard III., at Covent Garden, with the most complete success. He continued for a number of years to perform the leading parts of the drama, when, in 1810, he sailed for New York, in the United States. Here the violent excesses in drinking, to which he had long given way, proved too much even for his constitution, which had been one of the most powerful, and he died in September, 1812. B. at Westminster, 1755.—Edmund Kean, his great successor in tragedy, during one of his visits to America, had a monument erected over Cooke's grave.

COOKSTOWN, a town in the county of Tyrone, Ulster, Ireland. It stands on the Ballinderry, 5 miles from Stewartstown. Pop. 3,000.

COOPER, Sir Astley, koop'-er, a distinguished surgeon and anatomist, who rose to the summit of his profession, and in 1820 was called in to attend George IV., and removed a tumour from the royal head. In the same year he received a baronetcy, which, it was stipulated, was to descend to his adopted son and nephew Astley Cooper, he, himself, being without a son. In 1822 he was elected one of the court of examiners of the College of Surgeons, and in 1827 president of the college. In 1828 he became serjeant-surgeon to the king, and in 1830 vice-president of the Royal Society. In 1834 he received from Oxford the honorary degree of doctor of civil laws, and subsequently visited Edinburgh, where the university made him an LL.D., and the freedom of the city was voted to him. Old age and ill-health had, with all his honours, now gathered upon him, and in 1840 he was struck with an illness which shortly afterwards carried him off. B. at Brooke, Norfolk, 1768; D. in London, 1841.—A statue by Bailey was erected to his memory in St. Paul's Cathedral.

COOPER, Samuel, a celebrated English painter, who excelled in miniature portraits, insomuch that Louis XIV. of France offered £150 for his picture of Oliver Cromwell. He was called Van Dyck in little. B. in London, 1609; D. in London, 1672, and was buried in old St. Pancras church, where his epitaph, in Latin, might be seen, calling him the Apelles of his age. His wife was the sister of the poet Pope's mother.—He had a brother, Alexander Cooper, who became painter to Queen Christina of Sweden.

Cooper, James Fennimore, a distinguished American novelist, whose father was a judge in the state of New York. After passing through Yale College, he, in 1805, entered the navy as a midshipman, and, for six years, followed the sea, when he retired and got married. He now took up his abode in Cooperstown, a village founded by his father, on Lake Ostego, in Western New York. It was not, however, till 1821 that Mr. Cooper ventured to appear as an author. Then he produced his "Precaution," which was not well received; but which, being shortly afterwards succeeded by his "Spy," it may be presumed gave him courage to proceed in the style of novel-writing. This second production was a decided success, and led the way to a long list of fictions, which it would occupy a considerable space even to name. Among them we may specify his "Pioneers" and his "Pilot," "The Last of the Mohicans," "Lionel Lincoln," "The Red Rover," and "The Water-witch," as sufficiently indicating the characteristics of his genius. B. at Burlington, New Jersey, 1789; D. at Cooperstown, 1851.—Cooper wrote in other paths besides those of the imagination. He produced "Lives of Distinguished American Naval Officers," "Sketches of Switzerland," "Gleanings in Europe," and several other works. Many of his stories have been translated both into German and French; and it is also affirmed that some of them are to be found, even in one or more of the Oriental tongues.

Cooper, Thomas Sydney, began life as a scene-painter in the theatre at Canterbury, and, in 1823, went to London to enter the Royal Academy; but he was forced to return to the former town, and here he remained, giving instructions in drawing, till 1827. In that year he went to Holland, and there, under the animal-painter Verloeckhoven, made that particular branch of his art the subject of his ardent study. In 1831 he returned to England, and adopted animal-painting as his special branch. In 1833 he exhibited his first picture in the gallery of the Society of British Artists, and from that time, he steadily advanced in fame and fortune. In 1845 he was chosen an associate of the Royal Academy, and may be pronounced one of the finest cattle-painters England has produced. B. at Canterbury, 1803.

Cooper, a county of Missouri, U.S., watered by a river of the same name. Area, 576 square miles. Pop. 13,000.

Coorg, koorg, a district of S. India, inclosed by Mysore, Canara, and Malabar. Area, 1,420 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, and covered with forests. The lowest part of the country has an elevation of 3,000 feet above the level of the sea, and is watered by the Cauvary and its tributaries. Pop. about 70,000. Lat. between 11° 50′ and 12° 45′ N. Lon. between 75° 25′ and 76° 13′ E.—The inhabitants of this country are a handsome race, and mostly devoted to agricultural pursuits. Among them is the peculiar custom of the wife of the eldest brother in a family, being the common property of all the younger brothers, whose wives, in their turn, become the common property of all the rest. In 1832 Coorg was annexed to Great Britain.

Coos, koos, a county of New Hampshire, U.S. Area, 1,600 square miles. Pop. 12,000.

Coosa, koo'-sa, a county of Alabama, U.S. Area, 864 square miles. Pop. 15,000, of whom a third are slaves.—Also, the name of a river which waters the county, and forms a branch of the Alabama. Length, 250 miles.

Coosaw, or Coosawatchie, koo'-saw, a river of South Carolina, U.S., which runs S.S.E. into Broad River and Whale Branch.

Coosy, koo'-se, a river of British India, rising in the district of Ramghur, and, after a course of 240 miles, falling into the river Hooghly, in lat. 22° N.; lon. 88° 4′ E.

Coosy, a river of India, rising in the peaks of the Himalaya, and, after a course of 330 miles, falling into the Ganges, in lat. 25° 19′ N.; lon. 87° 19′ E.

Coote, Sir Eyre, koot, an English general, who entered the army at an early age, and fought against the followers of Charles Stuart in 1745. In 1754 he went to India, where he distinguished himself in many important actions, particularly at the siege of Pondicherry. On account of his conduct here, the directors of the honourable East-India Company presented him with a diamond-hilted sword. In 1769 he was made commander-in-chief of the Company's forces; but quitted Madras at the end of the following year, and returned to England, where he was appointed governor of Fort St. George, and made knight of the Bath. In 1781 he proceeded again to India as commander-in-chief, and, at the head of 10,000 men, defeated Hyder Ali, whose forces numbered 150,000. D. in Ireland, 1726; D. at Madras, in 1783.— There is a fine monument to his memory in Westminster Abbey.

Cootehill, koot'-hill, a market-town of Ireland, in Ulster, standing on the Cootehill river, 28 miles from Dundalk. It has a church, a court-house, a bridewell, and several schools. Pop. 3,300.

Cope, Charles West, R.A., kope, an English artist, who, in 1843, was one of the three successful competitors for the prizes offered by the Royal Commission of the Fine Arts in cartoons. His subject was "The First Trial by Jury." The fresco competition of the following year brought him forward with "The Meeting of Jacob and Rachel," which caused him to be selected to paint one of the six frescoes for the House of Lords. The subject which he chose for this was "Edward III. conferring the Order of the Garter on the Black Prince." For the same building he has since executed "Prince Henry's Submission to the Law," and "Griselda's First Trial," deemed his master-piece in fresco. In 1843 he was elected an A.R.A., and in 1848 an R.A. He has been a frequent exhibitor at the Royal Academy, and, both in imaginative and historical painting, has reached a high standard of excellence. His works are numerous; among which the principal are "The Last Days of Cardinal Wolsey," painted for Prince Albert; "Lear and Cordelia," "Othello relating his Adventures," and "The Children of Charles I. in Carisbrook Castle." B. at Leeds, 1815.

COPENHAGEN.

Copenhagen, ko'-pen-hal'-gen, is the capital of Denmark, and one of the best-built cities in Europe. It stands on the islands of Zealand and Amak, on the W. side of the Sound, about 20 miles from the narrow passage of that name in the Baltic. The city consists of three distinct parts; viz., the Old Town, the New Town, or Frederickstown, and Christianshaven. Of these the Old Town is the largest and most populous, forming what is properly called the city. There is a part of the New Town called Amalienburg, rebuilt by Frederick V. between 1746 and 1765. It is extremely beautiful, and consists chiefly of an octagon, known by the name of Frederick's Square, and opening into four broad rectangular streets. In the centre is a fine bronze statue of Frederick V. on horseback, weighing 45,000 lb. Not far from this is the king's new market, a spacious but irregular area, containing in one of its sides the castle of Charlottenburg, formerly the residence of the queen, but now appropriated to the Royal Academy of Fine Arts. Here also are the theatre, the artillery-house, the great hotel, and other stately buildings, besides an equestrian statue of Christian V., erected in 1688. The harbour of Copenhagen is formed by a narrow arm of the sea, or rather channel, running between the island of Zealand and the opposite one of Amak. It is capable of containing 1,000 sail, and, although the entrance is so narrow that one ship only can enter at a time, its depth is sufficient to admit vessels of the largest size. The part of the town called Christianshaven was built by Christian IV. on the adjacent part of the island of Amak. It is separated from Copenhagen by the inlet which forms the harbour, but which, becoming afterwards narrower, is crossed by two bridges. There are many ecclesiastical and other public edifices, a university, and a royal library, containing upwards of 410,000 volumes, and, it is said, 16,000 MSS. Manf. Linen, sail-cloth, porcelain, tobacco, spirituous liquors; and it has anchor-foundries, roperies, and dock-yards. Pop. 130,000. Lat. 55° 40′ 43″ N. Lon. 12° 34′ 44″ E.—Copenhagen is the residence of the sovereign, and the seat of the court. It was founded in 1168, and was originally constructed of wood. In the battle of the Baltic it was taken by Nelson, in 1801, and in 1807 again bombarded by the British. Then above 300 houses, including the cathedral and part of the university, were destroyed, while twice that number were damaged.

COPERNICUS, COPERNIK, or ZEPERNIC, Nicholas, ko-per'-ni-kus, as he has been differently called, was a famous Prussian astronomer, whose family was noble, and whose uncle was bishop of Warmia. He was educated at Cracow, where he became a doctor of medicine. He afterwards went to Italy, and in 1500 obtained a professorship of mathematics at Rome. He subsequently returned to his native country, where he became a canon in the church of Frauenburg. Here he passed the remainder of his days a quiet and grave man, deeply immersed in astronomical researches, whilst healing the poor by his medical knowledge, and comforting them by his ecclesiastical duties. The result of his solitary vigils appeared in his great work entitled "De Revolutionibus Orbium Cœlestium," which overturned the Ptolemaic system of astronomy, and established for himself an enduring fame. This system makes the sun the "centrum mundi," round which the earth and other planets revolve. The MS. of his great work remained in his possession some years before he would publish it. At length he gave it to the world, and only lived to see a printed copy of it a few hours before his death. B. at Thorn, in Prussia, 1472; D. 1543, and was buried in the cathedral to which he belonged COPIA, ko'-pe-a, the goddess of plenty among the Romans, represented bearing a horn, filled with grapes, fruits, &c.

COPIAPO, ko'-pe-a-po', the capital of a province of the same name in Chili, on a river also of its name, which enters the Pacific Ocean, and serves as its port. The town is in the department Coquimbo, and has repeatedly been ruined by earthquakes. Pop. 1,500. Lat. 27° S. Lon. 71° W.—In its vicinity is a volcano of the same name, belonging to the Andes.—In 1850, copper, cobalt, and silver were exported from Copiapo to the extent of nearly a million sterling in value. The Copiapo Railway is the highest in the world, being 4,479 feet above the Pacific.

COPLEY, Sir John Singleton, kop'-ley, a distinguished artist, born in America, but claimed by Ireland as a native, from his first "seeing the light" almost immediately after the arrival of his parents, who were from Ireland, in the United States. By the force of nature he became a painter, and rose to eminence in his profession on both sides of the Atlantic, before he had visited either England or Italy. In 1775, however, he arrived in London, and took up his residence in George Street, Hanover Square. During the previous year he had visited both England and Italy, and had now determined to settle in the former. In 1777 he became an associate of the Royal Academy, and in 1783 a member. He devoted much of his attention to illustrations of history, and his "Death of Lord Chatham" is, perhaps, his best work B. at Boston, United States, 1737; D. 1815.—He was the father of the venerable Lord Lyndhurst.

COPPER-MINE RIVER runs through a part of British North America, and after a course of 250 miles, falls into the Arctic Ocean in lat. 69° N., and lon. 115° 5′ W. —The Copper-mine mountains are to the west of it.

COQUET, ko'-ket, a river of Great Britain, rising in the Cheviot hills, Roxburgshire, and falling into the ocean opposite Coquet Island, off the coast of Northumberland. The island is about a mile in circumference, and has a fixed light 80 feet above the level of the sea.

COQUIMBO, ko-keem'-bo, the capital of a province of the same name in Chili, at nearly a mile's distance from the Pacific Ocean. It is one of the principal seaports, and stands at the mouth of the Coquimbo river. Some French mercantile houses are established in it, and it has smelting-furnaces. Pop. about 5,000. —The PROVINCE is inclosed by the department Aconcagua on the S., the desert of Atacama on the N., the Andes on the E., and it has the Pacific on the W. Area, 31,840 square miles. Desc. Barren and dry, but rich in mines. Pop. 85,000; consisting of Spaniards, people of colour, and some Indians. Lat. between 25° 30′ and 31° S. Lon. between 69° and 72° W.

CORAL SEA, kor'-al, that part of the Pacific Ocean which has Australia on its W. and the New Hebrides on its E.; and so called from the coral reefs it contains.

CORAM, Thomas, Captain, kor'-ăm, an English philanthropist, who instituted the London Foundling Hospital, besides causing an establishment to be formed in N. America for the education of Indian girls. He was bred to the sea, in the merchant service, and spent all that he had on these and other benevolent schemes, so that in his old age he was obliged to be supported by the contributions of several noble patrons, among whom was Frederick, prince of Wales. B. 1618; D. in London, 1751, and was buried in the Foundling Hospital, on the gate of which there is a statue of him.

CORBACH, or KORBACH, kor'-bak, the capital of the principality of Waldeck, on the Itter, 70 miles from Cologne. Manf. Principally woollen stuffs. Pop. 2,300.—Near here, in 1760, the French defeated the Hanoverians.

CORBALLY, kor-băl'-le, the name of several parishes in Ireland, none of them with a population above 1,000.

CORBEIL, kor'-bai, a town of France, 18 miles from Paris, in the department of the Seine and Oise. It stands where the Essonne joins the Seine, at the head of a branch of the Paris and Orleans Railway. Manf. Shawls, cashmeres, and printed goods. Pop. 5,000.

CORCYRA, or PHÆCIA, kor-si'-ra, an island in the Ionian Sea, on the coast of Epirus, famous for the shipwreck of Ulysses, and the gardens of Alcinous. It is the modern Corfu. (See CORFU.)

CORDAY D'ARMANS, Marie Anne Charlotte, kor'-dai, was born of a good family, who resided principally at Caen, where she was greatly admired for her beauty and spirit. She had a lover named Belsunce, a major in the French army, who was denounced by Marat, and caused to be assassinated. This event animated Charlotte with sentiments of vengeance against Marat, whom she regarded as the oppressor of her country. She hastened to Paris, and on being, after some difficulty, admitted to his presence, stabbed him to the heart, July 12, 1793. For from attempting to escape, she confessed the fact, and was condemned to suffer death. Accordingly, she was guillotined on July 17, 1793. B. near Sez, 1768.—This circumstance was attended by another equally extraordinary. As she was being conducted to the scaffold, a deputy of the city of Mayence, named Adam Lux, was so transported with admiration of her beauty and heroism, that he hastened to the tribunal, and demanded to suffer death in her stead. This, however, was not conceded to him; but he was also condemned and executed with the same instrument.

CORDILLERA, kor-dil-lair'-a, the Spanish name for a mountain-chain.

CORDOVA, kor-do'-va, the capital of a province of the same name, and formerly the capital of a kingdom, in a plain on the Guadalquiver, 120 miles from Cadiz. It forms an oblong square, built like an amphitheatre, and is surrounded by Moorish walls, flanked with large towers, and encompassing a large area, extensively occupied by gardens. There is a cathedral, which was anciently a mosque, built by Abderame, king of the Moors, about the year 692, and is still one of the most remarkable edifices in Spain. Several other churches are worthy of notice, either for their architecture or their paintings. There is a bridge across the Guadalquiver, which was built by the Moors. It consists of 16 arches, and is commanded by a Saracenic castle. Manf. Paper, hats, barrels, silken fabrics, and a kind of leather, called, from this town, Cordovan, or Cordwain. The manner of preparing it was here invented by the Moors. Its sale has now, however, dwindled into insignificance. Pop. 43,000.—Cordova was, in 672, taken by the Moors, and, for several centuries, remained in their possession. In 1236 it was captured by Ferdinand III., and was constituted capital of one of the four old provinces of Andalusia, with the title of kingdom. In 1808 it was occupied and pillaged by the French. It is the birthplace of the two Senecas, and of Lucan the poet.—The PROVINCE is inclosed by Badajos and Ciudad Real on the N., by Jaen on the E., on the S. by Granada, and on the W. by Seville. Area, 6,177 square miles. Desc. Mountainous in the N.; and in the S. comparatively level, with great fertility in the plains and valleys, and rich in minerals in the highlands. Pop. 350,000. Lat. between 37° 12′ and 38° 44′ N. Lon. between 3° 56′ and 5° 32′ W.—The city is the ancient Corduba.

CORDOVA, a city of S. America, and capital of a republic of the same name, in the Plata confederation. It is situate on the Rio Primero, and has a handsome cathedral and several other churches. Manf. Cotton and woollen cloths. Pop. 14,000. Lat. 31° 26′ 14″ S. Lon. 63° 55′ W.—The REPUBLIC is inclosed by Santiago, La Rioja, San Luis, and Santa Fé. Desc. Mountainous and infertile. Maize and fruits are the chief products, and large numbers of cattle and goats are reared. Pop. 88,000, its E. portion being nearly desolate.

CORDOVA, or CORDOBA, a town of the Mexican confederation, 150 miles from Mexico. It has numerous domes, towers, and steeples, and there is a large square in the centre of the town, with Gothic arcades on three sides, the cathedral on the fourth, with a fountain in the middle. Manf. Cotton and woollen fabrics; and it has a trade in coffee and sugar. Pop. about 5,000.

COREA, ko-re'-a, a large country of Asia, situate E. of China, and consisting of a peninsula, formed on one side by the Yellow Sea, and on the other by the Sea of Japan. Area, islands inclusive, 80,000 square miles. Desc. Fertile along the coasts, and little is known of the interior. Pro. Rice, millet, wheat, hemp, cotton, tobacco, ginseng, fruits, cattle, and timber. Minerals. Iron, coal, rock-salt, and gold. Manf. Similar to those of the Chinese, whose habits and customs are nearly the same. Their commerce is carried on principally with Japan; but they also pursue a contraband trade with China. Gov. Despotic; and the public acts must be approved by the emperor of China, to whom, every four years, a tribute is paid. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. between 33° and 43° N. Lon. between 124° and 130° E.—The COREAN ARCHIPELAGO comprises numerous islands in the Yellow Sea.

CORELLI, Arcangelo, ko-rel'-le, called by his countrymen "the divine," was an Italian musical composer, whose greatest work is his "Concerti Grossi," or twelve Concertos. B. at Lusignano, 1653; D. at Rome, 1713.—As a violinist, he was unrivalled, and his compositions for that instrument are regarded as of standard excellence.

CORENTIN, ko-ren'-tin, a river of Guiana, in S. America. It rises in Mount Acarai, 24 miles E. of the Essequibo, and enters the Atlantic in lat. 6° N.; lon. 57° W.

CORESUS, ko-re'-sus, a priest of Bacchus at Calydon, in Bœotia, was deeply enamoured of the nymph Callirhoe, who treated him with disdain. He complained to Bacchus, who visited the country with a pestilence. The Calydonians were directed by the oracle to appease the god by sacrificing Callirhoe on his altar. Accordingly, the nymph was led to the altar, and Coresus, who was to sacrifice her, forgot his resentment, and stabbed himself. Callirhoe, conscious of her ingratitude to the love of Coresus, killed herself on the brink of a fountain, which afterwards bore her name.

CORFE CASTLE, korf, a town and parish of England, in Dorsetshire, situate in the peninsula or the isle, of Purbeck, 5 miles from Wareham. Pop. 2,000.—It is chiefly noted for its castle, at the gates of which King Edward the Martyr, in 978 or 981, was assassinated, at the instigation of his stepmother, Elfrida. Subsequently, King John, in his wars with the barons, deposited his regalia in it, for security. In the civil war it was defended for the king by Lady Bankes, wife of Lord Chief Justice Sir John Bankes; but, in 1645-6, it fell into the hands of the Parliamentarians, who dismantled it.

CORFU, kor-foo', one of the Ionian islands, and the seat of their government. It is situate at the entrance of the Gulf of Venice, on the coast of South Albania, from which it is separated by a channel varying from 2 to 6 miles in width. Ext. 40 miles long, with a varying breadth of from 2 to 18. Area, 227 square miles. Desc. Undulating and fertile, with an unhealthy climate along the coasts. Pro. Corn, wine, and olive-oil, oranges, lemons, honey, wax, and salt. Pop. 65,000.—This is the ancient Corcyra. (See IONIAN ISLES.)

CORFU, the capital of the above island, is situate on the east coast, and built in the form of an amphitheatre. It is extremely strong, being defended by a detached citadel, two forts, and other works. The harbour is rather small, but the road is capacious and secure. In front of Corfu, at the distance of about a mile, is the island of Vido, upon which is built one of the above forts, and where the lazaretto is kept. It is protected by a triple range of batteries, and forms a strong outwork to the fortifications of the harbour. Pop. 16,000. Lat. 39° 37′ 1″ N. Lon. 20° 6′ 2″ E.—Corfu is the seat of the parliamentary senate, and the residence of the lord high commissioner. It has communication by steam with Athens, Otranto, Trieste, Gibraltar, and England.

CORFU, CHANNEL OF, is an arm of the Mediterranean, between the coast of Epirus and the island of the same name. Ext. 30 miles long, with a varying breadth of from 2 to 16 miles.

CORIA, ko-re-a, a town in Spanish Estremadura, on the Alagon, 110 miles from Madrid. It is inclosed by walls, and formed the winter quarters of Lord Hill in 1812. Pop. 3,000.—Another, 6 miles from Seville. Manf. Large almond- and oil-jars. Pop. 3,300.

CORIGLANO, ko-reel-ya'-no, a town of Naples, in the province of Calabria Citra, capital of a district, and 6 miles from Rossano. Manf. Woollen and cloth, caps, and soap. It has a considerable trade in fruit and wine, which form the produce of the neighbourhood. Pop. 8,500.—Another in the province of Otranto. Pop. 2,200.

CORINGA, ko-rin'-ga, a town of British India, in the presidency of Madras. It is the best port on the coast of Coromandel, but is subject to inundations when the wind is high from the N.E. Both in 1787 and 1832, most of its inhabitants were drowned. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 16° 49′ N. Lon. 82° 29′ E.

CORINNA, ko-rin'-na, a poetess of Bœotia. She was a disciple of Myrtis, a female philosopher of Greece, and the rival of Pindar, from whom she bore away, on five several occasions, the poetical prize. There have come down to the moderns only a few of her verses. Lived about 470 B.C.

CORINTH, kor'-inth, the name of several townships in the United States, principally in New York and Maine. None of their populations are more than 2,000.

CORINTH, a town of Greece, the capital of a department of the same name, situate on the Isthmus of Corinth, 50 miles from Athens. It now presents more the appearance of a village than a town, the houses being scattered and separated by gardens and corn-fields. The traces of the ancient walls are still discernible, but the principal and only interesting monument of antiquity is the citadel, or Acro-Corinthos. It stands above the town. Pop. 2,000.—Corinth was first founded by Sisyphus, son of Æolus, A.M. 2616, and received its name from Corinthus, the son of Pelops. It was totally destroyed by L. Mummius, the Roman consul, and burnt to the ground, 146 B.C. The government of Corinth was monarchical till 779 years B.C., when officers, called Prytanes, were instituted. Its inhabitants formed numerous colonies, and Paul preached the gospel in it for upwards of a year. After the taking of Constantinople, it fell into the hands of the Turks, from whom it was retaken in 1687, by its former possessors, the Venetians. In 1715 it again was possessed by the Turks, who held it till 1823.—The district or department, of which it is the capital, is extremely fertile, and in 1852 had a population of 106,000.

CORINTH, or LEPANTO, GULF OF, an arm of the Mediterranean, separating Hellas on the N. from the Morea on the S., and communicating with the Gulf of Patras by the Strait of Lepanto. Ext. 75 miles long, with an average breadth of 15 miles. (See LEPANTO.)

CORINTH, ISTHMUS OF, a narrow neck of sterile land, separating the Gulf of Corinth, or Lepanto, from that of Ægina, and connecting the peninsula of the Morea with the rest of Greece. Ext. 20 miles long, with a varying breadth of from 4 to 8 miles.

CORIOLANUS, kor'-i-o-lai'-nus, the surname of C. Martius, from his victory at Corioli, where, from a private soldier, he gained the amplest honours. His story, as given by the Roman historians, is regarded as a fiction by Niebuhr, who thinks it ought to be excluded from history. It is stated, however, that the consulship, which he had solicited, was refused him, he having rendered himself distasteful to the people, on account of his haughty character. He afterwards proposed measures hostile to the interests of the people, and opposed the gratuitous distribution of the corn which had been sent, in a time of scarcity, by Gelo, king of Sicily. The tribunes, thereon, condemned him to exile. Eager for vengeance, Coriolanus offered his services to the Volsci, and soon appeared at their head, ravaging the Roman territory, and laying siege to the "Eternal City" itself. The inhabitants, terrified, sent several embassies to him; but he was deaf to all their entreaties. He was about to deliver the assault, when Veturia, his mother, followed by his wife and a train of Roman women, arrived at his camp, to supplicate him to pause. Conquered by their tears, Coriolanus consented to raise the siege. He was assassinated some little time after, about 488 B.C., by the Volsci; although, according to others, he lived to an advanced age.—Shakspeare and other poets have dramatized his life.

CORK, kork, the largest county of Ireland, in the province of Munster, and bounded N. and N.E. by Limerick and Tipperary, E. by Waterford, and on the other sides by the Atlantic Ocean. Ext. 110 miles long, by 70 broad. Area, 2,885 square miles. Desc. The surface of the country is varied with beauty and fertility, producing crops principally of oats, wheat, and potatoes. The S. coast abounds with excellent harbours. Rivers. The Lee, Bandon, Blackwater, Islen, Funcheon, Bridge, and the Awbeg. Lakes. Numerous. Pop., exclusive of the city of Cork, about 600,000.—This county is supposed to have been originally peopled by the inhabitants of Spain, and up to the end of the 12th century, it formed a kingdom under the Macarthys.

CORK, the capital of the above county, is situate on the river Lee, over which are several elegant stone bridges, 138 miles from Dublin. The public buildings are generally of a plain exterior. They consist of a cathedral, an exchange, commercial buildings, a spacious market-house, custom-house, several handsome parish churches, a town-hall, hospitals, and two theatres. Its barracks are on a very large scale, and are fine buildings. It has also several scientific institutions, the principal of which are the Queen's College, school of medicine and surgery, the philosophical library, mechanics' institute, and a fine arts', Cuvierian, agricultural, and other societies. Manf. Sail-cloth, sheeting, paper, leather, glue, glass, iron, and gloves. The city exports large quantities of salt provisions, with hides, butter, flour, pork, and other Irish produce. Pop. 86,000.—Cork stands about 15 miles from the sea, and its harbour, or the Cove of Cork, 9 miles below the town, has long been celebrated for its safety and capaciousness. Connected by railway with Dublin and Limerick.

CORLEONE, kor'-lai-o'-nai, a well-built town of Sicily, 20 miles from Palermo. It stands on a hill near the source of the Belici, and has several churches and convents, with a trade in corn and oil. Pop. 13,000, chiefly engaged in agricultural pursuits.

CORNEILLE, Peter, kor'-nai, an eminent French dramatist, who was brought up to the bar, for which his genius was entirely unsuited. Accordingly, he quitted it, and commenced writing for the stage. His first comedy, "Mélite," was produced in 1629, and was followed by "Clitandre," "La Veuve," "La Galerie du Palais," and "La Place Royale," when, in 1637, appeared his

"Cid," founded on the "Cid" of Guillen de Castro, of Spain. This performance filled the Parisians with enthusiasm. It carried their conceptions into new regions of dramatic glory, and its author became "Le Grand Corneille." Whatever gratification this might bring to the vanity of the author, it was not quite universal. He had been so unfortunate as to offend the Cardinal Richelieu, who had, himself, some poetical pretensions, and who, as the founder of the French Academy, was, in some degree, the means of endeavouring to abate the public admiration. One of the members of that learned body, therefore, wrote an elaborate critique on the "Cid," hinting at a deficiency of inventive genius in Corneille, seeing that he had borrowed the plot of his drama from a Spaniard. Such an insinuation was too damaging to be taken with indifference by Corneille, who set to work and produced his "Horace" and his "Cinna," which are, in themselves, sufficient to establish a claim to ingenious originality. In 1640 appeared his "Polyeucte," which was succeeded by "La Mort de Pompée," "Le Menteur," and several others; none of which, however, nearly approached the "Cid." Nay, they betokened an evident declension of genius, when, in 1653, his "Pertharite" decidedly proclaimed him a fallen star. This disgusted him with the stage, and he turned his attention to other kinds of poetical composition. His success in these, however, was not great, and he returned to the drama. In 1659 he produced his "Œdipe," and continued to write, but with no steady success. In 1672 his "Pulchérie" appeared, and, in 1674, his "Suréna;" but he had already ceased to be popular. B. at Rouen, 1606; D. at Paris, 1684.—For 37 years he was a member of the academy.

CORNEILLE, Thomas, brother of the above, was also a poet, a member of the French Academy, and of that of Inscriptions. He wrote no fewer than forty-two pieces, which, with the exception of "Ariane" and "Le Comte d'Essex," have all passed into oblivion. Of this number, however, many met with the greatest success in their day. They were published, with those of his brother, in 1738, in 11 vols. 12mo. D. 1709.—Besides his plays, he wrote a "Dictionary of Arts," in 2 vols. folio, and a "Geographical and Historical Dictionary," in 3 vols. folio.

CORNELIA, wife of Pompey, and daughter of Metellus Scipio, accompanied her husband in his flight, after the battle of Pharsalia, and saw him massacred before her eyes in the harbour of Alexandria. (See POMPEY.)—The mother of the Gracchi, and daughter of Scipio Africanus. She directed the education of her sons, and was greatly admired for her virtues. When a Campanian lady made once a show of her jewels at Cornelia's house, and entreated her to favour her with a sight of her own, Cornelia produced her two sons, saying, "These are the only jewels of which I can boast." In her lifetime a statue was raised to her, with this inscription, "To Cornelia, the mother of the Gracchi." Lived in the 2nd century B.C. (See GRACCHI.)—The daughter of Cinna. (See CÆSAR, Julius.)

CORNELIUS, Peter von, kor-nai'-le-oos, an eminent German artist, who became a painter by choice, and who, in his nineteenth year, was engaged to paint, with figures in chiaroscuro, the cupola of the old church of Neuss, near Dusseldorf. After this, he proceeded to Frankfort, where he executed a series of designs illustrative of the "Faust" of Goethe, to whom the engravings were dedicated. His reputation was now fast rising, when he proceeded to Rome, where he united himself with several kindred spirits and commenced studying with a view to found a new school of German art. To accomplish this, fresco was the style adopted, and Cornelius was commissioned to paint the walls of the villa of Bartholdy, the Prussian consul-general. The subjects he chose were, "Joseph Recognizing his Brethren," and "Joseph Interpreting the Dream of Pharaoh's Chief Butler," which were a decided success, and excited general admiration. He now rose higher and higher in his profession, and left Rome, 1819. At Dusseldorf he remodelled the academy, and then had two spacious halls assigned him to paint, in the Glyptothek at Munich. In one of these,—the Hall of Heroes, he represented, in colossal proportions, the leading events of the "Iliad;" in the other,—the Hall of the Gods, he symbolised the Grecian mythology. These works were not completed till 1830, and are conceived and executed with such a grandeur of effect as to command universal homage. He became director of the Munich Academy, which, under him, rose to be a great school of art. B. at Dusseldorf, 1787.

CORNELIUS, kor-ne'-le-us, 'honey,' or 'beam of the sun,' a captain of the Roman garrison at Cæsarea.

CORNERO, or CORNARO, Louis, kor-nar'-o, a Venetian nobleman, remarkable for protracting his life to a considerable length by a course of regimen. In his youth he lived freely, which brought him into a bad state of health. On this, he formed the resolution of confining himself to twelve ounces of food and fourteen of wine daily; by which means, with exercise, he acquired a vigorous constitution. The system he practised, included spare and simple diet, avoidance of heat and cold, late hours, sexual indulgences, and over-fatigue. It required gentle and pleasing excitements, occasional riding on horseback, field sports, and the hearing of music. All violent passions were to be restrained or repressed, and no indulgence allowed to envy, hatred, ambition, jealousy, and the like. The result of his plan was perfect health, cheerful spirits, and long life. At an advanced age he wrote his popular book on "Health and Long Life," which has been translated into most languages; he also wrote a treatise on "Waters," particularly the lagunes about Venice. B. at Venice, 1467; D. at Padua, 1565. His wife, who survived him, lived to about the same age.—The conclusion to be drawn from Cornaro's book on "Health" is, that all men, or most of them, shorten their lives by over-eating and drinking.

CORNETO, kor-nai'-to, a maritime town of Central Italy, 12 miles from Civita Vecchia. It belongs to the States of the Church, and is a bishop's see, with a Gothic cathedral. Pop. 4,000.

CORNO MONTE, or GRAN SASSO D'ITALIA, kor'-no mon'-tai, the culminating peak of the Apeninnes in Naples. Height, 9,591 feet above the level of the sea.

CORNOUAILLES, kor'-noo-ail, an old district of France, now divided into the departments Côtes-du-Nord, Finisterre, and Morbihan.

CORNWALL, korn'-wal, a maritime county of England, forming its S.W. extremity, and surrounded by the sea, except on the E. side, where it is separated from Devonshire by the Tamar, and by an artificial boundary of a few miles in length at its northern extremity. Ext. 78 miles long, with an average breadth of 43. Area, 1,330 square miles. Desc. A ridge of bleak and rugged hills extending from W. to E. through its whole length, renders its appearance dreary in the extreme. The eye is, however, occasionally relieved by valleys of great fertility and beauty, watered by numberless small streams, which are frequently interesting, from the romantic scenery with which they are associated. Along the coasts, too, the huge masses of granite, bidding defiance on one side to the violence of the waves, and forming, on the other, a stupendous rampart to the fertile plains beneath, exhibit a rare union of the sublime and beautiful. Rivers. The Tamar, Lynher, Fawey, Fal, Hel or Heyl, the Loo, and the Alan or Camel. Climate. Uncertain, and subject to heavy rains, but, on the whole, mild. Myrtles and other tender plants thrive in it, whilst fruit-trees everywhere abound, and attain high perfection. Even the mulberry flourishes, and, in the western part of the county, its fruit ripens. Pro. Comparatively little attention was paid to agriculture till lately, when it began to be improved. The principal crops are corn and potatoes. Minerals. Silver, zinc, lead, copper, tin, antimony, manganese, cobalt, bismuth, and granite. One of the most interesting of the Cornish minerals is the soap-rock, particularly used in the manufacture of porcelain. There is also the china-stone, which is raised in great quantities near St. Austell, and forms a principal ingredient in the manufactures of the Staffordshire potteries. A great variety of fish frequent the coasts of this county. Its pilchard and mackerel fisheries are especially valuable, and absorb a large amount of capital. Manf. Unimportant. Pop. about 356,000.—This county was not subdued till the time of Athelstan, when the Saxons asserted their superiority over it. The Cornish, which is a dialect of the Celtic, has only become extinct within the present century. The Scilly Islands lie about 36 miles W. by S. of the Land's End, and are supposed to have been formerly connected with Cornwall. The intermediate and surrounding rocks are innumerable, and Druidical antiquities abound. In May, 1859, the Albert Viaduct, crossing the Tamar at Saltash, connected this county with Devonshire by railway. (See BRUNEL.)

CORNWALL, CAPE, on the W. coast of Cornwall. Lat. 50° 10′ N. Lon. 5° 55′ W.

CORNWALL, NEW, a county of British N. America. It is situate in Columbia, on the Pacific Ocean, between New Hanover and New Norfolk. Pop. Unascertained, being mostly Indians.

CORNWALL, a township of Orange county, New York, U.S., beautifully situate on the Hudson, 48 miles from New York. Pop. about 5,000. The United States Military Academy of West Point is here.—There are other townships, with small populations, of this name in the United States.

CORNWALLIS, korn-wal'-lis, a county of Lower Canada, lying on the S. side of the St. Lawrence, between Devonshire and the district of Gaspé. Pop. Unascertained.—Also a town of Nova Scotia, 50 miles from Halifax.—An island in British N. America, in the Arctic Ocean. Lat. 65° N. Lon. 95° W.—Another in the S. Atlantic. Lat. 61° S. Lon. 54° W.

CORNWALLIS, Charles, marquis of, entered the army at a very early age, and in 1758 was made a captain in the light infantry. Three years afterwards, he was aide-de-camp to the marquis of Granby, whom he accompanied in Germany till the end of the war. In 1761 he was promoted to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and the year following, succeeded, on the death of his father, to the title of Earl Cornwallis. On the breaking out of the American war, he was ordered to embark for that country, where he displayed great military talents, highly distinguishing himself at the battle of Brandywine and the reduction of Charlestown. He won the battles of Camden and Guildford, but in 1781 was forced to surrender at York Town to the united American and French army, in consequence, he declared, of the inefficient support he received from Sir Henry Clinton. Soon after this he returned to England. In 1786, the affairs of British India wearing a critical aspect, he was appointed governor of Bengal, where, in December, 1790, he took Bangalore. This success he followed up by defeating Tippoo Saib, who delivered to his lordship his two sons as hostages. Having successfully brought this war to a close, he returned to England, was created a marquis, and appointed master-general of the ordnance. In 1798 he was made lord-lieutenant of Ireland, where he quelled an insurrection, defeated an invading French force, and succeeded in effecting the important measure of a union between the two kingdoms. In 1801 his lord-lieutenancy expired, when he was employed as minister plenipotentiary in France; in which capacity he signed the preliminary treaty of the peace of Amiens. In 1804 he accepted the governor-generalship of India, where, soon after his arrival, he fell ill of a fever, on his march to join the army at Ghazepore, in the province of Benares. B. 1731; D. 1805.—Napoleon had a high opinion of the abilities and honesty of Cornwallis.—See, in Beeton's series, "The Life of Napoleon Bonaparte," by J. S. C. Abbott.

CORO, kor'-o, a seaport-town of S. America, in the province of Venezuela, of which it was once the capital. It is built in a sandy plain, near the Gulf of Maracaybo, 150 miles from Valencia. The inhabitants carry on some trade in mules, goats, hides, sheep-skins, cheese, &c. Pop. 4,000.

COROMANDEL COAST, kor'-o-măn'-del, a long line of seacoast on the W. side of the Bay of Bengal, extending from Point Calimere as far north as Gondegam. It does not possess a good harbour in its whole extent. The cities of Madras, Pondicherry, and Tranquebar are on its coast. Lat. between 10° 17′ and 15° 20′ N. Lon. between 79° 56′ and 80° 10′ E.

CORONA, ko-ro'-na, a village of Northern Italy, 13 miles from Verona.—In its neighbourhood, in January, 1797, a battle was fought between the French and Austrians.

CORONATA, ko-ro-na'-ta, an island in the Adriatic, 20 miles from Zara. Ext. 15 miles long, and 1 broad. It belongs to Dalmatia. Pop. Unascertained, and chiefly employed in agriculture, fishing, and trading in oil and wine.

CORONATION GULF, kor'-o-nai'-shun, lies to the W. of Victoria Land, in the Arctic Ocean, British North America. Lat. 68° 30′ N. Lon. 110° W.

CORPUS CHRISTI BAY, kor'-pus kris'-ti, a lagoon in Texas, N. America, separated from the Gulf of Mexico by the island of Mustang. Lat. 27° 30′ N. Lon. 98° W. It receives, at its W. end, the river Nueces.

CORREGGIO, kor-redj'-e-o, a town of Northern Italy, 10 miles from Modena. It has a citadel and several churches. Pop. 5,000.—Here, Antonio Allegri, better known by the name of Correggio, was born, in 1494.

CORREGGIO, a celebrated Italian painter, whose real name was Antonio Allegri, but called Correggio from having been born in the above town. His life is shrouded in obscurity. The little that is known of him seems to be rather the offspring of conjecture, eked out with imaginary probabilities, than facts obtained as the result of ascertained data. It is not known by whom he was instructed in his art; but Bianchi, Bartolotto, Lombardi, his uncle Lorenzo, and Mantegna, have all been named as his teachers. We believe that he was mostly self-taught, seeing that he seems never to have lived at Rome. His manner, however, combines grandeur of design with sweetness and gracefulness of execution. It is said he married, in 1520, a lady of a Mantuan family, whose name was Girolama Merlini. She is the original in the picture of his Holy Family, "La Zingarella." None have excelled him in the delicacy of his flesh-colouring; and his "Penitent Magdalen" is affirmed to be the most exquisite female figure ever painted. Four of his best pictures are in the National Gallery of Great Britain:—"Mercury instructing Cupid in the presence of Venus," an "Ecce Homo," "La Vierge au Panier," and "Christ's Agony in the Garden." The two first, in 1834, were purchased by the British government from the marquis of Londonderry for £10,000. B. at Correggio, 1494; D. 1534; and was buried in the church of St. Francis, at Correggio.

CORRÈZE, kor-raiz', a department of France, which comprises the S. or lower division of the former province of Limousin. Area, 2,300 square miles. Desc. Undulating; but the soil is far from productive, many of the inhabitants living on chestnut flour. Rivers. The Dordogne, Vezère, and Corrèze. Minerals. Iron, coal, copper, and lead. Large quantities of timber are grown. Manf. Muskets at Tulle. Pop. 322,000. Lat. between 44° 55′ and 45° 40′ N.

CORRIB LOCH, kor'-rib lok, a lake in Connaught, Ireland, 3 miles from Galway. Ext. 27 miles long, with a varying breadth of from 1 to 6 miles. It has numerous islets.

CORRIENTES, kor'-re-ain'-tais, a town of S. America, the capital of a department of the same name, at the junction of the Parana and Paraguay. Pop. 5,000. Lat. 27° 27′ S. Lon. 58° 25′ W.—The DEPARTMENT has an estimated area of 20,000 square miles, with a varied surface, fertile in maize, sugar, cotton, indigo, tobacco, and a kind of silk. Pop. about 40,000. Lat. between 27° and 30° S. Lon. between 57° and 59° W.—Several capes in Mexico, Cuba, and New Granada.—A river of Buenos Ayres, which falls into the Plata.

CORSHAM, kor'-sham, a town of Wilts, 4 miles from Chippenham. Pop. 3,200.—It is a station on the Great Western Railway.

CORSICA, kor'-se-ka, an island in the Mediterranean, between the coast of Genoa and the island of Sardinia. Ext. 120 miles long, with a varying breadth up to 45. Area, 4,300 square miles. Desc. Covered with mountains, especially in the centre, and culminating in Monte Rotondo, which attains an elevation of upwards of 9,000 feet above the level of the sea. It is watered by a number of streams and rivulets, which filter through a stony soil but little cultivated. Pro. Corn, excellent wine, oranges, lemons, figs, and other fruits; but the wealth of the island lies in its oil, chestnuts, timber, and live stock, which is the principal branch of industry. Minerals. Silver, copper, lead, iron, saltpetre, and alum; but the mines are little wrought. Manf. Coarse woollens, leather, and hardwares. The silk raised is used by the Genoese for the manufacture of their damasks and velvets, as also by the French at Lyons. The fisheries on the coast are productive. Pop. 240,000, mostly of Italian descent. Lat. between 41° 20′ and 43° N. Lon. between 8° 30′ and 9° 30′ E.—This island has been successively occupied by the Carthaginians, Romans, Goths, Saracens, Franks, the Popes, Pisans, and Genoese; and lastly by the French, in whose possession it now remains, and to whom it was ceded by the Genoese in 1768. In Ajaccio, its principal town, Napoleon I. was born. (See AJACCIO.)

CORSICO, kor'-se-ko, a town of Lombardy, 5 miles from Milan, celebrated as the depôt for the Parmesan or Grana cheese made in the provinces of Pavia and Milan.

CORSOER, or KORSOR, kor'-sor, a town of Denmark, 52 miles from Copenhagen, with a strong castle and good harbour. Pop. 1,800.—It has communication by railway with Copenhagen.

CORSTORPHINE, kor'-tor-feen, a village and parish of Scotland, 4 miles from Edinburgh, where there was once a famous sulphur spring. Pop. 1,500.

CORT, Henry, kort, of Gosport, invented the process by which pig-iron was converted into malleable iron by the flame of pit-coal in the puddling furnace. Before his time, English ironmasters were compelled to employ charcoal for fuel. Having got pig-iron into a malleable condition, he further invented a process for drawing it into bars by means of grooved rollers. In other words, he reduced the labour and cost of producing iron to one-twentieth of what they were before his day, and the iron was of a better quality. In perfecting these inventions, Cort expended a fortune of upwards of £20,000, yet was robbed of the fruits of his discoveries by the villany of an official in a high department of government, and, both cheated and persecuted, he was ultimately allowed to starve, by the apathy and selfishness of an ungrateful country. In 1859 a public appeal for the benefit of his family was made, and, looking at the services he rendered to the iron trade and our iron constructions, there can be no hesitation in assigning to the name of Cort a place beside the illustrious names of Watt, Arkwright, and Wedgewood. Lived in the 18th century.

CORTE, kor'-tai, a town of Corsica, 30 miles from Bastia. Pop. 5,000. It is defended by a castle, and near it are quarries of marble and jasper.—This is the name of several small towns in Spain and Italy.

CORTES, kor'-tais, the name of several towns in Spain. —1. In Andalusia.—2. In Valencia.—3. In Navarre. None of them has a population above 3,300.

CORTES, Ferdinand, the conqueror of Mexico, a celebrated Spanish adventurer, whose family was respectable but not opulent. He was bred at Salamanca to the law, which he renounced to follow a soldier's life. The governor of Hispaniola was his relation; and Cortes, in 1504, went to St. Domingo, where he was appointed to several valuable posts. In 1511, he accompanied Velasquez in his expedition to Cuba, and displayed so much skill and bravery in the conquest of that island, that he was chosen to conduct a similar enterprise for the conquest of Mexico. Accordingly, in 1519, he set out on his expedition, and first landed at Tabasco, where, after several bloody battles, he compelled the natives to submit to the Spanish yoke. Thence he sailed to St. Juan de Ulva, in the Bay of Mexico, where Cortes was met by several messengers from the governors of the province. Assuming now the title of ambassador of the king of Castile, he insisted on having an audience with Montezuma, the emperor, and for that purpose gave out that he intended to march on the capital. In the mean time, he founded a settlement on the coast, to which was given the name of Vera Cruz, at the same time declaring himself independent of the governor of Cuba. For some time he had tried in vain to negotiate a friendly intercourse with Montezuma, and now, at the head of 500 Spaniards, indifferently armed, he marched up the country. After various events, on 7th July, 1520, he defeated the Mexicans in the great battle of Otumba, and finally succeeded in establishing himself in their capital. Meanwhile, a commission was sent from Spain to deprive him of his post; but this he contrived to elude, and afterwards obtained from Charles V. the appointment of governor of New Spain. His conduct to the natives was merciless in the extreme, and a new commission of inquiry arriving, he returned to his native country to vindicate his honour, in 1528. Having made his defence to the satisfaction of Charles, he was created marquis of the Valle de Oajaca, and obtained a large grant of land in New Spain, where he proceeded in 1530. After an absence of ten years, he returned, to be treated with cold civility by Charles, and with neglect by his ministers. Disgusted alike with king, court, and courtiers, he, after an unfortunate expedition to Algiers, in which he served as a volunteer, retired to a residence in the vicinity of Seville, and there passed the remainder of his days. D. at Medellin, a village of Estremadura, 1485; D. near Seville, 1547.—W. H. Prescott, the American historian, has written a full and interesting account of the "Conquest of Mexico." This history forms one of the series called "Beeton's Historian."

CORTLANDT, kort'-land, a county of New York, U.S. Area, 500 square miles. Desc. Fertile in the usual cereals, and containing iron and sulphur-springs. Pop. 26,000.

CORTONA, kor-to'-na, a fortified town of Tuscany, on a hill fronting the lake of Thrasymene, 50 miles from Florence. It is a place of great antiquity, and is, to a considerable extent, still encompassed by its walls, erected 3,000 years ago. It has a cathedral of the 10th century, and a castle built by the Medici. Its churches contain many valuable works of art, and it has a famous academy of sciences, which was founded in 1726. Pop. 5,000.

CORUNNA, ko-run'-na, a fortified seaport of Spain, on a peninsula at the entrance of the Bay of Betanzos, 30 miles from Lugo. Its chief objects of interest are the royal arsenal, and an ancient tower called after Hercules, and occupying a Roman foundation. The harbour is spacious and secure, being defended by Fort St. Diego on the E., and Fort San Antonio in the W. About 3 miles from the harbour is a lighthouse. Manf. Cordage, linen goods, canvas, hats, and cigars. Besides these are some shipbuilding-docks. Pop. 20,000. Lat. 43° 22′ N. Lon. 8° 22′ W.—Hence, in 1588, the Spanish Armada took its departure on its fatal enterprise; and here, on the heights of Elvina, in 1809, the British, under Sir John Moore, defeated the French, although the glory was dearly purchased by the loss of their general. Corunna has, during the summer, regular steam communication with Southampton.

CORYAT, Thomas, kor'-i-ăt, an English traveller, who called himself the "Odcombian leg-stretcher." He was the son of the rector of Odcombe, and in 1611 published an account of his travels on the continent, with the singular title of "Coryat's Crudities." In the following year, he set out again with a design of spending ten years in the East. He rambled through Greece, Turkey, Syria, Egypt, and Persia, and died at Surat, in 1617. B. at Odcombe rectory, in 1577.—"Coryat's Crudities" is now a rare book, and fetches, whenever it is sold, a very high price.

CORYBANTES, kor-i-ban'-tees, the priests of Cybele, who, in the celebration of their festivals, beat their cymbals, and behaved as if delirious. First inhabiting Mount Ida, they thence passed into Crete, and were charged with the care of the infant Jupiter.

CORYVREKAN, kor'-i-vrek'-an, a dangerous vortex, or whirlpool, on the W. coast of Scotland, between the isle of Scarba and the N. point of Jura. Its vortex extends above a mile in circuit, and, at full tides, its numerous eddies form watery pyramids, which rise to a great height in the air.—It takes its name from a young Danish prince who perished in it.

COS, or STANCHIO, kos, an island of Asiatic Turkey, in ancient times celebrated for a temple dedicated to Æsculapius. Ext. 20 miles long, by 5 broad. Desc. Fertile, with a delightful climate. Pro. Silk, cottons, wines, fruit, and corn. Pop. Unascertained; perhaps 4,000.—The birthplace of Apelles and Hippocrates.

COSENZA, ko-sen'-za, a city of Naples, the capital of Calabria Citra, situate at the foot of the Apennines, 30 miles from Rossano. The streets are generally narrow, slanting, and ill built. It is surrounded by walls, and has a castle now converted into a barracks, and standing at the confluence of the rivers Busento and Crati. Manf. Cutlery and earthenware. It has a trade in rice, silk, and fruit. Pop. 9,000.

COSHOCTON, ko-shok'-ton, a county of Ohio, U.S. Area, 646 square miles. Pop. 26,000.

COSLIN, or KOSLIN, kos'-slin, a well-built town of Prussia, in Pomerania, on the Nesebach, 6 miles from the Baltic. Manf. Silks, hosiery, and leather. Pop. 8,300.—Here is a monument to the Pomeranians who fell in the war of 1813, '14, and '15. The town was burned in 1718, but was rebuilt by Frederick William I., to whom there is a statue in the market-place.

COSMO I. II. and III. (See MEDICIS.)

COSNE, kone, a town of France, on the Loire, 28 miles from Nièvre. Manf. Iron goods, hardware, and cutlery. Pop. 6,500.

COSSACKS, kos'-saks, the name of a warlike people, who inhabit the Ukraine, or the countries bordering on Russia, Tartary, the north of Turkey, Mongolia, and China. They are subjected to Russia, but are governed by their own laws, and have usages peculiar to themselves. They form the irregular troops of Russia, and, in times of war, it is estimated they can supply that power with a force of nearly 100,000 men. Their settlements in European Russia are calculated to occupy an area of 100,000 square miles, and their population is about 900,000. This is exclusive of the Ukraine Cossacks, who are mostly settled. The others comprised in this estimate are the Don Cossacks, the Black-Sea Cossacks, the Asovien and the Ural Cossacks. These form a military cordon of the empire of the Czar, extending from the Black Sea nearly to the Sea of Okhotsk.

COSSE BRISSAC, Charles de, kos brees'-sak, a celebrated French marshal, who successfully commanded the French army in Flanders and Piedmont, under Francis I., Henry II., and Charles IX. He acquired so high a reputation, that nobles and princes came to him to learn the art of war. B. 1505; D. 1563.

COSSEIR, or KOSSEIR, kos-sair', a seaport of Egypt, on the W. coast of the Red Sea, by which the communication between that country and Arabia is chiefly maintained. Caravans from Kous and Keneh, travelling through a mountainous and desolate country, bring corn and other productions of Egypt, to be here exchanged chiefly for the coffee of Mocha. It is defended by a citadel. Pop. 2,000. Lat. 26° 8′ N. Lon. 34° 8′ E.

COSSIMBAZAR, kos'-sim-ba-zar', a town of British India, in the province of Bengal, situate on the Bhagirathi river. It has been long celebrated for its silk and carpet manufactures, and derives a considerable profit from cotton stockings, which are knit by the women and children of the vicinity. Pop. about 4,000. Lat. 24° 10′ N. Lon. 88° 15′ E.

COSSYAH HILLS, kos-si'-ya, in Further India, lie between Assam and Sylhet, on the N. and S., and the Garrow country on the W. and E. Area, 730 square miles. Pop. 12,000. Lat. between 25° and 26° 7′ N. Lon. between 90° 52′ and 92° 11′ E.

COSTAMOUNI, or KASTAMOUNI, kos'-ta-moo'-ne, a town of Asia Minor, on the Kara-su, 114 miles from Angora. It has numerous mosques and public baths. Manf. Printed cottons, copper goods, and a trade in wool. Pop. 13,000, nearly all Turks.—This place has an elevation of nearly 2,400 feet above the level of the sea.

COSTA RICA, kos'-ta re'-ka, the most S. state of Central America, bounded on the N.E. by the Gulf of Mexico, S.W. by the Pacific Ocean, N.W. by Nicaragua, and S.E. by Veragua. Area, 16,250 square miles. Desc. Mountainous and volcanic, with extensive forests, although many parts present large barren tracts. Pro. Coffee, which is the staple; tobacco, sugar, cocoa, sarsaparilla, wild indigo, and dye-woods. Minerals. Gold and silver. Pop. 150,000, of whom 10,000 are Indians. Lat. between 9° and 11° 40′ N. Lon. between 83° and 85° W.—This state forms a free and independent republic, with a representative government and a supreme chief for the executive.

COSTIGLIONI, kos'-teel-ye-o'-ne, two towns of the Sardinian states, Piedmont.—1. In the division of Alessandria, 8 miles from Asti. Pop. 5,300.—2. In the division of Coni, 6 miles from Saluzzo. Pop. 3,000.

COSTON, kos'-ton, two parishes of England, one in Leicestershire and another in Norfolk. Neither has a population above 1,700.

COSWAY, Richard, R.A., kos'-wai, a distinguished painter, who, by his skill in miniatures, rose to the highest rank in his profession. He took immense sums, and was patronized by the prince of Wales, afterwards George IV., and all the leading members of the aristocracy. He married Maria Hadfield, a lady also of considerable artistic talent, and who, after his death, retired to Lodi, on the continent, where she kept an educational establishment, and acquired great respect in the neighbourhood. Cosway lived in the greatest splendour throughout his career, and was, in 1771, elected a member of the Royal Academy. B. at Tiverton, in 1740; D. 1821.

CÔTE D'OR, kote dor, a department of France, which comprehends the N. part of Burgundy, and is inclosed by the departments of Aube, Yonne, Saône-and-Loire, Jura, Haute Saône, and Haute Marne. Area, 3,380 square miles. Desc. Fertile, and largely covered with wood. Rivers. The Seine, Seraine, Armançon, the Aube, and the Saône. The Burgundy Canal traverses the department. Pro. The usual cerealia and fruit, especially the grape, the extensive cultivation of which makes this one of the most important departments of France. Minerals. Iron, coal, gypsum, marble, and lithographic stones. Manf. Jewellery, cloth, paper, pottery, iron goods, cottons, and chemicals. Pop. 400,300. Lat. between 48° 55′ and 48° 10′ N. Lon. between 4° 2′ and 5° 29′ E.

CÔTE ST. ANDRÉ, kote andrai, a town of France, in the department of the Isère, 20 miles from Vienne. Pop. 4,500.—In its neighbourhood is produced the celebrated liqueur called Eaux de la Côte.

COTENTIN, ko-ten'-til, a district of France, in the old province of Normandy. It forms a peninsula, stretching into the English Channel, in the department of Manche, and having, at its extremity, Cape la Hague.

COTES, Francis, R.A., kotes, one of the originators of the Royal Academy of London, and distinguished as a drawer of portraits in crayons. In oil-painting he was regarded by many as superior to Reynolds. His most celebrated works are a full-length portrait of the queen of George III., with the princess royal in her lap, and the beautiful daughter of Wilton the sculptor. D. in London, in 1725; D. 1770.

CÔTES DU NORD, kots doo nor', a maritime department of France, so called from its geographical position, as it comprehends the northern part of the ancient province of Brittany. Area, about 2,800 square miles. Desc. Mountainous in general, but productive in corn, hemp, and flax; and cattle-rearing and horse-breeding are carried on to a large extent. Rivers. The Rance, Arguenon, Gouet, Trieux, and Oust. Minerals. Iron, lead, and copper. Manf. Woollen and linen goods, and sailcloth. Pop. 650,000. Lat. between 48° 3′ and 48° 57′ N. Lon. between 1° 53′ and 3° 35′ W.

COTIGNAC, ko-teen'-yak, a town of France, in the department of the Var, 16 miles from Draguignan, with a trade in leather, silk, and wines. Pop. 3,500.

COTOPAXI, ko'-to-pax'-e, a volcanic mountain of the Andes of Quito, 36 miles to the S.E. of the city of Quito. It is 18,875 feet above the level of the sea. With the exception of a section round its summit, of 4,400 feet, the upper part of the mountain is covered with snow.

COTRONE, or CROTONA, ko-tro'-na, a seaport of Naples, in Calabria Ultra, 6 miles from Cape Nau. It is surrounded by walls, and defended by a strong citadel. Pop. 4,600.—In ancient times this place was celebrated as the school of Pythagoras.

COTSWOLD HILLS, kots'-wolde, are in the county of Gloucester, extending 30 miles in length, and about 20 in breadth, and separating the basins of the Thames and the Severn. Highest part near Cheltenham, 1,134 feet.

COTTA, kot'-ta, a village of Ceylon, 6 miles from Colombo, formerly one of the capitals of the kings of Ceylon.

COTTBUS, or KOTTBUS, kot'-boos, a town of Prussia, 42 miles from Frankfort. It has a royal palace and a college. Manf. Woollen cloths, hosiery, and tobacco. Pop. 9,000.

COTYTTO, ko-tit'-to, the goddess of all debauchery, whose festivals were celebrated by the ancients during the night.

COUDRE, koo'-der, an island of Canada, 55 miles from Quebec. Ext. 6 miles long and 3 broad. Desc. Fertile. Pop. 400.

COULOMB, Charles Augustin de, koo'-lomb, a French mathematician, who, in 1779, produced a treatise on the "Theory of Simple Machines," which gained the prize of the Academy. He is regarded as the founder of experimental physics in France, and is the inventor of the Torsini balance. There are few to whom the theory of electricity is so much indebted as to this philosopher. B. at Angoulême, 1736; D. 1806.

COURBEVOIR, koorb-vwaw', a town of France, in the department of the Seine, 6 miles from Paris. Manf. Spirituous liquors and white lead. Pop. 6,100. A station on the Paris and Versailles Railway.

COURLAND, or KURLAND, koor'-land, a government of European Russia, separated on the N.E. from Livonia by the Dwina, and bounded on other sides by the Baltic and the governments of Wilna and Witepsk. Area, 10,860 square miles. Desc. Undulating, with a fertile soil, but in many portions interspersed with swamps. Rivers. The Aa, Buller, Dwina, and Windau. Lakes. Numerous. Forests. Abundant; consisting of oak and fir, and covering two fifths of the country. Pro. Corn, flax, hemp, tobacco, and fruits. The live stock are generally of inferior breeds, and the pasturage being scarce, not many are raised. Manf. Paper, copper wares; and there are some distilleries and tile-factories. Pop. 555,000, mostly Protestants. Lat. between 56° and 58° N. Lon. between 21° and 27° E.—In 1795, this country was incorporated with Russia.

COURTALLUM, koort-al'-lum, a town of British India, in the territory of Travancore, 350 miles from Madras. Pop. Unascertained.—It stands in a fertile district, yielding sago, date-palms, arrowroot, nutmeg, cinnamon, and having an indigenous flora of upwards of 2,000 species.

COURTEN, William, koor'-ten, an ingenious English naturalist, whose collections were purchased for £20,000, and added to the British Museum. B. in London 1612; D. 1702.

COURTRAI, or COURTRAL, koor-trai', a fortified town of Belgium, on the Lys, which divides it into two parts, 26 miles from Ghent. Its public edifices are a cathedral, a town-hall, and a public library. Manf. Linen, woollen, cottons, and lace. Pop. 20,000.—Here, in 1302, the battle of the "Spurs," in which the Flemings defeated the French, was fought. On the field, after the fight, 700 gilt spurs were gathered, and hung up as a trophy in the church of the convent of Groenangen, now destroyed. In 1793, this town was taken by the French, and made capital of the department of Lys.

COUSIN, Jean, koo'-zā, an eminent French painter, sculptor, and geometrician. At the courts of Henry II., Francis II., Charles IX., and Henry IV., he was the principal favourite, and is the first French artist who excelled as an historical painter. His most celebrated picture is "The Last Judgment," now in the Louvre. His greatest work in sculpture is the monument of Admiral Chabot in the church of the Celestines. His book on geometry was published in 1560. B. at Soucy, near Sens, about 1500; D. about 1590.

COUSIN, Victor, a distinguished French inquirer into the systems of mental philosophy, and lecturer on philosophy at the Faculté des Lettres, in Paris. The original idea upon which his own system is based is, that every system is true, but incomplete in itself; but when all systems are united, and suitably, as it were, dovetailed together, a complete system would be obtained. After various vicissitudes, incident to the political changes in France, he became, under Louis Philippe, a councillor of state, an officer of the Legion of Honour, and a peer of France. B. at Paris, 1792.—Cousin wrote largely on educational as well as philosophical subjects, and translated the works of Plato, in thirteen volumes.

COUTANCES, koo-tance', a town of France, in the department of Manche, 40 miles from Cherbourg. It contains several fine churches, particularly a Gothic cathedral; a college, public library, and a theatre. Manf. Linens, woollens, lace, and parchment. Pop. 8,200.

COUTTS, Angela Georgina Burdett, koots, a lady possessed of great riches, and the daughter of Sir Francis Burdett, who, for many years, represented Westminster, as a Reformer, in parliament. Her grandfather, Mr. Coutts the banker, having, at a late period of life, married Miss Mellon, an actress, bequeathed to the latter his very large fortune, which acted as a temptation to the duke of St. Albans to marry her. The duchess dying in 1834, without issue, left to Miss Burdett her immense wealth, estimated at £2,500,000, on the condition that she would assume the name and arms of the Coutts family. This she accordingly did, and devoted her life to charitable purposes generally, and the promotion of the English church especially. B. 1814.—Her great wealth attracted many admirers, among whom were named the duke of Norfolk's eldest son and Prince Louis Bonaparte, afterwards Napoleon III.

COUVINS, koo'-vā, a town of Belgium, 14 miles from Charlemont, celebrated for its steam-machinery and the manufacture of cables. Pop. 2,000.

COUZA, Prince. (See MOLDAVIA and WALLACHIA.)

COVADUNGA, ko'-va-doon'-ga, a small town of the Asturias, Spain, 30 miles from Oviedo. This place is famous in Spanish history, as being the locality where, in 718, Pelayo, king of the Goths, defeated, with immense slaughter, the army of the Moors. This victory delivered this portion of Spain from the dominion of the Saracens, and from it may date the birth of the kingdoms of Asturias, Castile, and Navarre.

COVE OF CORK, or QUEENSTOWN, kove, a town of Ireland, in the county of Cork, and 10 miles from the city of that name. It is a handsome town, built in the form of terraces, with magnificent quays, and all conveniences for ships. Pop. 12,000.—COVE ISLAND is in Cork Harbour, and is well fortified and protected by batteries. It has an area of 13,000 acres, and is connected by bridges with the mainland.

COVENTRY, kov'-en-tre, a city of England, the capital of Warwickshire, 18 miles from Birmingham. It was formerly inclosed by walls, and many of its houses have still an antique appearance. Its public buildings are St. Michael's Church, a beautiful specimen of the English or Pointed style of architecture; and Trinity Church, having, as the other has, a lofty spire, but of inferior beauty; various charitable institutions, hospitals and almshouses, a free school, founded in the reign of Henry VIII.; St. Mary's Hall, a gaol, barracks, and theatre. Manf. Watches, ribbons, and silken fabrics. Pop. 37,000.—Coventry is a place of great antiquity. Frequent parliaments were convened within its walls by the ancient monarchs of England, some of whom occasionally resided in it. It was the favourite residence of Edward, the Black Prince; and Queen Elizabeth took great delight in seeing "the game of Hock Tuesday" performed in it. This pageant represented the destruction of the Danes by the English, in 1002. For pageants, however, the people of Coventry were always distinguished; and, to this day, the procession of Lady Godiva is to be seen at the annual great fair in the Friday of Trinity week. The story of its origin is this. Leofric, earl of Mercia, and lord of this place, had laid heavy taxes on the citizens, and would not remit them, even at the entreaty of his wife, the Lady Godiva, who was as beautiful as she was modest, but on condition of her riding naked through the city, which he thought she would never submit to. She, however, determined to do so; and, on the occasion, all the doors and windows were shut, and Camden says that nobody looked after her. The tradition, however, is, that a tailor would needs be peeping, and that he was thereupon struck blind. He is commemorated in an effigy protruding from a window in the High-street, and is called "Peeping Tom of Coventry."

COVENTRY, the name of several townships in N. America, none of them with a population exceeding 4,000.

COVERDALE, Miles, kuv'-er-dail, a distinguished reforming English divine, who, in 1532, united with William Tyndale in translating the Scriptures. In 1551 he became bishop of Exeter. B. in Yorkshire, 1487; D. in London, 1568.

COWAL, or COWALL, kow'-al, a district of Scotland, in Argyleshire. It lies between Loch Fine on the W., and the Firth of Clyde and Loch Long on the E. Pop. 9,000.—It has several lochs and villages.

COWBRIDGE, or PONT-VRAU, kow'-bridj, a town of Wales, 12 miles from Cardiff. Pop. 1,100.

COWES, WEST, kous, a town of the Isle of Wight, on the Medina, with a safe and commodious harbour, 11 miles from Portsmouth. Its streets, towards the sea, are narrow; but the buildings, rising above one another on the brow of a hill, command delightful views, and have a picturesque effect. At an angle called Egypt Point, is a battery, built by Henry VIII. It is much frequented in summer as a bathing-place. Pop. about 5,000.

COWES, EAST, a hamlet of the Isle of Wight, directly opposite to West Cowes, and 4 miles from Newport. Pop. 1,000.—Osborne House, the marine residence of Queen Victoria, is near this place.

COWLEY, Abraham, kow'-le, an English poet, educated at Westminster school. After passing through various vicissitudes on account of his loyalty to the Stuart dynasty, he, on the death of Cromwell, obtained a lease of a farm at Chertsey, valued at about £300 a year. Early in life, however, he produced a small volume of poems, called "Poetical Blossoms," which gained him a considerable reputation. Dr. Johnson places him at the head of those whom he calls metaphysical poets; but though he is sometimes sublime, always moral, and frequently witty, yet he is both tedious and affected. His Anacreontics are reckoned the best. He also wrote a comedy called "Cutter of Colman Street," and some pieces in prose, particularly a "Discourse on the Government of Cromwell," and a "Proposition for the Advancement of Experimental Philosophy." B. in London, 1618; D. at Chertsey, 1667, and was buried in Westminster Abbey, where there is a monument to his memory.

COWLEY, Mrs. Hannah, a poetess, whose effusions are perhaps more remarkable for their affectation than their merit. She wrote three narrative poems, called "The Scottish Village," "The Siege of Acre," and "The Maid of Aragon." For these, however, her name is not here preserved, but on account of her "Belle's Stratagem," and "A Bold Stroke for a Husband," which are her two best comedies, of the nine which she wrote. B. at Tiverton, 1743; D. at Tiverton, 1809.—Her maiden name was Parkhouse, and her husband a captain in the service of the East-India Company.

COWLEY, Henry Richard Wellesley, Lord, many years British ambassador at Paris and other courts, was the son of the first Lord Cowley, better known as Sir Henry Wellesley. At an early age, he entered the diplomatic service, and in 1852 succeeded the marquis of Normanby at the Tuileries. In conjunction with Lord Clarendon, he represented England at the congress of Paris, held in 1856. B. 1804.

COWLEY, the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 800.

COWPER, William, kow'-per, and sometimes pronounced koo'-per, a celebrated English poet, was the son of Dr. Cowper, chaplain to George II., rector of Berkhamstead, in Hertfordshire, and nephew to Lord-Chancellor Cowper. Being designed for the law, he, after finishing his education, was placed under an eminent attorney, and, at the age of 31, was nominated a clerk in the House of Lords. A constitutional timidity of disposition, however, prevented him from accepting it. He was next appointed clerk of the journals, a situation which, it was supposed, would require no personal attendance; but when he found that it would be requisite for the clerk to appear at the bar of the house, it had such an effect on his nerves, that he was obliged to resign the office. A morbid melancholy now seized him, and it was found necessary to place him under the care of Dr. Cotton, at St. Albans, where he gradually recovered the use of his faculties. In 1765 he settled at Huntingdon, where he formed an acquaintance with a clergyman of the name of Unwin, in whose family he became an inmate. That gentleman being killed by a fall from his horse, in 1767, Cowper and Mrs. Unwin took up their abode at Olney, Buckinghamshire, where they contracted an intimacy with Mr. Newton, then curate of that parish, and where Cowper devoted himself to poetry. To a collection of hymns published by that gentleman, Cowper contributed sixty-eight. In 1782 he published a volume of his poems, which did not excite much attention; but another volume, in 1785, stamped his reputation as a true poet. His "Task," "The Sofa," "John Gilpin," and other productions, will immediately occur to the reader's mind as works of enduring excellence. He afterwards engaged in translating Homer into Miltonic verse; and though his version is not so pleasing as that of Pope, it renders the original with greater fidelity. In 1786 he removed, with Mrs. Unwin, to Weston, Northamptonshire, where he continued to cultivate his literary tastes. In 1791 George III. granted him a pension of £300 per annum; but the royal bounty yielded pleasure only to his friends; for he was now sunk into a state of complete dejection, from which he never wholly recovered. B. at Berkhamstead, 1731; D. at Dereham, in Norfolk, 1800; and was buried in the parish church, where a monument is erected to his memory.

COX, David, kox, a distinguished water-colour artist, who unwearyedly devoted himself to the study of Nature under her ever-varying aspects, and reaped his reward in the general admiration which was awarded to his pictures. Although the opinion prevailed that they were merely rough sketches, being mostly executed on coarse paper, yet they exhibit a breadth and poetical embodiment, which stamp them with the mark of genius, and as the offspring of a highly vigorous and observing mind. He was one of the earliest members of the Society of Painters in Water-colours, and in the gallery of that society, in London, his pictures were almost exclusively shown. B. at Birmingham, 1793; D. at Harborne, near Birmingham, 1859.

COZBI, koz'-bi, 'a liar,' a princess of Moab and seducer of the Israelites, through the wicked counsel of Balaam.

COZUMEL, koz'-u-mel, an island of Central America, near the E. coast of Yucatan. Ext. 24 miles long, and 7 broad. Lat. 16° 56′ N. Lon. 87° 58′ W.

CRABBE, Reverend George, krăb, an English poet, who rose, from very humble circumstances, to hold the rectory of Trowbridge, in Wiltshire. He was educated for the medical profession; but being unsuccessful, applied to Burke, the great statesman, for poetical patronage. The politician took him under his protection, and advanced his fortunes by opening a path for his preferment in the church. His principal poems are "The Library," "The Village," which was revised by Dr. Johnson; "The Newspaper," "The Parish Register," and the "Tales of the Hall," for which Mr. Murray, the publisher, gave him £3,000, with the remaining copyright of his previous poems. B. at Aldborough, in Suffolk, 1754; D. 1832.—The poetry of Crabbe is remarkable for its individuality, and the minuteness with which every picture is painted. Of the higher quality of invention he had none. He could paint what he beheld with pathos, vigour, and originality, although the colours which he sometimes uses have a tendency to repel, rather than invite, readers of delicacy and taste to the contemplation of his pages.

CRACOW, kra'-ko, a city of Poland, now comprised in the Austrian empire, and situate at the confluence of the Vistula and Rudowa, 155 miles from Warsaw. It has every appearance of falling rapidly to decay. The streets are crooked, the pavements wretched, and the houses, though massive and spacious, old, and, in many cases, in a state of dilapidation. In its cathedral are the tombs of the most distinguished Polish kings, and the crown jewels were formerly deposited in it. Besides the cathedral, there is a castle, university, a botanical garden, an observatory, and a library. It is connected by railway with Vienna, Berlin, and Warsaw. Pop. about 50,000.—A tumulus to the memory of Kosciusko, with a height of 120 feet, stands at about 2 miles from the city.—The republic of CRACOW, of which the above city was the capital, embraced an area of 450 square miles, with a population of about 142,000. After an insurrection, in 1846, it was incorporated with Austria.

CRADOCK, krăd'-ok, a district in S. Africa, lying to the E. of Cape Colony. Area, 3,168 square miles. Desc. Undulating and fertile in some parts, but barren in others. It is watered by the Great Fish, Tarka, and Brakke rivers. Pop. 7,000.

CRAIK, George Lillie, kraik, a Scotch littérateur, who, in 1824, went to London, and when the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge commenced its labours, wrote for it a work called "The Pursuit of Knowledge under Difficulties." This brought him into notice, and he became a large contributor, in history and biography, to the "Penny Encyclopædia." In 1839 he assumed the editorship of the "Pictorial History of England," to which he contributed several of its most important chapters. These were subsequently published in an independent form, under the titles of "The History of British Commerce," and "The History of Literature and Learning in England." He also published a work on "Spenser and his Poetry," and in 1849 became professor of history and English literature in Queen's College, Belfast. Besides the above works, he produced the "Romance of the Peerage," "Outlines of the History of the English Language," and has been a large contributor to periodical publications. B. in Fifeshire, 1799.

CRAIL, krail, a royal burgh and parish of Fifeshire, Scotland, at the N. entrance of the Firth of Forth, 10 miles from St. Andrews. It consists of two parallel streets, now falling into decay. Pop. of parish, 1,900; of town, 1,250. On the E. of the harbour are the remains of a castle, at which King David I. frequently resided. Its church is of great antiquity.

CRANACH, Lucas, kra'-nak, one of the most eminent of the old German painters, called after the place of his birth, but whose family name was Sunder. He produced a great many works, which are to be seen chiefly in Upper Saxony. He excelled in portraits and altar-pieces, the principal of these last being the "Crucifixion," in the church of Weimar. He was court painter to three electors of Saxony, Frederick the Wise, John the Constant, and John Frederick the Magnanimous. He was also the friend of Luther, and is said to have been the means of bringing about the marriage of the great reformer with Catharine Bora. B. at Cranach, near Bamberg, in 1172; D. at Weimar, in 1553.

CRANBORNE, krăn'-born, a parish and ancient town of Dorsetshire, 11 miles from Salisbury. Pop. nearly 3,000.—CRANBORNE CHASE is in the neighbourhood, and still abounds with deer.

CRANBROOK, krăn'-brook, a town of Kent, 13 miles from Maidstone. Manf. Principally woollens. Pop. 4,300.

CRANMER, Thomas, krăn'-mer, archbishop of Canterbury, whose opinion on the question of the divorce of Henry VIII. recommended him to that monarch, and whose first service, after his appointment, was to pronounce the divorce between the king and Catharine. He zealously furthered the Reformation, and by his means the Bible was translated and read in churches. On the death of Henry, he was named in the will of that monarch one of the regency of the kingdom, and as Edward VI. was brought up chiefly under his care, the Reformation, under this youthful sovereign, assumed a consistent form. The liturgy, homilies, and articles of religion were now framed, and in all of these, Cranmer had a principal hand. On the accession of Mary, he was condemned, first for treason, and pardoned; but a charge of heresy being afterwards brought against him, he was sent to the Tower, whence, with Ridley and Latimer, he was removed to Oxford, to hold a public disputation. The fate of these men seems, without doubt, to have been already determined. The archbishop was tried by the pope's commissioners, and convicted, when, after enduring great hardships for upwards of three years, he was, at length, induced to sign his abjuration of the Protestant faith, on the promise of life. For having committed this act, however, he was struck with deep remorse, and when brought into St. Mary's Church, Oxford, to read his recantation in public, he, instead of complying, besought God's forgiveness for the apostasy of which he had been guilty, and exhorted the people against the errors of Rome. This greatly enraged his adversaries, who, denouncing him as a hypocrite and heretic, dragged him to the stake, opposite Baliol College. Here he endured the terrible fiery trial with patience and fortitude, holding his hand in the flame, and often exclaiming, "This unworthy hand!" B. at Aslacton, in Nottinghamshire, 1489; burned at Oxford, 1555.

CRAONE, kra'-one, a town of France, in the department of Aisne, 12 miles from Laon. Pop. 1,000.—Here, in 1814, Napoleon I. routed the Prussians.

CRASSUS, M. Licinius, krăs'-sus, surnamed the "rich," a distinguished Roman, who decisively defeated Spartacus, who, at the head of the gladiators, had for some time defied the power of Rome. Afterwards, he formed one of the triumvirate with Cæsar and Pompey, and had the province of Syria allotted to him. Attempting to possess himself of Parthia, he was defeated by Surena, the Parthian general, who, subsequently, treacherously got possession of his person, and put him to death, 53 B.C.

CRATERUS, krăt'-e-rus, one of Alexander the Great's generals, conspicuous for his literary abilities as well as for his valour. He received as his share of Alexander's kingdom, Greece and Epirus, and wrote the history of his great commander. Killed in a battle against Eumenes, 321 B.C.

CRATES, krat'-tes, a philosopher of Bœotia, remarkable for his eccentricities. In the summer he would clothe himself as warm as possible, but in the winter his garments were uncommonly thin. B. 324 B.C.

CRATHIE AND BRAEMAR, krat'-thie, a united parish in Aberdeenshire, Scotland, in which are the mountains Ben Macduhi, Ben-na-buird, and Cairn-Toul, and Lochnagar. It is intersected by the Dee, and was covered by the ancient Caledonian forest. Pop. 2,000.

CRATHIS, krat'-this, a river in Magna Græcia, distinguished for giving a yellow colour to the hair and beard of those who drank its waters.

CRATINUS, krä-ti'-nus, a satirical poet of Athens, who wrote twenty-one plays, and invented or improved comic poetry. D. 431 B.C.

CRAVEN, krat'-ven, a county of North Carolina, U.S. Area, 980 square miles. Pop. 15,000, of whom nearly a half are slaves.

CRAWFORD, kraw'-ford, the name of several counties in the United States, with populations varying between 7,000 and 38,000. They are in the following states: Georgia, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Missouri, and Arkansas.

CREBILLON, Prosper Joliot de, kre-bee'-yawng, a French dramatic poet, who studied for the law, but, being attached to theatrical representations, became a dramatic writer. His first popular performance was "Atreus," which was followed by his "Electra" and "Rhadamistus." He next produced some tragedies, which procured for him the name of the French Æschylus. For many years he retired into seclusion. B. at Dijon, 1674; D. in Paris, 1762.—By order of Louis XV. a monument was erected to his memory in the church of St. Gervois. His works have been published in 12 vols. 4to.—His son, Claude Prosper Joliot de Crebillon, was also a man of letters, and wrote several esteemed novels, the principal of which is entitled, "Les Egaremens du Cœur et de l'Esprit." B. 1707; D. 1771.

CRECY, or CRESSY, kres'-se, the name of several unimportant towns and villages of France, the most notable of which is a village in the department of Somme, 10 miles from Abbeville, famous for a great victory obtained over the French, under Philip of Valois, by Edward III. of England, August 26th, 1346. In this battle fell the king of Bohemia, the count of Flanders, 8 other sovereign princes, 80 bannerets, 1,200 knights, 1,500 gentlemen, 4,000 men-at-arms, with the duke of Alençon and the flower of the French nobility. The English army was drawn up in three lines; the first commanded by Edward, prince of Wales, assisted by the earls of Warwick and Oxford; the second line led by the earls of Arundel and Northampton; the third, or body of reserve, ranged along the summit of a hill, under the command of the king in person, attended by the lords Mowbray, Mortimer, and others.

CREDITON, kred'-i-ton, a town of Devonshire, near the confluence of the Crede with the Exe, 8 miles from Exeter. Pop. 6,000.

CREFELD, kref'-elt, a town of Rhenish Prussia, 12 miles from Dusseldorf. This is the principal place in Prussia for the manufacture of silk goods. Pop. 24,000.

CREMA, krat'-ma, a town of Lombardy, on the Serio, 20 miles from Cremona. It is the see of a bishop, and has a splendid cathedral, besides other churches and religious houses. Manf. Silk and lace. Pop. 8,800.

CREMNITZ, or KREMNITZ, krem'-nitz, the oldest mining town in Hungary, in the county of Barsch, amidst lofty mountains, 18 miles from Schemnitz. The castle, built on an eminence, is encompassed with a double wall and several bastions. This town is famous for its mines of gold and silver, which are of great value, and have attached to them large smelting and washing works. Pop. 5,000.

CREMONA, krai-mo'-na, a fortified city of Lombardy, the capital of the Cremona delegation, 48 miles from Milan. It has a vast number of churches, chapels, convents, and an obscure university. The cathedral is a massive structure, and the tower of Cremona is very curious, consisting of two octagonal obelisks, surmounted by a cross, and 372 feet in height. The Corso is very fine, and much resorted to. Manf. Silk, porcelain, and chemicals. It has, besides, been long noted for its superior violins. Pop. about 30,000.—This city is of great antiquity, having been created a Roman colony in B.C. 291.—The DELEGATION is inclosed by Oglio, Lodi, Bergamo, and the Po. Area, 453 geographical square miles. Desc. Fertile in corn, rice, flax, and wine. Pop. 205,000.

CREON, kre'-on, king of Corinth, promised his daughter Glauce to Jason, who thereupon repudiated Medea. Medea, in revenge, presented Glauce with a gown covered with poison. Upon wearing it, she expired in the greatest torments. Creon and his family shared the fate of Glauce, whose sufferings will be found vividly depicted in the "Medea" of Euripides.

CRESCENS, kres'-senz, 'growing,' a friend of the apostle Paul.

CRESCENTINO, kres'-en-te'-no, a town of Piedmont, on the Po, 20 miles from Turin. Manf. Silk and woollens. Pop. 6,000.

CREST, LE, krest, a town of France, on the Drôme, 45 miles from Grenoble. Manf. Woollen and silk fabrics. Pop. 5,500.

CRESWICK, Thomas, R.A., kres'-wik, an eminent English landscape-painter, who produced a great many "Scenes," "Spots," "Shades," and "Streams," redolent of poetic beauty. In 1843 he became an associate in the Royal Academy, and, in 1847, exhibited his two greatest works, entitled "England," and "The London Road a Hundred Years ago." He is one of the greatest of England's favourites in landscape representation. B. at Sheffield, 1811.

CREUSA, or GLAUCE, kre-u'-sa. (See CREON.)

CREUSE, kroose, a central department of France, comprising portions of the old provinces of the Limosin, Auvergne, and Berry. Area, 2,244 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, and in many parts barren, the rearing of live stock being the chief branch of rural industry. Minerals. Coal and salt. Pop. 288,000.

CREWE, kroo, a town of Cheshire, 3½ miles from Liverpool. Pop. 400.—A station and railway depôt on the London and North-Western Railway.

CRICHTON, James, kri'-ton, a celebrated Scotchman, of whom so many wonderful things are related as to have procured him the name of the "Admirable Crichton." He was educated at St. Andrews, and, at the age of 20, visited Paris. Here he acquired great reputation not only as a disputant, but for his skill and activity in games of all sorts, as well as martial exercises. He next went to Rome, and displayed his talents in the presence of the pope and cardinals. Thence he travelled to Venice, where he became intimate with the learned Aldus Minutius, who dedicated to him the Paradoxes of Cicero, in a strain of panegyric which borders on the ridiculous. At Padua he held disputations with the most learned professors on a number of subjects, but particularly on the Aristotelian philosophy. At Mantua he slew a famous fencing-master in a duel. The duke of Mantua admired him so much, as to appoint him tutor to his son, a licentious young man, by whom, it is said, he was assassinated in the public streets, during the carnival. B. in Perthshire, 1550; assassinated, 1583.

CRICKLADE, krik'-laid, a town of Wiltshire, on the Thames, 85 miles from London. Pop. 2,000.—The Thames is navigable to this town.

CRIEFF, kreef, a town and parish in Perthshire, on the Earn, 15 miles from Perth. Manf. Linen, paper, and leather. Pop. of town, 3,824.—The town is built at the base of a part of the Grampian mountains.

CRIFFEL, krif'-fel, a mountain of Scotland, in the stewartry of Kirkcudbright, near the mouth of the river Nith. Height, 1,892 feet.

CRIMEA, kri-me'-a, a peninsula of European Russia, in the S. of the government of Taurida, formed by the Black Sea on the W. and S., the Straits of Caffa and the Sea of Azov on the E., and on the N. connected with Russia by the isthmus of Perekop. Ext. 190 miles long, with a breadth of about 110. Area, 8,600 square miles. Desc. The centre and west portion consists of a vast steppe, covered mostly with swamps and salt marshes, unfertile in the extreme, but, upon the plains, affording pasturage to large flocks of broad-tailed sheep. In the S. there are numerous valleys of great fertility, exhibiting a constant succession of beautiful fields, forests, and meadows. Here the mountains slope towards the steppes on the N. Their highest point is Tchatir-dagh, which is 5,000 feet above the level of the sea. Rivers. The Alma, Salghir, and Karasu. Climate. Unequal and variable; sometimes severe in the winter, and at others not so. The temperature of summer is occasionally as high as 100° Fahrenheit in the shade. The spring is the most genial and healthy season, and the autumn the most unhealthy. Forests. Considerable, and furnishing pine, ash, oak, elm, and poplar. Zoology. The wild animals are the wolf, fox, fallow-deer, roebuck, and hare. Among birds may be noticed the Alpine vulture, numerous kites and hawks, which are trained to falconry by the Tartars. The domestic animals are the camel, dromedary, horse, ox, and sheep. Fish are abundant, both in the rivers and along the coasts. Pop. 200,000, more than two thirds of whom are Tartars, and the remainder Russians, Germans, and Greeks. Lat. between 42° 20' and 46° 10' N. Lon. between 32° 40' and 36° 30' E.—This country was, at one time, considered the granary of Greece, especially of Athens; and Demosthenes speaks of it in his oration against Leptines. Towards the end of the 11th century, the Genoese settled in it, but were expelled by the Tartars in 1474. In 1783 the Russians took possession of the country, and the following year it was ceded to them by the Turks; but its peaceable possession was not secured to them till 1791. The Crimea now forms the greater part of the Russian government Taurida, and was, in 1854, invaded by the Anglo-French army. This was followed by the battle of the Alma, and the siege of Sebastopol, one of the most memorable military events on record. From an account published in 1859, by the intendant of the Russian army in the Crimea during that war, it appears that the Russian troops, at its commencement, amounted to 250,000 men, with 100,000 horses, and those of all the troops for whom the intendance had to furnish provisions in the Crimea during 1855, were 845,000 men, with 187,360 horses; and for 1856, 796,973 men, with 183,570 horses. The intendance had to contend with immense difficulties, the price of cattle, provender, and all kinds of necessaries, having increased five-fold, and oftentimes more than ten-fold, particularly from the middle of 1855 until January, 1856. (See ALMA, BALACLAVA, INKERMANN, &c.; also RAGLAN, CANROBERT, &c.)

CRISPUS, kris'-pus, 'curled,' the ruler of the Jews' synagogue at Corinth, who embraced Christianity.

CROATIA, kro-ai'-she-a, a province of the Austrian empire, consisting of two divisions, Croatia proper and Upper Sclavonia. It is bounded E. by Sclavonia and Bosnia, S. by Dalmatia, and W. by the Adriatic. Area, 7,000 square miles. Desc. Traversed by a range of mountains, ranging between 3,500 and 5,000 feet high, and especially barren in the S. In the north there are tracts of the greatest fertility, where the vine is cultivated, and where silk, and the fruits common in the south of Europe, are raised with success; but cattle-rearing is the principal rural occupation of the inhabitants. Minerals. Iron, copper, lead, and coal. Rivers. The Save and the Drave. Pop. 900,000. Lat. between 44° 5' and 46° 25' N. Lon. between 14° 20' and 17° 25' E.—At the peace of Vienna, in 1809, the whole of this country lying to the south of the Save was ceded by Austria to France, and incorporated by Napoleon I. with the Illyrian provinces. At the congress of Vienna, however, in 1815, it was restored to its former possessor.

CROCE, ST., kro'-sai, the name of various unimportant towns in the Austrian empire, and in Italy.

CRŒSUS, kre'-sus, the last king of Lydia, of the race of the Mermnadæ, celebrated for his great riches. His court was the asylum of learning; and here were to be found Æsop and Solon. Showing, with pride, his treasures to the latter, that philosopher said, "Call no man happy before his death;" and, in truth, misfortune soon came upon the rich king. He was conquered by Cyrus, king of Persia, and placed on a burning pile, when, exclaiming "Solon, Solon," with great energy, his captor asked him the reason of such an exclamation. Crœsus then repeated the conversation he had had with Solon on human happiness. Cyrus, moved at the recollection of the instability of human affairs, ordered Crœsus to be taken from the burning pile, and became one of his most intimate friends. Mounted the throne, 559 B.C. The manner of his death is unknown.

Croft, kroft, the name of several parishes of England, with populations ranging between 200 and 1,000.

Croix, St., krwaw, the largest of the Virgin Islands, and the most important of the Danish possessions in the W. Indies. Area, 100 square miles. Pop. 26,000, of whom 19,000 are slaves.—The French sold this island to Denmark in 1733.

Croker, Right Honourable John Wilson, kro'-ker, was educated for the bar, and, in 1800, was entered a student at Lincolns Inn. He devoted much of his time, however, to literature and politics, displaying in the latter field strong Tory tendencies. In 1807 he became member of parliament for Downpatrick, in Ireland, and in 1809 secretary to the Admiralty. This post he held for twenty years, during which he sat as member in the house for various boroughs. Meanwhile he was almost continually engaged with his pen, and was a ready and versatile writer. His most extensive production is an edition of "Boswell's Life of Johnson," which Macaulay criticised with great severity in the "Edinburgh Review." He wrote besides, 'Stories from the History of England," and edited "The Suffolk Papers," "Walpole's Letters to Lord Hertford," and several other works. B. in Galway, Ireland, 1780; D. at Hampton, 1857.

Croly, Reverend George, kro'-ly, a modern poet and imaginative writer, as well as the rector of St. Stephen's, Walbrook, and St. Benet's, London. His principal effusions are "The Angel of the World;" a tragedy, entitled "Catiline;" a comedy, called "Pride shall have a Fall;" "Salathiel," a romance; and "Marston," with "Tales of the Great St. Bernard," both works of fiction. He has likewise written a "Life of Burke;" but it was as a popular preacher that his fame was most extended. B. at Dublin, 1780; D. in London 1860.

Cromarty, krom'-ar-te, a county of Scotland, formed of several detached portions of Ross-shire and Ardmeanach, or the "Black Isle," consisting of about 18 square miles. The boundaries of these districts are not well defined, and it is, therefore, difficult to determine the extent of each; but the whole county is said to have an area of 345 square miles. Desc. Fertile and cultivated in the E., but the interior and W. parts are almost uniformly wild and mountainous.

Cromarty, a seaport-town and parish in the above county, is situate on the peninsula between the firths of Cromarty and Murray, 20 miles from Inverness. It has a safe and commodious harbour, though but little commerce. Pop. of parish, 2,800; of town, 2,000.

Cromarty Firth, a bay lying between the county of Ross on the N. and W., and Cromarty and Ross on the S. and E. Ext. 18 miles long, with a varying breadth of from 3 to 5 miles.

Cromer, kro'-mer, a pretty seaport-town of England, on the N.E. coast of Norfolk, 20 miles from Norwich. From the encroachments of the sea on this coast, a considerable portion of it has been swept away by the waves. Pop. 1,400, mostly engaged in fishing.

Cromford, krom'-ford, a town of Derbyshire, on the Derwent, 2 miles from Matlock. Manf. Stockings and lace. Pop. 1,200.—Here Sir Richard Arkwright erected his first cotton-spinning mill.

Cromwell, Oliver, krom'-well, the great Protector, came of a good family on both sides, and after passing about a year at Cambridge, was removed to Lincolns Inn, with the view of prosecuting his studies for the bar. It has been said that he was much addicted to low pleasures and gaming in his youth; but when we find him, in his 21st year, marrying the daughter of Sir John Bouchier, and spoken of by religious men as a professor of religion, we are inclined to believe that he has been vilified by malice, rather than spoken of with justice. In 1628 he was elected member of parliament for Huntingdon, and, in the following year, distinguished himself by his zeal against the bishops. When the parliament was dissolved, he retired into the country, and took a grazing farm at St. Ives, where he became overseer of the parish, and a zealous member of the religious community with which he had connected himself. In 1636 Sir Thomas Stuart, his maternal uncle, died, leaving him property in the island of Ely worth £500 a year. To this place he now removed his family; but being disgusted with the measures of the government, he in 1637 actually took a passage for himself and family in a ship lying in the Thames, and bound for New England, in America. This vessel was detained by proclamation; but if she had been suffered to proceed on her voyage, the head of Charles I. would have, perhaps, never been forfeited to his country; England would never have been a commonwealth, nor Oliver Cromwell a protector. In 1640 he was returned to parliament for Cambridge, and, by this time, had become a popular leader, being called "Lord of the Fens," for having defended a portion of the fen country of Cambridgeshire from being wrested from the people by the grasping hands of certain proprietors who had been draining them for themselves. In 1642, when parliament determined upon hostilities, he went to Cambridge, where he raised a troop of horse, and which he himself so ably commanded, that he soon acquired the rank of colonel, and a great reputation for military skill and valour. His men were well disciplined, and, under his leadership, at the battle of Marston Moor, in 1644, acquired the name of "Ironsides." At Stamford, and in the second battle of Newbury, Cromwell greatly distinguished himself, and received from his party the title of "Saviour of the nation." This party consisted of the Independents, who had gained so great an influence in parliament as to pass the famous self-denying ordinance, by which all members of either house were excluded from commands in the army. From this, however, Cromwell, on account of his value to the cause, was excepted; a stroke of policy which preserved his ascendancy in the army, and paved the way for his future advancement. He was now made lieutenant-general, and by his conduct in 1645, the battle of Naseby, which decided the fate of the royalists, was won. This victory was followed by a series of successes, for which he was voted a pension of £2,500 per annum, and the thanks of the House. When the king was handed over by the Scotch to the parliament, Cromwell determined to get him into his own power. This he effected in 1647, by means of Cornet Joyce, a young and spirited soldier. He now obtained the chief command of the army, and at a conference at Windsor, which he himself opened with prayer, propounded the bold measure of punishing the king by a judicial sentence. Charles was now in the Isle of Wight, when Cromwell was called into the north against the Scots and into the west against the Welsh. Wherever he fought, success attended him, and returning to London, he purged the parliament house of its members, by means of his troopers, under the direction of Colonel Pride. In the January of 1649 the king's trial commenced. Cromwell was the third to sign the warrant for his execution, and the monarch suffered accordingly. Cromwell was now called into Ireland, where he took a terrible vengeance upon the inhabitants of Drogheda, Wexford, and several other places. In 1650 he returned to England, and was sent against the Scots, who had armed to restore Charles II. On September 3, 1650, he gained the battle of Dunbar; and that day twelvemonth he defeated Charles at Worcester. The sovereign power was now within his reach, and he did not hesitate to grasp it. Accordingly, on December 16, 1653, he was invested with the dignity of Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, in the court of Chancery. In this capacity, he vigorously directed the affairs of the kingdom, making the English flag, borne by men like Blake, respected wherever it was seen. In 1658, however, he became moody and suspicious. In the August of that year, his favourite daughter, Mrs. Claypole, died at Hampton Court. This event, with the publication of a pamphlet by Colonel Titus, entitled "Killing no Murder," tending to prove the assassination of a tyrant a public duty, produced a slow fever, from which he never rallied. He was, by order of his physician, removed to Whitehall for change of air; but nothing would avail him now. He died on the 3rd of September, 1658, the anniversary of his victories at Dunbar and Worcester, and a day which he was accustomed to consider especially fortunate to himself. B. in the town of Huntingdon, 1599.—His corpse was interred on the 25th of April, in Henry the Seventh's chapel, whence, at the Restoration, it was taken and exposed on, and afterwards buried under, the gallows at Tyburn. It is needless here to enter into the character of Cromwell. That he was one of the greatest statesmen and most valiant warriors England has produced, none will deny; and that he was as good, if not better, than most men would have been under the same circumstances, few will be inclined to dispute. Cromwell had six children; viz.—Richard, Henry, Bridget, Elizabeth, Mary, and Frances. Richard succeeded him in the protectorate; but when affairs turned, and he found his post no longer tenable, he resigned, and went abroad. D. at Cheshunt, in Hertfordshire, in 1712. Henry went to Ireland as lord-lieutenant, and bore a good character. D. in 1674. Bridget married first, Ireton, and afterwards Fleetwood. Elizabeth, his favourite daughter, married John Claypole, Esq., of Northamptonshire. Mary married Lord Faunconberg, and is supposed to have assisted in the restoration of Charles II. She died in 1712. Frances married first a grandson of the earl of Warwick, and secondly Sir John Russel of Cambridgeshire. Elizabeth, the wife of Cromwell, was a woman of strong mind, and a constant spur to her husband in the career of his ambition. She also governed her household with great address, and died in 1672.

CRONSTADT, or KRONSTAT, kron'-stat, a seaport and fortress of Russia, situate at the S.E. extremity of the island of Cotlin-Ostrof, in the Gulf of Finland, 20 miles from St. Petersburg. Some of the streets are tolerably regular, and the principal public buildings are the imperial hospital for sailors, the civil hospital, the barracks, and several churches. The harbour is very spacious, and consists of three divisions,—the Merchant's Harbour, the War Harbour, and the Man of War's Mole. The War Harbour is the principal station of the Russian fleet. Adjoining it are the docks for building and careening ships of war, faced with stone, and paved with granite. The Man of War's Mole is inclosed by a strong rampart of granite, built in the sea. Cronstadt is defended towards the sea by fortifications projecting into the water, and, towards the land, by ramparts and bastions. There are also batteries erected on several neighbouring islets in the channel between the island and the mainland. The principal exports are iron, flax, hemp, linseed, oil, and tar. Pop. about 2,500. Lat. 59° 59′ 26″ N. Lon. 29° 49′ 30″ E.—Cronstadt was founded in 1703, by Peter the Great. In 1855, the English fleet, commanded by Sir Charles Napier, proceeded to the Baltic, with the view of taking this place, or destroying its fortifications; but, either from the inadequacy of the means placed at his disposal, or from the great strength of the forts, no attempt was made upon them.

CRONSTADT, a trading town of Transylvania, on the river Farcas, 70 miles from Hermanstadt. Here are several Lutheran and Catholic churches, academies, a good public library, and the best paper-mill and book-printing establishment in Transylvania. Pop. 25,000.

CROOKED ISLANDS, krook'-ed, two islands of the Bahama group. Lat. of the middle of Crooked Island, 22° 30′ N. Lon. 74° W.

CROSBY, kros'-be, several parishes and townships in England, with populations ranging between 300 and 2,500.

CROSSEN, kros'-sen, a town of the Prussian states, 68 miles from Berlin. Manf. Hosiery, woollen cloths; and there are some tan-yards. Pop. 6,500.—In 1758, this place was taken by the Russians.

CROSTHWAITE, krosth'-wait, a parish of Cumberland, in which are the towns of Borrowdale and Keswick, with Lakes Thirlmere and Derwent. Pop. 5,300.

CROTCH, William, krotch, doctor of music, whose almost infant performances are said to have rivalled those of Mozart. In 1797, when only twenty-two, he was appointed musical professor at Oxford, and in 1822, principal of the Royal Academy of Music. He composed a large number of pieces, both for the pianoforte and the organ, besides an opera called "Palestine." B. at Norwich, 1775; D. at Taunton, Somersetshire, 1847.

CROTOY, LE, kro'-toi, a town of France, 10 miles from Abbeville, in the fortress of which Joan of Arc was confined.

CROXTON, krox'-ton, the name of several English parishes, none of them with a population above 1,000.

CROYDON, kroi'-don, a town and parish of Surrey. The church contains some elegant monuments of the 11 miles from London. It possesses many handsome villas, the residences of London merchants and others, archbishops of Canterbury, to whom the manor once belonged. In its neighbourhood is a large barracks. The summer assizes are held alternately here and at Guildford. Pop. 21,000.—A station on the London and Brighton Railway.

CROZET ISLANDS, kro'-set, a group in the South Indian Ocean. Lat. 46° 27′ S. Lon. 52° 14′ E.

CROZON, kro'-zawng, a trading town of France, in the department of Finisterre, 25 miles from Quimper. Pop. 9,000, mostly supported by fishing and navigation.

CRUDEN, kru'-den, a parish of Scotland, 20 miles from Aberdeen. Pop. 2,500.—In it was fought, in the 11th century, a battle between Canute, afterwards king of England, and Malcolm II. of Scotland.

CRUDEN, Alexander, a laborious compiler, who, in 1728, went from Aberdeen to London, and settled there as a bookseller. In 1737 he published his "Concordance to the Bible," a book of great merit. D. 1774.—He was a very pious man, but at times deranged in his mind.

CRUIKSHANK, George, krook'-shănk, the son of an artist, and an artist himself. He devoted his time mostly to the humorous or political illustration of works. His "Comic Almanac" he published, with unflagging originality of design, for about twelve years; and some of the fictions of Mr. Charles Dickens were accompanied with sketches from his pencil. Subsequently, he published "The Bottle," a series of eight drawings, showing the progressive effects of intemperance upon a family; and then became a professional painter in oil. In this path he exhibited, among other pictures, "Tam O'Shanter," "Titania and Bottom, the Weaver," and "Disturbing the Congregation," which was purchased by Prince Albert. His excellence, however, lay in comic etchings for woodcuts. B. in London, 1795.

CRUZ, SANTA, krooz, one of the Caribbee islands, in the W. Indies. Ext. 24 miles in length, and 9 in breadth. Desc. In a high state of cultivation, and producing excellent sugar. Pop. 3,000 whites and 30,000 slaves. Lat. 17° N. Lon. 65° W.—This is a Danish possession; but, in 1643, was first occupied by the Dutch.

CTESIBIUS, te-sib'-e-us, a mathematician of Alexandria, the inventor of the pump and other hydraulic instruments, also of a clepsydra, or water-clock. Lived in the 2nd century B.C.

CTESIPHON, tes'-i-fon, an Athenian, who counselled his fellow-citizens to present Demosthenes with a golden crown for his probity and virtue. Lived in the 4th century B.C.

CUBA, kw'-ba, the largest of the West Indian islands, situate at the entrance of the Gulf of Mexico. Ext. 764 miles in length, with a varying breadth of from 74 to 130. Area, including its dependent islands, about 33,000 square miles. Desc. A chain of mountains extends from E. to W. along the whole length of the island, and divides it into two parts. In the S.E. these attain an elevation of about 6,900 feet above the level of the sea. Great fertility, however, exists in the valleys, and the sides of many parts of the mountains are covered with dense forests. Rivers. None large. Zoology. The huita, a kind of rat, is the only indigenous quadruped; but amphibious reptiles, as the alligator, tortoise, and serpents, abound. Birds are numerous, and rich in their plumage; whilst the rivers and coasts are well supplied with fish. Pro. Ginger, long pepper, and other spices in abundance; aloes, mastic, cassia, manioc, maize, cocoa, potatoes, yams, and bananas. Tobacco grows to great perfection; also sugar, coffee, cotton, and indigo. In the plains large flocks of cattle are reared. Minerals. Iron, copper, which abounds; coal, and limestone. Pop. about 1,000,000, of whom about a fifth are whites, and the rest free coloured and slaves, divided nearly into equal proportions. Lat. between 19° 50′ and 23° 9′ N. Lon. between 74° 8′ and 84° 58′ W.—Cuba was discovered by Columbus in the year 1492; but it did not submit to the jurisdiction of Spain till 1511. In 1762 Havana was captured by the British, but restored in the following year. In 1850 and 1851 a band of United States adventurers made piratical attempts upon Cuba; but they were repulsed, and their leader, Narasso Lopez, executed.

CUDDALORE, kud-da-lor', a town of the S. of India, in the province of the Carnatic, on the W. shore of Bengal Bay. Pop. Large, but unascertained. Lat. 11° 40′ N. Lon. 79° 50′ E.

CUDDAPAH, kud-da-pa', a town and fortress of Hindostan, and the capital of a district of the same name, 139 miles from Madras. Pop. included in the district. —The DISTRICT is in the presidency of Madras, and has an area of about 13,000 square miles. Desc. Fertile, producing fruit, wheat, rice, sugar, cotton, and tobacco. Minerals. Copper, lead, and iron. There used to be some diamond-mines worked; but they have been abandoned. Pop. 1,452,000. Lat. between 13° 12′ and 16° 19′ N. Lon. between 77° 52′ and 79° 40′ E.

CUDWORTH, Ralph, kud'-worth, a learned divine, who wrote upon "The True Intellectual System of the Universe," and whose attainments were of the highest order. His writings set men to think, and gave rise to much controversy. B. at Aller, Somersetshire, 1617; D. at Cambridge, 1688.

CUENCA, koo-ain'-ka, a city of Spain, in New Castile, the capital of the province of La Sierra de Cuenca, 84 miles from Madrid. It is the see of a bishop, and contains a cathedral, an episcopal palace, 13 parish churches, several monasteries, nunneries, colleges, and hospitals. The cathedral is in the Gothic style, and was founded in the 12th century, by Alphonso IX. Pop. 6,300.—The PROVINCE has an area of about 12,000 square miles, with a population of 253,000. It is mountainous, and watered by numerous streams falling into the river Jucar. Lat. between 39° 20′ and 40° 47′ N. Lon. between 1° 5′ and 3° W.

CUENCA, SANTA ANA DE, the capital of a province 85 miles from Quito. It stands in a wide plain, and has a trade in rural produce, confectionary, and cheese. Pop. 18,000.

CUEVA DE VERA, koo-ai'-va, a town of Spain, at the mouth of the river Almanzor, 40 miles from Almeria. Pop. 10,000. In its neighbourhood there are mines of silver.

CUIABA, ke-a'-ba, a river of Brazil, falling into the Paraguay in lat. 17° 50′ S.

CUIABA, or CUYABA, a town of Brazil, in the province of Mattogrosso. It has an active commerce in hides, gold-dust, and diamonds. Pop. 10,000. Lat. 15° 36′ S. Lon. 56° W.—The PROVINCE, of which this town is the capital, has a population of about 25,000, mostly engaged in mining and agricultural pursuits.

CULIACAN, koo-le-a'-kan, a town of the Mexican Confederation, situate in a fertile tract, 90 miles from Sinaloa. Pop. 8,000.

CULLEN, kul'-len, a seaport of Banffshire, Scotland, at the conflux of the small stream of Cullen with the Murray Firth, 12 miles from Banff. Manf. Yarn, linen, and damask cloths. Pop. 1,700.

CULLODEN-MUIR, kul-lod'-en, a wide heath in Scotland, 3 miles E. of Inverness, on which the duke of Cumberland gained a decisive victory over the Highlanders, in their attempt to replace the Stuart dynasty on the throne, in 1746.

CULPEPPER, Nicholas, kul'-pep-per, an English astrologer and herbalist. He was the son of a clergyman, and bred an apothecary, when he settled in Spitalfields, where he practised physic and astrology with great success. D. 1654.—He wrote several books, the most celebrated of which is a Herbal, wherein he describes the good and bad qualities of plants according to the sidereal influence.

CULPEPPER, a county of Virginia, U.S. Area, 672 square miles. Pop. 13,000, of whom a half are slaves.

CULROSS, kul'-ross, a parish and ancient town of Perthshire, on the N. shore of the Firth of Forth, 5 miles from Dunfermline. At the E. end are the ruins of St. Mungo's chapel, and near these the remains of a monastery, built in 1217 by Malcolm, earl of Fife. It has various charitable institutions and schools. At a small distance to the E. stands the abbey house, an ancient building. Manf. Damask-weaving. Pop. of parish, 1,500; of town, 700.

CUMA, or CUMÆ, kw'-ma, a city of Campania, near Puteoli. In a cave in its vicinity one of the sibyls, called the Cumæan sibyl, fixed her residence.

CUMANA, koo-ma'-na, a city of S. America, and capital of a province of the same name, in the government of the Caraccas. It is situate near the mouth of the Gulf of Cariaco, about a mile from the sea, on an arid and sandy plain. The town has no remarkable edifice, and the frequency of earthquakes forbids all embellishments. Pop. 8,000. Lat. 10° 37′ N. Lon. 64° 13′ W. The city has been frequently destroyed by earthquakes; the last of which happened in 1853.—The PROVINCE has an area of 370,000 square miles. Desc. Fertile in the plains and valleys. Pop. about 75,000.

CUMBERLAND, kum'-ber-land, a county of England, bounded N. by the Solway Firth and the river Liddle, which separate it from Scotland for 30 miles; W. by the Irish Sea; S. by Westmoreland and Lancashire; and E. by Northumberland and Durham. Area, 1,523 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, with fine valleys interspersed. Skiddaw attains an elevation of nearly 3,050 feet. Rivers. The Eden, Eamont, Derwent, Cocker, Caldew, Esk, Liddle, and Irthing. Lakes. Numerous; among which are Bassenthwaite, Borrowdale, Buttermere, Derwentwater, and Ullswater. Pro. Wheat, oats, turnips, and potatoes. A large portion of the county is devoted to grazing purposes, and the butter it produces is excellent. Minerals. Coal, lead, plumbago, blue slate, and limestone. Manf. Extensive; consisting chiefly of ginghams, calicoes, corduroys, and other cotton goods, sail-cloth, carpets, paper, pottery, and glass bottles. Pop. 20,000.

CUMBERLAND, the name of several counties in the United States, with populations ranging between 10,000 and 25,000. They are in the following states:—Maine, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Virginia, N. Carolina, Kentucky, and Illinois.—Also the name of several townships in the United States.—Also a county of E.

Australia, in which are the towns of Sydney, Richmond, and Windsor.

CUMBERLAND, William, duke of, second son of George II., who, in 1743, with his father, was present at the battle of Dettingen, where he was wounded in the leg. He, in 1745, commanded the British at the battle of Fontenoy, where they were defeated by the French, in consequence of not being properly supported by the Dutch. In 1746, at Culloden, he defeated Charles Stuart, and received the thanks of both houses of parliament. B. 1721; D. 1765. (See CULLODEN.)

CUMBERLAND, Richard, an English dramatic and miscellaneous writer, who was educated for the church, but became secretary to the Board of Trade, and, in 1780, was dispatched to Madrid, on a secret and confidential mission. In this office he considerably exceeded the expenditure allowed him; and subsequently, on a compensation allowance, retired to Tunbridge Wells, where he entirely devoted himself to literature. From this retreat he poured forth essays, operas, comedies, tragedies, poetry, novels, and pamphlets, on various subjects. It is as an essayist, however, that he is most favourably known; for, out of upwards of thirty dramas, there are almost none of them now remembered. B. at Cambridge, 1732; D. at Tunbridge, 1811.

CUMBERLAND ISLAND, an island near the coast of Georgia, in N. America, about 20 miles in circumference. Lat. 31° N. Lon. 81° 40′ W.

CUMBERLAND ISLANDS, near the N.E. coast of Australia. Lat. 20° 36′ S. Lon. 149° E.

CUMBERLAND MOUNTAINS, a ridge of the Alleghany Mountains, in Virginia, U.S.

CUMBERLAND RIVER, a river rising in Virginia, U.S., and, after a course of 450 miles, falling into the Ohio, 10 miles above the mouth of the Tenessee.

CUMBRAY, GREAT and LITTLE, kum′-brai, two small islands of Scotland, in the Firth of Clyde, 2 miles from Largs. Pop. 1,300.

CUMBRIA, kum′-bre-a, an ancient British principality, from which Cumberland, and many places in Clydesdale, Scotland, are derived.

CUMBRIAN MOUNTAINS, kum′-bre-an, occupy portions of the counties of Cumberland, Westmorland, and Lancashire.

CUMMING, John, D.D., kum′-ming, a Scottish divine, and minister of the Scotch Church in Crown Court, Covent Garden, London. He published a great many works on religious subjects, chiefly bearing on the fulfilment of the prophecies; and, as secretary to the Protestant Reformation Society, was frequently called upon to take a prominent part in questions of dispute between the Roman Catholics and the Protestants. B. in Aberdeenshire, 1810.

CUMNOCK, OLD, kum′-nok, a village and parish of Ayrshire, Scotland, where a large manufacture of snuff-boxes is carried on. Pop. 4,000.—2. NEW, a parish in Ayrshire, in which are both coal and lead mines. Pop. 3,000.

CUNAXA, ku-nax′-a, a town of Assyria, famous for a battle fought there between Artaxerxes and his brother CYRUS the Younger, 401 B.C., in which the latter was defeated. (See XENOPHON.)

CUNDINAMARCA, koon-de′-na-mar′-ka, the central department of New Granada, S. America, comprising several provinces of the region in the Andes, with portions of the valleys of the Cauca and Magdalena. Area, estimated at 350,000 square miles. Pop. Unascertained; but mostly consisting of mixed races and Indians.

CUNNINGHAM, Allan, kun′-ning-hăm, a Scottish peasant, who was put to the trade of a stonemason; but, in his leisure, applied himself to the cultivation of the homely Doric muse of his country, and rose to a considerable eminence as a lyric poet. In 1810 he went to London, where he eked out a subsistence by reporting for the newspapers and contributing to periodicals. He subsequently obtained the situation of manager of the extensive studio of Chantrey, which enabled him to pursue his literary tastes in accordance with his own sentiments, and without the usual hazards attending the precariousness of the profession of literature. Considering his education and occupation, his works may be viewed as both numerous and excellent. The principal of them are the novels of "Paul Jones," and "Sir Michael Scott;" "Songs of Scotland, with Critical and Historical Notes;" "Sir Marmaduke Maxwell," a drama; "The Lives of the most Eminent British Painters, Sculptors, and Architects;" "The Life of Burns," and "The Life of Wilkie." He was highly appreciated by Sir Walter Scott, much admired by Hogg, and affectionately esteemed by Chantrey, who bequeathed him £2,000, and an annuity of £100. B. in Dumfriesshire, 1785; D. in London, 1842.

CUNNINGHAM, Peter, the eldest son of Allan Cunningham, was educated at a private school, and entered the public service as a clerk in the Audit Office. In 1854 he was promoted to one of the chief clerkships, and gave to the world some of the fruits of his leisure hours. In 1833 he published a "Life of Drummond of Hawthornden;" and, in 1835, "Songs of England and Scotland." In 1841 a new edition of Campbell's "Specimens of the British Poets," and in 1849 a "Handbook of London." Besides these, he edited Johnson's "Lives of the Poets," Goldsmith's works, and contributed to "Fraser's Magazine," and several other periodicals, articles of light literature. B. in London, 1816.

CUPAR-ANGUS, kŭ′-par, a parish and town in Perth and Forfar, Scotland, on a small rivulet which falls into the Isla, 13 miles from Perth. Manf. Linen and leather. Pop. of parish, 3,000; of town, 2,000.

CUPAR-FIFE, the capital of Fifeshire, Scotland, 10 miles from St. Andrews. It is situate at the junction of the river Eden with the stream St. Mary, and consists of several streets, with a number of lanes and detached houses. It has a church, county-hall, and other public buildings, with reading-rooms. Manf. Linens; and there are spinning and fulling mills, tanneries, and breweries. Pop. of parish, 7,500; of town, about 6,000.

CUPIDO, ku-pi′-do, a celebrated deity among the ancients, the god of love, and love itself. There are different traditions concerning his parents, but the most celebrated represents him as a lively ingenious youth, the son of Jupiter and Venus. He is generally exhibited as a winged infant, naked, armed with a bow and a quiver full of arrows.

CURAÇOA, ku-ra-so′, an island in the Caribbean Sea, about 75 miles from the coast of the Caracas, with several good ports. Ext. 40 miles long, with a varying breadth of from 6 to 10 miles. Desc. Rocky coasts, with an undulating surface, producing indigo, tobacco, sugar, and maize. Pop. 17,000, of whom a third are slaves. Lat. 12° N. Lon. 69° W.—It belongs to the Dutch, and the liqueur called Curaçoa is made here.

CURETES, or CORYBANTES. (See CORYBANTES.)

CURIA, kŭ′-re-a, a division of the Roman tribes, each tribe being divided into 10 curiæ.

CURIATII, ku-re-ai′-she-i. (See HORATII.)

CURISCHE HAFF, koo′-re-she(r) haf, 'the Gulf or Bay of Courland,' an arm of the sea in East Prussia, which communicates with the Baltic. It extends along the coast for about 50 miles, and receives the Niemen.

CURIUS DENTATUS, Marcus Annius, kŭ′-ri-us den-tai′-tus, a Roman, celebrated for his bravery, fortitude, and frugality. He was victorious over various nations, and when the Samnites attempted to bribe him, he said, "I prefer my earthen pots to all your vessels of gold and silver, and my desire is to command those who are in possession of money, while I have none, but live in poverty." Lived in the 3rd century B.C.

CURRITUCK, kur′-re-tŭk, a county on the coast of Edenton district, North Carolina, U.S. Area, 200 square miles. Pop. 8,000, of whom a fourth are slaves.—The Dismal Swamp is in this county.

CURTIUS, M., kur′-she-us, a Roman youth, who devoted himself to the infernal gods for the safety of his country. A wide chasm having suddenly appeared in the Forum, the oracle had said that it would never close until Rome threw into it its most precious possession. Thereupon Curtius, arming himself, mounted his horse, and solemnly threw himself into the abyss, which instantly closed over his head, 360 B.C.

CURZOLA, koor-zo′-la, an island of Dalmatia, in the Adriatic, separated by a narrow strait from the peninsula of Sabioncello. Ext. 25 miles long, with an average breadth of 4. Desc. Nearly entirely covered with trees. Pro. Timber, corn, and fruits. Pop. 4,500. Lat. 43° 55′ N. Lon. 16° 46′ E.—Its capital is of the same name, and has a good harbour. Pop. 2,000.

CUSH, kush, 'black,' a son of Ham, and father of Nimrod.—A country, supposed to be Æthiopia, in Africa, or the modern Abyssinia.

CUSHAN, ku'-shăn, 'blackness,' the Arabian Æthiopia, including the country of Midian.

CUSHI, ku'-shi, 'black,' an officer in the army of David.—The chief of a Jewish family.—The father of the prophet Zephaniah.

CUSTRIN, or KUSTRIN, koos-treen', a fortified town of Prussia, in the province of Brandenburg, at the union of the Wartha with the Oder, 48 miles from Berlin. It is small, but has three spacious suburbs, and is situate in a marsh crossed by 36 bridges. Pop. 8,500.—In 1758 it was bombarded by the Russians, and in 1806 taken by the French. It has large grain and powder magazines.

CUTCH, kutch, an extensive native state of India, inclosed by Scinde on the N., the Guicowar dominions on the S., and by the Gulf of Cutch and the Indian Ocean on the S. and S.E. Area, inclusive of the Runn of Cutch, about 14,000 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, but containing numerous fertile level tracts, which, with the usual cerealia of India, produce cotton, sugar, grapes, and musk-lemons. The horse and camel are reared, and the minerals are iron, coal, and alum. Pop. 500,000. Lat. between 22° 47′ and 24° 40′ N. Lon. between 68° 26′ and 71° 45′ E.—The RUNN OF CUTCH is supposed to have been the bed of an inland sea, thrown up by an earthquake in 1819. During the monsoons it is still covered with water. Area, 7,000 square miles.

CUTCH-GUNDAVA, gun-da'-va, a province of Beloochistan. Area, 10,000 square miles. Desc. Flat, bare, and arid, from the heat of the climate. Pro. Cotton, sugar, pulse, madder, and fruits. Pop. 100,000. Lat. between 27° 40′ and 29° 50′ N. Lon. between 67° 21′ and 69° 15′ E.

CUTTACK, kut-tak', the capital of an extensive province of British India, 220 miles from Calcutta. It was formerly fortified, and contained a number of good houses and good bazars, but has now fallen to decay. Pop. 40,000.—The PROVINCE has an area of 7,635 square miles, and where it is bounded by the sea it is called the Orissa coast. Desc. Mountainous in the interior, but generally having a surface diversified by hill and dale. Pro. Cotton, rice, indigo, tobacco, poppy, and oil-seeds. Minerals. Iron ore. Manf. Cottons and fine muslins. Pop. 2,200,000, mostly Brahmins. Lat. between 19° 40′ and 21° 45′ N. Lon. between 85° 8′ and 87° 30′ E.

CUVIER, Georges-Christian-Leopold-Dagobert, Baron, koo'-ve-ai, a distinguished French naturalist, who, at the age of 21, became tutor to the only son of Count d'Héricy in Normandy, where, having a residence by the seacoast, he commenced the study of marine animals. In a short time he sent some papers to the Society of Natural History, and in 1795 received the appointment of assistant to Mertrud at Paris, in the Jardin des Plantes. Here he commenced his collection of comparative anatomy, and in 1796, when the National Institute was formed, became one of its first members. He now began a series of works illustrative of fossil remains, and in 1800 was appointed professor of natural philosophy at the College of France, but still continued to lecture on comparative anatomy at the Jardin des Plantes. In 1802 he was chosen by the first consul, Bonaparte, one of the inspectors-general to establish public schools in France, and became perpetual secretary to the Institute for the department of Natural Sciences. He now rose to the highest honours, and in 1814, just before the abdication of Napoleon I., was named a councillor of state, which appointment was confirmed by Louis XVIII. His next advancement was to the chancellorship of the university, which he held till his death. In 1819 he was created a baron; in 1826 Charles X. conferred on him the decoration of grand officer of the Legion of Honour; and in 1832 Louis Philippe created him a peer. B. at Montbéliard, 1769; D. at Paris, 1832.—Cuvier greatly advanced the natural sciences, the true object of which is, he declares, "to lead the human mind towards its destination,—a knowledge of truth." His works are very numerous, and, perhaps, his greatest is his "Theory of the Earth."

CUVIER, Frederic, was a younger brother of the above, and was also devoted to the pursuits of natural history. His most scientific work is "On the Teeth of Animals," published in 1822. B. at Montbéliard, 1773; D. at Strasburg, 1838.

CUXHAVEN, koox-ha'-fen, a seaport, 58 miles from Hamburg, to which it belongs, situate at the mouth of the Elbe. The harbour is large and commodious. Pop. 1,300.—It has some baths, and regular steam communication with England, and was of great importance to English commerce during the continental war.

CUYAHOGA, ke'-a-ho'-ga, a county in Ohio, U.S., on Lake Erie, at the mouth of Cuyahoga river. Area, 486 square miles. Pop. 50,000.—The river enters Lake Erie at Cleveland, after a course of 60 miles.

CUYP. (See KUYP.)

CUZCO, kooz'-ko, a city of Peru, capital of a department, and the ancient capital of the Peruvian empire, in S. America, 200 miles from Arequipa. The houses are almost all of stone, and there are a cathedral, several parish churches, convents, and hospitals. Manf. Cotton and woollen goods, leather, and embroidery. Pop. 45,000, mostly Indians.—According to tradition, this town was founded in 1043, by Manco Capac, the first inca of Peru. The grandeur and magnificence of the edifices, of the fortress, and of the Temple of the Sun, struck the Spaniards with astonishment in 1534, when the city was taken by Francis Pizarro. On a hill towards the north are yet seen the ruins of a fortress built by the incas, and which had a communication, by means of subterraneous passages, with three forts built in the walls of Cuzco. All the descendants of the incas resided in a particular quarter. —The DEPARTMENT has an area of nearly 5,000 square miles, and in the W. is mostly occupied by the Andes. Pop. 220,000. Lat. between 13° and 15° S. Lon. between 70° and 73° W.

CYBELE, sib'-e-le, a goddess, the daughter of Cœlus and Terra (heaven and earth), and wife of Saturn. She is generally represented as a robust woman, far advanced in pregnancy, to personify the fecundity of the earth; and is also seen with many breasts, to show that the earth gives aliments to all living creatures.

CYCLADES, sik'-la-dees, a name given to certain islands of the Ægean Sea, the principal of which were Ceos, Naxos, Andros, Paros, Melos, Seraphos, Gyarus, and Tenedos.

CYCLOPES, si-klo'-pees, giants, the sons of heaven and earth, having but one eye in the middle of the forehead; whence their name. Mythologists differ as to their number; Hesiod mentions three,—Arges, Brontes, and Steropes. Virgil adds a fourth,—Pyracmon. They inhabited the western parts of Sicily, and, from their vicinity to Mount Ætna, were supposed to be the workmen of Vulcan, and to have fabricated the thunderbolts of Jupiter. They were reckoned among the gods, and sacrifices were solemnly offered to them at Corinth. Apollo destroyed them all, because they had made the thunderbolts of Jupiter, with which his son Æsculapius had been killed.

CYNÆGIRUS, sin-e-ji'-rus, an Athenian, brother of the poet Æschylus. After the battle of Marathon, he pursued the flying Persians to their ships, and seized one of their vessels with his right hand, which was immediately cut off by the enemy. Upon this, he seized the vessel with his left hand; and when he had lost that also, retained his hold with his teeth.

CYNICI, sin'-i-ci, Cynics, a sect of philosophers, founded by Antisthenes the Athenian. They were famous for their contempt of riches, for negligence in their dress, and the length of their beards. Diogenes was one of their sect.

CYNTHUS, sin'-thus, a mountain of Delos, which appeared very lofty to the ancients. Apollo was surnamed Cynthius, and Diana, Cynthia, as they were said to have been born on it.

CYPRIAN, Thascius Cœcilius, sip'-ri-an, a learned father of the Latin church, who, in 246, embraced Christianity, on which he wrote his book "De Gratiâ Dei," addressed to Donatus. Persecuted and beheaded at Carthage, 258.—His works were edited by Bishop Fell, at Oxford, in 1682; and rendered into English by Dr. Marshal, in one vol. folio.

CYPRUS, si'-prus, an island of Asiatic Turkey, near the coast of Asia Minor, in the Mediterranean. Area, estimated at 4,500 square miles. Desc. Fertile, and nearly traversed from east to west by two lofty chains of mountains, having between them the valley of the Pedia and Mount Santa Croce, the ancient Olympus, 8,000 feet above the level of the sea. Pro. Corn, wine, fruits, cheese, cotton, wool, salt, madder, hemp, timber, and colocynth. The corn is of excellent quality; but wine is the staple product of the island. All the valuable kinds are white, the red being merely used as vin du pays. The apricots of Cyprus are delicious; many varieties of the gourd and pumpkin are also produced. Manf. Carpets, printed cottons, and leather are the principal. Pop. 150,000. Lat. 35° N. Lon. between 32° and 34° 40′ E.—Cyprus is thought to have obtained its name from Cyprus, one of its early kings, though others say it was derived from a certain fragrant tree or flower. It has been celebrated as the residence of Venus, surnamed Cypris, who was the chief deity of the island, and to whose service many places and temples were consecrated. The Greeks made themselves masters of it, and it was taken from them by the Romans. Since 1585 it has been subject to the Turks, it having been then taken from the Venetians. The inhabitants were exceedingly ingenious and industrious, though they were much given to pleasure and dissipation.

CYR, ST., seer, the name of a number of small towns and villages in France, with populations varying between 1,400 and 2,300.

CYRENAICI, sir′-e-nai′-i-si. (See ARISTIPPUS.)

CYRENÉ, si-re′-ne, a celebrated city of Libya, situate in a beautiful and fertile plain, about eleven miles from the Mediterranean Sea. It was the birthplace of many great men; among whom were Callimachus, Eratosthenes, Carneades, Aristippus, &c.

CYRENIUS, si-re′-ni-us, 'who governs,' a Roman governor of Syria.

CYRUS, si′-rus, king of Persia, son of Cambyses and Mandane, daughter of Astyages, king of the Medes. There are different accounts of his youth. He restored the independence of Persia, which had long been under the domination of the Medes, and caused himself to be proclaimed king about 560 B.C. In a short time he extended the limits of his empire, which soon became the greatest in Asia. He decisively defeated Crœsus, king of Lydia, invaded Assyria, and took Babylon, by turning the channel of the Euphrates. He afterwards, however, was beaten by the Scythians, taken prisoner, and put to death by their queen, 530 B.C.—Historians do not agree, however, as to the manner of his death. (See CRŒSUS.)

CYRUS, called the "Younger," was the youngest son of Darius Nothus, and brother of Artaxerxes, king of Persia. When the latter mounted the throne, he was made governor of Asia Minor. Desirous, however, of the supreme authority, he levied forces against his sovereign. A great battle was fought between the brothers at Cunaxa, 401 B.C., where Cyrus was defeated and himself slain by Artaxerxes. Cyrus had in his service Clearchus and Xenophon. (See XENOPHON.)

CYZICUS, siz′-i-kus, the chief town of Cyzicum, in the Propontis, built where that island or peninsula is joined by bridges to the continent. It derives its name from Cyzicus, who was killed there by Jason. The Athenians, under Alcibiades, defeated, near this place, the Lacedæmonians, 410 B.C.

CZASLAU, tsas′-lou, a town of Bohemia, the capital of a circle, 45 miles from Prague. Pop. 3,500. In May, 1742, the Austrians were here defeated by the Prussians under Frederick the Great.

CZERNOVITZ, or TSCHERNOWITZ, tchair′-no-vestz, a town of the Austrian empire, on the Pruth, 140 miles from Jassy. Its public buildings are a cathedral, gymnasium, and schools. Manf. Jewellery, hardwares, and carriages. Pop. 21,000.

CZORTKOW, chort′-koof, a town of Austrian Galicia, the capital of a circle, 103 miles from Lemberg. It contains a castle, and has a large tobacco-manufactory. Pop. 2,500.

D.

DABER, da′-ber, a fortified town of Prussia, standing in the midst of marshes, 19 miles from Stargard. Pop. 1,600.—Here the Knight Templars had once an establishment.

DAC, or DACH, John, dak, a German painter, who was employed by the emperor Rodolphus, and whose pieces are very excellent. B. at Cologne, in 1550; D. at Vienna, 1646.

DACCA, dak′-ka, an extensive and rich district of Bengal. Area, 1,960 square miles. Desc. It is intersected by the Ganges and Brahmapootra, two of the largest rivers in the world. These, with their various branches, form a complete inland navigation, extending to every part of the country; so that, every town having its river or canal, the general mode of travelling or conveying goods is by water. The entire district, however, is ill cultivated. Pro. Sugar, hemp, indigo, the betel-nut, and vegetables. Manf. Jewellery, soap, paper, woollens, hardware, and glass. Pop. about 600,000. Lat. between 23° 12′ and 24° 17′ N. Lon. between 90° 11′ and 90° 58′ E.

DACCA, the capital of the above district, is situate on the N. bank of a deep and broad river called the Boor Gunga, 100 miles from the sea, and 150 from Calcutta. The houses of the wealthy are built of brick, every vacant spot being filled with trees. Its public buildings are the churches of various denominations, mosques, temples, cemeteries, a gaol, a college, and a number of schools. Manf. Muslins, and shell bracelets, much worn by Hindoo women. Pop. Nearly 70,000. From the unhealthiness of the climate of this place, its cantonments were abandoned in 1852.

DACI and DACÆ, dai′-si, a warlike nation of Germany, beyond the Danube, whose country, called Dacia, now Moldavia, was conquered by the Romans under Trajan, after a war of fifteen years, A.D. 103.

DACIER, Andrew, da′-se-ai, a learned French scholar, who, in 1681, published, at Paris, an edition of Pompeius Festus, for the use of the dauphin. His translation of Horace appeared the same year; and, in 1691, his translation of the "Reflections of Marcus Antoninus," and the next year Aristotle's "Poetics." For his services to literature, he was appointed perpetual secretary to the Academy, rewarded with a pension of 2,000 livres, and made keeper of the cabinet of the Louvre. B. at Castres, 1651; D. 1722.—Besides the works above mentioned, he translated Plato into French; the "Lives" of Plutarch, the "Manual" of Epictetus, and several others.

DACIER, Anne, wife of the above, and daughter of Le Fèvre, professor of Greek at Saumur, received a liberal education. In 1674 she published an edition of Callimachus, and, in 1681, a translation of Anacreon and Sappho, which was followed by versions of some of Plautus's comedies, and of the "Plutus" and "Clouds" of Aristophanes. In 1683 she married M. Dacier, and, in 1711, produced her translation of the "Iliad." Three years after, appeared her version of the "Odyssey;" and this closed her literary labours. B. at Saumur, in 1654; D. 1720.—Madame Dacier was as remarkable for her modesty as her erudition. A learned German having paid her a visit, begged that she would write her name and a sentence in his book. She excused herself as long as she could; but being strongly importuned, she complied, and added to her signature the sentence from Sophocles, "Silence is the ornament of the female sex."

DADUR, da′-dur, a town of Beloochistan, 5 miles from the Bolan pass. Pop. 3,000.—This is accounted one of the hottest places in the world, and is celebrated as the locality where, in 1840, the British defeated a Kelat force.

DÆDALUS, de′-da-lus, an Athenian, son of Eupalamus, was the most ingenious artist of his age. To him we are supposed to be indebted for the invention of the wedge and many other mechanical instruments, as also the sails of ships. Having killed, from jealousy, his nephew Dalus, Dædalus, with his son Icarus, fled from Athens to Crete, where Minos gave him a cordial reception. Here he constructed a famous labyrinth for Minos, in which he himself and his son were subsequently confined; when he made for themselves wings of feathers and wax, and took their flight from Crete. The heat of the sun, however, melted the wax on the wings of Icarus, who flew too high, and he fell into that part of the ocean which, from him, has been called the Icarian Sea. The father alighted at Cumæ, in Italy, where he built a temple to Apollo, and thence directed his course to Sicily, where he was kindly received by Cocalus, who reigned over part of the country. He was ultimately put to death by Cocalus, who had been threatened with war by Minos. The flight of Dædalus from Crete, with wings, is explained by observing that he was the inventor of sails, which in his age might pass, at a distance, for wings.

DÆMON, or GENIUS, dē'-mon, a kind of spirit, which, according to the ancients, presided over the actions of mankind. Some of the ancient philosophers maintained that every man had two of these dæmons, the one bad, and the other good. The dæmon or genius, as described by Socrates, is very remarkable. It informed him of many particulars, and hindered him from the commission of all crimes and impiety. These dæmons received divine honour in process of time, and altars and statues were erected genio loci,—to the genius of the place.

DAGHESTAN, dă'-ges-tan', a province of Russia, on the W. coast of the Caspian Sea, between the efflux of the rivers Koisin and Rubas. It has the mountains of Caucasus and Georgia on the S.W., and the province of Kumiki on the N. Desc. Mountainous, intersected with numerous valleys. Pro. Grain, madder, hemp, and tobacco. Cattle-raising is carried on to a large extent. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. between 41° and 43° N. Lon. between 46° and 50° E.

DAGO, dă'-go, an island of Russia, near the Gulf of Finland, in the Baltic Sea. Ext. 34 miles long and 15 broad. Desc. Rocky, and in general possessed of a poor soil. Pop. 10,000.

DAGO, or DAGEN, an island, situate in the Baltic, at the entrance of the Gulf of Finland. Ext. About 35 miles long, and from 15 to 36 broad. Desc. Infertile and rocky. Pop. 10,000.

DAGOBERT I., dăg'-o-bair, king of France, was recognized as king of Austrasia in 622, and on the death of his father, Clotaire II., in 628, became possessed of Neustria, and in 631 of Aquitania, on the death of his brother Caribert. He subdued the Saxons, Gascons, and Bretons; but tarnished the splendour of his exploits by his cruel and dissolute habits. He founded St. Denis, near Paris, in 632, and was there buried, 638; D. 602.—Dagobert II. succeeded to the kingdom of Austrasia in 656; assassinated, 679.—Dagobert III. succeeded his father, Childebert III., 711; D. 715.

DAGON, dai'-gon, 'corn,' or 'fish,' the idol deity of the Philistines, the body being human, with the tail of a fish.

DAGUERRE, Louis James Mandé, da-gair', the inventor of the diorama, and daguerreotypes or sun-pictures, which take from him their name. He was originally an artist, and became a scene-painter to the opera at Paris, assisting M. Prévost in producing his panoramas of the great cities of the world. His ingenuity, however, was continually prompting him to make new efforts in his art; and in 1822, in conjunction with Bouton, he perfected and exhibited the first diorama, which had a great success. For seventeen years he continued in this line, when he discovered the means of delineating objects by the chemical action of light. Something similar had been attempted before, by various chemists; but it remained for Daguerre to work out the discovery. To him belongs the merit of producing sun-pictures perfect upon metallic plates. In 1839 he made an exhibition of these pictures, and was named an officer of the Legion of Honour. At the same time, on condition of publishing his method, an annuity of 6,000 francs for life was voted to him by the government, and the process of daguerreotyping became generally known. B. at Cormeille, France, 1789; D. at Petit-Brie-sur-Marne, 1851, where a monument has been erected to his memory.

DAHL, Michael, dal, a Swedish portrait-painter, who came to England and met with great success. He had the honour to paint the portrait of Queen Anne, and was, during her reign and that of George I., the rival of Sir Godfrey Kneller. B. at Stockholm, 1656; D. in London, 1743.

DAHL, John Christian, a distinguished Norwegian landscape-painter, whose views of Italian and Tyrolean scenery were universally admired. In rendering the wild grandeur of his native scenery he was equally successful. B. at Bergen, 1773.

DAHLBERG, Eric, dal'-bairg, a Swedish general, who, after studying the science of fortification, was, in 1648, appointed an engineer. Gustavus Adolphus sent him to superintend the works for the defence of Thorn, and he attended that monarch in the Polish war. By his advice, the king undertook the enterprise of marching his army across the Great Belt, when frozen over in 1657, whereby he extended his conquests to Copenhagen. In 1660 Dahlberg was ennobled, and in 1669 appointed commandant of Malmo, and superintendent of fortifications. He so greatly improved these, as to be called the Vauban of Sweden. In 1690 he was made governor of Livonia, and died at Stockholm in 1703. B. 1625.—He published "Suecia Antiqua et Hodierna," 3 vols. folio, 1700.

DAHME, dam, a town of Prussia, on the river of the same name, 43 miles from Berlin. It is defended by a strong citadel, and inclosed by walls. Manf. Linens, woollens, and tobacco. Pop. 4,000.—Here, in 1713, the French were defeated by the Prussians.

DAHOMEY, dă'-ho-me, a country of Upper Guinea, West Africa, with a coast-line extending from the river Volta to Fort Badagry. It is bounded on the E. by Yarriba, and on the W. by Ashantee. Ext. 180 miles from E. to W., with a breadth of about 200 inland. Desc. The parts which have been visited are very beautiful and fertile, and rise, for about 150 miles, with a gradual slope, but without any great elevation. The soil is a deep rich clay, yielding maize, millet, and Guinea corn in abundance. The inhabitants are a warlike and ferocious race, but sunk in the lowest state of barbarism. Their institutions and political system are of a very extraordinary character. All the females of the nation are considered as belonging to the king, and a distribution of wives takes place once a year, at a grand festival. Their king is absolute. Pop. 200,000. Lat. between 6° and 8° N. Lon. between 30′ and 2° E.

DAIDIS, dai'-i-dis, a solemnity observed by the Greeks, It lasted three days. The first was in commemoration of Latona's labour; the second in memory of Apollo's birth; and the third in honour of the marriage of Podalirius and the mother of Alexander. Torches were always carried at the celebration; whence the name.

DAIMIEL, dă'-e-me-ail, a town of Spain, 20 miles from Ciudad-Real, and one of the richest and most important places in the province of La Mancha. Manf. Linens and woollens. Pop. 10,000.

DAIR EL KAMAR, dair el ,kă'-mar, a town of Syria, and capital of a community of Druses, 12 miles from Beyrout. Pop. 30,000.

DAKHEL, or DAKHIEH, EL, dă'-kel, the W. oasis of Upper Egypt, 50 miles W. of the oasis El-Kharzeh. It contains two small towns and numerous villages, the inhabitants of which are chiefly supported by dates, olives, and other fruits. Pop. 7,000. Lat. 25° 30′ N. Lon. 29° E.

DALAMOW, dă'-la-mow', a city of India, in the territory of Oude, 60 miles from Allahabad. It is a holy place, to which the Hindoos resort to perform their ritual ablutions in the Ganges. Pop. 10,000.

DALBY, dal'-be, the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 500.

DALBY, Isaac, a self-taught mathematician, who, in 1772, went to London, and received the appointment of usher to Archbishop Tenison's grammar-school, then near Charing Cross. Here he got acquainted with many celebrated men of science, and subsequently became mathematical master of the naval school at Chelsea. He was afterwards engaged in the trigonometrical survey of England, and in 1790 was appointed professor of mathematics in the senior department of the Royal Military College at High Wycombe. On the removal of that institution to Farnham, Surrey, he accompanied it; but infirmities were now fast increasing upon him, and he was forced to resign his situation. B. in Gloucestershire, 1744; D. at Farnham, 1824.—Besides other writings of less collective importance, he wrote for the Military College a "Course of Mathematics," in 2 vols., which extended to a sixth edition.

DAL-ELF, dal-elf, a river of Sweden, which is formed by the junction of the Oster- and Wester-Dal, and, after a course of 250 miles, falls into the Gulf of Bothnia, 10 miles from Gefle.

D'ALEMBERT. (See ALEMBERT, D'.

Dalhousie, dăl-hoo'-se, a village of Scotland, 8 miles from Edinburgh, with a station on the Hawick branch of the North British Railway. Near it is Dalhousie Castle.

Dalhousie, James Andrew Brown Ramsay, tenth earl and first marquis of, a modern English statesman, was educated at Harrow, and afterwards entered Christchurch, Oxford, where he graduated M.A. in 1838. In 1832 he became Lord Ramsay, by the death of his elder brothers, and in 1834 contested the representation of Edinburgh for the House of Commons, but was unsuccessful. In 1837, however, he was returned for Haddingtonshire. In the succeeding year he was called, by the death of his father, to the House of Lords, and in 1843 entered upon official life under the ministry of Sir Robert Peel. His first office was that of vice-president of the Board of Trade, of which he became president in the following year. In this capacity his business habits were so eminent, and his reforms so judicious, that, on the accession of Lord John Russell to power, in 1846, he was requested to keep his appointment, which he, accordingly, did. In 1847, on the recall of Lord Hardinge from India, Lord Dalhousie was appointed governor-general. He had now an opportunity of developing those administrative talents with which he was endowed. On reaching Calcutta, he proclaimed that his policy was to acquire equally direct dominion over the territories of the native princes, as the British already had over those other parts of India in their possession. Accordingly, on a revolt taking place in Moolraj, he marched a force into the North-western provinces, and, after defeating the Sikhs and Affghans, annexed the Punjab. In two years afterwards, the king of Ava provoked an expedition to be sent against him, when the coast of Burmah was taken by the British, and in 1852 Pegu incorporated with their dominions. After this, a series of annexations were made, which greatly enlarged the British empire in India. Nagpore, Sattara, Jhansi, Berar, and Oude were successively appropriated, either on account of the tyranny and misrule with which they had been governed, or from the failure of their lawful heirs among the native dynasties. Whilst these events were taking place, the internal resources of the country were being energetically developed and improved. A uniform system of cheap postage was introduced, and a large portion of India intersected by railways; the Ganges Canal was cut, and grand trunk roads constructed through various parts. The energy of his administration was apparent in every direction, when, with a broken constitution, he returned to England in 1856. In 1849 he was created a marquis for his successes in the Punjab. Previous to his return, he had been, on the death of the duke of Wellington, appointed to the wardenship of the Cinque Ports, and the East-India Company also settled on him a pension of £5,000 a year. D. 1812.

MARQUIS OF DALHOUSIE.

Dalilah, or Delilah, dă-lī'-la, 'poor,' or 'head of hair,' a woman of the Philistines, beloved by Samson. She was induced, by the gold which her friends offered her, to betray him, helpless, into their hands, and, one night cutting off his long hair, in which lay his strength, she delivered him, bound hand and foot, to his enemies.

Dalin, Olaus, da'-lin, a Swedish historian and poet, who wrote an effusion entitled "The Liberty of Sweden," and a tragedy entitled "Brunhilda." He also produced in prose a General History of Sweden, and other works; but was so distinguished for his poetical ability, as to be called the father of modern Swedish poetry. He became preceptor to Prince Gustavus, and chancellor of the court. B. at Winsberg, in 1708; D. in 1763.

Dalkeith, dăl-keeth', a town and parish of Scotland, 7 miles from Edinburgh. The town is tolerably well built, and has a church, several chapels, a scientific institute, various banks, and a new corn-exchange. In it is held the largest market for grain in Scotland. The duke of Buccleuch has a fine seat in the vicinity. Pop. of parish, 6,500; of town, 5,000.

Dallas, dăl'-las, the name of several counties in the United States, with populations ranging between 4,000 and 30,000, a proportion of whom are slaves. They are in the following states: Alabama, Texas, Arkansas, and Missouri.

Dalmatia, Kingdom of, dăl-mai'-she-a, a country in the S. of Europe, extending along the E. side of the Adriatic, and forming the southernmost portion of the Austrian empire. It is partly continental and partly insular. The continental portion makes a narrow strip of country, bounded on the S. and W. by the Adriatic, E. by Turkey (Herzegovina), and N. by Croatia. The islands are very numerous. Area, islands inclusive, 6,000 square miles. Desc. In general hilly and unproductive; but there are many beautiful and fertile valleys. The pasturages are considerable, and are, in many parts, overlooked by the lofty peaks of the Dinaric Alps, the highest of which are the Dinara, 5,669; the Svilaya, 4,750; Mosor, 4,210; and the Biokovo, near Macarsca, which is 5,520 feet above the level of the sea. The first of these peaks gives its name to the range. Rivers. The Kerka, Cettina, Narenta, and Zermagna. Pro. Chiefly maize, wheat, grapes, olives, and a small quantity of silk. Minerals. Rich, particularly in marble and gypsum; mines of iron are abundant, but those of gold and silver have disappeared. Pop. 395,000, principally of Sclavonic origin. Lat. between 42° 15′ and 44° 54′ N. Lon. between 14° 30′ and 19° E.—This country formed a part of the ancient Illyricum, and is now divided into the four departments of Cattaro, Ragusa, Spalatro, and Zaro. It was incorporated with the kingdom of Italy in 1805 by Napoleon I., who created Marshal Soult duke of Dalmatia.

Dalmellington, dăl-mel'-ling-ton, a parish of Scotland, 12 miles from Ayr. Manf. Woollens, and in its neighbourhood are coal-works. Pop. 3,000.

Dalry, dăl'-re, a village and parish of Ayrshire, Scotland, 15 miles from Paisley. Manf. Woollens, and there are coal-works in its vicinity. Pop. of parish, about 9,000, one half of whom form the inhabitants of the village.—Also a parish of Kirkcudbrightshire, 3 miles from New Galloway, with the mountain of Blacklarg, nearly 3,000 feet high. Pop. 1,300.

Dalrymple, Port, dăl-rim'-pel, a harbour, with lighthouse, in an estuary at the mouth of the Tamar, in Tasmania. Lat. 41° 3′ 5″ S. Lon. 146° 7′ 5″ E.

Dalrymple, David, Lord Hailes, a Scotch judge, who, after finishing his education at Eton and Utrecht, was called, in 1748, to the Scotch bar, and in 1766 appointed a judge, on which occasion he took the title of Lord Hailes. In this capacity he was eminently distinguished for the diligence with which he fulfilled his duties; but it is on account of his labours in the field of literature that he is chiefly celebrated. He published a number of books in the form of memoirs and letters, relating to the history of Britain in the reigns of James I. and Charles I.; "Remarks on the History of Scotland," 12mo; "Annals of Scotland," 4to, 2 vols.; "Remains of Christian Antiquity," 3 vols.; several Memoirs intended for a Biographia Scotica; papers in the "World" and "Mirror," and a great many other works, every one of them bearing the stamp of considerable merit. B. at Edinburgh, 1726; D. 1792.

DALRYMPLE, Alexander, an eminent hydrographer, who, by the force of his talents, raised himself to considerable eminence in the service of the East-India Company. He endeavoured to establish friendly commercial relations between the sultan of Soolo and the Company, but was unsuccessful. He returned to England with a like object in view, but was there also unsuccessful. In 1765 he again went to Madras, where he had been appointed a member of council, and one of the committee of circuit; but in 1777 was, with several others, recalled to have his conduct investigated regarding some of his proceedings. In 1779 he was appointed hydrographer to the Company, and in 1795, when a similar office was established by the Admiralty, it was given to Dalrymple. This appointment he held till 1808, when he was called upon to resign it on the ground of superannuation. This, however, he refused to do, and was dismissed. B. at New Hailes, Scotland, 1737; D. from vexation, a month after his dismissal from office, 1808.

DALSTON, dals'-ton, a suburb of London, in the parish of Hackney, 4 miles from St. Paul's. Pop. about 6,000.

DALTON, dal'-ton, the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 5,500.

DALTON, John, a distinguished mathematician, meteorologist, and natural philosopher, who, from humble circumstances, gradually worked his way into public notice and honourable fame. In his thirteenth year he kept a school at Eaglesfield, Cumberland, and in his fifteenth, removed to Kendal to fill the situation of usher in the school of his cousin, George Bewley. In 1793 he became professor of mathematics and natural philosophy in the New College at Manchester, which he held until the removal of that institution to York in 1799. He continued to reside in Manchester, and gave lessons in private seminaries, and also occupied himself with lecturing upon his favourite subjects. He also filled the appointments of secretary and vice-president to the Manchester Literary and Philosophical Society, and in 1817 became its president, to which distinction he was elected every succeeding year until his death. Meanwhile he had long been known as a contributor to the "Lady's Diary," "The Transactions of the Manchester Literary and Philosophical Society," and other serials; but it was not till 1803 that he commenced seriously to work out his grand discovery of the atomic theory. In the following year he explained it to Dr. Thomas Thomson, and subsequently in some of his own lectures, delivered in London and several other of the principal towns of England. In 1808 appeared the first volume of his "New System of Chemical Philosophy," which, in 1810, was followed by his second volume. In both of these volumes he treated of the atomic theory, which proved one of the most important contributions that had yet been made to the science of chemistry. By it, the constituents of any article could be regulated with perfect accuracy, and the knowledge of chemical combinations reduced to an amazing degree of simplicity and certainty. It is upon this discovery that his fame rests, as it, at once, places him amongst the most original inquirers and thinkers of his day. For it the first gold medal of the Royal Society was awarded to him. In 1832 the University of Oxford conferred upon him the title of D.C.L.; in the following year William IV. gave him a pension of £150 a year, which, in 1836, was raised to £300. In 1834 the University of Edinburgh conferred on him the degree of LL.D., and in 1833, £2,000 was subscribed by his friends in Manchester for a statue to him, to be sculptured by Chantrey, and placed in the entrance-hall of the Royal Institution of that city. In 1821 he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society, and was also a member of various other learned societies. B. at Eaglesfield, near Cockermouth, Cumberland, 1766; D. at Manchester, 1844.

DAMAGRAM, or ZINDER, dam'-a-gram, a province of Bornou, N. Africa, situate between Lake Tchad and the Quora. Desc. Fertile, and producing indigo, cotton, the castor-oil plant, with various fruits. Its principal traffic is in slaves. Lat. between 13° and 14° N. Lon. between 4° 30′ and 10° 50′ E.

DAMAN, da'-man, a town of India, belonging to the Portuguese, and situate on the coast of the Northern Concan. It is 160 miles from Bombay, and is included within that presidency. The town is fortified, and is the capital of a district 10 miles long by 5 broad. Pop. Unascertained.

DAMAN, or the BORDER, a tract lying between the Indus river and the Suliman mountains, in India. It was formerly a part of the kingdom of Runjeet Singh, but, being annexed to the Punjab, now belongs to the British. Desc. Fertile where watered, but otherwise consisting mostly of sand. Ext. 300 miles long, by 60 broad. Pop. Unascertained.

DAMANHOUR, da-man-hoor', a town of Lower Egypt, 38 miles from Alexandria. It has both cotton and woollen manufactories.

DAMARAS, da-mar'-as, a country comprising wide plains and grassy slopes, situate at the foot of mountains with an elevation of 1,000 feet, in S.W. Africa. It abounds with lions, rhinoceroses, and zebras, and is peopled by two distinct nations—the Damaras of the hills and the Damaras of the plains. It abounds with copper, of which the natives make rings. Lat. between 21° and 24° S.

DAMASCUS, dă-mas'-kus, the capital of Syria, and of a pashalic of the same name, is situate in a fertile plain amidst extensive gardens, 54 miles from its port of Beyrout. The streets are in general narrow, of regular width, though not in straight lines; they are well paved, and have elevated footpaths on each side. Damascus contains above 500 large and magnificent palatial houses, each of which has a canal or fountain. The number of mosques and chapels is also very great; and the grand mosque is 650 feet long, by 150 wide. An hospital for the indigent sick is attached to the edifice. This mosque is said to have been originally a Christian church, and the cathedral of Damascus. The mosques are mostly fronted by a court. There is a Greek, Maronite, Syrian, and Armenian church, and several synagogues. The castle, situate towards the S.W. part of the city, and about three quarters of a mile in circuit, is a fine rustic edifice, with three square towers in front, and five on each side. This city is the seat of a tribunal of commerce, and has a considerable trade. Manf. Formerly it was celebrated for the manufacture of sabres, of such peculiar quality as to be perfectly elastic. For these it is still distinguished, besides having extensive factories for silk and cotton stuffs; soap is largely made, and leather, cabinet-work, saddlery, and jewellery. Caravans arrive at it several times annually, bringing dried fruits and sweetmeats, slippers, copper kettles, horseshoe nails, tobacco-pipes, spiceries, shawls, and the rich fabrics of Surat, through Bagdad; iron, lead, tin, cochineal, broad-cloth, sugar, and such other European articles as are required in the city, through Saida, Beyrout, and Tripoli. Commerce is carried on chiefly by caravans, of which the principal is that which takes place annually with the pilgrims to Mecca. Pop. From 80,000 to 100,000; of whom 12,000 are Jews, and about an equal number, Christians. Lat. 33° 27′ N. Lon. 36° 23′ E.—Damascus is a place of great antiquity, and is alluded to in the days of Abraham. In 632 it fell before the Saracens, in 1516 was captured by the Turks, and in 1832 by Ibrahim Pacha.—The PASHALIC comprises that portion of country which lies between the Euphrates and Lebanon. Except in the W., it is generally level, and extremely fertile. Rivers. The Jordan and the Orontes. Lakes. The Dead Sea, a part of the Lake of Tiberias, and several smaller collections of water. Pro. Corn, cotton, silk, hemp, flax, madder, tobacco, and almost every kind of live stock. It contains the remains of several cities mentioned in ancient and sacred history, and is divided into twenty districts. Pop. About 600,000, exclusive of Bedouins. Lat. betweeen 31° and 36° N. Lon. between 35° and 41° E.

DAMASUS I., POPE, dăm'-a-sus, was a native of Portugal, and rose to the pontifical chair in 366. He laboured to reform the morals of his time, and extend the discipline of the Church. The Arians were opposed by him in several councils. B. 304; D. 384.—DAMASUS II. was elected pope in 1048, and only survived his election twenty-three days.

DAMIETTA, da'-me-et'-ta, a city of Lower Egypt, on the E. branch of the Nile, about eight miles above where it falls into the Mediterranean Sea. It is situate on a narrow neck of land, from two to six miles in breadth, interposed between the Nile and the lake Menzaleh. The houses are white, built in the form of a crescent along the right bank of the river, and most of them with pleasant saloons on their terraced roofs, commanding a delightful view of the river, the lake, and rich country intervening. The chief disadvantage of Damietta lies in the want of a harbour. It trades, notwithstanding, with Syria, Cyprus, and other parts of the Turkish empire. Pop. Estimated at 30,000. Lat. 31° 25′ N. Lon. 31° 49′ E. The country round Damietta is perhaps the most fertile in Egypt, being carefully improved by irrigation, and producing rice of an extremely fine quality.—OLD DAMIETTA lies about four miles to the N. of the above city, and was repeatedly taken by the Christians during the Crusades. Its remains now, however, are nearly extinguished.

DAMM, ALT, or OLD, dam, a fortified town of Prussia, at the mouth of the Plöne, on Lake Damm. Manf. Woollen cloths. Pop. 3,200.—NEW DAMM is in the circle of Konigsberg. Manf. Woollens. Pop. 3,000.

DAMMOODAH, dam-moo-da', a river of India, rising in the British district of Ramghur, in the Bengal presidency, and, after a course of 350 miles, falling into the Hooghly in lat. 22° 15′ N.; lon. 88° 7′ E.—The valley of this river abounds with iron and coal, and is to be traversed by the Calcutta Railway.

DAMOCLES, dăm'-o-klees, a flatterer of Dionysius the tyrant, whom he pronounced the happiest man on earth. This prince, in order to convince him of the happiness which a sovereign enjoyed, invited him to a banquet, and caused him to be arrayed and treated as a monarch. During the entertainment, a sword was suspended from the ceiling, over the head of Damocles, by a single horsehair; and thus was typified the happiness of a tyrant.

DAMON and PYTHIAS, dai'-mon, two Pythagorean philosophers of Syracuse, rendered memorable by their friendship. Dionysius the tyrant having condemned Damon to death, permission was granted him to return to his native place, in order to settle his affairs, Pythias remaining in his stead. The hour fixed for the execution arrived, and Pythias was about to suffer the punishment; but Damon returned in time, and a generous contest ensued between them as to who should be the victim. Dionysius was so touched by this faithful friendship, that he pardoned Damon, and asked to be admitted as a third friend. Lived in the 4th century B C.

DAMPIER, William, dăm'-peer, an English navigator, who was early sent to sea, and first sailed in a Bristol privateer. After cruising a considerable time on the American coast, and taking several prizes, principally from the Spaniards, Dampier went aboard another buccaneering ship. Not meeting with success, he sailed for the East Indies, where he left the vessel, and proceeded to the English factory at Achem. Afterwards he became gunner to the factory at Bencoolen. In 1691 he embarked for England, and arrived there the same year, when he published his "Voyage round the World," which was well received by the public. He had now made himself known, when he was sent out on a voyage of discovery to the South Seas. In this expedition he explored the north and north-west coasts of Australia, with Shark's Bay. He also explored New Guinea, New Britain, and New Ireland; but, on his return home, was wrecked on Ascension Island. In 1701, however, he arrived in England, and published an account of his voyage. He continued to follow the sea till 1711, when his life is lost in obscurity. B. in Somersetshire, 1652.—There is a portrait of Dampier in the Trinity House. His "Voyages" bear the stamp of truth, and are written in a vivid style of narrative.

DAMPIER ARCHIPELAGO, a group of islands lying off the N.W. coast of Australia. It comprises Enderly, Legendre, Lewis, Depuch, Rosemary, and several smaller islands. Lat. 21° S. Lon. between 116° and 117° E.

DAMPIER'S BAY, or SHARK'S BAY, a spacious inlet on the W. coast of Australia, about 25 miles wide and 150 long. It was named after Dampier, the navigator.

DAN, dăn, 'judgment,' the son of Jacob, by the servant of Rachel, and the father of the warlike tribe of Dan, one of the twelve tribes of Israel, whose portion was on the coast of the Mediterranean, bounded on the N. by Joppa, and on the S. by Ascalon.

DAN, an ancient city of Palestine, situate at the N. extremity of the "Promised Land," 140 miles from Beersheba, which was the S. limit.

DAN, a river of the United States, which, uniting with Staunton river, forms the Roanoke.

DANA, Richard Henry, dai'-na, an American writer, who was educated at Harvard College, Massachusetts, with a view to his following the legal profession. Delicacy of health, however, forced him to quit his legal studies, when he applied himself to the more congenial pursuits of literature and politics. In 1817 he became a contributor to the "North American Review," and, from the attractive character of his articles, was introduced to a share in its management. This continued till 1820, when his connection with that periodical ceased. He now started "The Idle Man," which lived only through one volume, and in which his "Tom Thornton" appeared. In 1825 he wrote his poem of "The Dying Raven," which appeared in the "New York Review;" and in 1827 be published his "Buccaneer, and other Poems." In 1833 he published a collection of his poems and prose writings, and another edition in 1850. Mr. Dana, however, has principally confined himself to miscellaneous writing, and to occasional lecturing on poetry. His popularity with his countrymen is widely extended, notwithstanding that his style has considerably less of that wordy exuberance and flowery luxuriance, by which many of the profusions of the writers of the New World are characterized. B. at Cambridge, near Boston, 1787.—There are other American authors of this name.

DANAE, dăn'-ai-e, the daughter of Acrisius, king of Argos, was confined in a brazen tower by her father, to whom it had been predicted by an oracle that he would be slain by his daughter's son. Jupiter, however, introduced himself into the tower in the guise of a golden shower. Perseus was the offspring of their union, and he, together with his mother, was exposed to the fury of the waves by Acrisius. He was saved, however, and ultimately killed his grandfather by accident.

DANAIDES, dă-nai'-ă-dees, the fifty daughters of Danaus, king of Argos. Ægyptus, king of Egypt, their uncle, who had fifty sons, wished them to be married to their cousins; but Danaus was averse to this, as he had been informed by an oracle that he would be killed by one of his sons-in-law. Ægyptus, however, sent his sons to Argos at the head of a powerful army; and Danaus, unable to resist, consented to the marriage; but his daughters had promised that they would destroy their husbands on the night of their nuptials. They executed their horrible purpose, Hypormnestra alone sparing her husband, Lynceus. In order to punish these cruel wives, Jupiter cast them into Tartarus, and condemned them to be eternally filling with water a vessel full of holes.

DANAKIL, da'-na-kil, a country of Africa, situate in the N.E. part of that continent, and extending along the W. coast of the Red Sea. Desc. Bare and desolate, and abounding in salt lakes. Lat. between 12° and 15° N. Lon. between 40° and 43° E.

DANAUS, dăn'-a-us, son of Belus, reigned, conjointly with his brother Ægyptus, on the throne of Egypt. Having, however, attempted the life of his brother, he was forced to fly, and arrived at Argos about the 16th century B.C. There the king, Gelanor, received him hospitably; but Danaus recompensed his kindness by usurping his throne, although others say Gelanor abdicated in his favour. However this may be, the dynasty of the Belides commenced with Danaus. Fable gave to this monarch fifty daughters. (See DANAIDES.) He was succeeded by Lynceus.

DANBURY, dăn'-ber-re, a post-township of Fairfield county, Connecticut, U.S., 33 miles from New Haven. Pop. 6,000.

DANBY, Francis, A.R.A., dăn'-be, a modern artist, who received his earliest lessons in design at the School of Arts in Dublin. After acquiring some distinction in that city, he, in 1820, removed to England, and took up his residence at Bristol, whence he sent his pictures annually to the exhibition of the Royal Academy, but with little success till 1824, when his "Sunset at Sea after a Storm" attracted considerable notice. This picture was purchased by Sir Thomas Lawrence. The following year he sent his "Delivery of Israel out of Egypt," which was highly thought of, and he became an associate of the academy. He now worked hard, and exhibited several pictures, which increased his reputation. In 1829, on account of some domestic affairs, he left England, and was absent for ten or twelve years, when he returned, and began to exhibit again. He had now attained the summit of his art, and continued to produce a great many first-class paintings. Among these may be named his "Morning at Rhodes," "The Enchanted Island," "The Deluge," "A Holy Family," "Caius Marius amid the Ruins of Carthage," "The Departure of Ulysses from Ithaca," and "A Wild Seashore at Sunset." B. at Wexford, in Ireland, 1793.

DANBY, the name of two parishes of England, neither of them with a population above 2,300.

DANCE, George, jun., dance, an eminent architect, whose first work was the prison of Newgate, begun by him in 1770. He also designed St. Luke's Hospital and the front of Guildhall, which, as an artistic performance, is remarkable only for its absurdity. He was also the architect of the British Institution, formerly the Shakspeare Gallery, Pall Mall, and the theatre at Bath. He held the appointment of city surveyor till 1816, when he resigned in favour of Mr. W. Montague, a pupil of his own. D. in London, 1740; D. 1825; and was buried near Wren and Rennie in St. Paul's.

DANCER, Daniel, dan'-ser, an extraordinary English miser, who, in 1736, succeeded to a considerable estate. Notwithstanding this, he led the life of a hermit for more than half a century. His only dealing with mankind arose from the sale of his hay; and he was seldom seen, except when gathering logs of wood from the common, or old iron or sheep's dung under the hedges. He was frequently robbed, and therefore fastened the door of his house, and got in at the upper window, making use of a ladder, which he drew up after him. His sister, who lived with him many years, left him, at her death, a considerable increase to his wealth; and, on this occasion, he bought a second-hand pair of black stockings to put himself in decent mourning. This was an article of luxury, for, at other times, Daniel wore haybands on his legs. B. 1716, near Harrow, in Middlesex; D. 1794; and left his estates to Lady Tempest, who had been very charitable to both him and his sister.

DANDE, dan'-de, a river of S. W. Africa, which, after a course of 200 miles, enters the Atlantic, 60 miles N. of the mouth of the Coanza.

DANDOLO, Henry, dan'-do-lo, doge of Venice, to which office he was elected in 1192, being then 84 years old. He raised the Venetian republic to a considerable height by the vigour and wisdom of his government. In 1201 he engaged in the crusade, and conquered Zara, which had revolted against the Venetians. In 1203, though nearly 90 years of age, he greatly distinguished himself at the siege of Constantinople, on the taking of which he was created despot of Romania. D. in 1205.

DANDOLO, Andrew, doge of Venice, extended the commerce of the republic by a union with Egypt, which produced a war between the Venetians and the Genoese, which lasted several years. He was a man of letters, wrote a "History of Venice," and corresponded with Petrarch. B. about 1310; D. in 1354.

DANE, dain, a county of Wisconsin, U. S. Area, 1,235 square miles. Desc. Fertile and producing Indian corn, wheat, and oats. Pop. 17,000.

DANGER, ISLANDS OF, dain'-jer, in the Pacific Ocean, seen by Commodore Byron in June, 1765. Lat. 11° S. Lon. 166° W.

DANGEROUS ARCHIPELAGO, a group in the Pacific, comprising Harp, Resolution, Palliser, and other islands. Lat. 21° S. Lon. 140° W.

DANHOLM, dan'-holm, a small island belonging to Russia, in the Baltic, opposite Stralsund. This island was formerly called Strale.

DANICAN, Andrew. (See PHILIDOR.)

DANIEL, dăn'-yel, 'judgment of God,' the fourth of the greater prophets, was of the blood royal of Judah, and was, in his infancy, carried captive to Babylon 606 B.C. He was brought up at the court of Nebuchadnezzar, subsequently becoming governor of Babylon, and in the reign of Belteshazzar explained the famous writing upon the wall, when the event confirmed the truth of his prediction. Darius made him his prime minister; but the courtiers, out of envy, contrived to have him thrown into a den of lions for refusing to pay divine honours to Darius. He escaped the beasts by a miracle, and regained the favour of his master. His prophecies are written partly in Hebrew and partly in Chaldee. They form fourteen chapters, and announce the coming of the Messiah, and the revolution of the four great empires. Lived in the 7th century B.C.

DANIEL, Samuel, an English poet and historian, who became groom of the privy chamber to the queen of James I. At the close of his life he retired to a farm in his native county, where he died in 1619. D. in Somersetshire, 1562.—His poems were collected, and printed in 2 vols. 12mo, 1718; but are now esteemed of little merit. The principal consists of an heroic in six books, on the wars of York and Lancaster, "Musophilus;" a tragedy of "Cleopatra," and the "Complaint of Rosamond." Besides these, are several masques, sonnets, odes, and epistles. He also wrote the "History of England to the End of the Reign of Edward III.," which, according to some authors, is the best of all his works.

DANIEL, Gabriel, da'-ne-el, a French historian, who entered among the Jesuits at the age of eighteen, and became historiographer of France under Louis XIV., who gave him a pension of 2,000 francs. One of his first productions was a "Voyage to the World of Descartes," which has been translated into several languages. His greatest performance, however, is "The History of France," published at Paris in 3 vols. folio, 1713, but afterwards enlarged to 7 vols. 4to, 1722. This work is said to have little merit as a whole. It is rather a history of the kings than of the people, is feeble in style, and full of inaccuracies. He also wrote several miscellaneous and theological treatises. B. at Rouen, 1649; D. at Paris, 1728.

DANIELL, William, R.A., dăn'-yel, an artist and engraver, who, at the age of fourteen, went with his uncle to India, and commenced sketching all that struck them as beautiful or interesting between Cape Comorin and Serinagur, in the Himalaya mountains. They were ten years engaged in this task, and many of their views were subsequently published in a work called "Oriental Scenery," which appeared, completed, in 6 vols. folio in 1808. As an engraver, Mr. Daniell produced several other works of great merit, and between 1814 and 1825 was occupied in getting up a work entitled a "Voyage Round Great Britain," for which he spent the summer of every year in making notes and collecting drawings. Besides these, he painted in oil many large pictures of scenes in India, and, in conjunction with Mr. Paris, produced, in 1832, a panorama of Madras, and, more recently, "The City of Lucknow." B. 1769; D. 1837.

DANIELL, John Frederick, a distinguished chemist and meteorologist, who commenced life as a sugar-refiner, but, becoming acquainted with Professor Brande, they, together, started the "Quarterly Journal of Science and Art," and superintended the first twenty volumes of that serial. In 1820 he published an account of his new hydrometer, an instrument which has been of immense service to meteorology. In 1823 his "Meteorological Essays" appeared, and raised him still higher in the rank of men of science. His "Essay on Artificial Climates" appeared in 1824, and in 1831, on the establishment of King's College, he was made professor of chemistry. About this time a description of his new pyrometer was given to the world, and for the invention of this instrument, the Royal Society awarded him the Rumford medal. In 1837 he received the Copley medal for discovering a mode by which a continuous current of voltaic electricity may be maintained. In 1842 he received one of the Royal medals for a paper on the theory of salts. In 1843 the University of Oxford conferred upon him the honorary degree of D.C.L., and in the same year a second edition of an "Introduction to Chemical Philosophy" appeared. With his professorship, he held other important appointments, and was, for thirty years, a member of the Royal Society. B. in London, 1790; D. 1845.—Besides the above, he wrote a great many treatises upon the subjects of his favourite studies.

DANKALI, KINGDOM OF, dan'-ka-le, an independent state in Africa, bounded by the Red Sea on the N.E., and on the S.W. by a range of mountains. Ext. 250 miles long, by 50 broad. Desc. Unfertile and ill-watered, and inhabited by a treacherous race of a barbarous disposition. Climate. Excessive. Pop. about 65,000.

DANTAN, Jean Pierre, dan'-tăn, a French sculptor, whose father followed the same profession, and in whose studio he first imbibed the principles of his art. He subsequently studied under Bosio, and, when he first essayed on his own account, produced several bust and portrait studies, which excited considerable admiration, and, at once, brought him prominently into notice. His genius, however, led him into the study of caricature, when, about 1832, he captivated the humorous inclinations of the Parisians by a series of grotesque statuettes, which he called "Charges," of the principal celebrities of the capital. These were nothing more than exaggerated portraits of the leading features of the face, rendered with great ingenuity, yet without being ridiculous. They were new and striking, and "took" with the public amazingly. One of the peculiarities of these "Charges" was, that the heads were disproportionately large, whilst the bodies, upon which they were placed, were as disproportionately diminutive. They were executed with a view to correctness of attitude and expression, in so far as regarded the individuals they were intended to represent, although all about them was both exaggerated or diminished to an amusing degree of absurdity. The consequence to these "celebrities" in the hands of Dantan was great popularity; and as many of them, such as Paganini, Lablache, Thalberg, were men continually before the public, it may be presumed that the genius of the sculptor helped to extend rather than circumscribe their fame. B. at Paris, 1800.

DANTE, or DURANTE, Alighieri, dan'-tai, the most distinguished of Italian poets, who, in early life, served his country both as a soldier and a politician. He became one of the priors or chief magistrates of his native city of Florence about 1300, when the two factions of the Bianchi and the Neri were at their height. He joined the former, which, being the weakest, was overcome in the struggle, and Dante falling with his party, was banished, and his property confiscated. For many years he was doomed to bear the sorrows of an exile. At length he was taken under the protection of Guido da Polentia, lord of Ravenna, under whose roof he passed the remainder of his days. B. at Florence, 1265; D. at Ravenna, 1321.—It was during his exile that Dante wrote his great poem, of world-wide fame, "La Divina Commedia." It comprises three poems, or distinct acts—Hell, Purgatory, and Paradise. The poet, describing the fate of souls after "shuffling off their mortal coil," places in hell and purgatory all those who are remarkable, either for their crimes or vices (especially those who were the authors of his misfortunes), and in paradise, those who have done good deeds on earth. He is supposed, in company with Virgil, to descend to the infernal regions, and there describe the various punishments of sinners, whilst Beatrice, his first-loved earthly companion, leads him through the delights of paradise. This extraordinary composition is one of the most sublime productions which have ever emanated from the genius of man, although many passages are full of extravagances, and others, from their peculiar allusions, are very obscure. "La Commedia" was the first poem ever written in the Italian language; before it, the Latin tongue was always employed. The best edition is that of Venice, 1757, 3 vols. 4to. This poem has found in all countries a host of editors, commentators, and translators. Dante also wrote some works in Latin, particularly one on monarchy, and another, "De Vulgari Eloquentiâ." It is, however, on his "Divine Comedy" that his fame securely rests. A monument was erected to his memory in the church of Santa Croce, in Florence, and opened to public view on the 24th of March, 1830. This tardy justice to the memory of a great poet, by his countrymen, may have been stimulated by the reproving lines of Byron, in the 4th canto of "Childe Harold," beginning—

"Ungrateful Florence! Dante sleeps afar!"

DANTON, George James, dan'-tawng, a leading demagogue in the French revolution. He was a lawyer, and attained notoriety in that storm, which brought prominently into notice a number of persons who would otherwise have passed their days in obscurity. He displayed extraordinary talents in the National Convention, and was a powerful speaker. Robespierre supplanted him, and he died under the guillotine in 1794. D. at Arcis-sur-Aube, 1759.

DANTZIC, dänt'-zik (Pruss. dant'-zeesh), a government in the province of W. Prussia, bounded on the N. by the Baltic, S. by Marienwerder, E. by Konigsberg, and W. by Kustrin. Area, 2,436 square miles. Desc. In general level and fertile. Pro. Corn, flax, and tobacco. Horses, cattle, and swine are bred. Its principal river is the Vistula, and it has several lakes. Pop. 410,000. (See PRUSSIA.)

DANTZIC, or DANZIG, an opulent city and seaport of Prussia, the capital of the above government, on the Vistula, about 6 miles from its mouth. The town is traversed by two small rivers, the Mottlau and Randanne, which soon after unite and fall into the Vistula. It is surrounded with ramparts, lined with cannon, and may be considered as well defended. The harbour is formed by the mouth of the Vistula, and is also well protected by forts. The principal public buildings are the cathedral, two town-halls, the arsenal, a school of navigation, an exchange, a house of industry, a gymnasium, a museum, an observatory, &c. Besides these, there are a great many churches, chapels, charitable institutions, and several monasteries and nunneries. Manf. Jewellery, silks, firearms, tobacco, and vitriol. It has large distilleries and breweries, sugar-refineries, dye-works, and flour-mills. Exp. Wheat and other grains, biscuit, flour, ashes, bones, timber, flax, hemp, spirits, black beer, and wool. Imp. Woollen and silken stuffs, manufactured goods, and colonial produce. Pop. with its suburbs, about 60,000. Lat. 54° 21′ N. Lon. 18° 39′ E.—Known in the 10th century as the capital of Pomerelia, it passed with that province, in 1295, under the authority of Poland; but, in 1308, Vladislaus IV. ceded the whole to the Teutonic knights, who held it till 1454. In that year it was again seized by the Poles; and, in 1575, having refused to acknowledge Stephen Bathory, it had to sustain a siege by that monarch, and was taken in 1577. From 1360 to 1641 it was one of the principal towns in the Hanseatic league. When this league was dissolved, Dantzic joined Lubeck, Hamburg, and Bremen; and these four cities, down to a very late period, retained their name of Hanse towns. In 1734 it was forced to surrender to the Russians and Saxons, who were then besieging Stanislaus of Poland. In 1793 it was occupied by the Prussians. It was taken by the French in May, 1807, after a long siege, by Marshal Lefèbre, who thence acquired his title of duke of Dantzic. After Bonaparte's disastrous campaign in Russia, it was blockaded and obliged to surrender, after a long and able defence by General Rapp. At the peace of Paris, in 1814, it reverted to Prussia. Fahrenheit was born here, 1690. It is connected by rail with Berlin and Konigsberg.

DANTZIC, GULF OF, an inlet of the Baltic, 60 miles wide at its entrance. On it are the towns of Hela, Pillau, and Putzig.

DANUBE, dăn'-ube (German, DONAU, don'-ou), the second largest river of Europe, being next to the Volga, rises from springs in the Berge of Baden, at nearly 3,000 feet above the level of the sea. After receiving in Suabia a number of small streams, it takes a N.E. direction, becomes navigable at Ulm, and throughout the remainder of its course, its waters are increased by the junction of the Iller, Lech, Iser, Inn, Ens, Raab, Save, Drave, Isker, Morava, Vid, and Jantra. A great number of towns are built on its banks, and after a course of above 2,400 miles, it enters the Black Sea by several mouths. The principal of these are the Sulina, Kilia, and St. George. The latter, which are to the S., were, by the treaty of Adrianople, the boundary between Russia and Turkey. After, however, the war of 1854-6, the Russians had to retire altogether from the banks of this river, the navigation of which, together with the care of its mouths, was to be under the authority of Austria, England, France, and Turkey.

DANUBE, the UPPER and LOWER CIRCLES of the, two former circles of Bavaria, now called Lower Bavaria and Suabia.

DANUBE, CIRCLE of the, one of the four circles of Wurtemberg, watered by the Danube and some of its affluents. Area, 1,760 geographical square miles. Pop. 377,000.

DANUBIAN PRINCIPALITIES, dă-nu'-be-an, the provinces of Moldavia and Wallachia, in Europe. United area, 44,500 square miles. United pop. 3,677,000. These provinces were, in July, 1853, invaded by the Russians, when the hospodars, or appointed governors of each, transferred their governmental powers into the hands of an extraordinary council of administration. In the following November, the emperor of Russia, who hitherto, in conjunction with the sultan of Turkey, had the power of nominating the hospodars, appointed Baron de Budberg to the government of both principalities. The occupation of these, with this assumption of the sovereign power by the Czar, led to the war between Turkey, England, and France, united against Russia. This war was terminated in 1856, and the final organization of the Danubian principalities was settled by a conference held at Paris in 1858. The chief articles in this convention were,—1. That the united principalities of Moldavia and Wallachia henceforth remain placed under the suzerainty of the Porte. 2. That, conformably to articles 22 and 23 of the treaty concluded at Paris on the 30th of March, 1856, the principalities will govern themselves (s'administreront) freely and without any interference on the part of the Sublime Porte, in the limits stipulated by the common agreement of the Powers guarantees with the suzerain court. 3. That the public power shall be intrusted in each principality to a hospodar, and to an elective assembly, acting, in cases provided for by the present convention, with the concurrence of a central commission common to the two principalities. 4. That the hospodar exercise executive power. 5. That the legislative power will be exercised collectively by the hospodar, by the Assembly, and by the central commission. 6. That the principalities will pay a tribute to the suzerain court, the amount of which is fixed at 1,500,000 piastres for Moldavia, and 2,500,000 for Wallachia. The investiture will be conferred upon the hospodars by the sultans as hitherto. The suzerain court concerts with the principalities the measures of defence of their territory in case of external aggression; and it will have the right to initiate, by an understanding with the guaranteeing powers, the necessary measures for the re-establishment of order, should it be compromised. As hitherto, international treaties concluded by the suzerain court with foreign powers, are applicable to the principalities in every point which does not infringe upon their immunities. 7. That in case of violation of the immunities of the principalities, the hospodars shall address an appeal to the suzerain power, and should that appeal not be responded to, they can appeal, through their agents, to the representatives of the guaranteeing powers at Constantinople. The hospodars will be represented at the suzerain court by agents (capou-Kiago), born Moldavians or Wallachians, not dependent upon any foreign jurisdiction, and admitted (agrées) by the Porte. 8. That the hospodar is elected for life by the Assembly. (See MOLDAVIA and WALLACHIA.)

DANVILLE, dăn'-vil, the name of several townships in the United States, with populations ranging between 2,000 and 4,000.

DAOUDNAGUR, da-oud-na-gur', a town of Hindostan, in Behar, 90 miles from Benares. Manf. Woollen and cotton fabrics. Pop. 10,000.—This town is the capital of a DIVISION, with an estimated population at 93,000.

DAOURIA, da-oor'-e-a, a country of Asia, comprising a part of Mantchooria, and the first government of Irkutsk in Russia and China. Its mountains of the same name are rich in metals.

DAPHNE, dăf'-ne, a daughter of the river Peneus, or of the Ladon, and beloved by Apollo during his exile upon earth. The god, pursuing the nymph, overtook her on the banks of the Peneus, and here Daphne, imploring the succour of the gods, was changed into a laurel. Apollo, in despair, crowned himself with its leaves, and ordered that this tree should be sacred to his divinity, and be the reward of poets.

DAPHNIS, dif'-nis, a shepherd of Sicily, who was the son of Mercury and a Sicilian nymph. He was educated by the Nymphs, and is supposed to be the first who wrote pastoral poetry, in which his successor Theocritus so happily excelled.

DARABJIRD, da-rab-jird', a town of Persia, in the province of Fars, 140 miles from Shiraz. A considerable portion of it is in ruins. Pop. 10,000 or 15,000. Lat. 29° N. Lon. 54° 15' E.

D'ARBLAY, Madame, dar'-blai, was the daughter of Charles Burney, the author of the "History of Music," and, in 1793, married a French emigrant artillery officer, with whom she afterwards went to France, and who, on the restoration of the Bourbons, attained the rank of general. After the termination of the war, they returned to England, and settled at Bath, where her husband died in 1818. She continued to reside at Bath up to the time of her death. B. at Lynn Regis, 1752; D. at Bath, 1840.—Madame D'Arblay's maiden name was Frances Burney, and she gained considerable celebrity by her literary productions. These were mostly in the paths of fiction, in which she produced four novels, "Evelina," "Cecilia," "Camilla," and the "Wanderer." For this last she received £1,500, although it is but an indifferent performance. She wrote several other works, among which were Memoirs of her father, which, in 1832, she published in 3 vols.

DARCET, John, dar'-sai, a French chemist and physician, who became professor of chemistry in the National Institute of Paris. He published several papers on the management of potteries, and the nature of earths fit to be used in those manufactories. He also gave analyses of several minerals; and published the "State of the Pyrenees, and of the Causes of their Wasting." B. at Donazit, Guienne, 1725; D. at Paris, 1801.

DARCI, Patrick, dar'-se, an eminent Irish engineer, who was educated at Paris, and, entering the French service, progressively rose through various ranks to a major-generalship. In 1760 he published an "Essay on Artillery." In 1765 appeared his "Memoir on the Duration of the Sensation of Sight," which is considered an ingenious performance. He also produced several meritorious mathematical works. B. in Galway, Ireland, 1725; D. 1779.

DARDANELLES, or HELLESPONT, dar'-da-nells', a narrow channel separating Europe from Asia, running between the Sea of Marmora and the Grecian archipelago. Ext. 40 miles long, with a varying breadth of from 1 to 4 miles. On the European side the coast is steep and rugged, but on the Asiatic, the scenery is extremely beautiful. On both sides are numerous forts, batteries, and several castles, as it is the key to Constantinople. Its ancient name, Hellespont, is derived from Helle, daughter of Alhamas, king of Thebes, who was drowned in it;—its modern, from two castles built by Mahomet IV. in 1658, on its banks, at its S.W. entrance. It is celebrated in ancient history as the water which Xerxes crossed, and in which Leander was drowned when swimming to visit Hero. It has been crossed in modern times by several swimmers, among whom was Lord Byron. In 1807, the English fleet, under Admiral Duckworth, forced the passage of the Dardanelles.

DARDANUS, dar'-da-nus, a son of Jupiter and Electra, who killed his brother Jasius, and fled to Samothrace, and thence to Asia Minor, where he married Batia, the daughter of Teucer, king of Teucria. After the death of his father-in-law he ascended the throne, and reigned 62 years. He was reckoned the founder of the kingdom of Troy.—From him the Trojans are called by the poets Dardanidæ, and he it was who caused to be erected the Palladium, the great statue of Pallas, the idol of the Trojans.

DARENT, dar'-ent, a river of England, rising near Bradsted, in Kent, and, after a course of 20 miles, joining the Thames near Erith.

DARES, dair'-es, a Phrygian, who lived during the Trojan war, in which he was engaged, and of which, it is said, he wrote the history in Greek. This work was extant in the age of Ælian.

DARFUR, or DARFOOR, dar'-foor, a country of Central Africa, occupying a large portion of the territory between Abyssinia and Bornou, but which is little known. On the E. it has Kordofan and the country of the Shilluks, which separate it from Sennaar and Abyssinia; on the W., Bergoo, which divides it from Begharmi and Bornou; while the regions to the S. are inhabited by barbarous nations, whose races extend to the Mountains of the Moon, and the early course of the Bahr-el-Abiad. Its commerce is extensive with Egypt and Nubia, being carried on entirely by the African system of caravans. The caravan going to Egypt consists often of 2,000 camels and 1,000 men. Exp. The most important are slaves, male and female, taken in the negro countries to the S.; camels, ivory, the horns, teeth, and hides of the rhinoceros and hippopotamus; ostrich feathers, gum, pimento, parroquets in abundance, and a small quantity of white copper. Imp. Extremely various; comprising beads of all sorts, toys, glass, arms, light cloths of different kinds, chiefly made in Egypt, with some of French manufacture, red Barbary caps, small carpets, silks wrought and unwrought, shoes, and a considerable quantity of writing-paper. Pop. estimated at 200,000. Lat. between 11° and 15° N. Lon. between 26° and 29° E.—Its limits, however, are rather doubtful. (See AFRICA.)

DARIEN, dair'-e-en, a seaport-town of Georgia, U.S., on the N. and principal channel of the Altamaha, 60 miles from Savannah. It has a trade in cotton.

DARIEN, GULF OF, a portion of the Caribbean Sea, having on its W. side the Isthmus of Darien or Panama. Its extent is 26 leagues from S. to N., and it is 9 wide from E. to W.

DARIEN, or PANAMA, ISTHMUS OF, a narrow neck of land, which connects Central with S. America, and is comprised in the republic of New Grenada. Ext. From E. to W. about 200 miles, with an average breadth of 40: in lon. 79°, however, it is not more than 30. Desc. Hilly, with a mountain-chain running through it and connecting the two systems of Central and S. America. The soil is fertile, and produces maize, rice, sugar, coffee, cocoa, a great variety of fruits, fine timber, dyes, drugs, vanilla, and caoutchouc. A railway, 45 miles long, between Simon, or Navy Bay, on the Atlantic, and Panama on the Pacific, was opened for traffic in 1855. Many schemes have been set on foot with a view to the cutting of a canal through this isthmus, in which undertaking it is said that the existence of the numerous rivers would materially assist. (See NAVY BAY and AMERICA.)

DARIUS THE MEDE, dai-ri'-us, the prince mentioned in the Scriptures, is, according to some, the same as Cyaxeres, son of Astyages, and maternal uncle to Cyrus. D. at Babylon, about 348 B.C.

DARIUS I., king of Persia, was the son of Hystaspes. He entered into a conspiracy with six others against the usurper Smerdis, whom they slew, and then entered into an agreement that he should have the crown, whose horse should neigh first in the morning. By a plan concerted by the groom of Darius, a certain spot was fixed upon, and when the candidates came to the place, the horse of Darius suddenly neighed, in consequence of which he was saluted king. He subsequently took Babylon, after a siege of ten months, rebuilt the temple of Jerusalem and restored the captive Jews to their own country. At Marathon his forces were defeated by the Greeks, on which he resolved to carry on the war in person, but died in the midst of his preparations, 485 B.C.

DARIUS II., surnamed Ochus, or Nothus (bastard), because he was an illegitimate son of Artaxerxes. After the murder of Xerxes, he ascended the Persian throne, and espoused Parisatis, his sister, a cruel princess, by whom he had Artaxerxes Mnemon, Amistris, and Cyrus the Younger. D. 404 B.C.

DARIUS III., surnamed Codomanus, was the last king of Persia. The peace of his kingdom was early disturbed by Alexander, who invaded Persia to avenge the injuries which the Greeks had suffered from the predecessors of Darius. The king of Persia met his adversary in person, at the head of 600,000 men. This army was remarkable, however, more for the splendour of its equipment than its military courage. A battle was fought near the Granicus, in which the Persians were easily defeated. Another was soon after fought near Issus, where Alexander left 110,000 of the enemy dead on the field, and took, among the prisoners of war, the mother, wife, and children of Darius. The darkness of the night favoured the retreat of Darius, who saved himself by flying in disguise. These losses weakened, but did not discourage, the Persian monarch, who assembled another more powerful army, with which he encountered his enemy at Arbela. The victory was long doubtful; but the intrepidity of Alexander and the superior valour of the Macedonians ultimately prevailed over the effeminate Persians, and Darius fled towards Media. His misfortunes were now almost at an end. Bessus, the governor of Bactriana, in hopes of succeeding him on the throne, attempted his life; and Darius was found by the Macedonians, in his chariot, expiring, covered with wounds, 331 B.C. In him the empire of Persia was extinguished, 228 years after it had been first founded by Cyrus the Great. (See ALEXANDER THE GREAT.)

DARK, dark, a county of Ohio, bordering on Indiana, U.S. Area, 714 square miles. Pop. 14,000.

DARKEHNEN, or DARKENEN, dar'-ke-nen, a town of Prussia, on the Angerap, 63 miles S.E. Konigsberg. Manf. Woollen and linen fabrics. Pop. 3,000.

DARKHAN MOUNT, dark'-han, a granite mountain in Mongolia, 145 miles from Ourga, on the way to Pekin. A monument to the memory of Genghis Khan is erected on it.

DARLING, dar'-ling, a principal river of Central Australia, which, after traversing a sterile country and receiving the Bogan, unites with the Murray near lat. 34° S. and lon. 142° E.—For the greater part of its course its waters are salt.

DARLING DOWNS, a settling district of New South Wales, chiefly watered by the Condamine. It lies between lat. 27° and 28° S. Pop. 3,000.

DARLING MOUNTAINS, a range in W. Australia, 250 miles long. Its culminating peak is 3,500 feet above the level of the sea.

DARLINGTON, a town and parish in the bishopric of Durham, on the Skern, which is here crossed by a bridge of three arches, 45 miles from York. The town has an ancient edifice called St. Cuthbert's Church, erected in 1160, by Hugh Pudsey, bishop of Durham; a handsome town-hall and mechanics' institute. Manf. Linen, woollen, and cotton. It also has metal-foundries. Pop. of parish, 12,500; of town, 11,600. It is a station on the Great North of England Railway.

DARLINGTON, a district of S. Carolina, U.S. Area, 1,050 square miles. Pop. 17,000, of whom two thirds are slaves.

DARMADAH, dar'-ma-ha, an island off the African coast, in the Red Sea, 20 miles in circumference. Desc. Low, and mostly covered with jungle. Lat. 12° 15' N. Lon. 42° 55' E.

DARMSTADT, darm'-stat, a neat town of Germany, on the Darm, the capital of the grand-duchy of Hesse Darmstadt, 18 miles from Mentz. It consists of an old and new town, both inclosed by walls. The principal objects of curiosity are the palace of the landgrave Louis VII. and the modern residence of the grand-duke, with its beautiful gardens; the town church, with the tombs of the landgraves; the meeting-house of the States, the academy, the town-school, the public library, consisting of 200,000 volumes, the library of the grand-duke, the cabinet of natural history (containing many curious fossils), the opera-house, several charitable institutions, and a number of different kinds of schools. Manf. Carpets, paper, silver articles, starch, tobacco, and wax-candles. Pop. 30,000.—Here, in 1803, Liebig, the celebrated chemist, was born.

DARNETAL, darn'-tal, a town of France, in the department of the Lower Seine, 2 miles from Rouen. Manf. Woollens and paper. Pop. 6,500.

DARNLEY, Earl of, darn'-le, the ill-fated husband of Mary, queen of Scots. He was married to her in 1565, and two years afterwards was blown up by gunpowder in a house where he was lying unwell, in the neighbourhood of Holyrood palace, at Edinburgh. (See MARY, QUEEN OF SCOTS.)

DARQUIER, Augustin, dar'-ke-ai, a French astronomer, and member of the National Institute, who early discovered a strong inclination for the study of astronomy, which he cultivated with ardour; purchasing instruments, and establishing an observatory in his own house. He also educated pupils, and paid the expense of calculations, and sought for no pecuniary aid from government. His last observations were printed in Lalande's "Histoire Céleste," and are brought down to March, 1798. B. at Toulouse, 1718; D. 1802.

DART, dart, a river of England, rising in Dartmoor, Devonshire, and falling into the English Channel by an estuary which forms Dartmouth harbour.

DARTFORD, dar'-ford, a town and parish of Kent, on the Darent, 15 miles from London. It consists of a principal street, with some smaller avenues. The church is a large edifice, and there are to be seen the remains of a nunnery erected by Edward III. Manf. Gunpowder, paper, oil, and steam-engines. Pop. 6,500. It is a station on the North-Kent Railway.

DARTMOOR, dart'-moor, an extensive tract of land, belonging to the duchy of Cornwall, which occupies the greatest portion of the S.W. district of Devonshire. Ext. 20 miles long, with an average breadth of 10. Desc. Mostly consisting of moorland, as its name implies, with several granite peaks rising to about 2,000 feet, and termed tors. It pastures, in the summer months, large numbers of sheep and cattle, Dartmoor mutton having a high reputation, and has tin and copper mines. In it are a convict prison and an hospital. (See DEVONSHIRE.)

DARTMOUTH, dart'-mouth, a seaport-town of Devonshire, situate 25 miles from Exeter, near the confluence of the Dart with the British Channel. It has a good harbour, with deep water, defended by a castle, and two platforms of cannon. The town occupies the declivity of a craggy hill, and extends about a mile along the water's edge. There are several churches, one of which stands on a hill, about a quarter of a mile from the town, and has a lofty tower, forming a good sea-mark. There are, besides, a gaol, custom-house, and a market-house. It is a coast-guard station, and many of its inhabitants engage in the pilchard fisheries. Exp. Woollen goods, corn, and barley. Imp. Wine, fruit, oil, and salt. Pop. 5,000.—It is a station on the South-Devon Railway, and has daily communication by steamers with Totness.

DARTMOUTH, a seaport-town in Bristol county, Massachusetts, U.S., 62 miles from Boston. Pop. 4,000, mostly engaged in a coasting trade and the whale fishery.

DARU, Pierre Antoine Noel Bruno, Count, dar'-oo, a distinguished poet, historian, and statesman of France, who entered the military service of his country, notwithstanding an ardent attachment which he had to literary pursuits. He rose through a succession of employments, writing poetry, and assisting in the military organization of the army. He attracted the notice of the first consul, and, in 1802, became a member of the Tribunal. In 1805 he was made a counsellor of state, and general intendant of the imperial household. This last office he hesitated to accept. "I have spent my life among books," said he, "and have not had time to study the arts of the courtier." "Of courtiers I have plenty," said Napoleon I.,—"they will never fail; but I want a minister, at once enlightened, vigilant, and firm." He subsequently became the confidential friend of the emperor, and his prime minister. In 1812 he opposed the expedition to Russia, as he did several other of the emperor's schemes. On the abdication of Napoleon, he retired from public life, and, although exiled by the first government of the restored Bourbons, was recalled in 1819, and made a peer of France. He afterwards wrote a "Life of Tully," and a "History of Venice." B. at Montpellier, 1767; D. 1829.

DARWEN, UPPER and LOWER, dar'-wen, two townships in Lancashire, 3 miles from Blackburn. United pop. 15,000.—A station on the Bolton Railway.

DARWIN, Erasmus, dar'-win, an English physician and poet, who, in 1755, took his bachelor's degree in medicine at Cambridge, and, on that occasion, produced a thesis in which he maintained that the movements of the heart and arteries are immediately produced by the stimulus of the blood. From Cambridge he removed to Edinburgh, where he took his doctor's degree, after which he practised at Lichfield. In 1757 he married Miss Howard, of that city, who died in 1770; after which he married the widow of Colonel Pole, who brought him a good fortune. He then removed to Derby, where he passed the remainder of his life. B. at Newark, Nottinghamshire, 1732; D. at Derby, 1802.—Dr. Darwin's literary fame rests upon his "Botanic Garden," with philosophical notes, in two parts:—1. "The Economy of Vegetation." 2. "The Loves of the Plants," 2vols. 8vo. 3. "Zoonomia, or the Laws of Organic Life," 8vo. 4. "Phytologia, or the Philosophy of Agriculture and Gardening," 1 vol. 4to. In these works the poet, botanist, and philosopher appear to advantage, although they are now little read. Besides these, he was the author of papers in the Philosophical Transactions, and a tract on Female Education, 4to. He had also a share in the formation of the System of Vegetables of Linnæus, published in the name of the Botanical Society at Lichfield.

DARWIN, Charles, F.R.S., an eminent modern naturalist, who has distinguished himself by his discoveries in the paths of zoology and geology. He is also widely known by his work entitled, "The Voyage of Naturalists." This is a record of the observations which he made in several of the countries visited by her majesty's ship Beagle, between the years 1832 and 1836, to which he had been attached as naturalist. He has also written several other works, which place him high among geologists.

DATAMES, dăt'-a-mees, a Persian general under Artaxerxes Ochus, gained many victories over the enemies of that prince. Being disgraced, however, by the king, to whom envious courtiers had misrepresented him, he raised Cappadocia in revolt, and defeated Artabazes, whom the king sent against him. Assassinated by Mithridates, 361 B.C.—Cornelius Nepos has written his life.

DATCHET, dătch'-et, a parish of Buckinghamshire, on the Thames, which is here crossed by a bridge, 1½ mile from Windsor, with which it is thus connected. Pop. 900.

DATHAN, dai'-thăn, 'laws,' or 'rights,' a conspirator against Moses.

DATIS, dai'-tis, a general of Darius I., had the command, in conjunction with Artaphernes, of the Persian army which was defeated by Miltiades at Marathon, 490 B.C.—He was subsequently put to death by the Spartans.

DAUBENTON, M., do-ben'-tawng, a French anatomist and naturalist, who became assistant to Buffon in the royal garden, and keeper of the king's museum. In 1744 he was admitted a member of the Academy of Sciences, and contributed several valuable papers to their memoirs. He had also a considerable share in the production of Buffon's "Natural History," generally furnishing the anatomical descriptions. His "Instructions to Shepherds," 1784, 8vo, is an excellent work. He was likewise the author of "A Methodical View of Minerals," and contributed several articles to the "Encyclopædia." B. at Montbard, Burgundy, 1716; D. at Paris, 1800.—Daubenton was the principal means of introducing and successfully propagating the breed of Spanish sheep in France. He was married to the authoress of "Zélie dans le Désert," with whom he lived in great happiness.

DAUBENY, Charles Giles Bridle, M.D., F.R.S., daw'-be-ne, has distinguished himself by his labours in the fields of geology, chemistry, and physiological botany. On these subjects he has published a great many papers, whilst performing his duties as professor of botany and chemistry in the University of Oxford. In 1836 he was elected president of the British Association.

D'AUBIGNÉ, Jean Henri Merle, do-been'-yai, a Swiss theologian, who, for some time, was the pastor of a French church in Hamburg, whence he removed to Brussels, where he acquired great popularity as a preacher. It is, however, on account of his great work, entitled "A History of the Reformation of the 16th Century," that he is here noticed, a performance which has acquired an immense popularity. He is the author of several other works; among which we may name "The Protector (Cromwell); a Vindication;" and "Germany, England, and Scotland." His sympathies lean greatly towards the evangelical Protestantism of the last-named country, to which he has paid frequent visits, and, in 1850, received the freedom of the city of Edinburgh. B. at Geneva, 1794.

D'AUBIGNÉ, Theodore Agrippa. (See AUBIGNÉ, D'.)

David

DAUN, Leopold Joseph Maria, Count, down, a celebrated Austrian general, who served the empress Maria Theresa with the greatest zeal and glory. He commenced his military career against the Turks; but it was as a commander in the armies which were engaged in the "seven years' war" against the king of Prussia, that he attained the acme of his glory. After a series of good fortune, however, he met with a defeat at Torgau, in 1760. B. 1705; D. at Vienna, 1766.

DAUNG, THE, dawng, an Indian tract of country, in the presidency of Bombay, comprising several native states, who pay tribute to a prince called the rajah of Daung. Area, about 1,000 square miles. Pop. 71,000. Lat. between 20° and 21° 5′ N. Lon. between 73° 28′ and 73° 52′ E.

DAUPHIN, daw'-fin, a county of Pennsylvania, U.S., situate on the E. side of the Susquehannah. Area, 608 square miles. Desc. Fertile, though mountainous. Pop. about 36,000.

DAUPHIN, an island in the Gulf of Mexico, near the coast of W. Florida. Ext. 14 miles long. Lat. 30° 18′ N. Lon. 88° 12′ W.

DAUPHINÉ, do'-fe-nai, an old and extensive province in the S.E. of France, now comprised in the three departments of Isère, Drôme, and Upper Alps.—Its counts were called dauphins; and when, in 1349, it was ceded to Philip of Valois, the title of dauphin was given to the eldest son of the king of France, to whom it continued to be applied till the revolution of 1830.

DAURIA, daw'-re-a, a district of N.E. Asia, Mantchooria, and separated by the Daurian mountains, an extensive range, from Lake Baikal.

DAVENANT, Sir William, dăv'-nant, an English poet, who, after being some time at Lincoln College, became page to the duchess of Richmond, and then to Lord Brook. In 1637 he succeeded Ben Jonson as poet laureate; and, having fought for the king during the civil war, received, in 1643, the honour of knighthood. On the decline of the royal cause, he went to France, and formed a plan of carrying out to Virginia, in America, some artificers; but his ship was taken by English cruisers, and he, himself, would have suffered death, had Milton, the great epicist, not interceded on his behalf. This generous act he was enabled, at a future day, similarly to repay to Milton. At the Restoration he obtained a patent for erecting a theatre in Lincolns-Inn Fields, and devoted himself to dramatic composition and poetry. B. at Oxford, 1605; D. in London in 1668, and was interred in Westminster Abbey. His works were published together in 1673.—His son, CHARLES DAVENANT, was well versed in politics, and acquired some reputation by his poetic works, as also others connected with political and social economy. His works were published in five volumes 8vo, 1771. B. 1656; D. 1714.

DAVENTRY, or DAINTRY, dăv'-en-tre, a town and parish of Northamptonshire, 12 miles from Northampton. Manf. Whips and shoes. Pop. 4,500.

DAVID, dai'-vid, a town of S. America, N. Grenada, of recent origin. It is situate on a river of the same name, and has rapidly increased by immigration. Pop. unascertained. Lat. 8° 23′ N. Lon. 82° 27′ W.

DAVID, 'beloved,' king and prophet of Israel, the son of Jesse, was keeping his father's flocks when he was selected and anointed by the prophet Samuel, at the age of 15, to succeed Saul. His valour in killing Goliath, a gigantic Philistine, procured him a place at the court of Saul, who, afterwards, endeavoured to take away his life; on which David fled. When Saul fell, David was acknowledged king by the tribe of Judah; but the other tribes, at the instigation of Abner, placed Ishbosheth, the younger son of Saul, on the throne; thus occasioning a civil war. On the death of Ishbosheth, however, the contending parties united in submission to David, who reigned with great glory for thirty years. He took Jerusalem from the Jebusites, and gained considerable victories over the Philistines and other neighbouring nations; but tarnished his glory by taking Bethshebah from Uriah, her husband, and putting him to death. He also suffered by causing the people to be numbered. A rebellion was excited against him by his son Absalom, which was quelled, and Absalom slain. When the news of this was brought to David, he lamented the untimely fall of his son in affecting terms. At the close of his life, he abdicated in favour of his son Solomon. B. at Bethlehem, 1085; D. 1015 B.C. —A considerable portion of the book of Psalms was composed by him, and is both a pathetic and sublime collection of devotional poetry.

DAVID, St., a British saint, who, in the 5th century, was bishop of Caerleon, and the metropolitan of the Welsh church. He subsequently removed his see to Mynyw, which came to be called Ty Dewi, or the house of St. David. There are many churches dedicated to him in Wales; but the notion of his being the patron saint of that country, and his originating its symbol in the leek, are treated as modern inventions. Lived in the 5th century.—The wearing of the leek, in Wales, on St. David's day, probably originated from the custom of Cymhortha, or the friendly aid, practised among farmers. In some districts of South Wales, all the neighbours of a small farmer were wont to appoint a day when they attended to plough his land, and the like; and, at such time, it was the custom for each to bring his portion of leeks with him for making the broth or soup.

DAVID I., king of Scotland, succeeded his brother, Alexander the Fierce, in 1124. He was reared in England, and married Maud, grand-niece of William the Conqueror. When called to the Scottish throne, he held the earldom of Northumberland and Huntingdon, and, on the death of Henry I., king of England, maintained the claim of his daughter Maud against Stephen, and seized Carlisle. He was, however, defeated at the battle of Northallerton, in 1138. The following year a negotiation was entered into, by which Carlisle was suffered to remain in the possession of David. D. at Carlisle, 1153.

DAVID II., king of Scotland, was the son of Robert Bruce, at whose death he was but five years old. On the invasion of his country by Baliol, he was sent to France; but his party prevailing, after a bloody contest, he returned in 1342. He made several inroads on England, but was taken prisoner and conveyed to the Tower, where he was confined till 1357, when, on paying a heavy ransom, he was set free. D. in 1371.

DAVID OF HIRAZUG, surnamed the Black, a Welsh divine, bard, and grammarian. The literary compositions of the Welsh being affected by their conquest by Edward I., this divine was chosen to modify the grammar and system of prosody of Edeyrn, agreeably to the regulations which took place on that occasion. He also translated several copies of a Missal, or the Office of the Virgin, into Welsh. Flourished in the 14th century.

DAVID AB GWILYM, a celebrated Welsh bard, who composed a variety of beautiful poems, under the patronage of Ivor the Generous. The subject of the greater part of these is love. One hundred and forty-seven of them he dedicated to the fair Morvid, his mistress; but she rejected his suit, and married Rhys Gwgan, an officer in the English army at the battle of Cressy. Flourished in the 14th century. His works were printed in London, in 1789.

DAVID COMNENUS, the last emperor of Trebizond, who had usurped the throne on the death of his brother John. In 1458 he relinquished his kingdom to Mahomet II., on condition that the latter should espouse his daughter Anne, and that his own life should be saved. The sultan observed the first of these conditions, but caused David to be put to death, with seven of his sons, 1462.

DAVID, James Louis, a celebrated French artist, who, after studying in Paris, went to Rome, where his talents for historical painting rapidly developed themselves. In 1789 he produced his picture representing Lucius Junius Brutus passing sentence of death upon his son Titus, which, to some extent, may be considered to have indicated the political tendency of his mind to the worship of democratic principles. He became a devoted admirer of the monsters Robespierre and Marat, and eagerly accepted office in the bloodiest periods of the great Revolution. He became a member of the National Convention, and also of the Jacobin Mountain, when he imagined he discovered in Robespierre a resemblance to Phocion, and in Collot d'Herbois a reproduction of Marius. He painted pictures of republican heroism, voted for the death of Louis XVI., and escaped guillotining himself only on account of his artistic celebrity. In 1800 Napoleon appointed him painter to the government; and throughout the imperial rule, his influence controlled, to a large extent, the fine arts in France. On the fall of the emperor, he was driven into exile. B. at Paris, 1748; D. at Brussels, 1825.—The best paintings of David, however excellent in other respects, are deficient in vitality. His figures have the form but not the breath of life in them; consequently, they can be considered as little more than beautiful sculptures represented on canvas. His best works are the "Oath of the Horatii," the "Rape of the Sabines," the "Death of Socrates," and "Napoleon presenting the Imperial Eagles to his Troops." His portrait of Napoleon I. is generally well known.

DAVID, Félicien, da'-veed, a modern French composer, who, after attaining to considerable excellence on the violin, became musical director at the church of Saint-Sauveur, Aix. Here he continued to devote himself to his professional duties; but becoming imbued with the doctrines of Saint-Simon, he, with some others, paid a visit to Egypt, the Holy Land, and the Desert. He was gone three years, and when he returned, published some "Oriental Melodies," which were not well received. Still devoting himself to study, he adopted loftier themes for the exercise of his genius, and in 1844 produced his ode entitled "The Desert," which met with a brilliant success. After this, came his "Moses on the Mount," "Christopher Columbus," for which Louis Philippe conferred on him the cross of the Legion of Honour; and several other works of great merit. B. at Cadenet, in Vaucluse, 1810.

DAVID'S, St., a decayed town of Pembrokeshire, S. Wales, about 2 miles from the sea. It is an episcopal see, and the cathedral and bishop's palace stand a little to the south of the town. The diocese comprises Carmarthen, Pembroke, Brecon, and the greater part of Radnorshire, with some adjoining parishes. The residence of the bishop is at Abergwilli. Pop. of parish, about 2,500, of which nearly one half is in the city.

DAVID'S HEAD, St., the extreme W. point of Wales, in Pembrokeshire. Lat. 51° 50′ N. Lon. 5° 15′ W.

DAVIDSON, da'-vid-son, two counties in the United States.—1. In West Tenessee. Area, 720 square miles. Pop. 39,000.—2. In North Carolina. Area, 380 square miles. Pop. 16,000, of whom a sixth are slaves.

DAVIES, Sir John, da'-vis, an English poet, lawyer, and political writer, who, on the accession of James I., had the honour of knighthood conferred on him, and was made attorney-general for Ireland. In 1626 he was appointed chief justice of the King's Bench, but died in the same year. B. at Chisgrove, Wiltshire, 1570.—Sir John wrote a valuable book on the state of Ireland. His poetical works, of which that entitled "Nosce Teipsum" is the principal, were collected and published in 1773, 12mo.

DAVIES, Thomas, an intelligent and enterprising publisher, who was educated at Edinburgh, and becoming an actor, received an engagement at the Haymarket theatre, London. He subsequently became a bookseller in Russell Street, Covent Garden, where he was patronized by Dr. Johnson, and, through him, by other celebrities of his time. In 1780 he published the "Life of Garrick," which had a good sale. He also wrote "Dramatic Miscellanies," the "Life of Henderson the Player," and several fugitive pieces. B. 1712; D. 1783.—Dr. Johnson declared that Davies was "learned enough for a clergyman." The Docto was first introduced to Boswell in his back shop; and both he and his wife, distinguished by her beauty, were highly esteemed by the great lexicographer, who lived on as easy an intimacy with them, as with any family he visited. It was the unmerciful ridicule of Churchill in his "Rosciad" which drove Davies from the stage.

"With him came mighty Davies;—on my life,
That Davies has a very pretty wife!—
Statesman all over—in plots famous grown,
He mouths a sentence as curs mouth a bone!"

DAVILA, Henry Catherine, da'-ve-la, an Italian historian, whose family was of Spanish extraction, and had furnished several constables to the island of Cyprus.

The Turks taking this island, at an early age he was brought from Padua to France, where his father enjoyed the favour of Henry III. and Catherine de Medicis. In compliment to these royal friends, he received his baptismal names; and, at first a page, he afterwards took service under Henry IV., and was present, during the civil war, in 1597, at Honfleur and Amiens. He, afterwards, returned to Padua, and then fixed his residence at Venice, where he, again, took up arms and rendered great services to the republic. He now set about writing, in Italian, a "History of the Civil Wars in France, from the Death of Henry II. to the Peace of Vervins," which was published at Venice, 1630. B. near Padua, 1576; assassinated near Verona, 1631. His history is universally esteemed for the exactness of its facts and the excellence of its style, although the author has been reproached with showing some partiality for Catherine de Medicis. It has been translated into French several times, and also into English.

Davis, John, dai'-vis, an English navigator, who, in 1585, had the command of an expedition to discover a N.W. passage to America. In this voyage he discovered the strait called by his name. The year following he sailed on the same design, and having explored the coasts of Greenland and Iceland, proceeded as far as lat. 72° N. In 1591 he went as second in command with Cavendish, in his voyage to the South Seas. After this, he made five voyages to the East Indies, but was killed in the last of these, in a fight with some Japanese pirates, on the coast of Malacca. B. near Dartmouth, Devonshire; slain, 1605.—He wrote an account of some of his voyages, and invented a quadrant, which was used for taking the sun's altitude at sea, till superseded by Hadley's sextant.

Davis Strait, a narrow sea, which divides Greenland on the W. from British N. America, and connects Baffin's Bay with the Atlantic Ocean. Its narrowest part is about 150 miles across. It was discovered by the English navigator of the same name.

Davoust, or Davout, Louis Nicholas, dai'-voost, a celebrated French marshal, began life with Bonaparte, as a student at Brienne. In 1785 he entered the army, and, taking the side of the revolutionists, fought under Dumouriez at Jemappe, on November 8, 1792. In 1793 he was made a general; but being of a noble family, he was forced to resign his command, on account of the decree which forbade such to enter upon active service. The downfall of Robespierre, however, enabled him to recover his rank in the army, with which he fought on the Rhine, under Pichegru. In the Italian campaigns he procured the friendship of Napoleon I., and afterwards accompanied him to Egypt. On his return, he was made a general of division, and commanded the cavalry of the Army of Italy. He contributed to the victory of Marengo, and became a marshal under the imperial dynasty. He commanded the right wing at Austerlitz, and, on October 14, 1806, defeated the duke of Brunswick at Auerstadt. For this he was created duke of Auerstadt. For his services at Eckmuhl he was created prince of Eckmuhl, and at Wagram once more commanded the right wing. He was with the Russian expedition, and was wounded in the battle of Borodino. After the retreat from Moscow, he held Hamburg, where he had his headquarters, against all the forces of the allies, and only, after the peace of 1814, surrendered to General Gérard, who was the bearer of the commands of Louis XVIII. On the return of Napoleon from Elba, he became minister of war. After Waterloo, he lived in retirement till 1819, when he re-entered the Chamber of Peers. B. at Annoux, in the Yonne, 1770; D. 1823.

Davy, Sir Humphrey, dai'-ve, a distinguished modern chemist, who was intended for the medical profession, but who relinquished that design, and became superintendent of the Pneumatic Institution at Bristol. While fulfilling his duties in this capacity, he published his "Chemical and Philosophical Researches," which obtained for him the professorship of chemistry in the Royal Institution of London. In the April of 1801 he gave his first lecture, and, from that time, his popularity extended to all parts of the country. In the following year he was made professor to the Board of Agriculture, and, in 1818, had a baronetcy conferred on him. In 1820 he was elected president of the Royal Society, to whose Transactions he continued to contribute papers, on subjects of the greatest interest, for several years. B. at Penzance, Cornwall, in 1778; D. at Geneva, Switzerland, 1829.—The exertions of Davy in the fields of science have given his name an imperishable fame. He discovered the metallic bases of the earths and alkalies, the principles of electro-chemistry, and invented the miners' safety-lamp. In reference to his discovery of the composition of the fixed alkalies, Dr. Paris says, "Since the account given by Newton of his first discoveries in optics, it may be questioned whether so happy and successful an instance of philosophical induction has been afforded as that of Davy." The same writer says of him, that "he was endued with the spirit, and was a master of the practice of the inductive logic; and that he has left us some of the noblest examples of the efficacy of that great instrument of human reason in the discovery of truth." Besides his philosophical works, he wrote "Salmonia; or, Days of Fly-fishing;" and "Consolations in Travel."—His brother and biographer, John, M.D., F.R.S., was also an eminent chemist, physiologist, and geologist. He entered the army as a surgeon, and became inspector-general of army hospitals, on half pay. He wrote largely on general subjects, as well as on those connected with the natural sciences.

Dawes, Richard, dawz, a learned critic, who, in 1736, published proposals for a Greek translation of "Paradise Lost," which was never completed. In 1738 he was appointed master of the grammar-school at Newcastle-upon-Tyne; and, in 1745, published his "Miscellanea Critica; or, a Collection of Remarks on various Ancient Authors," a work of high value. In 1749 Dawes resigned the mastership of his school, and died at Heworth, near Newcastle, 1766; B. at Market Bosworth, 1708.

Dawlish, daw'-lish, a town and parish of Devonshire, 3 miles from Teignmouth. Pop. 3,600.—It is a station of the Great Western Railway.

Dax, dax, a well-built town of France, in the department Landes, on the Adour, 25 miles from Bayonne. It has an old wall, flanked with towers, and is protected by a castle. This place has long been celebrated for its mineral waters and baths, and is, in consequence, much frequented. Manf. Leather, thread, earthenware, linseed-oil, and vinegar. It also has a trade in brandy, Bayonne hams, and wood. Pop. 6,000.—Dax was taken by the English in the 12th century, and remained in their possession till the middle of the 16th. It is connected by rail with Bayonne and Bordeaux.

Day, Thomas, an English writer, the author of "Sandford and Merton," whose father was a collector of the customs, and died while he was an infant, leaving Thomas £1,200 a year. His manners were eccentric, and his opinions romantic. He and a friend of his, called Bicknel, took two orphan children from the workhouse at Shrewsbury, to educate them in the ancient Roman manner, and afterwards to marry them. The project, however, failed, and Mr. Day married, in 1778, a Miss Mills, of Derbyshire. He wrote several works; but the one by which his name will be perpetuated is "The History of Sandford and Merton," a romantic tale, for young persons, pleasing, but fanciful, and of much the same stamp as Rousseau's "Emilius." B. in London, 1748; D. 1789.

Day, St., a town of Cornwall, 8 miles from Truro. Pop. 2,000, chiefly employed in the mines.

Dayton, dai'-ton, a post-township of Ohio, U.S., on the Miami, 52 miles from Cincinnati, with which it is connected by the Miami. Pop. 11,000, mostly employed in cotton-mills, iron-foundries, and machine workshops.

Dead Sea, or Lake Asphaltites, ded, that is, the 'Lake of Bitumen,' a lake of Palestine, about 20 miles from Jerusalem at its N. point. Ext. About 35 miles long, with an average breadth of from 10 to 12. Five cities, including Sodom and Gomorrah, situate on this spot, were, according to Scripture, all swallowed up, to satisfy divine vengeance for their iniquity. The neighbourhood of the lake abounds with volcanic products. It receives the river Jordan on its N. side, and, it has been affirmed, that no animal has been found in it. The Asclepias gigantea (the apple of Sodom) grows on its W. coast; and, though inviting to the eye, the fruit crumbles into dust in the hand. The depth of the lake is about 350 fathoms, and its surface is upwards of 1,000 feet below that of the Mediterranean Sea. Its centre is in lat. 31° 30′ N.; lon. 35° 30′ E.

DEADMAN'S HEAD, ded-mans, a promontory on the coast of Cornwall, in the English Channel. Lat. 50° 30′ N. Lon. 4° 48′ W.

DEAL, deel, a maritime town on the coast of Kent, situate between the N. and S. Forelands, 8 miles from Dover, opposite the Goodwin Sands. It is a member of the Cinque Port of Sandwich, and stands on the seashore, which forms a bold beach, and is defended from the violence of the waves, by a long rampart of pebbles, thrown up by the sea. In the upper part, the streets are broad and capacious; but, in Lower Deal, they are narrow and dirty. To the S. of the town is Walmer Castle, where the first duke of Wellington died, in 1852. Besides the parish church, there are a chapel of ease, a public library and reading-room, a regular custom-house, and naval store-house. At a little distance is an extensive naval hospital, and, at the back of the town, a commodious house of industry. The Deal pilots and boatmen are intrepid and excellent seamen, and particularly active in affording assistance to vessels in distress. Pop. 14,500.—It is supposed by many, that it was on the coast between Deal and Dover that Julius Cæsar landed, on his invasion of Britain. Others, however, place the landing at Folkestone.

DEAN, deen, a name common to a large number of English parishes, with populations ranging between 300 and 30,000. The largest is in Lancashire, 130 miles from Great Bolton, with cotton-mills, coal-mines, and bleaching-works. The population of none of the rest reaches above 1,000.

DEAN, FOREST OF, a royal forest in Gloucestershire, formerly of considerable extent, but now reduced to about 11,000 acres, inclosed for growing timber for the navy. It is 5 miles from Newnham. Its orchards yield the famous styre-apple cider, and it is connected by numerous railways with the rivers Severn and Wye. The inhabitants have no county rates, and enjoy other privileges. Pop. 11,000, much employed in coal and iron works.

DEARBORN, deer'-born, a county of Indiana, U.S., on Ohio river Area, 308 square miles. Pop. 30,000.—A river in Missouri territory, running into the Missouri, above the Falls, near the Rocky Mountains.

DEBENHAM, deb'-nam, a town and parish of Suffolk, on the Deben, 12 miles from Ipswich. Pop. 1,700.

DEBIR, de'-bir, 'oracle,' or 'discourse,' a king of Eglon slain by Joshua.

DEBO, LAKE, de'-bo, is in Central Africa, about 140 miles from Timbuctoo. It is traversed by the Joliba, and has a town of the same name on its shores.

DEBORAH, deb'-o-ra, a Hebrew prophetess, who, by her exhortations, prevailed on Barak to march against Sisera, general of the troops of Jabin. Lived in the 13th century B.C.

DEBRETZIN, de-bret'-zin, a large town of Hungary, 160 miles from Vienna. It has several Catholic and Calvinist churches, monasteries, hospitals, an orphan-house, a town-hall, and a celebrated Calvinistic college, with a large library. Manf. Furs, shoes, soap, pipe-bowls, tobacco, combs, and turnery wares. Pop. about 45,000, of whom 30,000 are Magyars.—This town was, in 1684, taken by the Turks, but abandoned by them in the same year.

DE CANDOLLE, Augustin Pyramus, kan'-dol, a French botanist, who, in 1807, was made professor of botany in the University of Montpellier. A chair was subsequently specially established for him in Geneva, when he designed to produce a work which should comprehend a description of all known plants. Such an undertaking was of too great magnitude for one man; consequently, he was obliged to abandon his design. He, however, wrote largely on his favourite science, besides contributing papers to the Transactions of almost every scientific society in Europe. D. at Geneva, 1778; D. 1841.

DECAPOLIS, de-kap'-o-lis, 'ten cities,' a province having ten cities, east of the Jordan.

DECATUR, de-kai'-tur, the names of three counties in the United States, with populations ranging between 7,000 and 16,000.—They are in the states of Georgia, Indiana, and Tenessee.

DECCAN, dek'-kan, or the Country of the South, an extensive region of India, bounded N. by the Nerbudda, S. by the Krishna or Kistna river, E. by the Bay of Bengal, and W. by the Arabian Sea. Ext. 900 miles long, and 490 at its greatest breadth. It comprises the provinces of Candeish, Gundwana, Berar, Orissa, the Northern Circars, Arungabad, Beeder, Bejapore, Hyderabad, and the dominions of the Nizam, the rajahs of Berar and Sattara, the Guicowar and Gwalior sovereigns.—BRITISH DECCAN comprises the electorates of Poona, Ahmednuggur, Dharwar, and Candeish. Some of the mountains of this country attain an elevation of nearly 9,000 feet above the level of the sea. This immense territory formed, for a long period, a state of itself. In the seventeenth century it was conquered by Aurungzebe, and, after his death, was split up into a number of petty principalities. The British now possess a large portion of the Deccan, the remainder being tributary to them.

DECCAN ISLAND is in the Bay of Bengal, at the mouth of the Brahmapootra. Ext. 30 miles long, by 12 broad. It lies very low, and at spring tides is nearly submerged.

DECEBALUS, de-seb'-a-lus, a warlike king of the Daci, who was successful in a war against the emperor Domitian, but was conquered by Trajan. In despair at his reverses, he destroyed himself, and Dacia became a Roman province. This was in 105.

DECEMVIRI, de-sem'-vi-ri, magistrates, who were created at Rome, 451 B.C., to compile a code of laws, and were ten in number,—whence their name. All other magistrates were suspended, and their power was absolute. At first, the decemvirs used their authority with considerable moderation, reduced the laws under twelve heads, and caused them to be engraved on twelve tables of brass. In the third year of their creation, however, the decemvirs became odious on account of their tyranny; and the attempt of Appius Claudius to gain possession of Virginia, caused the total abolition of their office. The people were so exasperated against them, that they demanded them from the senate, to burn them alive. Consuls were again appointed, and tranquillity re-established in the state. (See CLAUDIUS, Appius.)

DECEPTION ISLAND, de-sep'-shun, a volcanic island in the Antarctic Ocean, consisting of layers of ashes and ice.

DECIUS MUS, de'-she-us mus, a celebrated Roman consul, who, after many glorious exploits, devoted himself to the gods' manes for the safety of his country, in a battle against the Latins, throwing himself into the midst of the ranks of the enemy, and dying, covered with wounds, 338 B.C. His son and grandson also imitated his devotedness in the same manner; the first in a battle with the Gauls and Samnites, 295 B.C.; the second, in the war against Pyrrhus, 279 B.C.

DECIUS, a Roman emperor, who distinguished himself by an expedition against the Persians, and by persecuting the Christians. In his march against the Goths, he entered a morass, where he and his army, attacked by the enemy, perished, 251 A.D.

DECIZE, de-seez', a town of France, in the department of the Nièvre, 18 miles from Nevers. It stands on a rock in the middle of an island formed by the Loire, and has extensive coal and iron works in the vicinity. Pop. 3,000.

DECKER, Thomas, dek'-ker, an English dramatist, cotemporary with Ben Jonson, who satirized him in his "Poetaster," under the name of Crispanus, Decker retorting in his "Satyromastix; or, Untrussing of a Humorous Poet." He wrote several plays, some of which possess merit. D. about 1638.—The best-known drama of Decker is "Fortunatus, or the Wishing-cap;" and his best-known tract is "The Gull's Horn-book." From this, Sir Walter Scott, in his "Fortunes of Nigel," draws largely for his description of London life. It was first printed in 1609, and gives a very minute and curious picture of the manners and customs of the middle classes of society in the seventeenth century.

DECURIO, de-ku'-re-o, the title of a subaltern officer in the Roman armies, who commanded a decuria, which consisted of ten men. (See CENTURIA.)

DEDDINGTON, ded'-ding-ton, a parish and town of Oxfordshire, 15 miles from Oxford. It consists of one principal street, and has a large market-square. Pop. 2,100. It is a station on the Oxford and Rugby branch of the Great Western Railway.

DEDHAM, ded'-ham, a parish and village of Essex, picturesquely situate on the Stour, 4 miles from Manningtree. Pop, 1,800.

DEE, a river of Wales, rising in Lake Bala, Merionethshire, and, after a course of 70 miles, falling into the Irish Sea, about 15 miles below Chester.

DEE, a river of Scotland, rising in the Cairngorm mountains, on the N. side of Cairntoul, Aberdeenshire, and, after a course of 90 miles, falling into the German Ocean, at the town of Aberdeen. Its source has an elevation of 4,000 feet, and it drains 1,000 square miles of country.—Another, in Kirkcudbrightshire, which, after a course of 50 miles, joins the Solway Firth, below the town of Kirkcudbright.

DEE, a river of Ireland, which traverses the county of Louth, and, after a course of 20 miles, falls into Dundalk Bay.

DEE, John, an English mathematician and philosopher, who, on the founding of Trinity College, Cambridge, was chosen one of its fellows. Becoming, however, suspected of practising magic, he went to Louvain, where he took his doctor's degree in civil law. He there read lectures in the mathematics, and also at Paris, where he was offered a mathematical professorship in the university. In 1551 he returned to England, and obtained the rectory of Upton-upon-Severn; but his devotion to mathematical studies again brought him into trouble, by causing him to be accused of practising magical incantations. He was also accused of preaching against the life of Queen Mary, for which he suffered imprisonment. On the death of Mary, he rose into favour with Queen Elizabeth, who visited him at Mortlake, where he resided, and collected a library. As the people would have him a magician, he seems, at length, to have believed that he was one, and in 1581, with Edward Kelly, began magical operations, which lasted two years. In these they were joined by a Polish nobleman, called Laski, who persuaded Dee to go to Poland, where they remained some time, holding communication with spirits. He subsequently returned, by order of the queen, and, in 1596, was made warden of Manchester College. B. in London, 1527; D. at Mortlake, 1608.—He published several mathematical works in Latin and English, and wrote many more, which were never printed; but in 1659 Dr. Casaubon published "A true and faithful Relation of what passed for many years between Dr. John Dee and some Spirits," &c. The genius of Dee was comprehensive, and seems to have been misunderstood in the age in which he lived.

DEEPING, de'-ping, the name of three parishes in England, none of them with a population above 2,000.

DEER, two parishes of Scotland, none of them with a population above 5,000.

DEFIANCE, de-fi'-ance, a county of Ohio, U.S., bordering on Indiana. Area, 414 square miles. Pop. 7,000.

DE FOE, Daniel, de-fo', the author of "Robinson Crusoe," was the son of James Foe, a butcher, of St. Giles, Cripplegate. He himself prefixed the De to his name, but for what reason we have no intimation. In 1688 our author kept a hosier's shop in Cornhill; but becoming a bankrupt, had recourse to his pen for a subsistence. He subsequenely received the appointment of accountant to the commissioners of the glass duty, which office he held till that impost was taken off. In 1701 he produced his "True-born Englishman," and in the following year, appeared his "Shortest Way with the Dissenters," a pamphlet which drew upon him the vengeance of the government. Beholding the danger with which he was threatened, he absconded, when, on the 10th January, 1703, the following interesting descriptive advertisement appeared in the London Gazette:—"Whereas Daniel De Foe, alias De Fooe, is charged with writing a scandalous and seditious pamphlet, entitled, 'The Shortest Way with the Dissenters.' He is a middle-sized spare man, about 40 years old, of a brown complexion, and dark brown-coloured hair, but wears a wig; a hooked nose, a sharp chin, grey eyes, and a large mole near his mouth; was born in London, and for many years was a hose-factor in Freeman's Yard, in Cornhill, and now is owner of the brick and pantile works near Tilbury Fort, in Essex. Whoever will discover the said Daniel De Foe to one of her majesty's principal secretaries of state, or any of her majesty's justices of the peace, so that he may be apprehended, shall have the reward of £50, which her majesty has ordered immediately to be paid upon such discovery." The luck-less author was discovered, brought to trial, and sentenced to be pilloried, fined, and imprisoned. In the Gazette of the 31st July of the same year, it is recorded, that "on the 29th instant Daniel Foe, alias De Foe, stood in the pillory before the Royal Exchange in Cornhill, as he did yesterday near the Conduit in Cheapside, and this day at Temple Bar, in pursuance of his sentence, given against him at the last sessions at the Old Bailey, for writing and publishing a seditious libel, entitled, 'The Shortest Way with the Dissenters.' By which sentence he is also fined 200 marks, to find sureties for his good behaviour for seven years, and to remain in prison till all be performed." However cruel had been the design of the government, in passing sentence on De Foe, the punishment itself was a complete failure. Such a pillory exhibition had seldom been seen in England; for exulting thousands accompanied him each day from Newgate to the pillory, to protect him from hurt or insult, and greeted him, also, with shouts of triumph on his return to Newgate. The very pillory itself was said to have been decorated with garlands; for it was the height of summer, when there was an abundance of flowers: and not only this; but refreshments were provided for him. On regaining his liberty, he retired to Bury St. Edmunds, where he continued to exercise his pen, and was instrumental in promoting the union of England and Scotland. In 1713 he was again committed to prison for some political pamphlets, but Lord Oxford procured his pardon. In 1715 he published the "Family Instructor," a religious performance of merit; and in 1719 appeared his greatest work, the romance of "Robinson Crusoe," supposed to have been founded on the story of Alexander Selkirk's being left on the island of Juan Fernandez. De Foe wrote a number of other fictions of considerable merit. B. in London, 1664; D. 1731.—In concluding this brief sketch of one of the greatest and most original of England's fiction-writers, we cannot resist the temptation to insert the following record of what were his sentiments regarding the opinions of mankind, and what had been his own experience of life. The above advertisement describes the outward man. The inward shall be described by himself. "I am a Stoic," says he, "in whatever may be the event of things. I'll do and say what I think is a debt of justice and truth, without the least regard to clamour and reproach; and as I am utterly unconcerned at human opinion, the people that throw away their breath so freely in censuring me, may consider of some better improvement to make of their passions, than to waste them on a man that is both above and below the reach of them. I know too much of the world to expect good in it, and have learned to value it too little to be concerned at the evil. I have gone through a life of wonders, and am the subject of a vast variety of providences. I have been fed more by miracle than Elijah when the ravens were his purveyors. I have, some time ago, summed up the scenes of my life in this distich :—

No man has tasted differing fortunes more;
And thirteen times, I have been rich and poor.

In the school of affliction I have learned more philosophy than at the academy, and more divinity than from the pulpit. In prison, I have learned that liberty does not consist in open doors and the egress and ingress of locomotion. I have seen the rough side of the world as well as the smooth, and have, in less than half a year, tasted the difference between the closet of a king and the dungeon of Newgate. I have suffered deeply for cleaving to principles." Such is the experience of the author of "Robinson Crusoe," one of the most delightful romances that ever emanated from a human brain. "Was there ever anything written by mere man," asks Dr. Johnson, "that the reader wished longer, except 'Robinson Crusoe,' 'Don Quixote,' and the 'Pilgrim's Progress'?"

DEGNEZLI, de-neez'-le, a city of Asia Minor, 52 miles from Allah Shehr. In 1715, 12,000 of its inhabitants were destroyed by an earthquake. From that time it has never regained its former importance.

DEHRA DOON, de'-ra doon, a district of the N. W. Provinces in British India, consisting mostly of a fertile valley, 50 miles long, by 15 broad. Pop. 35,000. Lat. between 30° and 30° 32′ N. Lon. between 77° 43′ and 78° 24′ E.—The tea-plant has been introduced and successfully cultivated in this district.

DEIOPEIA, de'-i-o-pe'-ya, a nymph, the fairest of all the fourteen nymphs that attended upon Juno, who promised her in marriage to Æolus, the god of the winds, if he would destroy the fleet of Æneas, which was sailing for Italy.

DEIR, dair, the name of many places in the East, the principal being 10 miles from Beyrout, in Syria. It is the chief town of the Druses, whose emir lives in its citadel.

DEJANIRA, dej'-a-ni'-ra, a daughter of Œneus, king of Ætolia. Her father promised to give her in marriage to him only who proved to be the strongest of all his competitors. Hercules obtained the prize, and married Dejanira, by whom he had three children. When Nessus, a centaur, who had offered violence to Dejanira, was dying by a poisoned arrow shot from the bow of Hercules, she accepted from him the present of his tunic, which Nessus said had the power of reclaiming a husband from unlawful loves. Accordingly, when Hercules became enamoured of Iola, daughter of the king of Œchalia, she sent him the centaur's tunic, which instantly caused his death. Dejanira was so disconsolate at this event, that she destroyed herself. (See HERCULES.)

DEJOTARUS, de-jot'-a-rus, a tetrarch of Galatia, who was created, by the Romans, king of that country, with the addition of Lesser Armenia. He joined the party of Pompey, but, on the defeat of that general, submitted himself to Cæsar, who dethroned him, but soon afterwards restored his estates. Lived in the 1st century B C.

DE KALB, kälb, the name of several counties in the United States, with populations ranging between 8,000 and 15,000. They are situate in Georgia, Alabama, Tenessee, Indiana, and Illinois.

DE LA BÈCHE, Sir Henry Thomas, baish, an eminent geologist, who first imbibed a taste for that science whilst residing at Charmouth and Lyme Regis, previous to his being sent to the military school at Great Marlow, since removed to Sandhurst. In 1814 he entered the army, and in 1817 became a fellow of the Geological Society. Of this society he subsequently became secretary, foreign secretary, and finally president in 1847. Throughout the whole of his life, he ardently devoted himself to his favourite science, reporting on the geology of Cornwall, Devon, Somerset, Dorset, Wales, and other parts; and was, by his map of Cornwall, the cause of suggesting to the government the geological survey. He founded the Museum of Practical Geology, and succeeded in establishing the School of Mines. His mind was of an eminently practical character. In 1819 he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society, and in 1848 was knighted. In 1853 he was elected a corresponding member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris; but, by this time, his career was drawing to a close. B. near London, 1796; D. 1855.—Sir Henry wrote largely on geology, and published several excellent manuals for the young student. His "How to Observe," first published in 1835, has been pronounced a truly Baconian volume,—a sort of Novum Organum of geology.

DELACROIX, Ferdinand Victor Eugène, del'-a-krwaw, a distinguished French painter. His father passed through the sternest scenes of the great revolution, and, in 1805, died prefect of the Mouths of the Rhone and the Gironde. Young Delacroix was well educated, and entered the Academy of Arts in his 18th year. His first exhibited picture represented "Dante and Virgil sailing round the Infernal City," and excited a great deal of controversy; which may be taken as a sign of its being differently executed from the style of French art then in vogue, as well as of its indicating proofs of genius. It was succeeded by the "Massacre of Scio," which placed him at the head of a school designated the "Romantic." Both of these pictures now belong to the national collection, and hang on the walls of the Luxembourg. His position was now in a measure fixed, and he continued to work with unremitting assiduity. Among his earlier performances, we may notice his "Christ in the Garden," "Milton dictating 'Paradise Lost' to his Daughters," and "Mephistopheles appearing to Faust." The revolution of 1830 supplied him with other themes; but having become an attaché of the government mission to Morocco, the scenes of the East suggested new subjects. On his return, he exhibited, in 1834, "Women of Algiers;" a work which Parisian judges declared placed him on a parity with Rubens as a colorist. M. Thiers, who had from the first been his admirer, being now minister of the interior, gave him the walls of the Salon du Roi, at the Palais Bourbon, to paint; which he accomplished by symbollically illustrating the arts, winning for himself still greater fame. He was now called upon to adorn other public buildings, at which he laboured, whilst, at intervals, he produced other important gallery and cabinet paintings. Among these may be named "Hamlet with the Skull of Yorick," "Meden," "Cleopatra," "Christ at the Tomb," and the "Resurrection of Lazarus." His works, as a whole, are numerous, and marked by great energy of style and originality of invention. His admirers place him on the same pedestal with Paul Veronese. B. at Charenton-Saint-Maurice, near Paris, 1799.

DELAGOA BAY, del'-a-go'-a, is situate on the E. coast of Africa, about midway between Mozambique and the Cape. Ext. 25 miles long, by 20 broad. There is a settlement supposed to be inhabited by about 10,000 natives. The bay is a good deal frequented by the South-Sea whalers, who find it safe and commodious. The most N. point of its entrance is in lat. 25° 58′ S.; lon. 33° 15′ E.

DELAMBRE, Jean Baptiste Joseph, del-ambr', a distinguished modern French astronomer, who was first taught by the poet Delisle, at Amiens, and who afterwards entered the astronomical class under Lalande, in the College of France, at Paris. This teacher, as did Delisle, became the friend of Delambre; and many of the calculations of the master were performed by the pupil. Up to this period, Delambre had supported himself by translating foreign works for publishers, and by giving instructions as a professor of languages; when he became tutor to the two sons of a person of the name of d'Assy. This gentleman fitted up a small observatory for his use, and Delambre soon became an adept in the use of the instruments, when he resolved to devote himself to the study of astronomy and its history. Persevering by nature, and devoted to whatever he engaged in, he surmounted every obstacle that came in his way, and, in 1781, formed the tables of the motion of Herschel's newly-discovered planet, which procured him the prize awarded by the Academy of Sciences. He now entered upon the construction of his solar tables and those of other planets; and, in 1792, completed his calculations, and received another prize, which the Academy had offered in the preceding year. He was now deputed, with Méchain, to measure the arc from Dunkirk to Barcelona, which, from the death of his assistant, he had to complete himself. The result of the measurements taken in the performance of this duty, furnished the data for his work entitled "Base du Système Métrique Décimal," for which the Institute of France decreed him a prize. He had now attained what may reasonably be supposed to be the summit of a philosopher's ambition, and was chosen an associate of almost every learned body in Europe. In his own country, honours were showered upon him, and in 1817 he was made a chevalier of the order of St. Michael. His scientific works are very numerous. B. at Amiens, 1749; D. at Paris, 1822.

DELAROCHE, Paul, del-a-rosh', an eminent modern French painter, who early became devoted to his art. At first he applied himself to landscape, but by degrees entered upon historical subjects, and became the head of the "Eclectic" school. His style and pictures are so generally familiar, that it is hardly necessary to do more than enumerate the names of some of them, to recall them to mind, and prove his claim to the eminence he attained. "Joan of Arc in Prison with Cardinal Beaufort," the "Death of Queen Elizabeth," "The Children of Edward IV. in the Tower," "Cromwell contemplating the Dead Body of Charles I.," "Execution of Lady Jane Grey," "Charles I. insulted by the Parliamentary Soldiers in the Guard-room," "Strafford receiving the Blessing of Laud, on his Way to the Scaffold," "The Death of the Duke of Guise," "Napoleon crossing the Alps," "Napoleon at Fontainebleau," and many more. Most of these, if not all, have been engraved; and may be said to be almost universally known. In 1834 Delaroche was created an officer of the Legion of Honour. B. at Paris, 1797; D. 1856.

DELAVIGNE, Jean-François Casimir, del-a-veen', a modern French poet, whose best effusions are his "Messéniennes," which refer to the restoration of the Bourbons in 1815. He also wrote several dramas, which enjoyed an ephemeral success. B. at Havre, 1793; D. at Lyons, 1843.

DELAWARE, del'-a-war, one of the United States, bounded N. by Pennsylvania, S. and W. by Maryland, and E. by Delaware Bay and the Atlantic Ocean. Area, 2,120 square miles. Desc. In general low level; and, at particular seasons, overspread by quantities of stagnant water. It is chiefly an agricultural state, and includes a very fertile tract of country. In it is Cypress Swamp, which yields large quantities of pine timber. A canal in the N. part of the state connects the Chesapeake river with the Delaware. Pop. about 100,000. Lat. between 38° 30′ and 39° 47′ N. Lon. between 74° 56′ and 75° 40′ W.—This state took its name from Lord Delaware, the governor of Virginia, in the reign of James I., and to which colony he rendered important services.

DELAWARE, the name of several counties in the United States, with populations ranging between 3,000 and 40,000. They are in Iowa, Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and New York.—Also, several townships with small populations.

DELAWARE, a river of the United States, rising in the Catskill mountains, and, after a course of about 300 miles, expanding into Delaware Bay, lying between the state of that name and New Jersey. It is connected by canals with the river Hudson and the Bay of Chesapeake, and is navigable from its mouth, as far as Philadelphia, for large vessels.

DELAWARE BAY, an inlet of the Atlantic, formed by the mouth of the Delaware river and several other small ones. Ext. About 60 miles long, and 18 wide between Hinlopen and Cape May, where are two stone piers, inclosing an artificial harbour.

DELAWARES, THE, an Indian tribe, formerly very numerous, but whose numbers have diminished before the white race, as is the case with all "red" men. What remains of them, are now settled on the banks of the Arkansas.

DELFT, delft, a town of the Netherlands, in the province of S. Holland, 9 miles from Rotterdam. It is tolerably well built; most of the streets are divided by narrow canals, crossed by sixty-nine bridges. In the centre of the town, there are two spacious streets, with broad canals bordered with trees. The principal buildings are the palace, in which, in 1684, William, prince of Orange, was assassinated, now converted into a barracks; the council-house, arsenal, the military engineering academy, and several churches, containing various monuments. Manf. Earthenware, or counterfeit porcelain, called Delft ware; several kinds of fine cloth, and carpets. Butter, and next to it, beer, are the principal objects of the wholesale trade; tobacco-pipes, also, are made in quantities. Pop. 18,000.—It is the birthplace of Grotius and Leuwenhœk, who, with William the Silent, lie buried here.

DELFTSHAVEN, delfts-ha'-fen, a small fortified town of the Netherlands, on the bank of the Maas, 2 miles from Rotterdam. Pop. 3,000, mostly engaged in fishing and shipbuilding.

DELHI, del'-he, a district of Hindostan, bounded E. by the Ganges, N. by a range of mountains, W. by the deserts of Moultan, S. by Ajmeer. Area, 600 square miles. Desc. Sandy, and rendered fertile principally by artificial watering. The Jumna and its branches spread over portions of the district. It also contains the Delhi Canal and the Hansouti Nullah, a lake formed during the rainy season. Pop. 310,000. Lat. between 28° 24′ and 28° 54′ N. Lon. between 76° 50′ and 77° 30′ E. —In the rebellion of 1857 this was one of the most disturbed districts. (See DELHI.)

DELHI, a celebrated city of Hindostan, and for many years its capital, situate on the banks of the river Jumna, 266 miles from Cawnpore. During the era of its splendour, it is said to have covered a space of 20 miles in length; but it is now reduced to a circumference of about 7 or 8 miles. Its appearance in 1857 is thus described by a visitor:—"The inhabited part of it—for the ruins extend over a surface as large as London, Westminster, and Southwark—is about 7 miles in circuit, seated on a rocky range of hills, and surrounded by an embattled wall, which the English government have put into repair, and are now engaged in strengthening with bastions, a moat, and a regular [illegible]. The houses within are many of them large and [illegible]. There are a great number of mosques, with minarets and gilded domes; and above all are seen the palace, a very high and extensive cluster of Gothic towers and battlements, and the Jumna Musjid, the [illegible] and handsomest place of Mussulman worship [illegible]. The chief material of all these fine buildings is red granite, of a very agreeable though solemn colour, inlaid, in some of the ornamental parts, with white marble; and the general style of building is of a simple and impressive character: it far exceeds anything at Moscow. On the morning of December 30, I rode to the tomb of the emperor Humaioon, 6 miles from the city, S.W. On my way I passed to the Agra gate, along a very broad but irregular street, with a channel of water, lined with stone, conducted along its middle. This is a part of the celebrated aqueduct constructed, in the first instance, by Ali Merdan Khan, a Persian nobleman in the service of the emperor Shahjehan, and, within these few years, repaired by the English government. It is conducted from the Jumna, immediately on leaving its mountains, and while its stream is yet pure and wholesome, for a distance of about 120 miles. This is a noble work. Half-way along this street stands the imperial palace of Shah Jehan, surrounded by a wall, embattled and machiolated with small round towers and two great gateways, each defended by an outer barbican. The whole is of red granite, and surrounded by a wide moat. This is a place of no strength, the walls being only calculated for bows and arrows, or musketry; but, as a kingly residence, it is one of the grandest that I have seen. It far surpasses the Kremlin; but I do not think that, except in the durability of its materials, it equals Windsor. From the gate of Agra to Humaioon's tomb, is a very awful scene of desolation. It is occupied by the ruins of the Delhi of old, founded by the Patan kings. The official name of the present city is Shahjehanpoor, 'city of the king of the world.' Humaioon's tomb is a fine building of granite, inlaid with marble." Such is the appearance of this far-famed city, which in the rebellion of 1857, cost Great Britain so much of her best blood to recapture from the sepoys. Pop. about 160,000. Lat. 28° 39′ N. Lon. 77° 18′ E.—[For an account of the mutiny, see AGRA, BENGAL, CAWNPORE, and other Indian articles.]

DELIA, de'-le-a, the name of two festivals in the island of Delos, one celebrated every fifth year in honour of Apollo, the other annually. They were both instituted by Theseus. During the latter festival, it was unlawful to put to death any malefactor, and on that account the life of Socrates was prolonged for thirty days after his condemnation.

DELILLE, Jacques, de-leel', a modern French poet of considerable eminence. He translated the "Georgics" of Virgil, which obtained for him admission to the French Academy. He became professor of Latin poetry at the College of France, and of the belles-lettres in the Paris University. Having twice withdrawn from the unsettled social condition of his country, he came to London, where he translated Milton's "Paradise Lost." On his return he produced his poem entitled "Conversation;" but shortly afterwards became blind, and died. B. at Aigue Perse, in 1738; D. 1813.—Besides the works already mentioned, he produced the "Three Reigns of Nature," "Misfortune and Pity," and "Imagination." The chief characteristics of his effusions are sweetness of versification, true pathos, and purity of moral sentiment.

DELISLE, Joseph Nicholas, de-leel', an eminent French mathematician and astronomer, who had for his pupil the celebrated Lalande. Being invited to Russia, he there held the appointment of astronomer-royal for upwards of twenty years. On returning to Paris, he was appointed professor in the Royal College. In 1724 he paid a visit to England, and was there acquainted with both Newton and Halley. B. 1688; D. 1763.

DELOLME, John Louis, de-lolm', a political writer, who first practised as a lawyer in his native Switzerland, and afterwards travelled to gain a knowledge of the constitutions of various countries. He fixed his abode in England, where he remained until near the close of his life, composing political essays, and writing in the journals. In spite of considerable talents, he led a miserable existence, having an unfortunate passion for gaming. B. at Geneva, 1740; D. 1806.—He is best known by his "History of the Constitution of England," written in French, but translated into English, and often reprinted. "It is the best work to consult on the government of England," says a foreign writer, "and proves its superiority over all other existing governments."

DELORME, Philibert, de-lorm', a celebrated French architect, who first studied in Italy, and was attracted to Paris by the Cardinal du Bellay, who introduced him to the court of Henry II. Delorme executed for this prince the plans of the châteaux of Anet and Meudon, and subsequently, for Catherine de Medicis; those of the Valois court at St. Denis, and of the palace of the Tuileries, of which he was created governor. B. at Lyons, 1518; D. 1577.—He left some writings on architectural art; amongst which is a treatise entitled "New Inventions, in order to build better and at small cost."

DELOS, or ORTYGIA, now SAILLES, de'-los, one of the Cyclades, at the N. of Naxos, sacred to Apollo and Diana. According to fable, Neptune caused it to rise out of the waters, to save Latona and her two children, who were pursued by the jealousy of Juno. The dead were not interred, but were transported to the neighbouring island of Rhane. One of the altars of Apollo, in the island, was reckoned among the seven wonders of the world.

DELPHI, del'-fi, a town of Phocis, also called Pytho, situate in a valley to the W. of Mount Parnassus. The ancients regarded Delphi as a sacred city, and considered it to be the centre of the world. Its temple and its oracle of Apollo rendered it celebrated throughout all the countries inhabited by the Greeks. The oracles were generally given in verse, by a priestess named Pythia; but when it had been sarcastically observed that the god and patron of poetry was the most imperfect poet in the world, the priestess delivered her answers in prose. The temple was built and destroyed several times; and the immense riches which were sent to the altar of Apollo from all parts were often the object of plunder. (See CASTRI.)

DELTA, del'-ta, a part of Egypt, which received that name from its resemblance to the form of the fourth letter (Δ delta) of the Greek alphabet. It lies between the Canopian and Pelusian mouths of the Nile, and is said to have been formed by the accumulated mud and sand, washed down by the Nile from the upper parts of Egypt.—As a geographical expression, DELTA is applied to alluvial tracts, sometimes formed by, and inclosed between, the branches of a river and the sea into which it debouches. There are several deltas, the principal of which are those of the Nile and the Niger in Africa, and the Ganges in Asia.

DELUC, John Andrew, de-look', a modern philosopher, who principally devoted himself to the study of physics and geology, extending his observations to all parts of Europe, and endeavouring to make his discoveries tally with the text of the book of Genesis. He passed a portion of his life in England, and was there appointed queen's reader. His principal works are, "Theory of Barometers and Thermometers," "New Notions on Meteorology," "Letters to the Queen of England on the Mountains and History of the Earth," and "Geological Journeys." In 1811 he published "An Account of the Philosophy of Bacon," with a view of opposing Lasalle, a French infidel translator of the English philosopher; but the work was not much esteemed. B. at Geneva, 1727; D. at Windsor, 1817.—To Deluc we owe many important improvements in the barometer, thermometer, and hydrometer.

DELVINO, del-ve'-no, one of the principal towns of Lower Albania, 50 miles from Larissa. It was formerly the residence of a pasha, and is built on the side of a hill covered with orange-plantations. Pop. Unascertained.

DEMADES, dem'-a-dees, an Athenian, who, from being a mariner, became a distinguished orator, and rose to high service in the republic. He was made prisoner by Philip of Macedon at the battle of Cheronea, 338 B.C., and succeeded, by his frankness, in gaining the esteem of his captor, and was set at liberty. He remained some time attached to Macedon, and used his influence in favour of the Macedonian party at Athens. Betraying, however, Antipater, he was put to death by Cassander, the son of the latter, about 32– B.C. An oration of his is said to be in "Rhetorum Collectio," Venice, 1513.

DEMAS, dee'-mas, 'popular,' a Christian professor, corrupted by the love of riches.

DEMAVEND, MOUNT, dem'-a-vend, the highest peak in the Elburz chain, in Persia, 40 miles from Teheran. It is volcanic, and of the form of a cone. Height, nearly 15,000 feet.

DEMBIA, or TZANA, dem'-be-a, a province of Abyssinia, including all the territory surrounding the great lake which bears its name.—The LAKE is 60 miles long, with an average breadth of 25, and contains several islands. Lat. 12° N. Lon. 37° 15′ E.

DEMBIA, a river of Western Africa, falling into the W. Atlantic in lat. 9° 45′ N.

DEMERARA, dem'-a-rair'-a, a river of British Guiana, S. America, which, after a course of 200 miles, falls into the Atlantic in lat. 6° 50′ N.; lon. 58° W.—A county of this country takes its name from it. (See GUIANA, BRITISH.)

DEMETRIA, de-me'-tre-a, a festival in honour of Ceres, called by the Greeks, Demeter. During its continuance, it was customary for the votaries of the goddess to lash themselves with whips made with the bark of trees.

DEMETRIUS, de-me'-tre-us. Many of this name are mentioned in ancient history, the most celebrated of whom are the following:—

DEMETRIUS, king of Macedon, surnamed Poliorcetes, on account of the many places which he destroyed, one of Alexander the Great's generals and successors. He was the son of Antigonus, and at the age of twenty-two, was sent with an army against Ptolemy, by whom he was defeated near Gaza; he soon, however, repaired his losses, and, with a fleet of 250 ships, sailed to Athens, which he conquered from Demetrius Phalereus. He afterwards defeated Cassander at Thermopylæ, but was subsequently, himself, overthrown at the battle of Ipsus, fought 301 B.C., when he fled to Ephesus, the Athenians refusing to receive him. Notwithstanding this ingratitude, he raised another army, and when they groaned under the power of a foreign enemy, came to their help. He then slew Alexander, the son of Cassander, and seated himself on the throne of Macedon. At the end of seven years, he was obliged to quit his kingdom and retire into Asia, where, being reduced to great distress, he went to the court of Seleucus, his son-in-law; but a difference breaking out between them, war ensued, in which he was defeated. Seleucus then confined him in a castle, but allowed him to take the diversion of hunting. D. of excessive drinking, 286 B.C.—His posterity reigned till the time of Perseus, who was vanquished by the Romans.

DEMETRIUS I., king of Syria, surnamed Soter, was the son of Seleucus Philopator. He was, for some time, deprived by usurpers of his rightful inheritance; but the Syrians, recognizing him as their lawful sovereign, placed him on the throne. He then declared war against the Jews, in which conflict Judas Maccabæus lost his life, bravely fighting for the liberties of his country. A confederacy of the neighbouring kings was subsequently formed against Demetrius, and he was slain, 150 B.C.

DEMETRIUS II., surnamed Nicator, the son of the preceding, was placed on the throne by Ptolemy Philometor, king of Egypt, after expelling the usurper Alexander Balas, 146 B.C. He married Cleopatra, the wife of the same Alexander, and daughter of Ptolemy, but gave himself up to dissipation; when, after various vicissitudes, his reign became so intolerable, that his subjects solicited the king of Egypt to grant them another sovereign. Demetrius fled, and was killed by the governor of Tyre, 127 B.C.

DEMETRIUS PHALEREUS, a celebrated orator and statesman of Athens, attached to the Macedonian party, and elected by their influence, archon, 318 B.C. He governed wisely; and the Athenians, charmed by his eloquence, erected 360 bronze statues to his honour. He afterwards fell into disgrace, and Demetrius Poliorcetes took possession of the city, and proclaimed the liberty of the Athenians to throw off the yoke of the Macedonians. His life being threatened, he fled to the court of Ptolemy Lagus, king of Egypt, whose son banished him from his dominions, [illegible] by the bite of an asp, 284 B.C.—He [illegible] several books, and, it is said, that the library [illegible]dria was commenced by his advice, and [illegible] contributed to it 200,000 volumes. There is [illegible]ise on rhetoric ascribed to him; but it is [illegible]modern date. (See DEMETRIUS POLIORCETES.)

DEMETRIUS, the son of Ivan IV., [illegible] of Russia, was still in his cradle at the death of his father. He was the brother and sole heir of Fedor. The ambitious Boris Godonov caused him to be assassinated in 1592, thus hoping to pave his own way to the throne. B. about 1581.—The disappearance of Demetrius furnished an opportunity for a crowd of impostors to assert their right to the crown. One of these, a monk, and whose real name was Gregory Otrepieff, caused himself to be recognized as czar in 1605, and, after a reign of a few months, was assassinated in Moscow, 1606. The false Demetriuses ceased not to make their appearances until the rise of the house of Romanoff in 1613.

DEMIDOV, or DEMIDOFF, dem'-i-dof, a wealthy and influential Russian family, whose head was an armoury-founder at Toula. This Demidoff was intrusted by Peter the Great with the business of casting the cannon for that prince's numerous warlike expeditions. He actively seconded all the exertions of the czar, and in 1725 discovered the mines of Kolyvan, the working of which speedily enriched him.—He left a son, NITIKA, and several grandsons, who distinguished themselves in the same career as their progenitor, and amassed colossal fortunes.—The best-known of these are PROCOP DEMIDOFF, who worked with great profit the iron, copper, and gold mines of the Ural Mountains, D. at Moscow about 1730;—NICOLAS NIKITICH, a zealous philanthropist, who introduced into his country, several branches of industry, founded establishments of public utility, and carried, to a great state of perfection, the working of mines. He had an annual income of a quarter of a million sterling. His last years he passed in France and Italy, enjoying the society of learned men, and heaping benefits on all around him. D. near St. Petersburg, 1773; D. at Florence, 1828.—He left two sons, PAUL and ANATOL, who, as well as inheriting his fortune, had also the same high taste and benevolence. Of these, Count Anatol allied himself to the Bonaparte family, by marrying, in 1840, one of Napoleon's nieces, the Princess Mathilde, daughter of Jerome, and sister of Prince Napoleon. In 1845, however, a separation took place between them.

DEMIR-HISSAR, de-mir his'-sar, a town of European Turkey, on the Struma, 12 miles from Seres. Pop. 9,000.

DEMMIN, dem'-min, a town of Prussia, in the province of Pomerania, 27 miles from Stralsund. It stands at the mouth of the Trebel and Tolleuse. It is a place of considerable antiquity, and has a celebrity from the number of sieges it has sustained. Manf. Woollens, linens, leather, and hats. Pop. about 7,000.

DEMOCEDES, dem'-o-se'-dees, a physician of Crotona, who went to Athens, and resided at the court of Polycrates, the tyrant of Samos. On the death of that prince, he and his family became captives to the Persians, and were carried to Susa, where he worked with other slaves. Happening to cure Darius from the effects of a wound received whilst hunting, he was liberally rewarded, admitted to the royal table, and requested by the monarch to remain at his court. He returned, however, to his own country, and married the daughter of Milo the wrestler. Lived in the 6th century B.C.

DEMOCRITUS, de-mok'-ri-tus, a famous Greek philosopher, whose father was a man of wealth; but Democritus, preferring philosophy to riches, spent his patrimony in travelling to acquire knowledge. There was a law in his country, that whoever reduced himself to poverty should be deprived of sepulture. Democritus had incurred this fate; but his talents were such, that the magistrates decreed he should be buried at the public expense. He was constantly laughing at the follies of mankind, and, therein, had the advantage of Heraclitus, who was always weeping over them. B. at Abdera, in Thrace, about 460; D. 350 B.C.—None of his writings have come down to us. He was the author of the atomical philosophy, and the professor of Epicurus.

DEMONA, Val di, dai-mo'-na, one of the old divisions of Sicily, which occupied the N.E. portion of the island. It is now divided into the provinces of Catanio, Messina, and Palermo.

DEMONTE, dai-mon'-tai, a town of Piedmont, near the Stura, with a citadel on a high rock, 15 miles from Coni. It contains several churches and an hospital. Pop. 7,000.

DE MORGAN, Augustus, de mor'-gan, was professor of mathematics in University College, London, from its foundation, in 1828, till 1831, when he resigned. In 1836, however, he returned to the same post. He is the author of a great many works on arithmetic, trigonometry, mathematics, and the kindred sciences. B. in the island of Madura, East Indies, 1806.

DEMOSTHENES, de-mos'-the-nees, the greatest of Grecian orators, was the son of an Athenian, a wealthy armourer. Losing his father when a child, his guardians embezzled a considerable portion of his estate, and, at the age of seventeen, he pleaded his cause against them, in which he was successful. His first attempts at oratory, however, in the public assembly, were not so happy; for his lungs were weak, his pronunciation inarticulate, and his gestures awkward. He now retired for some years from public life, and by great perseverance overcame his defects. He would declaim as he walked up the side of steep hills, and by the seashore, when the waves were roaring, and accustom himself to speak with pebbles in his mouth. To acquire a good gesture, he would practise before a mirror; and to correct a habit he had of shrugging up one of his shoulders, he placed a sharp-pointed sword just over it, in the place where he stood. The principles of his art he had acquired under Isæus, and he had also attended the lectures of Plato. Not being ready in speaking extemporaneously, he studied orations with great care in a cave, on which account his detractors declared that they smelt of the lamp. He read and re-read, too, all the great writers of antiquity, especially the history of Thucydides, which he transcribed, it is said, some eight or ten times. Having thus gained confidence that he had overcome his faults of manner and style, he returned to public affairs at the age of twenty-seven, and after passing some years at the bar, entered the government, and filled the highest offices of state. The encroachments of Philip of Macedon at this period alarmed all the Grecian states, particularly Athens. Demosthenes was foremost in rousing his countrymen to a sense of their danger. He depicted the ambitious designs of Philip in glowing colours in his celebrated orations called Philippics. When Philip was about to invade Attica, Demosthenes was sent as ambassador to prevail on the Bœotians to assist them; in which mission he succeeded. He was also at the battle of Cheronea, where the orator, however, played the coward, and fled, and for his conduct there, several accusations were preferred against him; but he was acquitted. Philip dying, Demosthenes thought this a favourable opportunity to crush the Macedonian power, and by his exertions a new confederacy was formed among the Grecian states, and the Persians were solicited to commence hostilities against his son Alexander. The vigorous activity of this prince, however, and the dreadful chastisement he inflicted on Thebes, soon had the effect of breaking up the confederacy. The Athenians found it expedient to divert the victor's wrath by sending to him an embassy, of which Demosthenes formed one; but his apprehensions induced him to turn back on the road. He was one of the orators whom Alexander required to be delivered up; but Demades pacified the king without this sacrifice. The influence of Demosthenes being now on the decline, Æschines took advantage of it, to bring an accusation against him on the subject of his conduct at Cheronea, and his having had a crown of gold awarded him; but the orator so well defended himself in his celebrated oration "De Coronâ," that he was honourably acquitted, and his adversary sent into exile. Shortly after, however, Demosthenes was convicted of receiving a golden cup and twenty talents from Harpalus, one of Alexander's generals, who had revolted from Alexander, and instigated the Athenians to rise against his authority. To avoid punishment, Demosthenes fled to Ægina, where he remained till the death of Alexander, when he was recalled by his countrymen, and brought home in triumph. But this change of fortune was of short duration. Declaring war against Antipater, Alexander's successor, and that general defeating the Athenians, he required the citizens to deliver up Demosthenes, who fled to the temple of Neptune, at Calauria, where he poisoned himself, 322 B.C. B. at Athens, 381 B.C. The Athenians erected a statue to his memory, and maintained his eldest child at the public expense.—Majesty and energy are the characteristics of the eloquence of Demosthenes. To convince the understanding, rather than to exert a power over the passions of his hearers, was the object of this speaker's oratory; and, as Cicero said, this is the ideal model of true eloquence. Of the orations of Demosthenes which are extant, the text of Bekker is now regarded as the standard, and many of his orations have been translated into the English and other languages. Of the former, the work of Leland is the best.

DEMOTICA, de-mo'-te-ka, a town of European Turkey, on the Mariza, 25 miles from Adrianople. It is tolerably well built, and has a citadel. Pop. 8,000.

DEMPSTER, Thomas, demp'-ster, a Scotch writer, who studied at Cambridge, whence he removed to Paris, and afterwards became professor of philology at Pisa. He wrote several books, the most curious of which are a "Martyrology of Scotland," a "List of Scottish Writers," and a "History of the Etruscans;" but, either from carelessness, indolence, or ignorance, none of them are to be relied upon. D. at Bologna, in 1625.

DENBIGH, den'-bi, the county town of Denbighshire, in N. Wales, situate on the side of a craggy hill, on a branch of the Clwyd, 5 miles from St. Asaph. It was, formerly, surrounded with a strong wall, and defended by a castle, which was destroyed after the Restoration. Its principal buildings are a church, assembly-room, town-hall, and market-house. Manf. Shoes and gloves. Pop. 6,000.

DENBIGHSHIRE, den'-bi-sheer, a maritime county of N. Wales, bounded E. by Flintshire, Cheshire, and Shropshire; W. by Caernarvonshire; N. by the Irish Sea; and S. by Merionethshire and Montgomeryshire. Area, 633 square miles. Desc. Rugged and mountainous, but here and there interspersed with rich valleys. Rivers. The principal are the Clwyd, the Conway, the Dee, and the Elwy. Pro. Chiefly cattle, corn, barley, oats, and cheese. Goats and sheep are numerous. Minerals. Lead, iron, and slate. Wool is the principal article of manufacture. Near the village of Chirk is a cannon-foundry, and there are, also, some iron-forges. Pop. 93,000. The Holyhead railway crosses the N. part of this county.

DENBY, a township in the W. Riding of Yorkshire, 8 miles from Barnsley. Pop. 2,000.—Another, in Derbyshire, 7 miles from Derby. Pop. 1,300.

DENDER, den'-der, a small river of Belgium, which, after a course of 40 miles, joins the Scheldt at Dendermonde.

DENDERA, den'-de-ra, a town of Upper Egypt, opposite Keneh, on the left bank of the Nile, remarkable for the fine antiquities which it contains. The great temple of Venus here is the admiration of every traveller; and it still remains in an almost entire state. It is 220 feet long and 50 broad, with a portico supported by 24 columns. Lat. 26° 15′ N. Lon. 32° E.

DENDERMONDE, den'-der-mond, a fortified town of Belgium, in the province of E. Flanders, at the conflux of the Dender and the Scheldt, 19 miles from Antwerp. Its principal buildings are a town-hall, an asylum, hospital, and several churches and convents. Manf. Woollens and lace. Pop. about 9,000.—It is a station on the railway from Ostend to Mechlin.

DENHAM, Sir John, den'-ham, an English poet, whose father was baron of the court of Exchequer. In 1631 he was sent to Trinity College, Oxford, whence he went to Lincoln's Inn, with the view of following the law; but in this he made little or no progress. In 1641 his tragedy of "The Sophy" appeared; and soon after he was made governor of Fareham Castle for Charles I. In 1643 he published his "Cooper's Hill," the best of all his works. It is in this poem that the celebrated couplet, so very much admired, appears:—

"Though deep, yet clear; though gentle, yet not dull; Strong, without rage; without o'erflowing, full."

It relates to the times. After the decapitation of Charles I., he attended Charles II. in his exile, and was appointed by him ambassador to Poland. At the Restoration he was appointed surveyor-general of the royal buildings, and created knight of the Bath. D. at Dublin, 1668; or, in London, 1668; and was buried in Westminster Abbey.—His "Cooper's Hill" is a descriptive poem, and gave rise to a new species of composition, which, says Johnson, may be denominated local poetry. Pope has bestowed on him the compliment of the "majestic Denham."

DENIS, or DENYS, St., de-ne', an ancient town of France, in the department of the Seine, 5 miles from Paris. Its Benedictine abbey is now used as a house of instruction, founded by Napoleon I., for the daughters of the members of the Legion of Honour. The church is built in the Gothic style, and is remarkable for the delicacy of its structure and the richness of its ornaments. In its vaults repose the ashes of the kings of France since Dagobert I. Some of these tombs are beautifully sculptured, and, amongst others, an exquisite figure of the ill-fated Marie Antoinette. It is 415½ feet long and 106½ wide, with a spire 85 feet high. Pop. 16,000.—It is a station on the Railway du Nord.

DENMAN, Thomas, Lord, den'-man, received the rudiments of his education at Diss, under the celebrated Mr. and Mrs. Barbauld. He subsequently entered St. John's College, Cambridge, and, in 1806, was called to Lincoln's Inn. In 1818 he was returned member of parliament for Wareham, Dorset, and, in 1820, for Nottingham. In the House of Commons he leagued with Brougham and Burdett, and, in 1820, became solicitor-general to Queen Caroline. His conduct in behalf of that unfortunate lady was so highly approved by the London citizens, that they presented him with the freedom of their city. In 1830 he was appointed attorney-general, and, in 1832, chief justice of the King's Bench. In 1834 he was raised to the peerage, and, till 1850, presided over the court of Queen's Bench, when he retired, on account of failing health. B. in London, 1779; D. at Stoke Albany, Northamptonshire, 1854.

DENMARK, den'-mark, a kingdom in the N. of Europe, comprising three distinct parts:—1. The peninsula of Jutland. 2. Its dependencies. 3. Islands in the Atlantic and the Baltic; of which the chief are Schleswig, Holstein, and Lauenberg, Zealand, Fuhnen, Langeland, Falster, Laaland, Bornholm, Moen, and a number of smaller ones, treated of under their respective headings. The principal part is bounded on the N. and W. by the North Sea, S. by the Elbe, and E. by the Baltic and the Cattegat. Area, about 22,000 square miles. Desc. Continental Denmark forms a long-continued plain, interrupted by few hills, or even gentle risings, a portion of it being perfectly flat, and below the level of the sea. Along the coast are several winding creeks and bays, which are of essential benefit to navigation. The channels which separate the principal islands from the mainland, and from one another, are the two Belts and the Sound. Rivers. None of magnitude: next to the Elbe, the Eider is the largest. Lakes. Numerous, though small. The largest is the Arne, in Zealand. Climate. Temperate, but wet and foggy. The harbours of the country are rarely frozen; but it does sometimes happen that even the Sound is frozen over. The summers are not so fine as they are in countries having colder winters. Pro. The soil being various, and interspersed with heaths and marshes, especially in the west, much of the country is unproductive. Schleswig, Holstein, and the S.W. part of Jutland, are generally fertile, and have excellent pasturages. The N.W. of Jutland, and the higher parts, extending N. and S. in the middle of the country, largely consist of heaths covered with brambles. The common products are oats, barley, beans, pease, hops, hemp, potatoes, and tobacco; wheat is but partially cultivated, and the forests are not extensive. Cattle are largely reared in the duchies and N. Jutland; besides sheep, goats, and horses. These last are bred for military purposes, and are largely exported. COMMERCE. In regard to navigation, favourably as the Danes were situated for it, the Hanse towns, in the middle ages, and after them the Dutch, absorbed this branch of industry. It was not till the close of the 17th century that the Danes traded with distant countries in vessels of their own; but after the peace of Stockholm, in 1720, the commerce of Denmark greatly increased. This was greatly facilitated by the construction of canals in the kingdom. The most important of these are the Schleswig-Holstein, which, with the Eider river, forms a communication between the Baltic and the German Ocean, and the Stecknitz canal, which, by means of the river Trave, unites the Elbe with the Baltic. Imp. Manufactured goods, iron, hardware, wine, fruits, and colonial produce. Exp. Mostly agricultural produce, corn, meal, butter, rapeseed, cattle, hides, and salt and dried meats. Rel. Lutheranism. Army. About 25,000 men. Navy. From 120 to 130 vessels, carrying, in all, about 1,000 guns. Gov. Limited monarchy. Previous to 1831, the monarchy was absolute; then, however, a constitution was granted by the king, by which Jutland, the islands, and the duchies of Schleswig and Holstein were each allowed a representative in the Chamber, whose consent is necessary for the raising of taxes, &c., in their respective provinces. Colonial possessions. These consist of Iceland and the Faroe isles in Europe; a part of Greenland; Christiansburg, and other small places on the coast of Guinea; Tranquebar, on the coast of Coromandel; and the district and town of Serampore, in Bengal. In the West Indies, the more important settlements are Santa Cruz, St. Thomas, and St. John; but there are a number of smaller islands held by the Danish crown. Pop. 2,300,000. Lat. the principal part between 53° 22′ 42″ and 57° 44′ 52″ N. Lon. between 8° 5′ and 12° 37′ E.—The first inhabitants of Scandinavia (comprehending Denmark, Norway, and Sweden) were descended from the Scythians, a people who had no fixed habitations: at what period they first settled in towns is uncertain. The Cimbri, a German nation, next possessed themselves of Jutland, which, from this circumstance, obtained the name of the Cimbrian Chersonese. The Teutones, another tribe of Germans, reduced Zealand, Fuhnen, and the rest of the Danish islands. The Jutes and Angles succeeded the Cimbri in the Chersonese, and from the former, the peninsula obtained its name of Jutland. In the 4th century, the inhabitants of these countries and of the N.W. of Germany, were called Saxons. They attempted, but could not gain a footing in Britain, till the decline of the Roman empire, when Vortigern, king of S. Britain, invited them over, about the year 450, to defend his country against the Scots. After they had repulsed those northern invaders, they quarrelled with the Britons who had called them in, and, at length, made themselves entirely masters of S. Britain. Saxony, of which Denmark was then deemed a part, was, at that time, divided among a number of petty sovereigns and states, which were all united under Gestrius, their first king, about the year 797. The Danes and Normans, or Norwegians, invaded and harassed the coasts of Gaul and Britain in the 8th century, and continued their incursions till the year 1012; when Sweyn, king of Denmark, made a complete conquest of England, and left it to his son Canute, who was, in 1020, king of England, Denmark, Norway, and Sweden. The kingdoms of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway were, after this period, governed by distinct sovereigns; but, in 1397, by the Union of Calmar (see CALMAR), the three kingdoms were reunited into one. This union, however, was frequently broken, and at length finally put an end to, by the revolt of Gustavus Vasa, of Sweden, against Christian II., in 1523. Norway, however, was still subject to Denmark, and so continued until 1814, when it was ceded to Sweden, under Bernadotte. During the Napoleon wars, Denmark incurred a heavy loss at the hands of the British, by the bombardment of Copenhagen, 1807. The most remarkable event in the more modern history of Denmark is the revolt of the duchies of Holstein and Schleswig, in 1848. After a severe struggle, however, the army of the duchies was defeated at the battle of Instedt, in July, 1850, when they submitted to the authority of their sovereign, the king of Denmark. As duke of Holstein and Lauenburg, the king of Denmark is a member of the Germanic confederation.

DENNIS, John, den'-nis, an English author and critic, who, in 1692, wrote a Pindaric ode on King William, after which he published several other poems, two of which, on the battles of Blenheim and Ramilies, procured him the favour of the duke of Marlborough, who gave him £100 and placed him in the Custom-house. In 1704 appeared his tragedy of "Liberty Asserted," which, as an invective against the French nation, became popular. This was followed by his "Orpheus and Eurydice," "The Comical Gallant," an alteration of "The Merry Wives of Windsor;" "The Invader of his Country," which was also an alteration of "Coriolanus." When the treaty of Utrecht was negotiating, he imagined himself of so much consequence, that he went to the duke of Marlborough, and begged he would use his interest, that he might not be delivered up to the French king. The duke gravely told him, that "he had made no provision for himself, though he could not help thinking that he had done the French almost as much mischief as Mr. Dennis." In 1712 he made a merciless attack on the "Cato" of Addison, and his reflections on Pope's "Essay on Criticism" secured him a place in the "Dunciad." His attack on "Cato" drew forth a whimsical pamphlet, called "The Narrative of Dr. Robert Norris, concerning the strange and deplorable Frenzy of Mr. John Dennis." B. in London, 1657; D. 1734.

DENNY, den'-ne, a village and parish of Stirlingshire, Scotland, 5 miles from Falkirk. Pop. of village, 3,000; of parish, 5,000.

DENON, Dominique Vivant, Baron de, den-awng', was appointed to the office of a gentleman about the person of Louis XV., and afterwards, as secretary to an embassy, resided several years in Italy. Here he studied the arts, and, subsequently, after passing through the horrors of the French revolution, attracted the notice of Bonaparte. With him he went to Egypt, and on returning to Paris, received the appointment of general director of the museums, with the superintendence of the medallic mint, and such works of art as were executed in honour of the victories of France. On the abdication of the emperor, he was still allowed to retain his office, but in 1815, having rejoined Napoleon, on his escape from Elba, was deprived of it. He now retired from public life, and occupied his leisure with preparing a general history of art. In this performance he was assisted by eminent artists; but he did not live to complete it. D. at Châlons-sur-Saône, 1747; D. at Paris, 1825.—He wrote "Travels in Egypt," which is considered a great work, a comedy, and several other productions of considerable merit.

DENTATUS, Lucius Sicinius, den-tat'-tus, a Roman tribune, who had been engaged in 120 conflicts, and was 45 times wounded. He was murdered by the soldiers of Appius Claudius, but not until he had slain 15 of them and wounded 30 more.

DENT-DU-MIDI, dawng doo me'-de, an Alpine mountain on the frontiers of Savoy and the Valois. In 1784 it was first ascended. Height, about 10,780 feet.

DENTON, den'-ton, a name common to several parishes and townships of England, none of them with a population above 3,300.

DENTRECASTEAUX'S CHANNEL, dawn'-tre(r)-kas'-toes, a strait on the coast of Tasmania, separating Bruny Island from the mainland. Ext. 35 miles long, with a varying breadth of from 3 to 9. Also the name of a group of islands in the Pacific Ocean. Lat. 10′ S. Lon. 151° E.

DEODUR, de-o-dur', an independent state of Hindostan, in the presidency of Bombay. Area, 80 square miles. Pop. 2,000. Lat. 24° 9′ N. Lon. 71° 49′ E.

DEPEDELEN, de-ped'-e-len, a town of European Turkey. (See TEPELIN.)

DEPTFORD, dep'-ford, a naval port of England, at the confluence of the Ravensbourne with the Thames, in the county of Kent, 3 miles from London bridge. It is very irregularly built, and contains parish churches, besides several places of worship for dissenters. It has a royal dockyard, with fine wet docks, and numerous buildings for the manufacture and preservation of naval stores, established by Henry VIII., and occupying an area of upwards of 30 acres. There are also several private docks in the neighbourhood for building and repairing merchantmen. There are two hospitals belonging to the corporation or society of the Trinity House; one built in 1685, and devoted to the support of decayed masters of ships, and pilots, together with the widows of such persons. The society of the Trinity House was founded in the reign of Henry VIII., by Sir Thomas Spert, for the increase and encouragement of navigation, and for the good government of the seamen, and the better security of merchant-ships on our coasts. Pop. 28,000.—It is a station on the London and Greenwich Railway.

DEPUCH ISLANDS, de'-pook, a large collection of broken rocks lying off the N.W. coast of Australia, and attaining a height of upwards of 500 feet above the level of the sea. Lat. 20° 37′ 45″ N. Lon. 117° 44′ E.

DE QUINCY, Thomas, de quin'-cy, was a merchant's son, and educated at Eton and Oxford. He devoted himself to literature, and few employed their pens upon so many and such varied subjects. His "Confessions of an English Opium-Eater" reveal much of the history of his earlier years, and were first published in the "Old London Magazine," in 1821. From that time De Quincy constantly kept his name before the public, in metaphysics, political economy, philosophy, and biography. To enumerate the number of his essays would occupy a considerable space; but a complete edition of his works has been published in America, under the editorship of Mr. J. T. Fields. This, we believe, is the most complete edition which has yet appeared. It is impossible here to give the slightest criticism of the various writings of Mr. De Quincy. Every department of literature he has touched, he has either illumined with new lights, or given it additional graces by the magical fertility of his pen. Of the edition of his works, to which we have above alluded, he says, "It is astonishing how much more Boston knows of my literary acts and purposes than I do myself. Were it not, indeed, through Boston, hardly the sixth part of my literary undertakings—hurried or deliberate, sound, rotting, or rotten—would ever have reached posterity; which, be it known to thee, most sarcastic of future censors, already most of them have reached." D. at Manchester, 1786.

DERA, de'-ra, two towns of India.—1. 30 miles from Allahabad.—2. 40 from Moultan.

DERA GHAZEE KHAN, a town of Afghanistan, 40 miles from Bhaulpoor, ceded to the British in 1849. It has an extensive commerce. Pop. 25,000. Lat. 30° 5′ N. Lon. 70° 52′ E.

DERA ISMAEL KHAN, a town of Afghanistan, 16 miles from Bukkur. It has a trade in salt and grain. Pop. 8,000. Lat. 31° 50′ N. Lon. 70° 58′ E.

DERAYEH, EL, de-ra'-ye(r), a town of Arabia, nearly in the centre of Nedjed. It consists of several fortified parts, and in 1819, after a siege of seven months, it was nearly ruined by the troops of Ibrahim Pasha. Pop. estimated at 12,000. Lat. 25° 15′ N. Lon. 46° 30′ E. —This was the former capital of the Wahabees.

DERBEND, or DERBENT, der'-bend, a town of Russia, the capital of the circle of Derbend, on the W. coast of the Caspian Sea. It stands at the entrance of a defile in the Caucasus, and is surrounded by strong walls rising out of the sea, strengthened by round and square towers. It consists of three parts, of which the citadel, about half a mile square, constitutes the upper part, and commands the whole place. Its harbour is the worst on the Caspian Sea, so that ships cannot approach the town. Pop. 12,000, mostly Mahometans. Lat. 41° 52′ N. Lon. 48° 58′ E. It was taken from Persia by Russia in 1722, restored to the former power in 1735, and retaken by the Muscovites in 1795. —This is a place of great antiquity, the walls being supposed to be 1,500 years old.—The CIRCLE of Derbend comprises the plains on the W. shore of the Caspian, and was established in 1806. Pop. 40,000.

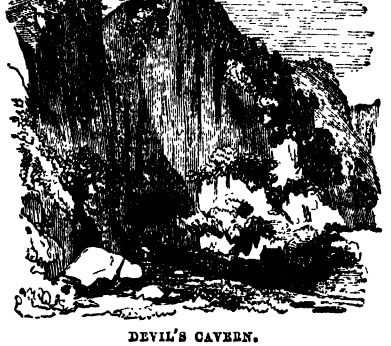
DERBY, der'-be, a town of England, the capital of Derbyshire, on the Derwent, 35 miles from Birmingham. The town has several parish churches, the principal being dedicated to All Saints,—and the architecture of which is greatly and justly admired. There are, besides, many chapels, a Roman Catholic church, a museum, infirmary, town-hall, a gaol, a market-place, and an assembly-room. Its public institutions consist of a philosophical society, a mechanics' institute, a county library, and several charitable establishments. Manf. These are largely carried on in silk, cotton, hosiery, ribands, lace, porcelain, and spar. There are, besides, manufactures of iron, lead pipes, lead shot, white and red lead, tin plate, soap, and several tanneries, bleaching-grounds, melting-houses, and corn-mills. Pop. 41,000.—This town stands at the head of the navigation of the Derwent, and also at the junction of the principal branches of the Midland Railway.



DERBY, WEST, a chapelry of Lancashire, included in the borough of Liverpool. Pop. 33,000.

DERBY, James Stanley, earl of, an English nobleman, and an active supporter of Charles I. in the civil war. In an action at Wigan, in Lancashire, he displayed considerable bravery against superior forces. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Worcester, and, in violation of a promise of quarter which had been given him, was beheaded in 1651. This earl wrote a "History of the Antiquities of the Isle of Man," and none shed greater lustre on the cause for which he fought than he. His countess retired to the Isle of Man, where she regarded herself as queen, and which she defended with the utmost gallantry, being the last person in the British dominions who yielded to the parliament forces.

DERBY, Edward Geoffrey Smith Stanley, 14th earl of, dar'-be, a modern English statesman, who, as Lord Stanley, was first returned to parliament in 1820 for Stockbridge. He afterwards represented Preston, Windsor, and Lancashire. His first efforts in addressing the "House" were very successful; and, under various administrations, he held office with credit to himself. During the early part of his career, Lord Derby supported reforming changes, and was chief secretary for Ireland, and, subsequently, colonial minister under Lord Grey's administration, from 1830 to 1834. In the discussion on the Reform Bill of that period, Lord Stanley defended its provisions with great warmth and talent, and also carried the bill for national education in Ireland. He was also a principal instrument in the success of the measure for the emancipation, in 1833, of the West-India slaves. Now came, however, the crisis in which he separated, for the remainder of his political life, from the Liberal party. Alarmed at the intended project to reduce still further the Irish Church establishment, he, with other members of the cabinet, resigned his office. He was once more, under Sir Robert Peel, colonial minister; and, in 1844, he took his seat in the House of Lords. Towards 1845, however, when Sir Robert declared his adhesion to the principles of free trade, Lord Stanley headed the protectionist opposition, and since that time has ever been the leader of the Conservative party. In 1851, his father dying, he succeeded to the earldom of Derby. The year following, he was enabled to form an administration to succeed Lord John Russell's, but he had only a few months' tenure of power. In 1858, on the fall of the Palmerston administration, he again had the formation of a ministry intrusted to him; and although this lasted somewhat longer than the former, yet, in 1859, it succumbed before the attacks made on its Reform Bill by the Whigs and Radicals, headed by Lord John Russell. B. at Knowsley Park, Lancashire, 1799.—The eloquence of Lord Derby is remarkable for the purity and fire of its style, and he has earned the title of the "Rupert of debate."

DERBYSHIRE, der'-be-sheer, a county of England, bounded N. by Yorkshire, E. by the counties of Nottingham and Leceister, S. by the counties of Leicester and Stafford, and W. by those of Stafford and Chester. Area, 1,030 square miles. Desc. Mountainous and picturesque towards the N.W.; on which account this portion of the county is called the High Peak, while the eastern and southern parts are called the Low Peak. They are rich and well cultivated, and the surface is more level. In the High Peak, the scenery is of the most romantic kind, the loftiest elevation culminating in upwards of 1,800 feet. It has, throughout, many wild caverns, among which the one denominated the "Devil's" is the most remarkable; all of them, however, contain some singular curiosities. Rivers. The principal are the Trent, Derwent, Wye, Rother, Dove, and the Erwash. Mineral springs are numerous; among which those of Buxton, Matlock, and Bakewell are particularly celebrated, and much frequented. Pro. Oats in the N., where much of the land is kept in a state of pasture, and where, as in the S., dairy husbandry is extensively carried on. Upwards of 2,000 tons of cheese are annually sold out of the county. In the High Peak large numbers of sheep are reared, but they are of a small size. Minerals. Lead, iron, coal, gypsum, lime, and what is so well known by the name of Derbyshire spar, which, in a variety of singular forms, is found suspended round the sides and tops of the limestone caverns. There are also extensive quarries of grit, which afford excellent millstones and grindstones. Crystals, also, called Derbyshire diamonds, jasper, chalcedony, and terra-vert are found. In the N.E. of the county are manufactories of iron; and many persons are employed in cutting and polishing marble and Derbyshire spar, either for useful or ornamental purposes. Manf. Woollen, linen, cotton, silk, spinning and weaving; calico-printing is carried on, and there are needle-factories, tanyards, paper-mills, and hat and porcelain manufactories. Pop. about 300,000. Canals are numerous in this county, and it is to a large extent intersected with railways.

DEVIL'S CAVERN.

DERCYLLIDAS, der-sil'-li-dăs, a Lacedæmonian general, who, about 404 B.C., entered Asia Minor, defeated the Persians, and took several of their cities; thus preserving the Greek colonies, which had been threatened by their neighbours. He, also, built a wall between Thracia and the Chersonesus, to prevent the incursions of the former people.

DEREHAM, or MARKET DEREHAM, deer'-ham, a town and parish of Norfolk, 16 miles from Norwich. The church of this place is a very ancient structure. Pop. of parish, 4,400. Dereham is, by a branch railway, in connection with that of the Eastern Counties.

DERG LOUGH, derg lok, an expansion of the Shannon river, separating Connaught from Munster, in Ireland. Ext. 24 miles long, with a varying breadth of from 2 to 6. It receives several small rivers.—Also a LAKE at the extremity of the county of Donegal, Ulster. It contains the island called St. Patrick's Purgatory, which is annually visited by a large number of votaries.

DERHAM, William, deer'-ham, an English divine and philosopher, who devoted himself to philosophical pursuits, became a member of the Royal Society, and contributed largely to the Philosophical Transactions. In 1713 he published his "Physico-Theology," being the substance of his Boyle's Lectures, with curious notes; and in 1714 appeared his "Astro-Theology," which was, also, delivered at the same lecture. In 1716 he was made canon of Windsor, and, in 1730, the University of Oxford conferred on him the degree of D.D. The last thing he printed of his own was "Christo-Theology, or a Demonstration of the Divine Authority of the Christian Religion," 1730. In his younger days he published a treatise entitled "The Artificial Clockmaker," in 12mo, which has been several times reprinted. He was rector of Upminster, where he died, 1735. B. near Worcester, 1657.

DERING, Sir Edward, deer'-ing, an English gentleman, who distinguished himself, in the reign of Charles I., by his zeal for the reform of abuses. He brought in a bill for the abolition of bishops, deans, and chapters. Notwithstanding these revolutionary tendencies, he, afterwards, espoused the king's cause, which he supported with a regiment of horse equipped at his own expense. He was a great sufferer in the civil war, and died before the Restoration. His speeches in parliament are in one volume 4to.

DERRY, der'-re, the prefix of several parishes in Ireland, with populations ranging between 3,000 and 8,000.

DERRY, a county and city of Ireland. (See LONDONDERRY.)

DERRY, several townships of the United States, none of them with a population above 2,000.

DERWENT, der'-went, the name of several rivers in England.—1. Of Cumberland, which falls into the Irish Sea at Workington.—2. Of York, which, after a course of 60 miles, falls into the Ouse at Barmby.—3. Another, which rises in the High Peak of Derbyshire, and, after a course of 50 miles, falls into the Trent on the borders of Leicestershire.

DERWENT-WATER, or KESWICK LAKE, der'-went, is in Cumberland. Ext. 4 miles long, with an average breadth of 1. It is very picturesque, and contains several islands, one of which is called the floating island, which only occasionally appears; being nothing more than a mass of soft land which rises to the surface.—The RIVER Derwent enters it at the S. and leaves it at its N. extremity.

DESAGUADERO, dais'-a-ga-dair'-o, a river of Bolivia, having its source in Lake Titicaca, and, after a course of about 200 miles, entering Lake Uros.

DESAGULIERS, John Theophilus, dai'-sa-goo'-le-at, a French philosopher, who came to London with his father, who was a minister, on the revocation of the edict of Nantes. Entering into holy orders, he, in 1710, succeeded Dr. Kiel as lecturer in experimental philosophy at Oxford, and published a "Course of Experimental Philosophy," a "Dissertation on Electricity," "Fires Improved; being a New Method of Building Chimneys, so as to prevent their smoking." He also translated into English "Gravesande's Mathematical Elements of Natural Philosophy." He was an active member of the Royal Society, and contributed several papers to its Transactions. B. at Rochelle, 1683; D. 1749.

DESAIGNES, des'-ain, a town of France, in the department of Ardèche, on the Doux, 10 miles from Tournon. Pop. 4,000.

DESAIX, Louis Charles Anthony, des-ai', a French general, who early entered the military service of his country, and rose to the rank of lieutenant. In the early part of the Revolution he became aide-de-camp to General Custine, and was severely wounded at the battle of Lauterberg, but kept the field, and rallied the battalions after they had been thrown into disorder. Named successively general of brigade and of division, he contributed greatly, by his talents, to the success of the famous retreat of Moreau from Germany, the left wing of the army being commanded by him on that occasion. He afterwards defended the bridge and fort of Kehl for two months against the Austrian army with great bravery, and was wounded; but subsequently joined Bonaparte at Milan, when it was announced that "the brave General Desaix had come to visit the army of Italy." He served with Bonaparte in Egypt, where he distinguished himself greatly, and was appointed governor of the upper part of the country. It was here he achieved his greatest glory. He completely subdued Upper Egypt, and received, as a testimony of admiration, from Bonaparte, a sword, with this inscription on its blade, "Conquète de la Haute Egypte!" He was obliged, however, in 1800, to sign the unfavourable treaty of El Arish with the Turks and English, and, on his way to France, was captured and detained by Lord Keith as prisoner of war. He afterwards obtained his parole, and went to France. He once more fought under the banner of Bonaparte in Italy, but was killed at the battle of Marengo, to which victory he principally contributed, June 14, 1800. B. at St. Hilaire-d'Ayat, in Avignon, 1768.—A statue was erected to this general, in the Place-Dauphiné, in Paris.

DESAULT, Peter Joseph, des'-olte, a French surgeon, who, in his twentieth year, went to Paris, and soon became popular as a lecturer on anatomy and surgery. In 1776 he was admitted a member of the corporation of surgeons, and, in 1782, was appointed surgeon-major to the Hospital of Charity, after which he became head surgeon of the Hôtel-Dieu. In 1791 he commenced his "Journal de Chirurgie," a work of high reputation. During the violence of the Revolution he was confined some time in the Luxembourg prison; but his usefulness saved his life. He died while attending the dauphin, June 1, 1795, which induced a suspicion that he was despatched because he would not poison that unfortunate prince. B. near Macon, 1744. He left a work entitled "Traité des Maladies Chirurgicales," &c., 2 vols. 8vo.

DESBARREAUX, James Vallée, Count, dai-bar'-ro, a French nobleman, who became counsellor in the Parliament of Paris, but which position he resigned, in order to devote himself more fully to the enjoyment of good cheer and the pursuit of pleasure. He changed his abode and climate according to the seasons, and was intimately associated with all the fine wits of the day—Balzac, Chapelle, Descartes, and others. He composed several songs and fugitive pieces; but the only production of his which is preserved is the beautiful sonnet, "Grand Dieu, tes jugements sont remplis d'équité," &c. Voltaire, however, denies the authorship to Desbarreaux, and gives it to the Abbé Lavau. B. at Paris, in 1602; D. 1647.

DESBILLONS, Francis Joseph, dai-bee'-yawng, a French Jesuit, who wrote 2 vols. of fables resembling those of La Fontaine, and some Latin poems. He also published an edition of Phædrus, with notes. B. at Châteauneuf, in 1711; D. at Mannheim, 1788.

DESCARTES, René, dai-kart', a celebrated French philosopher, who received his education at the Jesuits' college at La Flèche. Here he acquired a considerable knowledge of the Greek and Latin languages; but on leaving that seminary, removed to Paris, applying himself to the study of mathematics. In 1616 he entered the army of the prince of Orange, and, afterwards, served under the duke of Bavaria, fighting with great bravery at the battle of Prague, in 1620. While in the garrison at Breda, he solved a difficult mathematical problem, which had been posted in the public streets; and this introduced him to the acquaintance of the learned Beckman, principal of the college of Dort. He also wrote, at this time, in Latin, a treatise on music, and projected some other works. After this, he quitted the military life, and travelled into Holland, Switzerland, France, and Italy, where, although it has been said that he saw Galileo, at Florence, it does not appear that he visited him. In 1629 he settled at Amsterdam, and applied himself assiduously to the mathematical sciences, particulary dioptrics, in which he made some important discoveries. About this time he visited England, where he made observations on the declination of the magnetic needle. His philosophy now became the subject of much discussion, meeting with an extensive reception, though with considerable opposition. Gilbert Voet, rector of the University of Utrecht, wrote against it, and Descartes replied with a virulence unbecoming a philosopher. To escape religious persecution, he accepted an invitation from Christina, queen of Sweden, to go to Stockholm, where he obtained a pension and an estate. By this queen he was treated with great distinction, although she pursued her studies, under his direction, at five o'clock in the morning, notwithstanding that his health was far from being vigorous. B. at La Haye, in Touraine, 1596; D. at Stockholm, 1650, when his remains were conveyed to Paris, and interred with great pomp in the church of St. Geneviève. Descartes was a man of great parts, and of a vigorous imagination. He was the first to reduce the science of optics to the command of mathematics. His principal works are, 1. "Principia Philosophiæ;" 2. "Dissertatio de Methodo recte regendæ Rationis, &c.;" 3. "Dioptricæ;" 4. "Meditationes;" 5. "Geometry;" 6. "Letters."

DESEMBOGUE, dai-saim-bo'-gai, a town of Brazil, 400 miles from Goyaz. Pop. 5,000.

DESENZANO, dai-zain-za'-no, a town of Lombardy, situate at the S.W. extremity of the Lake of Garda, in the delegation of Brescia, from which it is distant 16 miles. Its streets are wide; it has several churches, a convent, hospital, and philosophical society: it forms a fishing port on the lake; and on the hill which rises behind it, is an ancient castle. Pop. 3,600. Here, in 1859, Garibaldi in command of the Italian volunteers, defeated an Austrian force.

DÉSERADE, dai'-se-rad, an island of the Little Antilles, 4 miles from Guadaloupe, of which it is a dependency. Pop. about 3,000. This was the first island discovered on the second voyage of Columbus, in 1493. It belongs to the French.

DESERT, des'-ert, a prefix of several parishes in Ireland, with populations ranging between 3,000 and 6,000.

DESERTAS, LAS, dai-sair'-tas, a group of islands in the Atlantic, with extensive cattle-pastures. They lie to the S. E. of Madeira. The largest is not more than 6 miles long.

DESFONTAINES, Peter Francis Guyot, dai-fon'-tain, a French critic, who studied under the Jesuits, and in 1724 went to Paris, where he contributed to several periodical papers, especially to the "Journal des Savants," which he greatly aided by the cleverness of his articles. Offending Voltaire by the freedom of his criticisms and censure, a bitter literary warfare was the consequence. Besides other works, he published a prose translation of Virgil. B. 1683; D. 1745.—There was also a French botanist of this name, who published several works on flowers and plants. B. 1751; D. 1833.

DESHOULIÈRES, Antoinette, dai-shool'-e-air, a distinguished French poetess of the reign of Louis XIV., who was intimate with all the literary celebrities of that sparkling age, and appears to have borne herself, throughout many difficult circumstances, with a propriety much to be commended. Her contemporaries called her the tenth muse and the French Calliope. She attempted poesy in all its various forms, from the song to tragedy; but the idyl and eclogue were those in which she most excelled. One of the most admired of her compositions is "Les Moutons," a charming allegory, in which she deplores, in beautiful verses, the sad lot of children who have lost their father. She married, in 1651, the Seigneur Deshoulières, but who died leaving her without fortune. B. 1638; D. 1694.

DESIDERIUS, or DIDIER, des'-i-deer'-e-us, the last king of Lombardy, succeeded Astolphus in 756. His daughters were married to the two sons of Pepin, king of France, Carloman and Charlemagne. Desiderius invading the papal territories, the pope called in Charlemagne to his aid, who marched into Lombardy, took his father-in-law prisoner, and sent him with his family to France, where they died. Lived in the 8th century.

DESMAIZEAUX, Peter, dai'-mai-zo, a French biographical writer, who came to England, and became fellow of the Royal Society. He translated into English "Bayle's Dictionary," and wrote the lives of Chillingworth and John Hales. He had also a concern in the great Historical Dictionary, 10 vols. folio. B. at Auvergne, 1666; D. in London, 1745.

DESMOLETS, Peter Nicholas, dai'-mo-lai, a French ecclesiastic, who continued Sallengre's "Memoirs of Literature," 11 vols. 12mo, and edited several of Lami's treatises. B. at Paris, in 1677; D. 1760.

DESMOULINS, Camille, dai'-moo-lă, a fellow-student of Robespierre, who, in 1789, was the favourite orator with the people of France, and made his idea of liberty the idol of his worship. He had the greatest contempt for everything that wore the appearance of religion; and although his talents were considerable, they seem only to have hastened his downfall. In the heat of the great revolution, his colleagues conspired against him, and brought him to the scaffold. B. at Guise, 1762; guillotined, 1794.

DESNA, des'-na, a large river of Russia, which, after a course of 500 miles, unites with the Dnieper nearly opposite Kiev. On its banks are the towns of Briansk, Elina, and Tchernigov.

DESOLATION, CAPE, des-o-lai'-shun, is the S.W. extremity of Nunarsoak Island, Greenland. Lat. 60° 50′ N. Lon. 48° 50′ W.—Also a HEADLAND of Terra-del-Fuego, S. America, on one of its W. islands. Lat. 55° 45′ S. Lon. 71° 37′ W.

DESPARD, Edward Marcus, des'-pard, an Irishman who early entered upon a military life, and became an able engineer. At the close of the American war he served in the West Indies, where he distinguished himself by an expedition on the Spanish main, in which he had for a coadjutor, Captain, afterwards Lord, Nelson. For his services there, he was made lieutenant-colonel. In 1784 he was appointed English superintendent at Honduras; but his conduct causing him to be suspended, he demanded an investigation. This, however, was refused him, when he became violent against the government, and was sent to Cold-bath Fields prison, whence he was removed to the House of Industry at Shrewsbury, and next to Tothill Fields bridewell. On his liberation, he endeavoured to seduce the soldiery, and having collected some followers, held secret meetings at alehouses, to which no persons were admitted without taking a treasonable oath. At these assemblies, it is said that various plans were devised for the murder of the king; and, at last, it was determined to make the attack when his majesty went to the Parliament House. The plot being discovered, he and several other persons were arrested, and, being found guilty, suffered on the scaffold, in 1803.

DESPOTO DAGH, des-po'-to da, a mountain-chain of European Turkey, extending from 30 miles to the E. of the Balkan to the bank of the Maritza. Height, nearly 8,000 feet.

DESSAU, des'-son, the capital of the duchy of Anhalt-Dessau, on the Mulde, 70 miles from Berlin. The chief buildings are the prince's castle and the government house, an asylum, a riding-school, and Lutheran and Catholic churches. Manf. Woollens, leather, hats; and there are some distilleries. Pop. 1,000.

DESTERRO, dais-tair'-ro, a fortified city of Brazil, nearly in the middle of the W. coast of the island of Santa Catharina, 450 miles from Rio Janeiro. Pop. of district, 7,000.

DESTOUCHES, Philip Néricault, dai-toosh', a French dramatic writer, who was attached to a political mission to England, and resided in London for a number of years. On his return to his own country he refused the office of ambassador to Russia, and retired into the country, where he devoted himself to agriculture and the belles-lettres. B. at Tours, 1680; D. 1754.—His principal pieces are "Le Philosophe marié," and "Le Glorieux;" the last of which is esteemed one of the best comedies in the French language. His works were printed at the Louvre, in 4 vols. 4to, 1757, and since in 10 vols. 12mo.

DETROIT RIVER, or STRAIT OF ST. CLAIR, det'-rwaw, flows from Lake St. Clair into Lake Erie, separating the United States from Upper Canada. It is navigable for the largest vessels.

DETROIT, a city and port of entry in Wayne county, and the capital of Michigan, U.S., on the Detroit, 225 miles from Buffalo. It has a state-house, city-hall, a cathedral, several churches, market-houses, government magazines, museum, theatre, merchants'-hall, and several charitable institutions, literary societies, and schools. Manf. Brass and iron works. It has shipbuilding-docks, and a considerable trade on the lakes. Pop. 25,000.—This place was founded by the French in 1670, and, in 1815, made a city.

DETTINGEN, det'-tin-gen, a village of Bavaria, on the Maine, 8 miles from Aschaffenburg. It is noted for a victory gained over the French, commanded by Marshal Noailles, by the English, under George II., in 1743. Pop. 500.—The name also of three towns in Wurtemberg.

DEUCALION, du-kai'-le-on, an ancient king of Thessaly, the son of Prometheus, and husband of Pyrrha, daughter of Epimetheus. In his reign the whole earth was covered with a deluge. Deucalion and Pyrrha, alone preserved out of all mankind, on account of their piety, built a vessel, which, after tossing about nine days, landed on the top of Mount Parnassus. Here, consulting the oracle of Themis, they were directed, in order to repair the loss of mankind, to throw behind them the bones of their grandmother. Understanding, by the latter phrase, the earth, they threw behind them stones, and those that Deucalion cast, became men, and those that Pyrrha cast, women. The deluge of Deucalion, so much celebrated in ancient history, is supposed to have happened 1503 years B.C.—Some writers, in their account of this, do not mention the building of a vessel, but only say that the king and queen took refuge on the top of Mount Parnassus, and others say, Etna.

DEUTZ, doitz, a fortified town of Prussia, on the Rhine, opposite Cologne, with which it is connected by a bridge of boats. Manf. Silks and velvets. Pop. 5,000.

DEUX PONTS, LES, doo pawng (Germ. ZWEIBRUCKEN, tzwi brook'-en), 'Two Bridges,' a town of Bavaria, capital of a duchy of the same name, on the Little Erbach, with a fine castle, 58 miles from Mentz. The town church has a beautiful organ. The other public buildings are the Lutheran church, the Lutheran academy, and the Orphan-house. Manf. Woollens, cotton, leather, and tobacco. Pop. 7,000.—From 1802 to 1814, this town, with its duchy, formed a department of France called Mont-Tonnerre.

DEVA, dai'-va, the name of two rivers in Spain, on one of which is the town of Deva, a fishing town and seaport in Guipuscoa, 15 miles from St. Sebastian. Pop. of town, 2,500.

DEVA, a town of Transylvania, 10 miles from Hunyad. Pop. 4,000, mostly employed in paper-making and copper-mining.

DEVAPRAYAGA, de'-va-pra'-ya-ga', a town of Northern Hindostan, Serinagur. It has a noted Hindoo temple, to which pilgrims resort in great numbers. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 30° 9′ N. Lon. 78° 31′ E.

DEVENTER, dai-fen'-ter, a fortified town of Holland, on the Yssel, 45 miles from Amsterdam. Its principal buildings are a cathedral, several other churches, a town-hall, and an observatory. Manf. Linens, stockings, and carpets; and the traffic in cattle, butter, and cheese is considerable. Pop. 14,500.

DEVERON, dev'-e-ron, a river of Scotland, rising in Aberdeenshire, and, after a course of 40 miles, falling into the German Ocean at Banff.

DEVIL'S-BIT MOUNTAINS, a range in the county of Tipperary and part of King's county, Ireland. It separates the basins of the Suir and the Shannon. Height, about 2,100 feet.

DEVIZES, de-vi'-zes, a town of Wiltshire, on the Kennet and Avon Canal, 23 miles from Salisbury. It has two parochial churches, some dissenting chapels, a town-hall, a gaol, and a free grammar-school. Manf. Silk, snuff, and malt. Pop. about 7,000.

DEVON, dev'-on, a river of Scotland, rising in the Ochil Hills, and falling into the Forth near Alloa. There is another smaller river, which falls into the Forth at Clackmannan harbour.

DEVONPORT, dev'-on-port, a seaport of Devonshire, situate on the E. of the estuary of the Tamar, and connected with Plymouth. It is partially inclosed with a lofty wall, and on its sea side is defended by strong batteries. Its dockyard occupies more than 100 acres, the buildings being mostly of granite. It has a barracks, military hospital, assembly-rooms, theatre, and several places of worship. Pop. 52,000.

DEVONSHIRE, dev'-on-sheer, a county of England, bounded N. by the Bristol Channel, E. by the counties of Dorset and Somerset, S. by the English Channel, and W. by the county of Cornwall. Area, 2,585 square miles. Desc. A large portion is open and uncultivated; and Dartmoor occupies a considerable part of its S.W. half. (See DARTMOOR.) A great extent of the surface, however, consists of fine valleys; whilst the climate is particularly mild, and on that account making this county the resort of invalids from all the northern counties of Britain. Rivers. The Exe, Tamar, Torridge, Teign, Taw, Dart, and Axe; nearly all the estuaries of which form good harbours. Plymouth Sound and Torbay are respectively on its S.W. and S.E. coasts. Pro. Corn in most of its varieties; excellent cider is made, and the produce of the dairy is considerable. The Devonshire red breed of cattle is highly valued; and Dartmoor grazes large flocks of sheep. The coast abounds with herrings, pilchards, and mackerel. Minerals. Small quantities of gold and silver are sometimes found; antimony, bismuth, cobalt, copper, lead, tin, iron, gypsum, and manganese. A beautiful kind of veined marble, called Devonshire marble, susceptible of a high polish, is also found. Manf. Woollen-weaving and spinning. An iron-foundry, and works for cutlery, are established on a large scale at Tavistock. Shipbuilding is carried on at the various ports. Pop. 568,000.

D'EWES, Sir Symonds, duse, an English antiquary, who employed a considerable part of his time in collecting materials for a history of Great Britain, and had the honour of knighthood conferred upon him by Charles I. In 1641 he was made a baronet, and, on the breaking out of the civil war, entered the Solemn League and Covenant. B. at Coxden, Dorsetshire, 1602; D. 1650.—He compiled the "Journals of all the Parliaments during the Reign of Queen Elizabeth," published in 1682, folio, and wrote his own life, which is in Peck's "Desiderata Curiosa." The "Journals of Parliament" are an authority for the reign of Queen Elizabeth.

DE WITT, John, de wit, a distinguished Dutch statesman, who laboured to retrench the power of the house of Orange by endeavouring to prevent the union of the offices of stadtholder, captain-general, and high admiral in one and the same person. In 1654 he negotiated the peace with Cromwell, in which it was arranged that no member of the house of Orange should be made high admiral or stadtholder. B. at Dort, 1625; murdered with his brother, at the Hague, 1672.—He had gone in his carriage to receive his brother as he came out of prison, having been unjustly confined, when he was set upon by the populace and killed.

DE WITT LAND, a region on the N.W. coast of Australia, between lon. 120° and 123° W. Discovered in 1628.

DEWSBURY, duse'-ber-e, a township and parish in the West Riding of Yorkshire, 8 miles from Leeds. Manf. Blankets and woollen stuffs, generally. Pop. of parish, 29,000; of township, 14,100.—It is a station on the Manchester and Leeds Railway.

DEYNZE, dainse, a town of Belgium, on the Lys, 9 miles from Ghent. It is famed for its gin-distilleries. Pop. about 4,000. It is a station on the Ghent and Courtrai Railway.

DHAMIR, a Sikh state in Hindostan, protected by the British. Pop. 3,000.

DHAR, dar, a state of India. Area, 1,070 square miles. Desc. Fertile, yielding wheat, millet, rice, pulse, maize, sugar, oil-seeds, opium, hemp, and cotton. Pop. 105,000. Lat. 22° 35′ N. Lon. 75° 20′ E.—The capital of this place is of the same name, and is about 30 miles from Mhow.

DHARMA, dar'-ma, a district of Kumaon, in British India. Area, 400 square miles. It consists of rocks and valleys, overlooked by mountains covered with perpetual snow, and some of them attaining a height of nearly 19,000 feet above the level of the sea. Pop. 3,000. Lat. between 30° 5′ and 30° 30′ N. Lon. between 80° 25′ and 80° 45′ E.

DHARWAR, dar-war', a district of British India, in the presidency of Bombay, inclosed by Belgaum, Mysore, Madras territory, and the dominions of the Nizam. Area, 3,840 square miles. Desc. Fertile and level. American cotton is grown in it to a large extent. Pop. 800,000. Lat. between 14° 16′ and 15° 20′ N. Lon. between 74° 50′ and 76° E.—This district came into the possession of the British in 1818. —A town of the same name, with government native schools, 290 miles from Bombay.

DHAWALAGIRI, da-wal'-a-ge'-re, a peak of the Himalayas, Hindostan, formerly supposed to be the highest point of the earth's surface. Height, 28,000 feet. Lat. 29° N. Lon. 82° 50′ E.

D'HILLIERS, BARAGUAY. (See BARAGUAY.)

DHOOLPORE, dool-por', a city of Hindostan, in the province of Agra, on the Chumbul, 35 miles from Agra. It has several mosques and tombs. Pop. Unascertained. Dhoolpore is the capital of a territory of the same name, made fertile by artificial watering. Area, 1,626 square miles. Pop. estimated at 500,000. Lat. between 26° 30′ and 27° 57′ N. Lon. between 77° 32′ and 78° 30′ E.

DHUBBOVRE, dub-bo-ve', a decayed town of India, 220 miles from Bombay. It bears the appearance of having once been large, its walls being 3 miles in circumference, with fifty-two towers. It has a richly-sculptured Hindoo temple. Pop. Unascertained.

DHULAK, du'-lak, an island in the Red Sea, 25 miles from Massouah. Ext. 23 miles long, with an average breadth of 15. Its inhabitants are mostly employed in the coral fishery.

DHUMTOUR, or DUMTAUR, dum-tor', a valley in the Punjab, British India, traversed by numerous streams, and containing a number of scattered villages, which, in the aggregate, form a large population. It grows sugar, and cattle are extensively reared. Lat. between 34° and 34° 10′ N. Lon. between 72° 55′ and 73° 15′ E.

DHURRUMPOOR, dur-rum-poor', a Rajpoot state of India, inclosed by Bandsda, the Daung, the Penth, and Surat. Area, 225 square miles. Pop. 17,000.

DIABLERATS, de-abl'-ra, a mountain of the Bernese Alps, between the cantons Berne and Valois. Height, 10,190 feet above the level of the sea.

DIAGORAS, di-ăg'-o-răs, a Greek philosopher of Milos, a disciple of Democritus. Having been the victim of a perjury which remained unpunished, he passed from superstition to atheism, and was generally called the Atheist. He was driven from Athens on the charge of having turned into ridicule the Eleusinian mysteries, and perished by shipwreck, about 412 B.C.

DIAMANT, de'-a-mang, a town of Martinique, in the Antilles, 8 miles from Port Royal. It is near a volcanic mountain, called Morne de Diamant, nearly 1,600 feet in height. Pop. 1,600, of whom two thirds were formerly slaves.

DIAMANTINO, de'-a-man-te'-no, a city of Brazil, 220 miles from Ouro-Preto. It is built in the form of an amphitheatre, 5,700 feet above the level of the sea, and is the centre of a district with a population of 14,000.—Also, a town 70 miles from Cuyaba. Pop. 5,000.—Also, a river, called so from the diamonds found in its basin in 1728. That the Spanish government might monopolize the diamonds and gold in its district, this was closed; which circumstance, in 1749, caused an extensive emigration.

DIAMOND HARBOUR, di'-a-mond, is in the river Hooghly, 30 miles below Calcutta, British India.

DIAMOND ISLAND is in the estuary of the Bassain river, Burmah. It is 12 miles from Cape Negrais, and abounds with turtles.

DIANA, di-ăn'-a, the goddess of hunting, was the daughter of Jupiter and Latona. Having to fulfil three distinct offices,—viz., one on earth, and the others in heaven and the infernal regions,—she received, in consequence, three distinct names. On earth she was known by the name of Diana, and was the goddess of hunting and chastity; and, as Lucina, was invoked by women in childbed. In heaven she was known as Phœbe, and was the goddess of the moon, as Apollo, her brother, was the god of the sun. In Tartarus she was known as Hecate, and presided at all transformations and punishment. Many adventures are ascribed to Diana. She changed into a stag the hunter Actæon, who had watched her as she bathed. Although the patroness of chastity, she had loved Endymion, Pan, and Orion. She is represented with a quiver, and attended with dogs, and sometimes drawn in a chariot by two white stags. She was supposed to be the same as the Isis of the Egyptians, whose worship was introduced into Greece with that of Osiris, under the name of Apollo. The most famous of her temples was that of Ephesus, which was one of the seven wonders of the world.

DIARBEKIR, de-ar'-be-ker', a city of Asiatic Turkey, and capital of the pashalic of Diarbekir, on the Tigris, which encircles it on the E., and is crossed by a bridge half a mile lower down, 170 miles from Malatia. It is encompassed by a lofty thick wall of black stone, flanked with towers. On the N. side of the town is a strong castle. The streets are paved, but narrow and dirty. The houses are built of hewn stone, and present a handsome appearance, and many of them are elegant. There are several fine bazars well stored with rich merchandise, and a large and magnificent mosque, formerly a Christian church. The Armenian cathedral is a handsome structure. Manf. Iron, copper, silk, wool, cotton, and Turkey or Morocco leather. Pop. 14,000, consisting of Turks, Armenians, Kurds, and Christians.—The PASHALIC forms the W. part of Turkish Armenia, the Euphrates separating it, on the N.W. and S., from the pashalics of Erzeroum, Damascus, Marash, and Sivas. It is traversed by the Upper Tigris. Lat. between 37° and 39° N. Lon. between 37° and 39° E.

DIAZ, Bartholomew, de'-az, a Portuguese navigator, who discovered the Cape of Good Hope, to which he gave the name of the Cape of Tempests; but on his reporting this, in 1486, to John II., king of Portugal, he commanded it to be called Cabo de Buena Esperanza, or the Cape of Good Hope. Lived in the 15th century. (See AFRICA, and CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.)

DIBDIN, Charles, dib'-din, an actor, dramatist, and distinguished sea-song writer. He was educated at Winchester, and originally intended for the church; but going to London, at the early age of sixteen he produced an opera, called "The Shepherd's Artifice," which was brought out at Covent Garden. In 1778 he was appointed musical manager at Covent Garden. Subsequently he built the "Circus," afterwards called the "Surrey;" and in 1788 published his "Musical Tour." In the following year he gave his entertainment called "The Whim of the Moment," of which he was sole author, composer, and performer. In this piece, he sung his ballad of "Poor Jack," which completely won the ear of the public; and, from that time, his reputation as a balladist was established. He wrote no fewer than 900 songs, according to some, and 1,200 according to others. Whichever number is correct, does not much signify; as a soil so prolific must have produced many weeds. Many of his lyrics, however, have great merit. They have solaced the seaman during his long voyage, sustained him in the storm, and inspired him in battle; and they have been quoted to restore the mutinous to order and discipline. In 1805 he retired from public life, and received a government pension of £200 per annum. B. at Southampton, 1745; D. 1813.—"Poor Tom Bowling" was written upon a brother of his, who had been the captain of an East Indiaman, and was twenty-nine years older than the author.—THOMAS, a son of Charles, was long connected with the London stage, as an actor and dramatist. He wrote and adapted a vast number of pieces; but none of them are distinguished by much original merit. He also wrote a work of amusing "Reminiscences." D. in Pentonville, 1841.

DIBDIN, Reverend Thomas Frognall, was the son of the brother of Charles Dibdin's celebrated

"Poor Tom Bowling, the darling of our crew."

He lost his parents when only in his fourth year, and was designed for the law, but ultimately became a clergyman, and an eminent bibliographer. In 1809 appeared his "Bibliomania," and an enlarged edition in 1811. The work was well received, and brought him £200 of profit, and considerable reputation. After it, came his "Topographical Antiquities of Great Britain," the "Bibliotheca Spenceriana," the "Bibliographical Decameron," and several other "Antiquarian Tours." He was the founder of the Roxburghe Club, a literary association, instituted for the purpose of reprinting books. He also wrote "Reminiscences of a Literary Life," and several theological works. B. at Calcutta, 1776; D. 1847.

DICEARCHUS, dī'-se-ar'-kus, a Peripatetic philosopher of Messina, in Sicily, whose treatise on the Geography of Greece was published by H. Stephens in 1589, and by Hudson in his collection of writers on geography, in 1709. His principal philosophical work was one "On the Soul," which he divided into three dialogues, and which argued against its existence. Lived in the 3rd century B.C.

DICK, Sir Alexander, dik, a Scottish physician, who studied at Edinburgh, and at Leyden under Boerhaave; and having taken his degree of M.D., returned to his own country. He afterwards made the tour of Europe, and when he came back, settled in Pembrokeshire, where he practised with success. On the death of his brother, he succeeded to his family seat of Prestonfield, where he resided the remainder of his days. In 1756 he was chosen president of the College of Physicians at Edinburgh, to which he was a benefactor. B. at Prestonfield, in 1703; D. 1785.—He was the first who paid attention to the culture of the true rhubarb in Britain; for which he received, in 1774, the gold medal from the London Society for Promoting Arts and Commerce.

DICK, Thomas, LL.D., dik, the "Christian philosopher," was educated at the University of Edinburgh, and afterwards entered the ministry of the Secession Church. Much of his time was passed in teaching and lecturing on scientific subjects. He also contributed to many periodicals, whilst producing the following more permanent works: "The Christian Philosopher;" "The Philosophy of Religion;" "Philosophy of a Future State;" "On the Mental Illumination and Moral Improvement of Mankind;" "Christian Beneficence contrasted with Covetousness;" "Celestial Scenes;" "The Solar System;" "The Atmosphere and Atmospherial Phenomena;" and "The Telescope and Microscope." Some of these works have been translated into other languages, and the "Solar System," into the Chinese. All his works have received the highest commendation, and merit a place in every Christian library. B. near Dundee, Scotland, 1774; D. 1857. Towards the close of his life, a small pension was granted to him by the government.

DICKENS, Charles, dik'-ens, one of the most successful of modern novelists, was intended for the profession of the law, but merged into a reporter for the newspapers. His first engagement was in the office of the True Sun, and his next in that of the Morning Chronicle, in the evening edition of which paper, first appeared his "Sketches of Life and Character." These were subsequently collected, and given to the world under the title of "Sketches by Boz," Their success induced an enterprising publisher to engage Mr. Dickens and Mr. Seymour, the comic draughtsman, "the one to write, and the other to illustrate, a book which should exhibit the adventures of a party of cockney sportsmen." The result was the "Pickwick Papers," a performance which, at once, placed Mr. Dickens in the foremost rank as a popular writer of fiction. After it, came his "Nicholas Nickleby," "Oliver Twist," the "Old Curiosity-Shop," "Barnaby Rudge," and many more, teeming with original wit, humour, and sentiment, besides abounding with vivid descriptions of human life and character. In 1841 he paid a visit to America, where his fame had preceded him, and where he received a hearty welcome. On his return, he published a work recording the impressions made by his visit. In 1845 he was appointed principal editor of the Daily News, a paper of liberal politics; but he did not long hold this position. To its columns he contributed "Pictures of Italy." On his retirement from that paper, he resumed the pen of fiction, and produced "Dombey and Son," "David Copperfield," "Bleak House," several "Christmas Tales," the "Child's History of England," "Little Dorrit," and edited the "Memoirs of Grimaldi." He, besides, till 1859, conducted the periodical called "Household Words," and was a constant contributor to its pages. In that year he relinquished his connection with that serial, to establish another on a similar plan, and entitled, "All the Year Round." B. at Landport, Portsmouth, 1812.

DICKSON, dik'-son, a county of W. Tenessee, U.S. Area, 724 square miles. Pop. 9,000.

DICTATOR, dik-tat'-tor, a magistrate at Rome, invested with regal authority. This officer was first chosen during the Roman wars against the Latins. The consuls being found unable to make levies from the plebeians, who had refused to enlist without a remission of their debts by the patricians, the senate found it expedient to elect a new magistrate, with unbounded authority. The dictator remained in office for six months, after which he was again elected, if the affairs of the state seemed to be desperate. If, however, tranquillity was re-established, he generally laid down his power before the time was expired. He knew no superior in the republic, and even the laws were subject to him. He was called dictator, because the people implicitly obeyed his dictates. As his power was absolute, he could proclaim war, levy forces, conduct them against an enemy, and disband them at pleasure. He punished as he pleased; and, from his decision, there was no appeal,—at least till later times. He was chosen only when the state was in imminent danger, from foreign enemies or inward sedition. This office, so dignified in the first ages of the republic, became odious by the perpetual usurpations of Sylla and J. Cæsar; and after the death of the latter, the Roman senate, on the motion of the consul Antony, passed a decree, which for ever after forbade a dictator to exist in Rome. The dictatorship was originally confined to the patricians; but the plebeians were afterwards admitted to share it. Titus Lartius Flavus was the first dictator, 498 B.C.

DICTYNNA, dik-tin'-na, a nymph of Crete, and one of Diana's attendants, who first invented hunting-nets. Some have supposed that Milos pursued her, and that, to avoid his importunities, she threw herself into the sea, and was caught in fishermen's nets, diktua; whence her name.

DICTYS CRETENSIS, dik'-tis, an ancient historian, who served under Idomeneus, king of Crete, at the siege of Troy; of which expedition he wrote an account. This work is said to have been the foundation of Homer's "Iliad." The book which is extant under his name is a forgery.

DIDEROT, Denis, de'-de-ro, a French writer, was the son of a master cutler, and intended for the profession of the law; but, from sheer indolence and the love of reading, he relinquished this intention, and gave himself up to literature and philosophy. His first work, entitled "Philosophical Musings," was published in 1740, and was afterwards reprinted under another title. In 1746 he was concerned in a Medical Dictionary, which suggested to him the idea of a "Dictionnaire Encyclopédique," which, with the assistance of others, he completed. His share in this work was large, and the whole of the articles on arts and trade were furnished by him. His own opinion of it, however, is not very flattering. "In its execution," said he, "I had neither time nor the power to be particular in the choice of my contributors, who were mostly very inferior men, badly paid, and, consequently, careless in their work." While engaged in the "Encyclopédie," he wrote some other books; as a licentious novel, called "Bijoux Indiscrets," and two comedies, the "Fils Naturel" and the "Père de Famille." In 1749 appeared his "Letters to the Blind," the free sentiments in which, occasioned his being imprisoned six months at Vincennes. On recovering his liberty, he wrote "A Letter on the Deaf and Dumb." His other works are, "Principles of Moral Philosophy," "Reflections on the Interpretation of Nature," "The Code of Nature," "The Sixth Sense," "Of Public Education," "Panegyric on Richardson," "Life of Seneca." B. at Langres, in Champagne, 1713; D. in Paris, 1784.—Diderot was an ingenious, rather than a useful writer. His works are fanciful, and full of prejudices against religion; but he made himself rich by them, if that is of consequence when a man comes to his deathbed. The last remark he was heard to make, by his daughter, shortly before his death, was, that "the first step towards philosophy is incredulity."

DIDIER, St., did'-e-ai, a name common to many towns and parishes in France, none of them with a population above 3,000.

DIDIER-LA-SÉAUVE, St., sai'-ove, a town and parish of France, in the Upper Loire, 14 miles from Yessengeaux. Manf. Silks. Pop. 5,000.

DIDIUS JULIANUS, M. Salvius Severus, did'-i-us ju-li-ai'-nus, a Roman emperor, who was consul in 179. He purchased the imperial diadem of the soldiers at an enormous rate, in 193; but did not pay the sum agreed upon, and made himself odious by his luxurious and extravagant habits. Shortly afterwards, however, Severus was declared emperor by the prætorian bands, and Didius was slain, having reigned only sixty-six days. B. at Milan, about 133.

DIDO, or ELISSA, di'-do, queen and founder of Carthage, was the daughter of Belus, king of Tyre. She married Sichæus, priest of Hercules, who, for the sake of his riches, was murdered by Pygmalion, the successor of Belus. Dido, disconsolate at the loss of her husband, sailed with a number of Tyrians, and settled on the coast of Africa, where she purchased a tract of land, on which she built a citadel called Byrsa. This place soon increased, and her dominions extended. Iarbas, king of Mauritania, wooed her; but she rejected his suit; when he threatened to invade her territories. She requested three months to reconsider her refusal, and, in the interval, caused a funeral pile to be erected, on which she stabbed herself in the presence of her subjects, about 953 B.C. Virgil and Ovid have represented this action as the effect of grief, occasioned by the departure of Æneas, of whom she was enamoured.

DIDOT, Francis Ambrose, de-do, a celebrated printer, who invented stereotyping, ascribed also to a Scotchman named Ged, and executed several works with beauty. He also improved the construction of papermills, and invented many useful machines relative to the typographic art. At the age of 78 he read over five times, and carefully corrected, every sheet of the stereotyped edition of Montaigne, printed by his sons. He had likewise projected, and partly executed, an index to that writer. B. 1730; D. at Paris, 1804.

DIDRON, Adolphe Napoléon, de'-drawng, one of the greatest modern French students of mediæval Christian art, who made himself familiar with all the remarkable mediæval monuments in France and Greece. In 1848 he lectured on Christian iconography in Paris, and, afterwards, became editor of the "Annales Archéologiques." His principal work, however, is his "Iconographie Chrétienne," a portion of which has been translated into English by Mrs. Millington. D. at Hauteville, 1806.

DIE, de, a town of France, on the Drôme, in Lower Dauphiny, 30 miles from Grenoble. Manf. Silks, paper, and leather. Pop. 4,000.

DIÉ, ST., de'-ai, a town and parish of France, in the Vosges, 24 miles from Epinal. Manf. Cotton-spinning, iron, and wire-works. Pop. 9,000.—In its neighbourhood are marble-quarries and copper-mines.

DIEBITSCH, Sabalanski Hans Karl Frederich Anton, de'-bitsh, a Prussian, who entered the military service of Russia, and in 1805 was wounded at Austerlitz. After the battle of Friedland, he rose to the rank of captain, and subsequently became major-general. He fought at the battle of Lutzen, and was at that of Dresden. In 1814 he opposed the hesitation of the allies to march on Paris, for which the emperor Alexander bestowed on him the order of St. Alexander Newski. In 1820, he became chief of the imperial staff of Alexander, whom he attended on his death-bed at Taganrog. In the war with Turkey in 1828-9, he took Varna, and greatly extended his reputation by making the passage of the Balkan. He advanced to Adrianople, when the treaty of that name was signed, and which saved his army. In 1831 he was sent to quell the insurrection in Poland, and fought the battle of Ostrolenka. Thence he transferred his head-quarters to near Pultusk, where he died of cholera, 1831. B. at Grossleippe, in Silesia, 1785.

DIEBURG, de'-boorg, a town of the grand-duchy of Hesse-Darmstadt, 24 miles from Mentz. It is the capital of the district. Pop. 3,100.

DIEGO, SAN, de-ai'-go, a harbour in the Pacific, in Upper California. Lat. 32° 39' N. Lon. 117° 17' W. —A shoal in the Gulf of Mexico, between Florida and the mouth of the Mississippi.—A cape at the extremity of Staten Island, Terra-del-Fuego.

DIEMEN, Anthony Van, de'-men, governor of the Dutch E. India possessions, first went to India as an accountant, in the employ of his government. In 1625 he became a member of the supreme council, and in 1631 returned to Holland as commander of the India fleet; but the year following, went out again as director-general. Subsequently becoming governor-general, he greatly extended the Dutch interest in the East. In 1642 he sent Abel Tasman on a voyage to the south; the consequence of which was, the discovery of that part of New Holland called after him Van Diemen's Land; but which name was changed, at the desire of the colonists, to Tasmania. B. at Krulenberg. D. 1645.

DIENECKS, di-en'-e-sees, a Spartan, who, hearing, before the battle of Thermopylæ, that the Persians were so numerous that their arrows would darken the light of the sun, observed, that it would be a great convenience, for the Spartans would then fight in the shade.

DIEPENBECK, Abraham Van, de'-pen-bek, an eminent Dutch painter, of the Flemish school. He was a fellow-pupil of Vandyke in the school of Rubens, at Antwerp. He was one of the best scholars of his great master, and acquired a high reputation. In 1641 he was elected director of the Antwerp Academy, an office which he held as long as he lived. He designed chiefly for the booksellers, and his works on canvass are very scarce. In the churches of Antwerp, there are several painted windows by him. B. at Bois-le-Duc, about 1606; D. 1675.

DIEPPE, de'-ep, a seaport-town of France, in the department of the Lower Seine, at the mouth of the river Arques, 34 miles from Rouen. Its streets are tolerably regular. The principal public edifices, are the parish church of St. James, an old castle on the W. side of the town, a college, theatre, public library, town-hall, and baths. The ramparts form a pleasant promenade, and the town proper communicates with a suburb called Le Pollet, by means of a flying-bridge. The harbour, though tolerably commodious, is narrow. The only seminary of note is a navigation school. Manf. Watches, lace, and ivory wares. Pop. 18,000.

It has daily communication with Newhaven and Brighton, by steamboats.

DIES, Albert, dees, a German landscape-painter and engraver, who acquired considerable reputation in his art. After gaining a slight knowledge of this in Hanover, he proceeded to Düsseldorf, and thence to Rome, where he took up his abode in the neighbourhood of Tivoli and Albano. Here he devoted himself to the study of the ever-varying aspects of nature; and, in Rome, published, in conjunction with several German artists, a set of landscape-etchings. He now married a Roman lady, and, in 1796, returned to Germany, taking up his residence in Vienna. Here he rose into fame; but from having accidentally taken some sugar of lead, by mistake, for a medicine, he was afflicted with a nervous debility, which forced him to resign the use of his pencil. He now applied himself to poetry, in the study of which he had always been more or less occupied, and to musical composition. We are not aware that his excellence was great in either of these pursuits. B. in Hanover, 1755; D. at Vienna, 1822.

DIEMEN'S LAND, VAN. (See TASMANIA.)

DIEST, de'-est, a town of Belgium, in S. Brabant, on the Demer, 22 miles from Maestricht. It has three parish churches and several chapels. Manf. Woollens. Pop. 7,500. This town was taken by the duke of Marlborough in 1705, but retaken by the French, and dismantled, in the same year. Within these few years, it has been made a place of great strength by improved fortifications.

DIETRICH, Johann Wilhelm Ernst, de'-treesh, an eminent German artist, whose father was court-painter at Weimar, and from whom he received his first instructions in his art. In his 12th year he was sent to study at Dresden, and there, in his 18th, was presented to Augustus II., king of Poland, whose court-painter he became. He obtained other patrons, and now rose rapidly. In 1741 he was appointed court-painter to Augustus III. In 1763 he became one of the professors in the Academy of Arts at Dresden, and director of the school of painting in the porcelain-manufactory at Meissen. B. at Weimar, 1712; D. at Dresden, 1774. —Dietrich was a persevering artist, but with little original power. His excellence lay chiefly in landscape painting.

DIEU LE FIT, de'-e(r) le(r) fe, a town of France, in the department of the Drôme, 18 miles from Montelimart. Manf. Pottery and woollens. Pop. about 3,500. In the time of the religious troubles of France, this was a Protestant stronghold.

DIEUSE, or DUZE, de'-e(r)ze, a town of France, in the department Meurthe, 26 miles from Nancy. Its principal public building is a commercial college. Manf. Hosiery and linen goods. It has several tanneries, and, in the neighbourhood, are mines of rock-salt. Pop. 4,000. Its site is said to be the Decem Pagi mentioned in Cæsar's Commentaries.

DIGBY, Sir Everard, dig'-be, an English gentleman, who was visited by James I. at Belvoir Castle, and knighted by that sovereign, when on his way from Scotland to ascend the throne of England. He became a partisan in the gunpowder plot, for which he was executed in 1606. B. 1581.—He pleaded guilty at his trial, and endeavoured to extenuate his crime by alleging conscience as his motive.

DIGBY, Sir Kenelm, son of the above, was brought up in the Protestant religion, and educated at Gloucester Hall, Oxford, where he studied philosophy; after which he made the tour of Europe, and was absent two years in France, Spain, and Italy. On his return, he received the honour of knighthood at the house of Lord Montague, Hinchinbrook, near Huntingdon. In the reign of Charles I. he was appointed to several posts, and on occasion of some difference between England and the Venetians, was dispatched with a fleet into the Mediterranean, and gained considerable reputation by his conduct. About 1636 he quitted the Church of England for that of Rome, and vindicated this change in a piece, entitled, "A Conference with a Lady about the Choice of Religion." At the commencement of the civil war, he was imprisoned by the Parliament in Winchester-house, during which time he wrote a compilation of Brown's "Religio Medici." In 1643 he regained his liberty, went to France, and, soon after, travelled into Holland to visit Descartes, with whom he established an intimate friendship. When Cromwell assumed the government, he ventured to visit his native country, and was frequent in his attendance at the court of the Protector. He also became a member of the Royal Society, and was one of the council. B. 1603; D. in London, 1665, and was buried in Christ Church, Newgate Street.—With his son the males of that branch of the Digby family became extinct. He wrote "A Treatise on the Nature of Bodies;" "On the Operations and Nature of Man's Soul;" "Institutionum Peripateticarum Libri quinque, cum Appendice Theologicâ de Origine Mundi;" and several other works. Sir Kenelm's wife was Venetia Anastasia Stanley, distinguished for her beauty, which he tasked his ingenuity to preserve, by the invention of cosmetics for her use. There is a portrait of her, by Vandyke, in Windsor Castle.

DIGBY, John, an English nobleman, who was appointed gentleman of the bedchamber to James I., who sent him ambassador to Spain. In 1618 he was made Lord Digby, and in 1621 sent ambassador to the emperor of Germany. In 1622 he was again sent to Spain to negotiate a marriage between Prince Charles and the Infanta, and, the same year, was created earl of Bristol. On his return, he and Buckingham preferred charges against each other in parliament, which ended without trial. When the civil war broke out, he went abroad, and died at Paris, 1653. B. at Coleshill, Warwickshire, 1580. He wrote some poems.

DIGBY, Lord George, an English nobleman, the son of the above, received his education at Oxford. He became a member of the Long Parliament, wherein he, at first, opposed the court, but afterwards joined the royal party, and was expelled. He exerted himself in the service of Charles I., and when that monarch was put to death, his lordship was exempted from pardon, when he went abroad. At the Restoration he was made knight of the Garter. In 1663 he impeached Lord Clarendon in the "House." B. at Madrid, Spain, 1612; D. at Chelsea, 1677.—He wrote a play called "Elvira, or the Worst not always True," which was printed in 1667.

DIGGES, Thomas, digs, was educated at Oxford, after which he became muster-master general of the forces sent by Queen Elizabeth to assist the oppressed Netherlanders. He wrote,—1. "Alæ, sive Scalæ Mathematicæ," containing demonstrations for finding the parallax of any comet, or other celestial body, 4to. 2. An arithmetical treatise, named "Stratioticos," requisite for the perfection of soldiers, 4to. 3. "Perfect Descriptions of the Celestial Orbs," 4to. 4. "Humble Motives for Associations to maintain the Religion established," 8vo. 5. "England's Defence," a treatise concerning invasion, fol. B. in Kent; D. 1595.

DIGGES, Sir Dudley, the eldest son of the above, was educated at University College, Oxford. He was knighted by James I., who sent him ambassador to Russia; but in the parliament of 1621 he resisted the court measures, and so continued to do in the next reign, for which he was sent to the Tower. In 1636 he was bought over by the grant of the mastership of the Rolls. B. 1583; D. 1639.—He wrote,—1. "A Defence of Trade," 1615, 4to. 2. "A Discourse concerning the Rights and Privileges of the Subject," 4to. 3. "Speeches in Rushworth's Collections." 4. A collection of letters, which appeared after his death, under the title of the "Complete Ambassador."

DIGNE, deen, a town of France, in the department of the Lower Alps, on the Bléone, 54 miles from Aix. It is the seat of a suffragan bishop, a theological seminary, and a commercial college. Manf. Leather; and it has a trade in dried fruits, woollen goods, hemp, honey, wax, cutlery, and kid-skins. Pop. 4,000.

DII, di'-i, the gods, or the divinities of the ancient inhabitants of the earth, were very numerous. Every object which caused terror, inspired gratitude, or bestowed affluence, received the tribute of veneration. Mythologists have divided these Dii into different classes. The Romans, generally speaking, reckoned two classes of the gods,—the dii majorum gentium, or dii consulentes, and the dii minorum gentium. The former were twelve in number,—six males and six females: their names are Juno, Vesta, Minerva, Ceres, Diana, Venus, Mars, Mercury, Jupiter, Neptune, Vulcan, Apollo. In the class of the latter were ranked all the gods which were worshipped in different parts of the earth. Besides these, there were some called dii selecti, sometimes classed with the twelve greater gods. There were also some called demigods, that is, those who deserved immortality by the greatness of their exploits, and for their uncommon services to mankind. Besides these, all the passions, and the moral virtues, were reckoned as powerful deities; and temples were raised to a goddess of concord, peace, &c. According to Hesiod, there were no less than 30,000 gods that inhabited the earth, and were guardians of men, all being subservient to the power of Jupiter; and, in succeeding ages, we find temples erected and sacrifices offered to unknown gods. In process of time, not only good and virtuous men, who had been the patrons of learning and the supporters of liberty, but also thieves and pirates, were admitted among the gods; and the Roman senate obsequiously granted immortality to the most cruel and abandoned of their emperors.

DIJON, de-zhawng, an ancient walled city of France, and capital of the department of the Côte d'Or, is situate between the rivers Ouche and Suzon, on the canal de Bourgogne, 160 miles from Paris. The streets are regular and well paved, and the houses, in general, neat and commodious. The principal square, or Place Royale, is in the form of a horse-shoe, and contains the palace of justice, or house of assembly of the ancient parliament of Burgundy, and other buildings. It has several churches, remarkable for the richness of their architectural decorations, and a celebrated university; hospitals, prisons, public libraries, an orphan asylum, schools, and academies. Manf. Woollens, cottons, linens, silks, leather, and earthenware. Pop. 33,000.—This city is believed to have been founded by the Romans, and is the birthplace of Bossuet, Crebillon, Piron, Rousseau, Guyton, and other celebrated men. In its neighbourhood the famous St. Bernard was born, to whom a bronze statue is erected in Dijon. It is a station on the Paris and Lyons Railway.

DILKE, Charles Wentworth, dilk, a publicist closely connected with the literature of his day. Receiving, at an early age, an appointment in the Navy Pay-office, he found leisure to contribute papers to various magazines and reviews, and to edit a collection of old English plays, in 6 vols. This work appeared in 1814. He subsequently became connected with the Athenæum, a literary journal, and by skilful management raised it to an influential position in the world of periodical literature. B. 1789.—Mr. Dilke had a son of the same name, who was one of the most active promoters of the Great Industrial Exhibition of 1851, and to whose unwearied industry in working out its details, its success was greatly attributable.

DILLENIUS, John James, dil-le'-ne-us, an eminent German botanist, who, in 1721, accompanied Dr. Sherrard to England, where he spent the remainder of his days. Soon after his arrival, he undertook a new edition of Ray's "Synopsis Stirpium Britannicarum," and was appointed the first botanical professor at Oxford, on Dr. Sherrard's foundation. In 1735 the university admitted him to the degree of M.D. B. at Darmstadt, 1687; D. 1747.—He published a work, entitled "Hortus Elthamensis," and a "History of Mosses."

DILLINGEN, dil'-ling-en, a town of Bavaria, 24 miles from Augsburg. It is surrounded by walls in a partially ruinous state, and contains several churches, chapels, a castle, and a residence for a bishop. It has also a lyceum, ecclesiastical seminary, and other schools, a town-house, hospital, and barracks. Manf. Woollens, paper, and cutlery. Pop. 3,500.

DIMSDALE, Thomas, dimz'-dail, a celebrated physician, who accompanied the duke of Cumberland in his expedition against the army of Prince Charles Stuart, as assistant-surgeon, and continued in that capacity till the surrender of Carlisle, when he returned to Hertford. In 1761 he commenced practice, and became celebrated by his successful mode of inoculating for the small-pox. In 1768, accompanied by his son, he went to Russia, and inoculated the empress and grand-duke, for which he was created a baron of the empire, physician to her majesty, and counsellor of state. A gratuity of £12,000 was given him for his journey, and a pension of £500 a year. In 1781 he again visited Russia, to inoculate the two sons of the grand-duke. The year preceding, he was elected member of parliament for Hertford, and again in 1784, on which he quitted practice. About this time he had the misfortune to lose the sight of both eyes by cataracts, from which he was relieved by Baron Wenzell. In 1790 he retired from parliament. B. in Essex, 1712; D. 1800.—He wrote "Tracts on Inoculation," 8vo, 1781, in which is an account of his first journey to Russia.

DINAGEPORE, din'-a-ge-por, the capital of a district of Bengal, situate on an island formed by the Pernabubah river, 260 miles from Calcutta. Pop. 25,000.—It is the seat of a British jurisdiction.—The DISTRICT is inclosed by Rungpoor, Purneah, Rajeshahy, Mymunsingh, and Boglipoor. Area, 5,371 square miles. Desc. Level, and producing two crops of rice a year. It grows, besides, cotton, wheat, barley, millet, sugar, pepper, and ginger. It also rears horses, sheep, cattle, goats, and swine. Manf. Silks, cottons, paper, leather, and pottery-ware. Pop. 1,200,000. Lat. between 24° 53′ and 26° 38′ N. Lon. between 82° 2′ and 89° 16′ E.

DINAN, de'-nang, a town of France, in the department Côtes-du-Nord, 13 miles from St. Malo. It is inclosed by walls, and is defended by an old castle, which now serves as a prison. The boulevards are planted with trees, and are laid out in gardens, which afford agreeable walks. Its principal buildings are a town-hall, commercial college, concert-hall, and public library. Manf. Sailcloth, linen and cotton fabrics, shoes, hats, and leather. It has both beetroot-factories and salt-refineries, besides a trade in hemp, thread, and linen. Pop. 8,500.—This place was often besieged during the middle ages; and, in 1373, was taken by Duguesclin, and, in 1379, by De Clisson. It is the birthplace of Duclos, Mahé de la Bourdonnaise, and Broussais.

DINANT, a town of Belgium, on the Meuse, 14 miles from Namur. Its principal buildings are a church, town-hall, palace, college, hospitals, schools, and charitable institutions. Manf. Hats, paper, woollens, cards, cutlery, vinegar, hydromel, and glass. It has marble-works, soap-works, salt-refineries, and breweries. Pop. 6,500.—This place was taken by Philip the Good, duke of Burgundy, in 1466, when 800 of its inhabitants were taken by twos, tied back to back, and thrown into the Meuse. The town was also razed to the ground; but in 1493 it was rebuilt. In 1554 and 1675 it was again taken by the French.

DINAPOOR, din-a-por', a town of British India, in the presidency of Bengal, on the Ganges, 145 miles from Benares. It is a military station, of which its population is wholly composed. Pop. 16,000.

DINARCHUS, di-nar'-kus, an orator of Greece, who established himself at Athens, and there received large sums of money for the composition of orations, which, as a foreigner, he was unable, himself, to speak. Accused of taking bribes from the enemies of Athens, he went into voluntary exile, about 340 B.C., but was recalled, after an absence of fifteen years. Three of his orations, only, have come down to us, and are in Stephens's Collection, 1575.

DINARIC ALPS, di-nar'-ik, a portion of the Alpine system, which connects the Julian Alps with the branches of the Balkan, in Turkey. (See ALPS and BALKAN.)

DINDIGUL, din-di-gul', capital of a district in the S. of India, in the presidency of Madras. The town is 160 miles from Cape Comorin, and has a fortress of considerable strength. Pop. 7,000.

DINGWALL, ding'-wawl, a town and parish of Scotland, in the county of Ross. The town is pleasantly situate on the Firth of Cromarty, where it is joined by the Peffer, 11 miles from Inverness. The soil in the neighbourhood is rich and fertile. Pop. of parish, 2,400; of town, 2,000.

DINKELSBUHL, din'-kels-bool, a town of Bavaria, surrounded with a high wall, towers, and ditches, 20 miles from Anspach. It has manufactures of woollen, fustian, stockings, and leather. Pop. 5,200.

DINOCRATES, di-nok'-ra-tees, an architect of Macedonia, who rebuilt the temple of Diana at Ephesus, which had been burnt by Erostratus, extended and beautified Alexandria, at the command of Alexander the Great, and was called into Egypt by Ptolemy Philadelphus. To him, as well as to others, has been ascribed the gigantic project of cutting Mount Athos in the form of a statue, holding a city in one hand, and in the other, a basin, into which, all the waters of the mountain should empty themselves. Lived in the 4th century B.C.

DINWIDDIE, din-wid'-de, a county of Virginia, U.S. Area, 616 square miles. Pop. 26,000.

DIOCLETIAN, Caius Valerius, di-o-kle'-she-an, a Roman emperor, born of an obscure family, and raised from a common soldier to the rank of general. On the death of Numerian, in 284, he was chosen emperor. He took Maximian to be his colleague, and created two subordinate emperors, Constantius and Galerius, whom he styled Cæsars. He was a great commander, and a patron of learning; but, in 303, stained his reign by a persecution of the Christians. He renounced the crown in 304, and retired to Salona, where he died, 313. B. at Diocles, in Dalmatia, about 245. This was one of the most distinguished of the Roman emperors.

DIODORUS SICULUS (of Sicily), di'-o-dor'-us sik'-u-lus, an historian, who produced an Historic Library, or a Universal History, in 40 volumes, which contained the history of the world, from the creation to 60 B.C. Unfortunately, of these, only 15 books and a few fragments remain. Though his chronology is erroneous, and there are many great defects in his writings, they are, nevertheless, extremely valuable, containing, as they do, facts to be met with in no other collection. He flourished about 44 B.C. B. in Sicily.—The best edition of his work is that of Wesseling, in 2 vols. folio, Amsterdam, 1746.

DIOGENES, di-odj'-e-nees, a Cynic philosopher, who being forced to leave his native country for coining false money, went to Athens, and applied himself to the study of philosophy under Antisthenes, the founder of the Cynics. He carried the austerities of his sect to a great extreme, wearing a coarse ragged cloak, living on the meanest food, and lodging under porticos and other public places. It is said that he also took up his residence in a tub, and that this became his favourite abode. At Corinth he used to harangue in the Cranæum, where he was visited by Alexander the Great, who, on approaching him, said, "I am Alexander the king;" to which the other replied, "And I am Diogenes the Cynic." The monarch then asked him if he could render him any service: "Yes," said he, "not to stand between me and the sun." The independence of mind shown by the philosopher, struck the king, and he said, "If I was not Alexander, I would be Diogenes." He is supposed to have died at Corinth, and a public funeral was decreed him by the Athenians. The people of Sinope erected statues to his memory. B. at Sinope, a city of Pontus, 414 B.C.

DIOGENES, surnamed the Babylonian, a Stoic philosopher, a disciple of Chrysippus, and the successor of Zeno as teacher of philosophy. He accompanied Carneades and Critolaus on the embassy from Athens to Rome. Lived about 200 B.C. His works are lost.

DIOGENES LAERTIUS, la-er'-she-us, a Greek historian, who wrote the "Lives of the Philosophers," in ten books. B. at Laertes, in Cilicia; D. 222. The best edition of Laertius is that of Amsterdam, 1692, 2 vols. 4to. The most convenient edition is that of H. G. Hübner, Leipsic, 1831, 2 vols. 8vo.

DIOGENES, a Cretan philosopher, who succeeded his master, Anaximenes, in his school of Ionia, about 550 B.C.

DIOMEDES, di-o-me'-des, son of Tydeus and Deiphyle, was king of Ætolia, and one of the bravest of the Grecian chiefs in the Trojan war. He often engaged Hector and Æneas, and wounded Mars and Venus in battle. He went with Ulysses to steal the Palladium from the temple of Minerva, in Troy, and assisted in murdering Rhesus, king of Thrace, and carrying away his horses. On account of his wife's infidelity, he went to Italy, and built a city, which he called Argyrippa, and married the daughter of Daunus, the king of the country. He died there in extreme old age, or, according to a certain tradition, he perished by the hand of his father-in-law. His death was greatly lamented by his companions, who, in the excess of their grief, were changed into birds resembling swans. —A king of Thrace, a son of Mars and Cyrene, who fed his horses with human flesh. It was one of the labours of Hercules to destroy them, and, accordingly, the hero, attended with some of his friends, attacked Diomedes, and gave him to be devoured to his own horses, which he had fed so barbarously.

DION, di'-on, a celebrated patriot of Syracuse, who was the disciple and friend of Plato, when that philosopher was at the court of Dionysius, whose daughter, Arete, he married. Being afterwards ill-treated and banished his country by Dionysius, he resolved upon revenge, and, with a small force, landed in Sicily during the absence of Dionysius, and entered Syracuse in triumph. The tyrant, informed of this, hastened to Sicily, and made a violent assault on the citadel, in defending which Dion was wounded. Being supplanted by Heraclides, the commander of the Syracusan fleet, who had defeated that of Dionysius, Dion retreated to Leontium, whence he was recalled when the city was besieged by another force sent against it by Heraclides. He relieved the place, pardoned his enemies, and retired to a private station. In a subsequent conspiracy he fell by assassination, 354 A.C.

DION CASSIUS, a Bithynian historian, whose father was proconsul of Cilicia, whence Dion went to Rome; and here his pleadings recommended him to notice, leading him, at length, to the office of consul. He wrote in Greek the "History of Rome," from the building of the city to the reign of Alexander Severus, the greatest part of which, however, is lost. That which remains was printed by Robert Stephens at Paris in 1548, and afterwards by Xylander, with a Latin translation. He died, in his native country, at the age of 70. B. in Bithynia, and lived in the 3rd century.

DIONYSIA, di-o-nish'-ea, from Dionusos, festivals held among the Greeks in honour of Bacchus. Their form and solemnity were first introduced into Greece from Egypt by a certain Melampus; and admitting that Bacchus is the same as the Egyptian Isis, then the Dionysia of the Greeks are the same as the festivals celebrated by the Egyptians in honour of Isis. At Athens, members of both sexes joined in the solemnity. The worshippers ran about the hills and country, nodding their heads, dancing in ridiculous postures, and filling the air with hideous shrieks and shouts, and crying aloud, "Evoe Bacche! Io! Io! Evoe Iacche! Io Bacche! Evohe!" The festivals in honour of Bacchus were almost innumerable in Greece, and were celebrated with the greatest licentiousness. Indeed, when introduced to Rome, the debaucheries and impurities practised by their votaries were so great, that the interference of the senate was necessary for their suppression, under the consulship of S. Posthumius Albinus and Q. Mac. Philippus. They, however, were reinstituted at Rome, but not with such extravagancies as before.

DIONYSIUS, I., di'-o-nish'-e-us, king or tyrant of Syracuse, who, from being a plain citizen, became commander of the forces, overthrew the government, and assumed the title of king, 404 B.C. While he was engaged in an expedition against Carthage, a body of his forces deserted, and returning, took possession of the citadel, plundered his riches, and offered violence to his wife. Dionysius hastened back, and having defeated his enemies, took upon them a severe revenge. He now concluded a peace with the Carthaginians, and employed himself in defending the city. Having defeated another insurrection, he disarmed all his subjects. He conquered several cities, and, after a long war with the Carthaginians, succeeded in driving them from Sicily. B. at Syracuse, 430; D. 367 B.C. —Dionysius affected a taste for polite literature, and repeatedly contested the poetical prize at the Olympic games, without success. To raise money for his expeditions, he plundered the temples, and committed dreadful cruelties. Being of a suspicious disposition, he caused a subterraneous prison to be so constructed as to carry, by tubes to his private apartment, every sound or speech uttered by its prisoners. He invited Plato to his court; but being displeased with his moral discourses, he sent him away in disgrace, and ordered the master of the ship to sell him for a slave. (See DAMOCLES.)

DIONYSIUS II., the younger, the son and successor of the above, whom he exceeded in cruelty, but whose equal he was not in policy. He sent for Plato to his court, profiting little, however, by the conversation of that philosopher. He banished his brother-in-law, Dion, and obliged his wife to marry again, which so enraged Dion, that he gathered an army, and drove the tyrant from Syracuse, B.C. 343. Dionysius returned about ten years afterwards, and was expelled by Timoleon; on which he fled to Corinth, where he supported himself as a schoolmaster. Lived in the 4th century B.C.

DIONYSIUS, an historian and critic of Halicarnassus, in Caria, who was invited to Rome about 30 B.C., and there wrote his "Roman Antiquities," only eleven books of which are extant. He is esteemed for his impartiality, and particularly for his chronological accuracy. Besides this work, we have one written by him, entitled a "Companion," of some ancient historians, and another on the "Structure of Language." The best edition of his works is that of Oxford, in 1704, 2 vols. folio. Lived in the 1st century B.C.

DIONYSIUS, called the Tyrant of Heraclea, in Pontus, married the niece of Darius, and greatly enlarged his territories. He was, it is said, of a most corpulent habit, so that it was impossible to awake him without piercing his flesh with pins. B. 359; D. 304 B.C., aged 55.

DIONYSIUS (the Areopagite), a native of Athens, and a member of the Areopagus, where he sat when St. Paul was brought before it, and made his famous speech respecting the "unknown God," which was the means of the conversion of Dionysius. According to some accounts, he was consecrated bishop of Athens, and suffered martyrdom. There were printed at Antwerp, in 1634, 2 vols. purporting to be his works; but their authenticity is questionable.

DIONYSIUS, surnamed the Little, a Romish monk, who drew up a body of canons, called "Collectio, sive Codex Canonum Ecclesiasticorum," translated from the Greek; he also compiled a body of decretals. To him is attributed the invention of the Victorian period, or chronological mode of computing the time of Easter. Lived in the 5th century.

DIOPHANTUS, di-o-fan'-tus, a mathematician of Alexandria, to whom is attributed the invention of algebra. When he lived is not settled; some placing him before the Christian era, and others afterwards. Six books of his, on arithmetic, were published in Greek and Latin at Paris, in 1621.

DIOS, NOMBRE DE, de'-os, a town of Mexico, on the road from the mines of Sombrerete to Durango, from which it is 50 miles distant. Pop. 7,000.

DIOSCORIDES, Pedanius, di'-os-kor'-i-dees, a physician and botanist, of Greece, who wrote five books on the Materia Medica, containing the medical virtues of plants. These are the most abundant source from which we can draw a knowledge of the botanical attainments of the ancients; the best edition of these is that of Sarracinus, folio, Frankfort, 1598. B. at Anazarba, Cilicia. Lived in the 1st century.

DIPPEL, John Conrad, dip'-pel, a German physician, who, at first, studied theology at Giessen, and afterwards read medical lectures at Strasburg. He asserted that he had discovered the philosopher's stone, and other wonderful secrets. After rambling from place to place, he settled at Hamburg; but was given up to the Danish government for some freedoms he had taken in regard to the government of that country, and sentenced to perpetual imprisonment in the island of Bornholm. After seven years' confinement, he was set at liberty, and, about the same time, was invited to Sweden, to attend the king, who was dangerously ill. The influence of the clergy, however, procured his expulsion in 1727. He then went to Germany, and in 1733 gave out that he would not die till 1808; but the year following, he was found dead in his bed. B. at Darmstadt, 1672.—He wrote a number of enthusiastic books, under the name of "Christianus Democritus." In the midst of his extravagancies, however, Dippel did some good. He made several useful discoveries; amongst others, those of the animal oil which goes by his name, and of Prussian-blue.

DIRÆ, di'-re, the daughters of Acheron and Nox, who persecuted the souls of the guilty. They are the same as the Furies, and some suppose that they are called Furies in Hell, Harpies on earth, and Diræ in heaven.

DIRCE, dir'-se, a woman whom Lycus, king of Thebes, married after he had divorced Antiope. In consequence of her cruelties to Antiope, she was tied by Amphion and Zethus, the sons of Antiope, to the tail of a wild bull, and dragged over rocks, thus dashing her nearly to pieces. The gods, pitying her fate, changed her into a fountain, in the neighbourhood of Thebes.

DIRK-HARTOG ISLAND, dirk har'-tog, lies off the W. coast of Australia, and has a precipitous coast. Ext. 45 miles long, by 10 broad. Lat. 26° S. Lon. 113° E.

DISAPPOINTMENT, ISLANDS OF, a group in the S. Pacific Ocean, so named by Commodore Byron, and discovered in 1765. Lat. 14° 5′ S. Lon. of the middle, 145° 4′ W.—The name also of several other islands and capes.

DISCORDIA, dis-kor'-de-a, a malevolent deity, daughter of Nox, and sister to Nemesis, the Parcæ, and Death. She was driven from heaven by Jupiter, because she was there the cause of continual quarrels. When the nuptials of Peleus and Thetis were celebrated, this goddess was not invited; and the neglect so irritated her, that she threw an apple into the midst of the gods, with the inscription of Detur pulchriori,—"Let it be given to the most beautiful." This apple was the cause of the ruin of Troy, and of infinite misfortunes to the Greeks. She is represented with a pale ghastly look, and her garment is torn. Her head is generally entwined with serpents, and she is attended by Bellona. She is supposed to be the cause of all the dissensions which arise upon earth, public as well as private. (See PARIS.)

DISENTIS, de-sen'-te, a small town of the Swiss canton of the Grisons, in the valley of the Upper Rhine, 34 miles from Chur. It has a monastery, which was erected in the 7th century. Pop. 1,500. This village stands at an elevation of about 3,800 feet above the level of the sea.

DISMAL SWAMP, dis'-mal, a very large morass, nearly 30 miles in length, by about 10 broad, partly in Virginia, and partly in N. Carolina, U.S. Area, about 300 square miles. In it is Lake Drummond, and it is traversed by a canal named after it.—Mrs. Stowe here laid the scene of her tale of the "Dismal Swamp."

DISRAELI, Isaac, dis-rai'-le, was the descendant of a family of Spanish Jews, who, in the 15th century, fled from the religious persecutions in the Peninsula, and settled in Venice, where they assumed the name of Disraeli, "which was never borne before or since, by any other family." The father of Isaac came to England in the middle of the 18th century, and made a fortune by commerce; and he, himself, was the only child by a mother of the same race as his father. He was intended for the pursuits of commerce, but having a strong aversion to that line of life, he was suffered to apply himself to literature, and, after some performances in the region of poetry and romance, published, in 1790, a small volume entitled "Curiosities of Literature." The success of this volume stimulated him to pursue his researches in the same path, and in 1839, the one, had become six volumes, full of interesting matter. In 1795 appeared his "Essay on the Literary Character," which was succeeded, at various periods, by "Calamities of Authors," "Quarrels of Authors," an "Inquiry into the Political Character of James I.;" "Literary Miscellanies;" "Life and Reign of Charles I.;" and a few other works. In 1841 he published his "Amenities of Literature," and, afterwards, amused the remainder of his days with revising what he had before written. B. at Enfield, 1766; D. at Bradenham, Buckinghamshire, 1848.

DISRAELI, Benjamin, the Right Honourable, the son of the preceding, at an early age discovered such precocity of talent as seemed to prognosticate future success in the paths of literature; but, as he was intended for the legal profession, he was placed in an attorney's office, where he continued for some time. In 1826 he became a contributor to a paper started in the Tory interest; and called The Representative. This paper lived only five months; but it seems to have had some effect upon the mind of Mr. Disraeli, in so far as to give it a political bias. In 1828 appeared his novel of "Vivian Grey," which was, at various times, succeeded by "Contarini Fleming," "The Young Duke," "The Wondrous Tale of Alroy," "The Rise of Iskander," "Henrietta Temple," "Venetia," "Coningsby," "The Sibyl," and "Tancred." Besides these, he produced, in 1834, a quarto poem, entitled "The Revolutionary Epic;" and, in 1839, "Alarcos, a Tragedy." He also wrote some pamphlets, and a biography of Lord George Bentinck. Whilst thus actively engaged in the world of letters, he was continually before the public eye as a politician. In this character, however, he did not figure so satisfactorily as in that of a writer of fiction. After travelling on the continent between the years 1829 and 1831, he returned, and stood for the representation of the borough of Wycombe, in Buckinghamshire, in the interest of the radical reforming party. He was unsuccessful, but nothing daunted; and, in 1833, he came forward in the same interest as a candidate for Marylebone. Here he was again unsuccessful, notwithstanding that he declared himself the friend of triennial parliaments and of vote by ballot. Having failed as a Radical, he, in 1835, came forward as a Conservative candidate for the borough of Taunton. He was still unsuccessful; but, in 1837, as a Conservative, he was returned member for Maidstone. His first speech in the House was, like his first attempts at political representation, a complete failure. His speech was laughed at throughout, and he was compelled to sit down before it was finished. This, however, he did not do until he had said, "I have begun, several times, many things, and have often succeeded at last. I shall sit down now; but the time will come when you will hear me." These words proved prophetic. The time did come when he was listened to, and that, too, with the most anxious eagerness. By 1841 he was recognized as the leader of "the Young England party." Between that year and 1846 his attacks upon Sir Robert Peel were as frequent, as they were often brilliant and severe. He was then member for Shrewsbury, and, in 1847, was elected member for Buckinghamshire. In 1848 his friend Lord George Bentinck died, when he became leader of the old Tory or Protectionist party in the House of Commons. In 1852 he became chancellor of the Exchequer under Lord Derby, but, in the same year, that administration fell upon his own budget. In 1858 Lord Derby again came into power, and Mr. Disraeli was again appointed chancellor of the Exchequer, which office he held little more than a year. (See DERBY, Earl of.) B. in London, 1805.

DISS, diss, a town and parish of Norfolk, on the Wavency, 20 miles from Norwich. Manf. Hempen cloth, hose, and stays. Pop. 3,700.

DITHMARSH, NORTH and SOUTH, dit'-marsh, belong to the duchy of Holstein-Denmark, and lie between the Eider and the Elbe. Area of the N., 230 square miles; pop. 33,000. Area of the S., 275 square miles; pop. 35,000.

DITHYRAMBUS, dith'-i-răm'-bus, a surname of Bacchus; whence the hymns sung in his honour were called Dithyrambics.

DITTON, dit'-ton, the name of numerous parishes in England, of which the largest is Thames-Ditton, in Surrey, 12 miles from London, on the South-Western Railway. Pop. 2,500.

DIU, de-u', a fortified seaport-town of Hindostam, situate on an island off the S. coast of the Guzerat peninsula. It belongs to the Portuguese. Pop. 3,000. To the W. of this town is DIU-HEAD CAPE, in lat. 20° 43′ N.; lon. 71° 3′ 2″ E.

DIVEN, de'-ven, a market-town of Hungary, 20 miles from Altshol. Manf. Glass, chiefly. Pop. 2,000.

DIVI, di'-vi, a name chiefly given to those men who were made gods after death; such as heroes and warriors, or the Lares and Penates, and other domestic gods.

DIVINI, de-ve'-ne, Eustachius, an Italian, who distinguished himself by his skill in grinding telescope-glasses. In this, however, he was soon outstripped by Huygens, who introduced such improvements as enabled him to discover Saturn's ring. Divini contested the truth of this, Huygens replying and Divini rejoining. D. about 1663.

Divis, de-ve, an old district of France, in the province of Dauphiné. It was ceded, in 1414, by Louis de Poitiers to Charles VI.

Dixon, W. Hepworth, dix'-on, a modern English writer, who first brought himself into notice by contributing some papers to the Daily News, "On the Literature of the Lower Orders." He wrote another series on "London Prisons," and then produced several biographical works of considerable merit. Among these we may notice that of "William Penn," in which he undertakes the defence of his subject against several charges made by Lord Macaulay in his History of England. To the arguments and statements of Mr. Dixon, Macaulay never replied. He also wrote a "Life of Blake," and, in 1853, was appointed to the editorship of the Athenæum, so well known for its merits as a literary journal. B. 1821.

Dixon Entrance, a strait on the W. coast of N. America, between the Prince of Wales Archipelago and Queen Charlotte Island. Length, from E. to W., estimated at 100 miles.

Dizful, diz'-ful, a city of Persia, on the river of the same name, here crossed by a bridge, 30 miles from Shuster. It is the chief mart in the province of Khuzistan. Pop. estimated at 12,000.

Dizier, St., de'-ze-ai, a town and parish of France, on the Marne, and in the department Haute-Marne, 35 miles from Chalons. It is tolerably well built, and has a church, town-house, commercial college, and court of commerce. Manf. Cotton and iron goods, with a trade in timber and iron. Pop. 7,500.—The emperor Charles V. besieged and took this place in 1544; and in its neighbourhood Napoleon defeated the allies, in two battles fought January 27 and March 27, 1814.

Djokjokarta, jok'-jo-kar'-ta, a Dutch residency of Java, near the middle of the S. coast of that island. Desc. Fertile, and abounding in forests of teak-wood; and producing rice, coffee, and tobacco in abundance. Pop. 326,000.—The Town of the same name is the seat of a Dutch resident, and a native sultan, who has a guard of armed young females, from amongst whom he frequently selects his wives. Pop. 90,000.

Dnieper, ne'-per, anciently the Borysthenes, a large river of European Russia, rising in a marsh in the forest of Walchonski, in the government of Smolensk, and after a direct course of 620 miles, falling into the Black Sea on its northern side, between Oczakov and Kinburn. If its windings are calculated, its length would be not less than 1,200 miles. Its principal affluents are the Berezina, Drutz, Bug, Pripet, Poj, Desna, Soula, Koral, and Samara.

Dniester, nees'-ter, the ancient Tyras, a large river of Europe, which has its source in a lake amid the Carpathian mountains, in Austrian Galicia, and, after a winding course of 600 miles, empties itself into the Black Sea between Ovidiopol and Akerman. Its principal affluents are the Botna, Stry, Reout, Podhora, and Sered.

Dobberan, dob'-be-ran, a town of Germany, 8 miles from Rostock. It has a sea-bathing establishment, and is much frequented for the sake of its mineral springs and baths. Pop. 3,500.

Dobeln, de(r)'-beln, a town of Saxony, 35 miles from Leipsic. It stands on an island formed by the Mulde, and has two churches, an hospital, and several schools. Manf. Woollen, cotton, and other goods. Pop. 6,000.

Dobrudscha, or Dobruska, do-broods'-ka, a town of Bohemia, 15 miles from Königgratz. Pop. 2,000.

Dobrudscha or Dobruska, a district of European Turkey, having Silistria and the Danube on its W., and extending from the St. George mouth of the Danube, on the S., to Cape Kalagria, on the Black Sea. Desc. Low, sterile, and destitute of water. Anciently this region was crossed from the Black Sea to the Danube by the wall of Trajan. This was one of the theatres of the Russian war of 1854-56.

Dobson, William, dob'-son, an English painter, who imitated the manner of Vandyke, by whom he was introduced to Charles I. He painted both in history and portrait with great excellence. B. 1613; D. 1647.

Doce, Rio, do'-sai, a river of Brazil, rising near the town of Villa Rica, and, after a course of about 300 miles, falling into the Atlantic, in lat. 19° 30′ S.

Dochart, dok'-ärt, a river of Scotland, in Perthshire, which joins the Lochy at Killin, and carries off the surplus waters of a Lake of the same name.

Dodd, William, dod, an unfortunate English divine, who, in 1753, entered into orders, and became a popular preacher in the metropolis. In 1766 he took the degree of LL.D., at which time he was chaplain to the king; in 1771 he published "Sermons to Young Men," and the year following, obtained the living of Hockloff, in Buckinghamshire. The rectory of St. George, Hanover Square, becoming vacant in 1774, he sent an anonymous letter to the chancellor's lady, offering £3,000 for the presentation. Being discovered as the writer of this letter, King George III. caused him to be struck out of the list of chaplains. On this he went abroad, and meeting his pupil, the earl of Chesterfield, at Geneva, that nobleman presented him with the living of Winge, in Buckinghamshire. This generosity he ill requited; for, being of an extravagant disposition, and more expensive in his habits than his income would allow, he forged Lord Chesterfield's name to a bond for £4,200, in the hope of being able to take it up before it was due; but the fraud was discovered, and he was tried and condemned to the gibbet. B. at Bourne, Lincolnshire, 1729; hanged at Tyburn, 1777.—He published a translation of the poems of Callimachus; four volumes of "Sermons on the Miracles and Parables;" "A Collection of Poems;" "Reflections on Death," 12mo; "Comfort for the Afflicted," 8vo; and after his death appeared his "Thoughts in Prison," with his life prefixed.—He also selected the "Beauties of Shakspeare," which he interspersed with criticisms throughout the body of the volume.

Doddington, dod'-ding-ton, the name of several parishes in England, the largest with a population of about 10,000.

Doddridge, Philip, dod'-ridj, an eminent dissenting divine, who, after several preferments, settled at Northampton, as minister and tutor, and acquired a great and merited reputation by his learning, candour, and piety. Many eminent persons were educated under him, and he held friendly relationships and correspondence with the greatest dignitaries of the established church. Being of a consumptive habit, he went to Bristol, to endeavour to improve his health; but finding little or no benefit from the change, he went to Lisbon, where he died, 1751. B. in London, 1702.—He published a number of excellent works, the principal of which are, his "Family Expositor on the New Testament," 6 vols. 4to; the "Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul," of which numerous editions have been printed; the "Life of Colonel Gardiner;" and "Sermons on the Evidences of Christianity." His single sermons and tracts were collected in 3 vols. 12mo, after his death; also his "Hymns;" "Lectures on Pneumatology, Ethics, and Divinity;" and a volume of his letters, by Mr. Stedman, of Shrewsbury.

Dodge, dodj, a county in Wisconsin, U.S. Area, 900 square miles. Pop. 20,000. It is intersected by the Du Lac and Chicago Railway.

Dodona, do-do'-na, a town of Thesprotia, in Epirus, or, according to others, in Thessaly. There was, in its neighbourhood, a celebrated oracle of Jupiter, supposed to be the most ancient of all Greece. According to the traditions of the Egyptians, it was founded by a dove, which, in company with another, took flight from Thebes, in Egypt, and alighted, one at the temple of Ammon, and the other at Dodona, where, with human voice, it informed the natives that the surrounding ground should, in future, be endued with a prophetic spirit. Oracles were, therefore, in consequence, frequently delivered by the sacred oaks, and the doves which inhabited the place. The oracles of Dodona were generally delivered by women.

Dodonides, do-don'-i-dees, the priestesses who delivered oracles in the temple of Jupiter in Dodona.

Dodsley, Robert, dods'-le, an author and bookseller, but who first figured in life as footman to a lady. While in this station, he published a volume of poems by subscription, entitled "The Muse in Livery." His next piece was a dramatic trifle called "The Toyshop," which had the approbation of Mr. Pope, and was brought upon the stage with so much success, that the author was enabled to commence bookseller in Pall Mall, where he carried on an extensive business many years, and then left it to his brother. He also wrote the "King and Miller of Mansfield," which was followed by a sequel to it, named, "Sir John Cockle at Court." His greatest dramatic effort, however, was the tragedy of "Cleone," which was successfully brought out at Covent Garden theatre. He also produced a little book entitled, "The Economy of Human Life," which, owing to a notion that prevailed that it was the production of the earl of Chesterfield, had a large sale. In 1760 he published select fables of Æsop and other fabulists; to which he prefixed an essay on fable. He also edited a valuable collection of poems by different authors, 6 vols.; and a collection of old plays, 12 vols. Mr. Dodsley was likewise the projector of the "Preceptor," a useful book for youth, 2 vols. 8vo; and of "The Annual Register," a work of high and deserved reputation. His own miscellaneous pieces were collected and published in 2 vols. 8vo. B. at Mansfield, 1703; D. at Durham, 1764.

Dödiberg, do'-de-bairg, a summit of the Swiss Alps, 17 miles from Glarus, having an elevation of nearly 11,900 feet.

Dodsworth, Roger, dods'-worth, an English topographer, who collected the antiquities of Yorkshire, in 162 folio volumes, which are in the Bodleian library at Oxford. B. in Yorkshire, 1585; D. 1654.

Dodwell, Henry, dod'-wel, a learned writer, who, after various vicissitudes, was, in 1688, appointed Camden professor of history at Oxford, but was deprived of that place in 1691, for refusing the oaths to King William, on which he retired to Cookham, and afterwards to Shottesbrooke, in Berkshire. In 1701 he published an account of the ancient Greek and Roman cycles, a quarto volume, of which Dr. Halley had a high opinion. To follow him through his numerous publications would exceed our limits; but his most famous book was on the "Natural Mortality of the Soul," in which he endeavoured to prove, from Scripture and the fathers, that "it is immortalized actually by the pleasure of God, to punishment or reward, by its union with the divine baptismal spirit." This book made a great noise, and was answered by several writers, particularly Dr. Samuel Clarke. He wrote and edited several other works, and died at Shottesbrooke, in 1711. B. at Dublin, 1641.—Henry, a son of the above, was bred to the law, and was an active promoter of the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce. He wrote a pamphlet, but did not affix his name to it, entitled, "Christianity not founded on Argument," in which, under the pretence of friendship, he endeavoured to undermine the Christian religion. It was answered by Dr. Leland, Dr. Doddridge, and the author's brother William, who was educated at Trinity College, Oxford, and became D.D., rector of Shottesbrooke, prebendary of Salisbury, and archdeacon of Berkshire.

Dofrines, or Dofrefeld, dofr'-felt, a chain of mountains dividing Norway from Sweden. (See Norway.)

Dogger Bank, dog'-ger bünk, an extensive sandbank in the North Sea, between the coasts of Denmark and England, the W. extremity reaching nearly to Scarborough, Yorkshire, and the E. to within 60 miles of the coast of Jutland. Its fisheries are important. In 1781 a naval conflict between the Dutch and English fleets was fought on the Dogger Bank. Neither could claim the victory.

Dogget, Thomas, dog'-get, the legator of "Dogget's coat and badge," was an English actor and dramatic poet, who excelled in the representation of comic characters, playing at Drury Lane theatre, and becoming joint manager of that house. D. in 1721.—He left a legacy to provide a coat and badge to be rowed for, from London bridge to Chelsea, by six watermen, yearly, on the 1st of August, the day of the accession of George I.

Dogs, Isle of, or Poplar Marshes, dogz, a portion of the county of Middlesex, opposite Greenwich, formed by the windings of the Thames, 3½ miles from St. Paul's. —It takes its name, one tradition says, from the king's hounds having formerly been kept here; but other authorities say that its real name was the "Isle of Ducks," in allusion to the number of wild fowl frequenting the spot.

Doko, do'-ko, a region of tropical Africa, lying to the S. of Abyssinia, inhabited by a pigmy race of negroes. They are in a wild state, wearing no covering whatever, and subsisting on roots, honey, and reptiles. The men have no beards, and are supposed to be the pigmies of the ancients. Lat. 3° N. Lon. 37° E.

Dolabella, P. Cornelius, dol'-a-bel'-la, the son-in-law of Cicero, who attached himself to Julius Cæsar, by whom he was made consul. On the death of Cæsar he obtained the government of Syria; but having slain Trebonius, the governor of Asia Minor, and one of Cæsar's assassins, he was declared an enemy of the republic. Cassius besieged him in Laodicea, where he killed himself, in the 27th year of his age. Lived in the 1st century B.C.

Dolce, Carlo, dol'-chai, an artist of Florence, who attained great eminence as a painter of religious subjects. His heads are said to be inimitable. B. 1616; D. 1686.

Dôle, dole, a well-built town of France, in the department of the Jura, on the Doubs, 28 miles from Dijon. The principal buildings are the court of justice, the church of Notre Dame, two hospitals, and a theatre. It has also a public library, and the remains of a castle built in the 12th century by Frederick Barbarossa. Manf. Straw hats, leather, earthenware, hosiery, optical instruments, and wax candles. Pop. about 10,000. —This place was founded by the Romans, and was the capital of Franche Comté, till it was united to France. Its fortifications were of great strength till 1674, when they were reduced.

Dolgelly, or Dolgellen, dol-geth'-le, a parish and irregularly-built town of North Wales, in the county of Merioneth, 46 miles from Shrewsbury. Its principal public edifices are a parish church, several dissenting chapels, a county-hall, gaol, market-house, and town-hall. Manf. Coarse woollens. Pop. of parish, 3,500; of town, 2,100. — In 1404 Owen Glendower held a parliament here.

Dolgourouki, dol-goo-roo'-ke, the name of a Russian family, which has furnished a number of distinguished warriors and statesmen.

Dollar, dol'-lar, a parish and village of Scotland, in the county of Clackmannan, 10 miles from Stirling. Pop. 1,660.—In 1819 an academy was founded here, under the will of Captain McNab, who, from being a poor ship-boy on board a coasting vessel, became a man possessed of great wealth. He left £80,000 for the purpose. The building is a noble structure, in the Grecian style, and the branches taught in it are English, writing, arithmetic, Latin, Greek, the modern languages, geography, drawing, mathematics, and botany. The fees are regulated by a graduated scale; but an excellent education can be obtained by the poorer classes for eightpence a quarter for each class attended.

Dollart Bay, or The Dollert, dol-lart', a large arm of the North Sea, extending between Hanover and the Netherlands, to the mouth of the river Ems. It is said to have been formed, in 1276, by an inundation of the sea, which swept away nearly 34 villages.

Dollond, John, dol'-lond, an eminent English optician, who, though put to the trade of silk-weaving, devoted himself to the study of astronomy, which led him to consider the means by which the power of the telescope might be improved. Commencing business as an optician with his eldest son Peter, he invented the achromatic object-glass, and succeeded in applying the micrometer to reflecting telescopes, and made many other improvements. B. in Spitalfields, 1706; D. 1761. —His son Peter also made great improvements in optical instruments, and, in conjunction with his father, acquired a well-merited reputation. D. 1820.

Dolomieu, Deodat, do'-lo-me-u(r), an able French mineralogist, who served with Bonaparte in Egypt, but on his return was taken prisoner, and confined at Messina. Sir Joseph Banks, president of the Royal Society, interested himself successfully for his release, which he obtained in 1801. D. in 1802.—His principal works are, "Voyage to the Isles of Lipari in 1781;" "Memoir on the Earthquake of Calabria in 1783;" "On the Origin of the Basaltes;" "A Mineralogical Dictionary." He was commander of the Order of Malta, a member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, and also of the National Institute.

DOLORES, Nostra Señora de los, do-lor'-ais, a town of the Mexican Confederation, 24 miles from Guanaxuato. Here, in 1810, commenced the troubles which ended in the independence of Mexico.

DOMBROWSKI, Henry John, dom-brov'-ske, a Polish general, who, in 1791, was engaged in the cause of the independence of his country against Russia and Prussia. Obliged to take refuge in France in 1796, he there formed a Polish legion, and had the command of it in the Italian campaign. In 1806, after the battle of Jena, he hastened to Poland, and there assembled a force of 30,000 men, which he united with Napoleon's army. In 1812, having made the greatest exertion to cover the retreat of the French from Moscow, he led the remains of his army beyond the Rhine. He was appointed, in 1815, commander of the cavalry, and senator of the new kingdom of Poland, but did not long enjoy these new dignities. B. near Cracow, 1755; D. 1818.

DOMENICHINO, do'-main-e-ke'-no, an Italian painter, who studied in the school of the Caracci, where his fellow pupils, from his slowness, called him the "Ox." On this, one of his masters told them, that "this ox would in time make his ground so fruitful, that painting would be fed by what it produced." The prediction was verified. He was also deeply skilled in architecture, and filled the appointment of architect to Gregory XV. B. at Bologna, 1581; D. 1641.

DOMINGO, SAN, do-min'-go, the capital of the Spanish part of the island of Hayti, in the W. Indies, and the first or oldest city in the Western world, at the mouth of the Ozama, which forms its harbour. The plan of the city is quadrilateral, and it is wholly surrounded by a rampart. The houses are well-proportioned, with flat roofs, and a courtyard in the middle, with surrounding galleries inside, and balconies to the street. Its public buildings are a cathedral, which was finished in 1540; a barracks, in which is the arsenal; a palace, and several convents and nunneries. Its trade is very limited, the harbour being unfit for large ships. Pop. 15,000. Lat. 18° 29′ N. Lon. 69° 59′ W.—About the year 1586 the city was sacked by Sir Francis Drake.—The name of several settlements, villages, and rivers in South America.

DOMINGO. (See HAYTI.)

DOMINIC, ST., dom'-e-neck, a Spanish priest, who founded the order of the preaching friars called Dominicans, and, according to some authorities, the powerful Inquisition. Others declare that it existed before him, having been founded in 1184. He, however, was the first to receive from the pope the title of inquisitor-general. B. at Calatorra, in Old Castile, 1170; D. at Bologna, 1221. He was canonized by Pope Gregory IX.

DOMINICA, REPUBLIC OF, dom'-e-ne'-ka, a government in the E. part of the island of Hayti, founded in 1843. Pop. 50,000.

DOMINICA, an island in the W. Indies, belonging to the Leeward group, lying about 20 miles to the N. of Martinique. Ext. 29 miles long, with an average breadth of 16. Desc. Volcanic and mountainous, interspersed by many rich and beautiful valleys. Its loftiest summit attains an elevation of 6,000 feet, which, with the exception of Cuba, Hayti, and Jamaica, is higher than any of the other W. India islands. It is well watered. Pro. Coffee, sugar, maize, cotton, cacao, tobacco, timber, and cabinet wood. Poultry, game, and bees, are abundant. Exp. Sugar, coffee, rum, molasses, cane-juice, cacao, and copper-ore. Pop. about 24,000. Lat. 15° 18′ 4″ N. Lon. 61° 24′ 7″ W.—This island was discovered by Columbus in 1498, and was claimed alternately by England, France, and Spain; but was finally ceded to Great Britain in 1763.

DOMITIAN, Titus Flavius, do-mish'-e-an, the son of Vespasian, and a Roman emperor, who obtained the imperial dignity on the death of his brother Titus, A.D. 81. The commencement of his reign seemed auspicious to the happiness of the Romans; but he soon discovered the wickedness of his disposition, and gave way to the most detestable crimes. He assumed the title of deity, and, at the same time, amused himself in catching flies, and sticking them on a bodkin. His cruelties rendered him so odious, that he was afraid of his own shadow, and took a number of precautions to secure himself from assassination, by which fate, however, he was overcome, A.D. 96, in the 45th year of his age.—He was the last of the twelve Cæsars.

DOMITIANUS, Domitius, do-mish'-e-ai'-nus, general of Diocletian's army in Egypt. He caused himself to be proclaimed emperor at Alexandria in 286, and fell by violence, two years afterwards.

DOMO D'OSSOLA, do'-mo dos'-so-la, a town of Sardinia, on the Toce, at the foot of the Simplon route, 20 miles from Pallanza. It has a little fort, and after belonging to Sardinia, was held by France from 1796 to 1814. It was then restored to Piedmont.

DOMREMY-LA-PUCELLE, dom'-rai-me, a village of France, in the department of the Vosges, 7 miles from Neufchâteau. It is the birthplace of Joan of Arc, and has a monument to her memory.

DON, don, a river of Scotland, rising in Ben Aven, and, after a course of about 60 miles, falling into the North Sea, 2 miles from Aberdeen.—Another in England, rising in the moors near Penniston, Yorkshire, and, after a course of 55 miles, joining the Ouse at Goole. It communicates by canals with the Calder and the Trent.

DON, one of the largest rivers of European Russia, rising from a small lake in the government of Tula, and, after a winding course of nearly 1,000 miles, falling into the Sea of Azov by many mouths. It is united by canal with the Oka, an affluent of the Volga; and thus connects the Sea of Azov with the Caspian.

DON, a river of France, in the departments Maine-et-Loire and Ille-et-Vilaine. After a course of about 40 miles, it unites with the Vilaine, 6 miles from Redon.

DON, Country of the Cossacks, a government of European Russia, between the governments of Voronez and Ekaterinoslav, and the province of the Caucasus and the Sea of Azov, and the governments of Saratov and Astrakan. Pop. 500,000. (See COSSACKS and RUSSIA.)

DON, David, an eminent botanist, who, in 1836, was appointed to the chair of botany in King's College, London, which he held till his death. He wrote several excellent works upon the science of which he was a professor, and was, for some time, librarian to the Linnæan Society. B. at Forfar, Scotland, 1800; D. 1840.

DONA, SAN, do'-na, a town of N. Italy, on the Piave, 18 miles from Venice. Pop. 4,500.

DONABUR, don-a-boo', a town of British India, 65 miles from Rangoon. In 1825 the British were here repulsed by the Burmese, and again in 1853, when several officers were slain.

DONAGHADEE, don-a-ha-de', a seaport-town of Ireland, in the county of Down, on the Irish Channel, 16 miles from Belfast. It consists of two principal streets, intersected by narrow lanes, and has a harbour, with a lighthouse. It is the head of a coast-guard district. Pop. 3,000.—Many of the female inhabitants are employed in embroidering muslins for the Glasgow houses, whilst others are engaged in flax-mills.

DONAGHMORE, don-a-mor', the name of a number of parishes in Ireland, with populations ranging between 40 and 10,000.

DONAGHMOYNE, don-a-moin', a parish of Ireland, in the county of Monaghan, 3 miles from Carrickmacross. Pop. 11,000.

DONALD, don'-ald, the name of eight kings of Scotland, who reigned at various times between 216 and 1040, and whose lives do not present many facts of interest.

DONALDSON, Thomas Leverton, don'-ild-son, professor of architecture in University College, London, gradually rose to the high position he attained, and published several works illustrative of the subject of his profession. After pursuing his studies abroad, visiting Naples, and spending a year at Rome, he returned, and commenced publishing several works, which brought him prominently into notice. When the Institution of British Architects was inaugurated, in 1835, he was chosen one of its secretaries, and subsequently became chairman of the commissioners of sewers for Westminster. In 1843 he was appointed professor of architecture at University College. He acted on the committee for the Great Exhibition of 1851, and, in 1855, received, for his own drawings, from the committee of the "Exposition Universelle," one of the first class gold medals. B. in London, 1795.

DONATI, M., do-na'-te, a modern Italian astronomer, of the museum at Florence, who was the first to discover, on the 2nd of June, 1858, the magnificent comet of that year, and which was known by his name. At that date it was 228,000,000 miles distant from the earth, being visible only by the most powerful telescopes. From that time it gradually approached our world until the 10th October, when it was at its nearest, viz., 51,000,000 miles. Donati's comet was unexpected, and was new to astronomers, who, however, at its arrival, had been anxiously looking out for the return of that of 1556.

DONAUESCHINGEN, don'-ou-es-shing'-en, a town of Southern Germany, in the grand-duchy of Baden, 38 miles from Constance. Pop. 3,000.—In the vicinity of this place is a spring, considered the fountain-head of the Danube.

DONAUWERTH, don'-ou-vairt, a town of Bavaria, on the Danube, 25 miles from Augsburg.—Near here, in 1704, the duke of Marlborough forced a strongly intrenched camp of the Bavarians.

DON BENITO, be-ne'-to, a town of Spain, 58 miles from Badajoz. It is the capital of a district of the same name comprising 8 villages. Manf. Principally woollens. Pop. 15,500.

DONCASTER, don'-kas-ter, a town in the W. Riding of Yorkshire, on the river Dun, or Don, 18 miles from Sheffield. It is well built, kept remarkably clean, and consists of one main street, besides others of smaller extent. Its principal buildings are the parish church, Christ church, several chapels, a town-hall, theatre, gaol, lyceum, market-house, a corn-exchange, the mansion-house, and several charitable institutions. Manf. Cotton and woollen spinning, and glove and stocking knitting. Pop. 12,300.—The races of this place are very distinguished, and were established in 1703. In 1776 the celebrated St. Leger stakes were founded, and took their name from Colonel St. Leger, who resided in the vicinity of the town. These stakes are for three-year-old animals, and amount, annually, to from £4,000 to £5,000. The racecourse is one of the finest in the kingdom, and is nearly two miles in length. It is a station on the Great Northern Railway.

DON COSSACKS, COUNTRY OF. (See DON, Cossacks of the.)

DONEGAL, don'-e-gawl, a maritime county of Ireland, bounded N. and W. by the Atlantic Ocean, E. by the counties of Londonderry and Tyrone, S. by the county of Fermanagh and the bay of Ballyshannon. Area, 1,852 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, with a vast deal of waste in the form of bogs. Nor is its soil in general fertile, whilst it is very slightly wooded. Rivers. The Fin, the Dale, the Erne, the Guibarra, and the Swilly. Lakes. Numerous, the chief being Lough Derg. Pro. Oats, barley, potatoes, and flax. Its fisheries are important, and employ a large number of the inhabitants. Pop. 255,000.

DONIZETTI, Gaetano, don-e-zet'-te, a distinguished Italian musical composer, who received his first instructions in his art in the Musical Institute of Bergamo. In 1815 he removed to Bologna, and, entering the army, produced, in Venice, in 1818, his first opera, entitled "Enrico di Borgogna." In 1822 he left the army, but, still continuing to cultivate his musical abilities, he put forth, in 1830, his "Anna Bolena" at Milan. Up to this period he had produced no fewer than thirty-one operas; and during the next fourteen years he added to these thirty-three more. Many have sunk into oblivion; but others, being of the highest class, retain their possession of the popular musical mind. Among these we may mention "Anna Bolena," "Lucrezia Borgia," "Lucia di Lammermoor," "La Fille du Régiment," "Don Pasquale," &c. In 1833 he was appointed professor of counter-point in the Royal College of Music at Naples, and afterwards became chapel-master and composer to the imperial court at Vienna. Having unfortunately contracted habits of intemperance, he was for some time confined in a lunatic asylum. In 1847 he was taken to Bergamo, where he died in the following year. B. at Bergamo, 1798.

DONNE, John, don, an English divine and poet, who, though reared a Roman Catholic, embraced, at the age of nineteen, the Protestant religion. Soon afterwards he went abroad, and on his return became secretary to Lord Chancellor Ellesmere, when he privately married a daughter of Sir George Moore, lieutenant of the Tower. The latter was so irritated at the match, that he not only prevailed upon the chancellor to dismiss him from his service, but got him imprisoned in that ancient fortress. His confinement, however, was short, and a reconciliation was effected. At the desire of King James, he entered into orders, and became his chaplain. He was made D.D. by the University of Cambridge, and rose to such fame by his preaching, that he had the offer of no fewer than fourteen different livings during the first year of his ministry. In 1617 he was chosen preacher at Lincoln's Inn; in 1621 he was made dean of St. Paul's, and, soon after, Vicar of St. Dunstan's in the West. B. in London, 1573; D. 1631, and was buried in St. Paul's cathedral.—Dr. Donne was a man of great wit, learning, and gravity. His satires are highly praised by Dryden, who calls him "the greatest wit, though not the greatest poet, of our nation." They were rendered into modern English by Pope. Three volumes of his sermons were published after his death, and some miscellaneous essays.

DONNE, Benjamin, an English mathematician, who made a survey of Devonshire in 1761, for which he received a premium of £100 from the Society for Promoting Arts and Commerce. About the same time he published "Mathematical Essays," in 8vo, which had a favourable reception, and procured him the office of keeper of the library at Bristol, where he kept an academy many years. In 1771 he printed an "Epitome of Natural and Experimental Philosophy," and in 1774 a work entitled "The British Mariner's Assistant." In 1796 he was appointed master of mechanics to the king. B. at Bideford, 1729; D. 1798.—Besides the books above mentioned, he wrote treatises on geometry, book-keeping, and trigonometry.

DONNINGTON, don'-ning-ton, the name of several English parishes, none of them with a population above 2,000. The principal is in Lincolnshire, which has a market-town of the same name, connected by canal with Boston.

DONNYBROOK (ST. MARY'S), don'-no-brook, a parish of Ireland, in the county of Leinster, 2 miles from Dublin. It includes several small towns, whose united population is estimated at 12,000.—The village of Donnybrook contains about 1,200 inhabitants, and has long been famous for its fair, which is held during the week commencing August 26th.

DONZY, dawn'-ze, a parish and town of France, in the department of the Nièvre, 10 miles from Cosne. Pop. 4,200.

DOO, George Thomas, doo, an English artist, who was appointed historical engraver to the queen, and is best known by his "KNOX preaching before the Lords of the Covenant," after Wilkie; Etty's "Combat," and Eastlake's "Italians coming in Sight of Rome." From the little encouragement, however, extended to his art, he nearly entirely abandoned it, and became a painter of portraits in oil. B. in London, 1800.

DOON, doon, a parish of Ireland, in Munster, 10 miles from Tipperary. Pop. 700.

DOON, a lake and river of Ayrshire, Scotland. The river rises in the lake, and, after a course of 18 miles, falls into the Firth of Clyde, 3 miles from Ayr. It is celebrated by Burns in his beautifully plaintive lyric beginning,

"Ye banks and braes o' bonnie Doon."

The LAKE is 22 miles from Ayr, and is 5 miles long, by nearly a mile broad.

DOR, or DORE, MOUNT, dor, a mountain group of France, belonging to the Auvergne, in the department of the Puy-de-Dôme. They are volcanic, and their principal summit is the Pic de Sancy, which has an elevation of nearly 6,200 feet above the level of the sea. The rivers Dor and Dogne have their sources in them.

DORA, or DURIA (MAJOR and MINOR), dor'-a, two rivers of N. Italy, tributary to the Po. The MAJOR rises at the foot of Little St. Bernard, and, after a course of 90 miles, joins the Po near Crescentino, and, under the French, gave its name to a department. The MINOR rises in the Cottian Alps, and, after a course of 60 miles, falls into the Po near Turin. On the banks of both are several towns.

DORAN, John, LL.D., dor'-an, a modern English writer, who, at the age of 15, manifested a predilection for literature, and produced a melodrama entitled "The Wandering Jew," which was, in 1822, first played at the Surrey theatre, London. After passing some years in France, he became, successively, private tutor in four of the noblest families in Britain; and, in 1832, published his "History of the Borough and Castle of Reading." This work obtained for him the degree of M.A., and, subsequently, LL.D., by the university of Marbury. His other works are Xenophon's "Anabasis," with notes; "Life of Dr. Young;" "Filia Dolorosa," which was written in conjunction with Mrs. Romer, and published in 1853. The share of that lady in it, however, was very small. "Table Traits, and Something on Them," "Habits and Men," "Knights and their Days," "Queens of England of the House of Hanover," "Monarchs retired from Business," and "The History of Court Fools." These works passed through several editions, and Dr. Doran has also acted in the capacity of editor to a weekly paper, and contributed largely, both in prose and verse, to various periodicals. B. in London, 1807.

DORCAS, dor'-kas, a Christian woman of Joppa, whom Peter restored to life. One of the principal exercises of her benevolence was in the making of garments for poor widows; and from her, the "Dorcas meetings" of those who charitably engage in making garments for the poor, are so called.

DORCHESTER, dor'-chest-er, the capital of Dorsetshire, situate on an ascent from the river Frome, 8 miles from Weymouth. It consists principally of three spacious streets, and has three churches, three almshouses, a county gaol, town-hall, market-house, shire-hall, theatre, cavalry barracks, and a union workhouse. Manf. Serges, and it has several ale-breweries. Pop. 6,500.

DORCHESTER, a town and parish of Oxfordshire, on the Thames, 9 miles from Oxford. Pop. 1,100.

DORCHESTER, a township of Massachusetts, U.S., 3 miles from Boston. Pop. 8,000, employed in the fisheries and various manufactures.

DORCHESTER, a county of Maryland, U.S., on the E. shore of the Chesapeake. Area, 604 square miles. Pop. 19,000, of whom about a fourth are slaves.

DORCHESTER, Carleton Dudley, Viscount, an eminent English statesman, who, after visiting different European courts in a diplomatic character, was appointed ambassador to the United Netherland Provinces, where he bore a distinguished part in the synod of Dort. On his return to England, he was, in 1626, created a peer by the title of Baron Carleton. He was soon after sent again to the Hague, and was employed there in several important measures, when he was recalled, created Viscount Dorchester, and made secretary of state. B. in Oxfordshire, 1573; D. 1631.—His letters during his embassy were printed in 1757, and again in 1775.

DORDOGNE, dor'-done, a large river of France, formed by the union of the Dor and Dogne, and, after a course of 220 miles, falling into the Garonne, 15 miles below Bordeaux.

DORDOGNE, a department of France, adjoining the departments of the Gironde, Charente, and Corrèze. Area, 3,520 square miles. Desc. Mountainous in some parts, in others marshy, and in others dry and sandy. Much of it is uncultivated. Rivers. The Dordogne and the Vezère. Pro. Rye, buckwheat, maize, and chestnuts. Minerals. Coal, iron, copper, lead, manganese, lithographic stones, and marble. Manf. Paper, brandy, liqueurs, and iron wares. Pop. 506,000.

DORDRECHT, dort'-rekt, a town of the Netherlands. (See DORT.)

DORIA, Andrew, dor'-e-a, a celebrated Genoese naval commander. Being born of a noble family, he early adopted the profession of arms, and distinguished himself in the service of different Italian states. At length his own country required his assistance against the rebels of Corsica, and these he defeated. He was then appointed commander-in-chief of a fleet of galleys, and inflicted severe loss on the African pirates. On the revolution breaking out in Genoa, he entered into the service of Francis I. of France, which he quitted for that of Pope Clement VII., but shortly afterwards joined the party of Charles V. of Spain, and succeeded in driving the French out of Genoa. Charles now offered to invest Doria with the sovereignty of Genoa, but he nobly refused it, stipulating only that the republic should continue under the imperial protection. Having delivered Genoa from the oppression of the French yoke, he was, in 1528, honoured by the senate with the title of the "father and saviour of his country," and had a statue erected to his honour, and a palace built for him. He made his name famous through the Mediterranean by his naval exploits, particularly against Barbarossa and the African corsairs. B. at Oneglia, 1468; D. in his palace at Genoa, 1560, in the 94th year of his age.—Doria was created prince of Malfi and Tarsi by Charles V. His death was lamented by the Genoese as a public calamity.—Many of this name will be found in Italian history.

DORIGNY, do-reen'-ye, an eminent French engraver and designer, who resided for a lengthened period in Italy, and engraved many celebrated Italian paintings. Among these may be mentioned the "Transfiguration," by Raffaele; the "Taking down from the Cross," by Daniel da Voltera; and the "Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," by Domenichino. In 1711 he came to England for the purpose of engraving the cartoons of Raffaele, and had a room set apart for him at Hampton Court. He completed his task in 1719, when he received a purse of 100 guineas for a couple of sets, which he presented to George I., who also knighted him. His sight now began to fail, when, in 1723, he disposed of his drawings, and, in the following year, returned to Paris. B. at Paris, 1657; D. 1746.—He had an elder brother named Louis, distinguished as a fresco-painter. He passed his life chiefly in Italy. D. at Verona, 1742.

DORIS, dor'-is, a country of Greece, between Phocis, Thessaly, and Acarnania. It received its name from Dorus, the son of Deucalion, who made a settlement there. Its inhabitants colonized several different parts, which bore the same name as their native country. The most famous of these is Doris, in Asia Minor, of which Halicarnassus was once the capital.—A goddess of the sea, daughter of Oceanus and Tethys. She married her brother Nereus, by whom she had 50 daughters, called Nereides. Her name is often used to express the sea itself.

DORISLAUS, Isaac, dor-is-lai'-us, a Dutch doctor of civil law at Leyden, whence he went to England, and was appointed to read lectures on history at Cambridge; but avowing republican principles, was obliged to resign. He afterwards became judge-advocate in the king's army, but quitted his majesty's service for that of the parliament, and assisted in drawing up the charge against Charles I. In 1649 he was sent ambassador to the Hague, where he was stabbed, while at supper, by some exiled royalists. The parliament caused his body to be brought to England, where it was interred in Westminster Abbey. Here, however, it was not suffered to remain. At the Restoration it was exhumed, and finally buried in St. Margaret's churchyard.

DORKING, or DARKING, dor'-king, a town of Surrey, near the river Mole, 22 miles from London. It consists of three principal streets, well paved and lighted with gas, and has a trade in lime, flour, and poultry. This last is a peculiar breed, having five claws, and is in great demand for the London market. It is supposed to have been introduced by the Romans. Pop. 6,000. A station on the South-Eastern Railway.

DORNACH, dor'-nak, a village of Switzerland, 20 miles from Soleure, remarkable for the victory obtained by the Swiss over the Austrians in 1499, and which gave Switzerland her independence. Pop. 700.—Maupertuis, the mathematician, was buried in the churchyard of this place.

DORNOCH, FIRTH OF, dor'-nok, an arm of the sea, in Scotland, dividing the S. part of Sutherlandshire from the county of Ross. Its entrance is nearly 15 miles wide.

DORNOCH, a town and parish of Sutherlandshire, Scotland, on the N. coast of the Firth of Dornoch, 14 miles from Cromarty. Pop. of parish, 3,000; of town, 600.—The bishops of Caithness resided here up to the time of the Revolution. Gilbert Murray, one of them, is supposed to have built the cathedral in the 13th century, and was canonized under the name of St. Gilbert.

DORPAT, DORPFT, DORPT, DORP, or DERPT, dor'-pat, a town of European Russia, in Livonia, on the Embach, 150 miles from Riga. A university was established here in 1802, by the emperor Alexander. It had originally been founded in 1632, by Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden, but had, from 1656, been suppressed. Pop. 14,000. Lat. 58° 22′ N. Lon. 26° 43′ E.

DORSET, dor'-set, a post township of Bennington county, Vermont, U. S., 27 miles from Bennington. Pop. 1,500.

DORSET, Thomas Sackville, Earl of, grand treasurer of England, was raised by Queen Elizabeth to the peerage, under the title of Lord Buckhurst. He was one of the commissioners who tried Mary, queen of Scots, and it was he who was deputed to announce her sentence to that unfortunate lady. In 1598, he succeeded Lord Burleigh as treasurer, and was president of the commission appointed to try the earl of Essex. James I. created him earl of Dorset, and he continued to receive in his reign the same favour he had enjoyed in the preceding. B. at Buckhurst, Sussex, 1536; D. at the council-board, 1608, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.—In his youth he cultivated letters, and acquired celebrity from his tragedy of "Gorboduc," which is considered the first regular dramatic piece produced in England.

DORSETSHIRE, dor'-set-sheer, a county of England, bounded N. by the counties of Somerset and Wilts, E. by Hampshire, S. by the British Channel, and W. by the counties of Devon and Somerset. Area, 1,006 square miles. Desc. Diversified by hill and dale in the S., level in the N., and traversed in the centre by chalk downs, on which large numbers of sheep are pastured. Rivers. The principal are the Stour, Frome, Piddle, Char, and Wey. There are several mineral waters. Pro. Wheat, barley, hemp, and linseed. The dairy husbandry is important. Minerals. A bituminous slaty coal, two kinds of freestone, quarried in the isle of Portland, and in Purbeck a kind of coarse marble and potter's clay. Manf. Twine, cordage, netting, sacking, sailcloth, linens, silks, and woollens. The mackerel fishery is carried on between Lyme and Portland, from April to June, and other fish frequent the coast in great variety. Pop. 184,207.

DORT, DORAT, or DORDRECHT, dort, one of the most ancient towns of the Netherlands, in S. Holland, on an island formed in the Meuse, 11 miles from Rotterdam. Among the public buildings are the great church, with a lofty tower and chimes; an elegant town-house, the exchange, the church of St. Nicholas, hospitals, and other institutions. The situation of Dort is highly favourable for trade, and the harbour sufficiently commodious. Great quantities of timber are floated here from Switzerland and Upper Germany down the Rhine. It has several docks for shipbuilding; a brisk traffic is carried on in yarn and linen, as well as in salt, flax, corn, and oil. There are some sugar-refineries, tobacco-factories, and saw-mills. The salmon fishing is productive. Pop. 21,000.—This place was the original residence of the counts of Holland, and, in 1572, the independence of the United Provinces was here first declared. In 1618 and 1619 the synod, which pronounced against the doctrines of Arminius, was also held here. It is the birthplace of the two de Witts.

DORTMUND, dort'-moond, a walled town of Prussia, on the Emster, 40 miles from Cologne. It is the seat of several courts and public offices. Manf. Woollens, linens, cottons, nails, and tobacco. Pop. 11,000.—In 1815, this place was given to Prussia at the congress of Vienna. A station on the Cologne and Minden Railway.

DOSITHÆUS, do-si-thē'-us, a heresiarch of Samaria, who asserted that he was the Messiah, and had with him a woman, whom he called the moon. Retiring into a cave, he there starved himself, in order that his disciples might believe he had ascended to heaven. His sect, which lasted till the 6th century, abstained from animal food, and observed the sabbath with excessive rigour.

DOTHAN, do'-than, a town of Palestine, to the W. of the Sea of Galilee. Near this place Joseph was sold by his brethren (Gen. xxxvii. 17), and the prophet smote the Syrians with blindness (2 Kings, vi. 13).

DOTIS, do'-tis, a market-town of West Hungary, 12 miles from Komorn. It has several churches and chapels, a college, gymnasium, and high school. Manf. Woollens and porcelain. Pop. 5,000.

DOUA, or DOUAY, doo'-ai, a fortified town of France, on the small river Scarpe, 18 miles from Lille. It has manufactures of cotton, linen, lace, and thread. Its principal buildings are a cannon-foundry, an arsenal, an artillery school, a theatre, public library, and several hospitals. It has been long noted for its university, also for its English schools. Manf. Lace, cottons, gauzes, glass, soap, earthenware, and sugar. Pop. 21,000.—This place was, in 1719, taken by the allies, under the duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene.

DOUBLEDAY, Edward, dub'-el-dai, a distinguished English naturalist, who, in the departments of entomology and ornithology, produced some excellent works. After making a tour in the United States, he returned, and became one of the curators in the British Museum. Here he was enabled to pursue his favourite studies to a large extent, and commenced a work in parts, "On the Genera of Diurnal Lepidoptera." This work he did not live to complete. B. in London, 1810; D. 1849.

DOUBS, doobs, a department of France, bounded on the E. by Switzerland, and on the S.W. by the department of the Jura. Area, 2,020 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, but fertile in many parts, with excellent pasturage for a valuable breed of draught-horses which it possesses. Minerals. Iron, salt, and gypsum. Pop. 297,000.—The RIVER, from which the department takes its name, passes through it, rising at the foot of Mount Jura, and washing St. Hypolite, Besançon, Dôle, &c., and, after a course of 288 miles, losing itself in the Saône, near Verdun.

DOUCE, Francis, dooce, an antiquarian, chiefly known by his work entitled "Illustrations of Shakspeare and Ancient Manners." At his death he bequeathed his writings and correspondence, in a strong box sealed up, to the British Museum, which would not accept it, on account of its being labelled with the following inscription:—"Mr. Douce's papers, to be opened in the year 1900." It was then presented to the Bodleian library. B. in London, 1762; D. 1834.—Mr. Douce also wrote a dissertation on Holbein's "Dance of Death," accompanied by 54 engravings on wood, which are admirably executed.

Douce, a mountain in the county of Wicklow, Ireland, 6 miles from Bray. Height, about 2,400 feet.

Doudeville, dood'-veel, a town of France, in the department of the Lower Seine, 25 miles from Rouen. Pop. 3,800.

Douë, doo'-ai, a small town in the department of Maine and Loire, with a manufacture of druggets and tammies. Pop. 3,200.—Near it are the remains of an amphitheatre, cut out of the solid rock; by some supposed to be Roman, and by others, the remains of a palace of Dagobert, king of Aquitaine.

Douglas, Gawin or Gavin, dug'-las, a Scotch poet, who was the younger son of the 5th earl of Angus, and obtained the bishopric of Dunkeld, to which was added the rich abbey of Aberbrothick. B. at Brechin, 1475; D. 1522.—His works are—1. A translation of Virgil's "Æneis;" 2. "The Palace of Honour," a poem; 3. "Aureæ Narrationes, Comediæ aliquot Sacræ;" 4. "De Rebus Scoticis Liber."—His "Palace of Honour" is his principal original composition, designed to show the instability of worldly pomp, and to prove that true honour and happiness are only to be found by a constant practice of virtue. His translation of "Æneis" was the first made of a classic author into any British tongue, unless Hector Boethius be called a classic. It is a work of great merit.

Douglas, Sir James, a Scotch nobleman, and one of the principal companions of Bruce in winning the independence of his country. He was made a knight-banneret under the royal standard at Bannockburn; and, at that battle, commanded the centre division of the Scottish van. Robert Bruce having made a vow to go against the infidels, and not being able to fulfil it, ordered that his heart should be carried to Palestine after his death, and deposited in the holy sepulchre. In 1327, Douglas and some others set out on this adventure, but were all killed by the way.

Douglas, Admiral Sir Charles, entered the Dutch service, which he quitted for the English navy. The American war commencing, he was appointed commodore of a squadron in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, where he obtained a great reputation, and, in 1787, was made rear-admiral. B. in Scotland; D. 1789.

Douglas, David, an eminent British botanist and enterprising traveller. In 1823 he visited the United States as a botanical collector, and, in the following year, explored the vegetable productions of the country in the neighbourhood of the Columbia, towards California. He further extended his researches, and, in 1827, crossed the Rocky Mountains to Hudson's Bay, where he met with Sir John Franklin, then returning from his second overland expedition. With him he returned to England; but, in 1829, sailed again for Columbia river. He afterwards visited the Sandwich Islands, where he fell into a trap set for the capture of wild bulls, and met his death from one of these animals, which had also fallen into it. B. at Scone, Scotland, 1798; killed, 1834.—The botany of England stands greatly indebted to Douglas. He introduced almost all the new hardy plants in its gardens, many valuable timber-trees, besides numerous beautiful species of ornamental shrubs.

Douglas, General Sir Howard, Bart., an English military officer, who distinguished himself by his devotion to his profession. After serving in the Peninsula from 1809 to 1812, he published a treatise "On Military Bridges," which was succeeded by another on "Naval Gunnery," and brought him prominently before the lords of the Admiralty. To the edition of 1855 of this work he appended a chapter on the siege of Sebastopol and the operations in the Crimea generally. One of his prophecies regarding the fall of Sebastopol, in this portion of his treatise, was doomed to be falsified. As a military engineer, his judgment was considered to be entitled to great weight. B. at Gosport, 1776.

Douglas, a village and parish of Lanarkshire, Scotland, 10 miles from Lanark. Pop. of parish, 2,600; of village, 1,400, mostly employed in collieries and cotton-factories.—Also a small river which joins the Clyde.

Douglas, a seaport and principal town of the Isle of Man, on the S.E. shore, 80 miles from Liverpool. The harbour is spacious and safe, and it has several episcopal chapels and meeting-houses, a custom-house, market-house, post-office for the island, assembly-rooms, libraries, and baths. It has a coasting trade, with some fisheries. Pop. 10,000.—Professor Edward Forbes, the naturalist, was born here.

Doullens, dool'-lens, a town of France, 15 miles from Amiens. It has a citadel, theatre, and a trade in cotton yarn, hempen cloths, and corn. Pop. 4,400. This town was, in 1814, taken by the allies.

Douro, doo'-ro, a large river of Spain, rising on the borders of Aragon, and, flowing W., traverses more than half the width of Spain and the whole of Portugal. After a course of 400 miles, it falls into the Atlantic, 3 miles from Oporto. Its basin is the largest in the Spanish peninsula. The wine country of the Douro begins 50 miles to the E. of Oporto.—This river was crossed in 1809 by the British army under the duke of Wellington, when he surprised the French under Marshal Soult, and won the battle of Oporto.

Douro, or Duero, a province in the N. of Portugal, having the Atlantic on the W., and, on its other sides, the provinces Minho, Upper Beira, and Estremadura. Area, 3,872 square miles. Pop. 208,000.

Douro, Pulo, an island of the Indian Archipelago, 35 miles from Timor, almost barren, and yielding little else than spelt and beans. Pop. 5,000. Lat. 10° 48′ S. Lon. 122° 41′ E.

Dousa, Janus, doo'-sa, a learned Dutchman, whose real name was Vander Does. He became eminent as a scholar and soldier, and, in 1574, was appointed governor of Leyden. On the establishment of its university, he was appointed first curator. B. 1545; D. 1604. He wrote Latin poems, among which is one on the history of Holland.—His son Janus distinguished himself, in his childhood, by his Latin poems. He was an eminent critic, mathematician, and philosopher. His poems were published at Leyden in 1607. B. 1572; D. 1598.

Doustre and Douve, doostr, two rivers of France, the former, after a course of about 30 miles, joining the Dordogne at Argentat; and the latter, after a course of 30 miles, entering the English Channel at Carentan.

Douvar, Thomas de, doovr, archbishop of York, in which station he was placed by William the Conqueror, whom he accompanied from Normandy. He was a great benefactor to his clergy, and rebuilt his cathedral. D. in 1100.—His nephew Thomas was made archbishop of York in 1108. He had some disputes with Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury, relating to the primacy. D. 1114.

Douw, or Dow, Gerard, dou, an eminent Dutch painter, who was the disciple of Rembrandt, and acquired uncommon excellence in painting in miniature. B. at Leyden in 1613; D. 1680.—His works are to be found in all great collections.

Doux, doo, a river of France, in the department of Ardèche, and, after a course of 25 miles, joining the Rhone near Tournou.

Douze, La, dooze, a river of France, traversing the departments Gers and Landes, and, after a course of 55 miles, joining the Midon at Mont-de-Marsan.

Douzy, doo'-ze, a town of France, in the department of the Nièvre. Pop. 3,600.

Dove, duv, a river of England, rising near Buxton, and, after a course of 40 miles, falling into the Trent below Burton.

Dover, do'-ver, a seaport-town of Kent, situate on a small stream which falls into its harbour, 66 miles from London. It consists chiefly of three long streets converging to one point; the upper part called the Town, and the lower the Pier. It has several churches, numerous chapels, a town-hall, and a gaol; a free school, a charity school, and an hospital. It is defended by a strong and spacious castle, and all the neighbouring heights are fortified. The castle occupies a lofty eminence, steep and rugged towards the town and harbour, and presents a precipitous cliff, 320 feet above the sea. It has subterraneous works and casements, a bomb-proof magazine, and a barracks capable of accommodating 2,000 men. Altogether it covers an area of 35 acres, and it is intended still further to strengthen and enlarge its fortifications. The walls round the ramparts, inside and outside, will be raised many feet, the ditches considerably lowered, while on the sea front will be erected a large bastion for officers' quarters, on the top of which will be a very strong battery, heavily mounted with first-class ordnance. In the centre of the citadel is to be a signal-tower, while lower, and over the reservoir, will be placed all the necessary buildings required for such a place. Between this and the guns facing outwards will be a covered way to protect the military passing to and fro. The improvements will extend from the citadel to the drop, at which places, and at the head of the military road, will be constructed new drawbridges of great strength. These works, it is estimated, will cost £150,000. The harbour consists of three basins, the outer one inclosed by two piers 150 feet apart, and improvements are going on to render the whole a harbour of refuge. It is the principal place of embarkation to France, and has constant communication with Calais. It has a thriving coasting trade, and imports from the continent, eggs, fruit, and other rural produce. Pop. 23,000. Lat. of castle, 51° 7′ 8″ N. Lon. 1° 19′ 5″ E. This town is the terminus of the South-Eastern Railway.

DOVER, the name of several towns in the United States, with populations ranging between 2,000 and 9,000.

DOVER, STRAIT OF (the French Pas-de-Calais), connects the English Channel with the North Sea, and separates England from France. It extends from Cape Gris-Nez and Dungeness on the N.E., to Calais and the South Foreland. Length, 22 miles, with a breadth of 21 at its narrowest point. A submarine telegraph to the coasts of England and France crosses the strait.

DOWLATABAD, dou-la-ta-bad′, a city and fortress of Hindostan, in the Deccan, 7 miles from Aurungabad. The fort stands on the summit of a mountain 500 feet high, and commands the town. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 19° 52′ N. Lon. 76° 2′ E.

DOWN, doun, a maritime county of Ireland, bounded N. by the county of Antrim and an arm of the sea, E. and S. by the Irish Sea, and W. by the county of Armagh. Area, 956 square miles. Desc. Mountainous in general, but fertile in many parts. The Mourne mountains occupy a portion of it, and attain an elevation of nearly 2,800 feet above the level of the sea. Rivers and Lakes. The Bann, Lagan, and Newry; and there are numerous small lakes in different places, the chief of which is Lough Strangford. Pro. Oats, potatoes, flax, and barley. Little wheat is grown, and the breed of cattle is esteemed indifferent. Minerals. Copper and lead are found; also black marble susceptible of a high polish, slate, coal, freestone, and crystals. Manf. Kelp is made along the coast; but the principal are linens and muslins, hosiery, leather, and salt. The fisheries employ some thousands of people. The county exports butter, hides, pork, and skins, with considerable quantities of its manufactured goods. Pop. 329,000.

DOWN, or DOWN-PATRICK, the chief town of the above county, situate near the mouth of the Quoyle, in Lough Strangford, 20 miles from Belfast. It consists principally of four main streets, intersected by several lanes. The principal public buildings are a cathedral, a parish church, chapels, schools, courthouse, infirmary, prison, barracks, and several charitable institutions. Manf. Linen, soap, leather, and it has several breweries. It has holy wells, which are visited by Roman Catholic pilgrims. Pop. about 4,000.

DOWN, the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 700.

DOWNE, a township of Cumberland county, New Jersey, U.S., 14 miles from Bridgeton. Pop. 2,000.

DOWNHAM, down′-ham, a town and parish of Cambridge, 3 miles from Ely. Pop. 2,300.

DOWNHAM-MARKET, a market-town and parish of Norfolk, on the Ouse, 11 miles from Lynn. Pop. 3,300.

DOWNS, THE, a portion of the North Sea, off the S.E. coast of England, between the N. and S. Foreland, opposite Ramsgate and Deal. This well-known roadstead affords a most valuable refuge to shipping, the Goodwin Sands serving as a breakwater. Here may be often seen, waiting for a favourable wind, several hundred sail.

DOWNTON, doun′-ton, a town and parish of Wiltshire, on the Avon, 6 miles from Salisbury. It has a church, several chapels, and a grammar-school. Manf. Lace, ticks, and it has both tanneries and malting-houses. Pop. 4,000.—At a short distance is the estate of Standlinch, purchased for the heirs of Lord Nelson, for which parliament voted £100,000.

DOYLE, Richard, doil, an English artist who excelled in depicting the passing whims and oddities of the day, and was for some time a constant illustrator of the pages of Punch. It was in that facetious periodical that he illustrated with great success, and in endless variety, "Ye Manners and Customs of ye English," and produced many other sketches, discovering much originality of invention, as well as humorous appreciation. In 1850 he ceased to contribute to Punch, and afterwards produced "The Foreign Tour of Brown, Jones, and Robinson," and other works. B. in London, 1826.

DRACANUS, dra-kai′-nus, a mountain whereon Jupiter took Bacchus from his thigh.

DRACO, drai′-ko, a celebrated lawgiver of Athens, who exercised the office of Archon, and, in 623 B.C., compiled a code of laws, which, on account of their severity, were said, by the orator Demades, to be written in letters of blood. He punished all crimes with death, alleging, that as the smallest crimes deserved it, he could not find a more severe punishment for the most atrocious. These laws were, at first, enforced, but were afterwards often neglected, on account of their extreme rigour, Solon ultimately totally abolishing them, except that which punished a murderer with death. Notwithstanding the severity of his code, his popularity was so great, that it was the proximate cause of his death. The Athenians, agreeably to a custom among them, out of great respect, heaped hats and cloaks on him at the theatre to such a degree, that they smothered him. Flourished in the 7th century B.C.

DRAGONERA, dra-go-nair′-a, the name of several small islands in the Mediterranean.

DRAGUIGNAN, dra′-goo-een′-yawng, the chief town of the department of the Var, France, 12 miles from Fréjus. Pop. 9,794.

DRAGUT, dra′-goot, the favourite and successor of the corsair Barbarossa, whom he equalled in skill and valour. After a series of daring exploits, he was killed before Malta, in 1565. (See BARBAROSSA.)

DRAKE, Francis, draik, a celebrated British admiral, who early went to sea, and served under his relative, Sir John Hawkins. After passing through some adventures, and playing some doubtful parts, he, in 1570, raised sufficient volunteers to man two ships, and went to the West Indies, where he reaped considerable advantages. In 1572 he sailed again for the Spanish main, and, after a short absence, returned to Plymouth loaded with treasure. He next served under the earl of Essex, in Ireland, where he distinguished himself so much by his bravery, that Sir Christopher Hatton introduced him to Queen Elizabeth. In 1577 he made another voyage to America, sailing through the Straits of Magellan, plundering the Spanish towns on the coast of Chili and Peru, and sailing northward till he reached the 48th degree. Here he took possession of New Albion (see NEW ALBION), and then steered for the East Indies. He doubled the Cape of Good Hope, and returned to Plymouth in 1580. This voyage round the world occupied two years and nearly ten months. Queen Elizabeth ordered his ship up to Deptford, and partook of a banquet on board of her, and then conferred the honour of knighthood on Drake. In 1585, and the whole of 1586, he was engaged in the West Indies, where he took several places from the Spaniards; visited the colony of Virginia, in America, planted by Raleigh, and brought some of the colonists to England with him. By these it is supposed that tobacco was first introduced into England. Drake returned loaded with treasure. In 1587 he commanded a fleet of thirty sail, with which he entered Cadiz, and destroyed a number of shipping, and afterwards, between St. Vincent and Cadiz, burned 100 vessels, and destroyed several castles on the coast. This Drake humorously termed "singeing the Spanish monarch's beard." The year following, he commanded as vice-admiral, under Lord Howard, and was instrumental in the defeat of the Spanish Armada. After this he went to the West Indies with Sir John Hawkins; but the two commanders disagreeing in their plans, little was done by them. B. at Tavistock, 1545; D. in the harbour of Nombre de Dios, in America, 1595.—He was representative for the town of Plymouth, to which he was a great benefactor, by causing water to be conveyed to it from springs at eight miles' distance.

DRAKENBERG, Christian Jocobensen, dra'-ken-bairg, a Norwegian seaman, who is noticed here on account of the great age he attained. In his 13th year he went to sea, in his 68th was captured by Algerine pirates, and was kept in slavery till his 84th. In his 102nd he was taken into the service of Count Samsoe, with whom he went to Copenhagen. In his 111th he married a widow 60 years of age, and died at the age of 146. B. at Blomsholm, Norway, 1626.—He was never known to be intoxicated.

DRAKENBORCH, Arnold, dra'-ken-bork, professor of history and eloquence at Utrecht, who published editions of Livy and Silius Italicus, with learned notes. B. at Utrecht, 1684; D. 1747.

DRAMMEN, dram'-men, a seaport-town of Norway, consisting of two distinct parts, on the Drammen, 22 miles from Christiania. Its parts were formerly separate villages, now united by a bridge. It has a college, parish church, and several schools. Manf. Leather, tobacco, sail-cloth, oil, ropes, and spirits. It has also shipbuilding-docks, and has a trade in deals, timber, pitch, and iron. Pop. 12,000. Lat. 59° 44′ N. Lon. 10° 12′ E.

DRAPER, Sir William, drai'-per, an English general, whose father was collector of customs at Bristol. He received his education at Eton and King's College, Cambridge, after which he went to the East Indies, where he rose to the rank of colonel. In 1763 he took Manilla, in conjunction with Admiral Cornish; but the place was preserved from plunder, on condition of its paying a ransom of four millions of dollars, which was never discharged. For this service he was created a knight of the Bath. In 1769 he was engaged in a controversy with Junius, in defence of his friend the marquis of Granby. In 1779 he was appointed lieutenant-governor of Minorca. When that place surrendered, he brought an accusation against General Murray, the governor, after whose trial General Draper was commanded by the court to make an apology to him. B. at Bristol, 1721; D. at Bath, 1787.

DRAVE, drav, a river of Europe, which rises in the Tyrol, 16 miles from Bruneoken, and, after a course of 360 miles, joins the Danube 15 miles from Eszek. It is one of the chief tributaries of the Danube.

DRAYCOT, drai'-kot, two parishes of England, both in Wilts, one 4 miles from Chippenham, and the other 5 miles from Swindon. Their populations are small.

DRAYTON, drai'-ton, the name of numerous parishes in England, with populations ranging between 200 and 700.

DRAYTON-IN-HALES, or MARKET, a town and parish in the county of Salop, 18 miles from Shrewsbury. Pop. 5,000.

DRAYTON WEST, a parish of Middlesex, 4 miles from Uxbridge. Pop. 1,000.—It is a station on the Great Western Railway.

DRAYTON, Michael, an English poet, who received his education at Oxford, but never took a degree. In 1593 he published a collection of pastorals, entitled, "The Shepherd's Garland," which was followed by his poems of "The Barons' Wars," and "England's Heroical Epistles." The "Barons' Wars" contain many passages of great beauty, and were imitated by Milton. In 1613 he published his "Poly-Albion," or a Description of England, to which Mr. Selden wrote notes. This is his great work, "exhibiting, at once, the learning of an historian, an antiquary, a naturalist, and a geographer, besides being embellished with the imagination of a poet." B. at Hartshill, Warwickshire, 1563; D. 1631, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.—His works were reprinted in 1748 in one volume folio, and in 1753 in 10 vols. 8vo.

DREBEL, Cornelius, dreb'-el, a Dutch philosopher, whose principal work is "De Naturâ Elementorum," 8vo. He invented the thermometer which bears his name, and is also said, although erroneously, to have been the discoverer of the microscope and telescope. B. at Alkmaar, 1572; D. in London, 1634.

DRENTHE, drent, a frontier province of the Netherlands, having on the E. the Hanoverian dominions, and on the other sides, the provinces of Friesland, Gröningen, and Overyssel. Area, 1,028 square miles. Desc. Flat and marshy, with a generally infertile soil. The principal employment of the population is pasturing flocks and digging and exporting peat. Pop. about 88,000. Lat. between 52° 35′ and 53° 12′ N. Lon. between 6° 5′ and 7° 5′ E.

DREPANO, CAPE, drai-pa'-no, several headlands in Greece and European Turkey.

DRESDEN, dres'-den, one of the four circles into which the kingdom of Saxony is divided; being inclosed by Prussia, Bautzen, Bohemia, Zuickau, and Leipsic. Area, 1,279 geographical square miles. Desc. It is more pastoral than agricultural, rearing large herds and flocks of cattle, goats, sheep, and swine. Minerals. Iron, silver, copper, lead, antimony, coal, lignite, and marble. Pop. 510,000.

DRESDEN, the capital of the kingdom of Saxony, and one of the best-built towns in Europe, is beautifully situate on both sides of the Elbe, which is here crossed by a magnificent bridge, 100 miles from Berlin. This city, which has long been noted for its valuable collections in the fine arts and antiquities, contains many Lutheran churches, structures for other religious denominations, a Roman Catholic church of great beauty, an electoral or royal palace, with a tower 355 feet in height. This building has a number of remarkable apartments, particularly a green vault, divided into eight rooms, all paved with marble, and containing statues, ivory-work, silver plate, vases, and precious stones. Its other buildings are the Dresden Gallery, famed for its paintings; the Palace of the Princes, the Augusteum, or Japanese Palace; the Bruhl Palace, the opera-house, capable of seating 8,000 spectators; the theatre, the House of Assembly, the trades and city halls, various colleges, and the Academy of Arts. The Zwinger Gardens, situate in the suburbs, form a kind of public promenade, and contain a valuable cabinet of natural history, and a curious collection of arms; among others, the first-invented firearms. The castle is the great depôt of the porcelain manufactures. There are, besides a number of schools, an academy for cadets of noble families, a military school, and several charitable institutions. Manf. Silks, woollens, carpets, mirrors, porcelain, jewellery, gloves, leather, artificial flowers, scientific instruments, chemicals; and there is a bomb and cannon foundry. Pop. 105,000, mostly Protestants.—Old Dresden owes its origin to a château built by Charlemagne in 808. In 1813 the allies were defeated, in a terrible battle, by the French, under the walls of this city; and about a mile from it is a granite block, surmounted by a helmet, marking the spot where Moreau fell, in this conflict, by the side of the emperor Alexander.

DRESDEN, the name of several townships, with small populations, in the United States. They are in New York, Illinois, and Maine.

DREUX, droo, an old town of France, in the department of the Eure and Loire, on the Blaise, 45 miles from Paris. Manf. Woollens, and it has a trade in sheep and cattle. There are also several tanneries, iron-foundries, and dye-works. Pop. about 7,000.—In 1188 this town was burned by the Norman English; and in 1562 the prince of Condé was taken prisoner in a severe action fought between the Calvinists and the Catholics in its neighbourhood. On a hill that overlooks the town there is a magnificent chapel, which was built by Louis Philippe of France, when duke of Orleans, and in which rest the remains of some of his own family. In the town-hall is the tomb of Philidor, the great chess-player and musical composer, who was a native of this place. (See PHILIDOR.)

DREUX DU RADIER, John Francis, rad'-e-ai, a French advocate, who wrote several books, the principal of which are—1. "Bibliothèque Historique et Politique de Poitou," 5 vols. 12mo; 2. "L'Europe Illustrée;" 3. "Tablettes Anecdotes des Rois de France," 3 vols. 12mo, &c. B. 1714; D. 1780.

DRIFFIELD, GREAT, drif'-feeld, a township of the East Riding of Yorkshire, 20 miles from Hull. It has an ancient church, several chapels, and a union workhouse. Pop. 4,300.—It is a station on the Hull and Scarborough Railway.

DRIMACHUS, drim'-a-kus, a famous robber of Chios. When a price was set upon his head, he ordered a young man to cut it off, and go and receive the money. Such an uncommon instance of generosity so pleased the Chians, that they raised a temple to his memory, and honoured him as a god.

DRIN, drin, a large river of European Turkey, in Albania, which, after a course of about 100 miles, falls into the Adriatic 4 miles from Alessio.—Another, of European Turkey, which separates Bosnia from Servia, and, after a course of 180 miles, joins the Save 60 miles from Belgrade.

DROGHEDA, draw'-he-da, a seaport-town of Ireland, in the counties of Meath and Louth, built on both sides of the Boyne, 30 miles from Dublin. It was once surrounded by walls, but these have fallen into decay; the town, however, is compact and well built. The principal buildings are two churches, a Catholic cathedral, several monasteries and nunneries, an infirmary, barracks, gaol, custom-house, linen-hall, and market-house. It has also a good harbour. Manf. Linens and cottons. Brewing is largely carried on. Pop. 17,000.—In 1649 Cromwell was twice repulsed in besieging this town; but in the third attempt he was successful, when most of its garrison were put to the sword.

DROHOBICK, or DROHOBICZ, dro'-ho-bitch, a town of Austrian Poland, in Galicia, 18 miles from Sambor. It has several suburbs, numerous churches, various schools, and a fair for cattle and corn. Pop. 12,000.

DROITWICH, droit'-wich, a town of Worcestershire, on a canal communicating with the Severn, 7 miles from Worcester. It contains several fine churches, an hospital, and a union workhouse. Its principal manufacture is fine white salt, of which about 30,000 tons are annually procured from its celebrated brine springs. Pop. 3,200.—It is a station on the Bristol and Birmingham Railway.

DRÔME, drome, a river of France, rising in the Upper Alps, and, after a course of 60 miles, joining the Rhone 12 miles from Valence.

DRÔME, a department of France, taking its name from the above river, and comprehending the S.W. part of Lower Dauphiny. It is bounded by the departments of the Isère, Upper Alps, Lower Alps, and Vaucluse; the Rhone separating it on the W. from Ardèche. Area, 2,519 square miles. Desc. Mountainous in the E., and generally infertile. Rivers. The Rhone, Drôme, and Isère. Pro. Silk and the grape. Hermitage is the product of the latter. Minerals. Iron, coal, copper, lead, granite, and marble. Pop. 326,846. Lat. between 44° 9′ and 45° 20′ N. Lon. between 4° 38′ and 5° 45′ E.

DROMORE, dro-mor', a town and parish of Ireland, in the county of Down, on the Lagan, 15 miles from Belfast. The town has a cathedral, a market-house, and an episcopal residence. Pop. of parish, 13,200; of town, 1,900.—Also the name of a county in Tyrone. Pop. 8,000.—The name of several villages in the counties of Sligo and Clare.

DROMORE, a post-township of Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, U.S., on the E. side of the Susquehannah, 17 miles from Lancaster. Pop. 2,300.

DRONERO, dro-nair'-o, a town of Piedmont, 9 miles from Cuneo, near the foot of the Alps. Pop. with its parish, 8,000.

DRONFIELD, dron'-feeld, a town and parish of Derbyshire, 6 miles from Chesterfield. Manf. Cutlery and iron-wares. Pop. 5,300.

DRONNE, dron, a river of France, which joins the Isle near Coutras.

DRONTHEIM, or TRONDHJEM, dront'-hime, the most N. of the four grand baliages or dioceses of Norway, is situate on the W. coast, between Bergen, Aggerhuus, the Swedish frontier, and Norrland. Area, 19,735 square miles. It is divided by mountains from Sweden. Pop. about 230,000.

DRONTHEIM, or TRONDHJEM, a town of Norway, the capital of the above province, on the Nid, in Dronthеim fiord, by which the town is nearly surrounded. It is defended by the fortress of Munkholm, on an island in the fiord, and has a cathedral, several churches, a theatre, exchange, bank, schools, and charitable institutions. Its trade is carried on in dried fish, tar, deals, and copper. The imports consist chiefly of groceries, cloths, wine, and corn. Pop. about 15,000. Lat. 63° 25′ 8″ N. Lon. 10° 28′ 7″ E.—DRONTHEIM FIORD extends inland about 80 miles, and receives several rivers.

DROUET D'ERLON, Jean Baptiste, droo-ai dair'-lawng, a French marshal, who, at an early age, joined the army, and, after passing through the various ranks, became a general of division, in 1805. In 1807 Dantzic capitulated to him, he was wounded at Friedland, served in Spain under Massena, and was opposed on many occasions to the English. On Napoleon's return from Elba, he was one of the most eager to receive him, and commanded the first corps d'armée during the "hundred days." He was condemned, in 1816, to death, found an asylum in Prussia, returned, in 1825, to his country; but did not rejoin the service till 1830, when, in 1834, he was appointed governor-general of Algeria. Here he was the author of several administrative reforms; but, not displaying against Abd-el-Kader the necessary energy, he was recalled in 1835, being made, however, a marshal in 1813. B. at Rheims, 1795; D. 1844.—He wrote his autobiography, under the title of "The Military Life of General Drouet."

DROUYN DE LHUYS, Edward, droo'-awng de(r) lweece, a modern French statesman, who early entered the diplomatic service of his country, and was employed in several minor positions at various courts. He was also elected a deputy of the Chamber. Here he was opposed to the policy of M. Guizot, and was one of those who signed the list of charges drawn up against the ministry by Odillon Barrot. In the first cabinet of Louis Napoleon, after he became president, Drouyn de Lhuys was appointed foreign minister, and acquitted himself with considerable ability in those difficult times. He was afterwards sent as ambassador to England, and, subsequently, in 1852, being again foreign minister, addressed to the various powers, despatches announcing the establishment of the empire under Napoleon III. During the dispute between Turkey and Russia, his endeavours for peace were strenuously exerted. He took part in the conferences at Vienna in 1855, and, on their breaking up without any result, resigned his office. The following year he also tendered his resignation as senator. B. at Paris, 1805.

DROYLSDEN, droils'-den, a township of Lancashire, 4 miles from Manchester. Pop. 6,500.

DRUIDÆ, dru'-i-de, the Druids, so called from drus, 'an oak,' because the woods were their usual abode. They were the ministers of religion among the ancient Gauls and Britons, being divided into different classes, called the Bardi, Eubages, Vates, Semnothei, Sarronides, and Samothei, and held in the greatest veneration by the people. Their life was austere and recluse, their dress peculiar to themselves, and generally consisting of a tunic, which reached a little below the knee. They could declare war and make peace at their option. Their power was extended, not only over private families, but they could depose magistrates, and even kings, if their actions in any manner deviated from the laws of the state. They were intrusted with the education of youth, and taught the doctrine of the metempsychosis, believing in the immortality of the soul. In their sacrifices they often immolated human victims to their gods.

DRUM, drum, the prefix to a great number of parishes in Ireland, with populations ranging between 100 and 15,000. Those above 5,000 are—DRUMACHOSE, in Londonderry; DRUMAUL, in Antrim; DRUMBALLYRONG, in Down; DRUMBOE, in Down; two DRUMCLIFFES, one in Sligo and another in Clare; DRUMCORE, in Armagh; DRUMGLASS, in Tyrone; DRUMGOOLAND, in Down; DRUMGOON, in Cavan; DRUMHOME, in Donegal; DRUMKEERAN, in Fermanagh; DRUMLANE, in Cavan; DRUMMAUL, in Antrim; DRUMRAGH, in Tyrone; DRUMREILLY, in Leitrim.

DRUMMOND, William, drum'-mond, a Scotch poet, was the son of Sir John Drummond, of Hawthornden; and was destined for the law; but Parnassus had more charms for him than the courts. In his retirement at Hawthornden, he wrote several beautiful poems; but the death of a lady, to whom he was about to be married, affected him so much, that he went abroad, where he remained some years. On his return, he settled at Hawthornden, and wrote his "History of the Seven Kings of the Name of James," and several pieces to promote peace and union in that turbulent time. B. at Hawthornden, 1585; D. 1649.—This poet excited the envy of rare Ben Jonson, as well as attracted his praise. That bard, in 1619, made a journey to Scotland expressly to see him. Hazlitt says of his sonnets, that "they come as near as almost any others to the perfection of this kind of writing."

DRUMMOND, Captain Thomas Henry, was appointed to a cadetship at Woolwich, where he soon began to distinguish himself by his mechanical talents in the engineering department of the government institution of that place. Having served here some time, he went to Plymouth, thence to Chatham, and thence to Edinburgh, where he got acquainted with Captain Colly, then engaged in the trigonometrical survey. From this officer he obtained employment, and, in surveying a portion of Ireland, invented a new light, which greatly assisted his observations in foggy weather. He also invented a heliostat, an instrument for reflecting the rays of the sun, which was used in this survey. This instrument, in an improved form, connected with the theodolite, has been found of great service. He continued to devote himself to scientific pursuits, until ill-health compelled him, for a time, to resign his situation. He was subsequently engaged in laying down the boundaries to the old and the new boroughs, under the provisions of the Reform Bill; in which capacity he distinguished himself by his usual perseverance and accuracy. In 1835 he became under-secretary for Ireland. His labours now took a political direction, into which it is unnecessary to enter. B. at Edinburgh, 1797; D. 1840.

DRUMMOND ISLAND, an island in Lake Huron, North America. It is a trading post, and has a British fort upon it. Ext. 20 miles long, by 10 broad.

DRURY, Robert, droo'-re, an English seaman, who, in 1702, was shipwrecked on the coast of Madagascar, where he remained 15 years. After his return to England, he published a very exact and curious account of that island, 8vo, 1729.

DRURY, Dru, an English naturalist, supposed to have been descended from Sir Dru Drury, a knight of the reign of Elizabeth. He was for several years a jeweller in the Strand, London, and was a great collector of subjects of natural history. He wrote three volumes on insects. D. 1804.

DRUSILLA, dru-sil'-la, was the youngest daughter of Herod Agrippa, sister of Berenice and Agrippa. She became wife of Azizus, king of the Emesenians, but deserted him, and married Claudius.

DRUSUS, drw'-sus, a name common to many eminent Romans, the most remarkable of whom are the following:—A son of Tiberius and Vipsania, who made himself famous by his intrepidity and courage in the provinces of Illyricum and Pannonia. He was raised to the greatest honours by his father, but a blow which he gave to Sejanus, an audacious libertine, proved his ruin. Sejanus corrupted Livia, the wife of Drusus, and, in conjunction with her, the former caused him to be poisoned by a eunuch, 23 A.D.—A son of Germanicus and Agrippina, who enjoyed offices of the greatest trust under Tiberius. His enemy Sejanus, however, effected his ruin by his insinuations; Drusus was confined by Tiberius, and deprived of all aliment. He was found dead nine days after his confinement, 33 A.D.—Nero Claudius, a son of Tiberius Nero and Livia, adopted by Augustus. He was brother to Tiberius, who was afterwards made emperor. He greatly signalized himself in his wars in Germany and Gaul against the Rhæti and Vindelici, and was honoured with a triumph. He died of a fall from his horse, in the 30th year of his age, 9 B.C. B. 38 B.C.

DRYADES, dri'-ä-dees, nymphs who presided over the woods. Oblations of milk, oil, and honey were offered to them, and sometimes the votaries sacrificed a goat.

DRYANDER, John, dre-an'-der, a mathematician and physician of Wetteren, in the county of Hesse. He was a professor at Marpurg, and wrote several books on physic and mathematics, which were once held in great esteem. D. at Marpurg, 1560.

DRYANDER, Jonas, a Swedish naturalist, a pupil of Linnæus, went to England, and there became a member of the Linnæan Society, being also charged by Sir Joseph Banks with the care of his library. He wrote several memoirs, and also compiled a catalogue of Sir Joseph's library. B. 1748; D. in London, 1811.

DRYDEN, John, dri'-den, an English poet, educated at Westminster school under Dr. Busby, the stimulating properties of whose classic ferula are well known; whence he was elected to Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1650. He proceeded to the degree of M.A., and in 1657 removed to London, where, in the following year, he wrote an elegy on the death of Cromwell. His sorrow, however, was of short duration; for at the Restoration, he complimented Charles II. in a poem, entitled "Astræa Redux." In 1662 appeared his first play, called "The Wild Gallant," which was indifferently received. Soon afterwards he produced "The Rival Ladies," and next "The Indian Emperor," which made him famous. This last was written in conjunction with Sir Robert Howard, who introduced him to the earl of Berkshire, whose eldest daughter he married, but who brought him no happiness. Soon after the fire of London, he engaged with the king's theatre for an annual stipend, on condition of furnishing a certain number of plays in each year. On the death of Sir William Davenant, he was nominated poet laureate, and in 1668 obtained the place of historiographer royal, with a salary of £200 a year and a butt of wine. His eminence as a dramatic writer was now established, but it exposed him to the envy of several rival wits. Among these the duke of Buckingham held him up to ridicule in the character of Bayes, in "The Rehearsal;" and the earl of Rochester being offended, it is supposed, at some allusions in an "Essay on Satire," written jointly by Dryden and Lord Mulgrave, caused the former to be cudgelled by some hired ruffians as he came home from a coffee-house. Others, however, declare that the vanity of the duchess of Portsmouth, one of the king's mistresses, was wounded by a jeu d'esprit of Dryden, and that this procured him the cudgelling. To his antagonists in satirical weapons, he was decidedly superior. "His keen and trenchant blade," says Sir Walter Scott, "never makes a thrust in vain, and never strikes but at a vulnerable point." The duke of Buckingham is the Zimri of the poet's "Absalom and Achitophel." On the accession of James II. Dryden became a Roman Catholic, and, like most converts, endeavoured to defend his new faith at the expense of the old one, in a poem, called "The Hind and Panther," which was admirably parodied by Prior and Montague, afterwards earl of Halifax, in "The Country Mouse and the City Mouse." At the Revolution he lost his posts, and was succeeded by Shadwell, whom Dryden satirized under the name of Mac Flecknoe. In 1695 his translation of Virgil appeared; which performance alone is sufficient to immortalize his name. Pope pronounces it "the most noble and spirited translation in any language." No other translations are equally excellent. B. at Aldwinkle, Northamptonshire, 1631; D. in London, 1700, and was buried between the graves of Chaucer and Cowley, in Westminster Abbey, where is a monument to his memory, erected by Sheffield, duke of Buckingham. Dryden's works are too numerous to be here distinguished. His critical prefaces are admirable; his prose being matchless for its freedom, vigour, variety, and copiousness. It ranks with the best in the English language. His poetry is correct, harmonious, and strong, particularly his satires. As a dramatic writer, he chiefly excelled in tragedy. His plays are numerous, he having been the sole or joint author of twenty-seven. He had three sons: CHARLES, who became usher of the palace to Pope Clement XI., and was drowned in 1704; JOHN, who wrote a comedy, called "The Husband his own Cuckold;" and HENRY, who entered into a religious order abroad.

DRYOPE, dri'-o-pe, a woman of Lemnos, whose shape Venus assumed to persuade all the females of the island to murder the men.—A virgin of Œchalia, whom Andræmon married after she had been beloved by Apollo. She was changed into a lotus.—A nymph, mother of Tarquitus by Faunus.

DRYOPES, dri'-o-pees, a people of Greece, near Mount Œta. They afterwards passed into the Peloponnesus, where they inhabited the towns of Asine and Hermione, in Argolis.

DU BARRY, Jeanne Vaubernier, Countess. (See BARRY.)

DU BARTAS, William de Saluste, doo bar'-ta, a French poet, who distinguished himself by his bravery and also by his diplomatic skill, and was employed in diplomatic missions both to England and Denmark. He wrote some poems, which had a great success. His best-known work is "The Week of the Creation," in 7 books, which went through more than 30 editions in six years; he is also the author of "Second Week," comprising the history of the New Testament. He possessed strength and imagination, but is wanting in refinement. B. at Montfort, 1544; D. 1590.

DU BELLAY, doo bel'-lai, a French cardinal and statesman, who enjoyed the favour of Francis I., and was sent as ambassador to Henry VIII. of England and the pope, Paul III. He was appointed lieutenant-general of the kingdom during the absence of Francis, who was engaged against the emperor Charles V. in Provence. Falling into disgrace on the death of this king, he retired to Rome. B. 1492; D. 1560.—This cardinal protected and encouraged letters, and it was at his suggestion that the College of France was founded. Rabelais was attached to his establishment.—His brother WILLIAM was one of Francis I.'s bravest generals, and was viceroy of Piedmont, where he defeated the Imperialists; he wrote some interesting memoirs, which he called Ogdoades.

DUBITZA, doo-beet'-cha, a town and fort of European Turkey, in Bosnia, on the Unna, 25 miles from Gradiska. Pop. 6,000.—In 1738 the Austrians took this town.

DUBLIN, dub'-lin, a county of Ireland, bounded E. by the Irish Sea, N. by the county of Meath, W. by the counties of Meath and Kildare, and S. by the county of Wicklow. Area, 354 square miles. Desc. Undulating. In the vicinity of the city of Dublin the lands are fertile and luxuriant, but in more remote parts, agriculture is not in so flourishing a state. Rivers. The principal is the Liffey. The Dodder is a small stream, falling into Dublin Bay. There are two canals, the Grand and the Royal canals, by which a navigable communication is effected between Dublin and the Shannon. Its fisheries along the coast are important. Pop. 147,000.

DUBLIN, 'the town and the ford of the hurdles,' is the metropolis of Ireland, in the province of Leinster, and county of Dublin. It stands close to the bay of that name, into which the river Liffey runs, after dividing the city, 138 miles from Liverpool. The bay is spacious, and has recently been greatly improved. From the point where the Liffey enters the bay, it is embanked on either side with a noble wall of freestone, forming a range of beautiful and spacious quays through the whole city. The river is crossed in its course through the city by seven stone and two iron bridges. Dublin is, besides, nearly insulated by two canals, which give great advantages for inland communication. The city is built rather in the form of a rectangular parallelogram, round which a road, called the Circular, is carried, 9 miles in length. The houses, with the exception of the principal public structures, are generally brick, and from three to five stories high. In the old part of the city, the streets are irregular, although those which range parallel to and at right angles with the Liffey, are uniform and spacious. There are several squares, and Stephen's Green is nearly a mile in circuit. To the W. end of the city is Phœnix Park, a royal demesne, about three miles in length, and two in breadth. In it is a Corinthian fluted pillar 30 feet high, surmounted by a phœnix, erected by the earl of Chesterfield, when viceroy, in 1747. The park contains inclosures, the vice-regal lodge, with appropriate buildings for the secretaries and rangers; also a military hospital, a large military school for the maintenance and education of soldiers' children, with a beautiful church, a salute-battery, and a magazine strongly fortified. On an eminence is erected, in honour of the duke of Wellington, and at a cost of £20,000, a splendid obelisk, 210 feet in height. No city can boast, perhaps, of a greater number of magnificent and useful buildings. The "Castle," which was completed and flanked with towers in 1213, is situate about the centre of the city, and is occupied for the purposes of government. It consists principally of two squares, which contain apartments for the lord-lieutenant and officers of his suite, and residences for his secretaries, with suitable offices for transacting the business of the civil and war departments. In the lower court are the Treasury and other offices, besides the civil establishment of the ordnance department, and an extensive armoury. The Castle chapel, in this lower square, is an exquisite specimen of Gothic architecture. The other public edifices are the Royal Exchange, the Commercial Buildings, Corn-exchange or Burgh-quay, the Linen-hall, the Custom-house, the Stamp-office, Post-office, and the Bank of Ireland, formerly the Parliament-house. Opposite to the east front of the custom-house are the government wet docks, and adjacent to the post-office, standing in Sackville Street, one of the finest thoroughfares in Europe, is Nelson's pillar, 134 feet high. In the centre of College Green, to which the principal front of the bank looks, is an equestrian statue of William III., erected in 1701. On the east side of College Green is the grand front of Trinity College, which is of Portland stone, of the Corinthian order. The park is in the rear of the college, and contains 25½ acres, adorned with fine trees. The other public buildings are the "Four Courts" of justice, and their necessary offices, situate on the quay, many parochial churches, two cathedrals, besides several chapels, and other structures for various religious denominations. St. Patrick's Cathedral is an antique building, erected in 1190, decorated with a steeple in 1370, and a very lofty spire in 1750. Christ Church, the ancient cathedral of Dublin, built in 1038, is another venerable pile, containing some curious monuments. St. George's Church is a superb edifice, with a magnificent front, and spire 200 feet high. No city, for its size, abounds more in charitable institutions. These are in general well endowed, and some of them are splendid buildings. To the W. of the city, opposite Phœnix Park, is the royal hospital of Kilmainham, for the reception of disabled and superannuated soldiers, on the plan of that of Chelsea. There are also many learned societies. The chief trade of Dublin consists in exporting poplins, linens, porter, and provisions. Pop. 259,000. Lat. of observatory, 53° 20′ 38″ N. Lon. 6° 17′ 30″ W.—By railways and canals, Dublin communicates with the W. of Ireland and the towns of Belfast, Cork, Limerick, Kingstown, Howth, Drogheda, and other places. By steamboats it also communicates with Belfast, Liverpool, Glasgow, Cork, Holyhead, Bristol, Plymouth, Southampton, London, and Havre.

DUBLIN, several townships of the United States, with small populations.

DUBLIN BAY, an inlet of the Irish Sea, having at its W. end the mouth of the river Liffey, with Dublin harbour. Its entrance is marked as being between two lighthouses, one at Howth Head on the N., and the other at Kingstown on the S.

DUBNIZZA, doob-nee'-za, a town of European Turkey, on the bank of the Djerma, 22 miles from Sophia. In its vicinity the grape is cultivated, and there are large iron-works. Pop. 6,000.

DUBOCAGE, Marie Anne le Page, doo'-bo-caj, a talented French authoress, who was a member of the academies of Rome, Bologna, Padua, Lyons, and Rouen. She early distinguished herself by a taste for poetry, and translated Pope's "Temple of Fame" into French. In 1746 she obtained the prize given by the academy at Rouen, and afterwards translated Milton's "Paradise Lost," which she followed by a translation of the "Death of Abel." In 1749 she produced a tragedy, called "The Amazons," and subsequently "The Columbiad," an epic poem on the discovery of America, which is esteemed her greatest work. She also published "Travels through England, Holland, and Italy," in the epistolary form. B. at Rouen, 1710; D. 1802.

DUBOIS, William du, doo-bwaw', archbishop of Cambray, cardinal, and prime minister of France, was the son of a poor apothecary in Limousin. He became valet to the superior of the college of St. Michael at Paris, where he studied, and entered into orders. Being appointed private reader to the duke de Chartres, afterwards duke of Orleans and Regent, he received the rich abbey of St. Just, and subsequently became counsellor of state. In 1717 he was sent to England as plenipotentiary to sign the triple alliance, which had been entered into against Spain, between England, France, and Holland. On his return, he was made minister and secretary of state, and obtained the archbishopric of Cambray. In 1721, the pope advanced him to the cardinalate, and, in the following year, he was appointed first minister of state. From that time he reigned absolute master, and the French court, already so depraved, sank still lower in its vices; but happily his death soon put an end to his power. B. in Limousin; D. 1723.—He possessed great talents, but these were sullied and clouded by his vices of debauchery, avarice, and guilty ambition.

DUBOS, John Baptist, doo-bo', a French writer, who was employed in some secret transactions by M. De Torcy, minister of foreign affairs, for which he was rewarded with several benefices. He is principally known by his "Critical Reflections on Poetry and Painting," 2 vols. 12mo; a work which, at the time of its appearance, was highly esteemed. He also wrote some political pieces, and a "Critical History of the Establishment of the French Monarchy in Gaul." B. at Beauvais, 1670; D. at Paris, 1742.

DUBUQUE, do-book', a county of Iowa, U.S. Area, 576 square miles. Pop. 11,000.

DU CANGE, Charles Dufresne, Seigneur, doo kanzh, a French author, who studied for the profession of the law, but subsequently devoted himself entirely to history and philosophy. His first work was "A History of Constantinople under the French Emperors," which was succeeded by his "Scriptural Glossary," a work of great value in enabling us to understand the writers of the dark and middle ages. He also produced some other historical works, and left a large number of manuscripts. B. at Amiens, 1610; D. 1688.—His children received a pension of 2,000 francs from Louis XIV.

DUCAREL, Andrew Coltee, doo'-ka-rel, an eminent civilian and antiquarian, who published a number of topographical and antiquarian works. His best known is one on Anglo-Gallic, Norman, and Aquitaine coins, which appeared in 1757. "Anglo-Norman Antiquities," considered in a tour through Normandy, is another valuable work on the particular subject of which it treats. B. in Normandy, 1713; D. at South Lambeth, 1785.—Ducarel was commissary of St. Catherine's and Canterbury, and was brought to England soon after his birth. When the Society of Antiquaries was incorporated, in 1755, he was appointed one of its first fellows.

DUCAS, Michael, doo'-kăs, the author of a history of the Grecian empire, from the reign of Andronicus the Elder to the fall of that empire; printed at the Louvre in 1649.

DUCATO, CAPE, doo-ka'-to, is at the S. extremity of the island of Santa Maura, Ionian islands. It is the Leucadian promontory, or "Lover's Leap," of the ancients.

DUCHESS, dutch'-ess, a county of New York, in the United States. Area, 765 square miles. Desc. Fertile, producing Indian corn and potatoes. Pop. 60,000.

DUCKINFIELD, duk'-in-feeld, a township of Cheshire, 2 miles from Staleybridge. Manf. Cottons. In its neighbourhood are extensive collieries. Pop. 27,000.—It is a station on the Manchester and Staleybridge Railway.

DUCKWORTH, Sir John Thomas, Bart., duk'-worth, a British admiral, who entered the navy in 1759, under Admiral Boscawen, and took part in several engagements with the French. Having served in various ships, and seen a great deal of active service, he, in 1793, was attached to Lord Howe's fleet, and, in the celebrated action of June 1, 1794, greatly distinguished himself by his bravery, as well as naval skill. In 1800 he was appointed to the command of the Leeward islands; and in 1801, for aiding in the reduction of the Swedish and West-India islands, was created a K.C.B. In 1803 he was appointed commander-in-chief of Jamaica, and, for the vigorous measures he adopted in protecting the commerce of that island, received the thanks of its House of Assembly, with the presentation of a sword valued at £1,000. In 1805 he defeated the French in the Bay of St. Domingo, for which he was thanked by both houses of parliament, and had an annuity of £1,000 bestowed upon him. In 1807 he forced the passage of the Dardanelles, in spite of the Turks; and, from 1810 to 1815, held the commander-in-chiefship of Newfoundland. He subsequently became governor of Plymouth, and, in 1813, was created a baronet. B. at Fulmer, Bucks, 1748; D. at Devonport, 1817.

DUCLOS, Charles Pineau, doo-klo', an historiographer of France, who became perpetual secretary to the French Academy, and died in 1772. B. at Dinant, 1705.—His principal works are—1. "Memoirs on the Manners of the 18th Century," 1 vol. 12mo; 2. "The History of Louis XI.," 3 vols. 12mo; 3. "The Confessions of Count * * *."

DUDDINGSTON, dud'-dings-ton, a parish and village in the county of Edinburgh, Scotland. It is situate on the Firth of Forth, and comprises the sea-bathing town of Portobello. Pop. 4,500.—The parish church is of Saxon origin, and stands on the borders of the loch of the same name, presenting a picturesque appearance at the base of Arthur's Seat.

DUDEVANT, Madame Amantine Aurore, dood'-vant, is better known by her assumed name of George Sand. Having been married at 17, she parted from her husband in her 27th year, and went to Paris to pursue a life of literary independence. There she produced, in conjunction with a young student named Jules Sandeau, a novel, called "Rose et Blanche," which met with success. Her next performance, entitled "Indiana," was entirely her own, and it immediately made her celebrated. She affixed the name of George Sand to it, to commemorate her friendship with Sandeau. Since then, she has written voluminously in the region of fiction; but perhaps the best of all her tales is "Consuelo." In 1848 she started a democratic newspaper of her own in Paris; but her views proving unpalatable to the régime of Louis Napoleon, it was suppressed. From that time she has mostly written for the stage, but not with equal success to that which marked her former efforts in stories of the imagination. B. at Paris, 1804.

DUDLEY, dud'-le, a market-town and parish of Worcestershire, from which it is detached, and surrounded by Staffordshire, 10 miles from Birmingham. There are two churches; the parish church, dedicated to St. Thomas, and the other a chapel of ease belonging to it, dedicated to St. Edmund. It has also several dissenting places of worship. The castle is a grand and spacious ruin. At a little distance from it are the interesting remains of a priory. In the town are a well-endowed free grammar-school and two charity schools. Manf. Iron, nails, glass, fire-irons, grates, and chain-cables. Pop. of parish and town, 38,000.—There are vast caverns of limestone in the neighbourhood.

DUDLEY, the name of several townships in the United States, none of them with a population above 2,000.

DUDLEY, Edmund, an English statesman, who being, when young, introduced to the court of Henry VII., became one of the favourites of that monarch. In 1494 he married Elizabeth, daughter of Edward Grey, Lord Lisle. In the parliament of 1504 he was speaker of the House of Commons, and, two years afterwards, obtained the stewardship of Hastings. On the king's death, he and Empson were sent to the Tower, and in 1510 beheaded on Tower-hill. B. 1462.—While in confinement, Dudley wrote a piece, entitled "The Tree of the Commonwealth," which is still in MS.

DUDLEY, John, son of the preceding statesman, was created Viscount Lisle and knight of the Garter, by Henry VIII. In the next reign he was made earl of Warwick. On the execution of Sir Thomas Seymour, he was appointed lord high admiral, and in 1551 was created duke of Northumberland. Pursuing an ambitious policy, he effected a marriage between his son, Lord Guilford Dudley, and Lady Jane Grey, the eldest daughter of the duke of Suffolk, and a branch of the royal family. When the days of Edward VI. were drawing to a close, he prevailed upon him to set aside his sisters, Mary and Elizabeth, from the succession, in favour of Lady Jane, and on his death he caused his daughter-in-law to be proclaimed. An insurrection being raised in favour of Mary, however, she was proclaimed in London, and the duke executed, 1553. B. 1502. (See EDWARD VI., ELIZABETH, MARY.)

DUDLEY, Ambrose, son of the above, was condemned with his father, but received a pardon. In 1557 he went with his two brothers to the Low Countries, and served in the Spanish army before St. Quentin. In the next reign, he was created earl of Warwick. He died of a wound, in defending New-Haven against the French, in 1589. D. 1530.

DUDLEY, Sir Robert, the son of the earl of Leicester by the Lady Douglas Sheffield, though treated by his father as illegitimate, yet was left the bulk of his estate, after the death of his uncle Ambrose. In 1594 he made a voyage to the South Seas, and, in the following year, commenced a suit to prove his legitimacy; but the countess dowager of Leicester filing an information against him for a conspiracy, he went to Florence, where the grand-duke appointed him chamberlain to his wife, the archduchess of Austria, sister to Ferdinand II. That emperor created him a duke of the holy Roman empire, on which he assumed the title of duke of Northumberland. He drained the morass between Pisa and the sea, by which Leghorn became one of the first ports in the world. B. at Sheen, in Surrey, 1573; D. at Florence, 1639.—He wrote several pieces, the chief of which is "Del Arcano del Mare," &c. 1630.

DUFFIELD, duf'-feeld, a parish of Derbyshire, 4 miles from Derby. Its inhabitants are principally engaged in collieries and the manufacture of cotton goods. Pop. 18,000. It is a station on the North Midland Railway.

DUFRESNY, Charles Rivière, doo-frai'-ne, a French comic writer, who was descended from Henry IV., to whom he bore considerable resemblance. He possessed great talents for landscape and ornamental gardening, and was, on this account, appointed by Louis XIV. comptroller of the royal gardens. The "grand monarch" also gave him several privileges; amongst which was the monopoly of the manufacture of looking-glasses. This right, however, with others, he soon disposed of for certain sums of ready money, and always managed to be penniless in an exceedingly short space of time. In reference to his want of funds, one of his friends observed that poverty was not a crime. "No, it's much worse," answered he. Louis XIV., who was very much attached to him, supplied him liberally with funds on many occasions, but grew, at length, tired of the continual demands made by Dufresny, saying, "I am not powerful enough to make Dufresny rich." Losing his first wife, he married his laundress, in order to pay the washing-bill due to her. Paris was full of this occurrence for a few days, he being well badgered for this mésalliance; and the following is an anecdote told of him at this time. Meeting the Abbé Pellegrin, who was not conspicuous for cleanliness, he reproached him for his always wearing such dirty linen. "Ah!" replied the Abbé, "every one isn't so fortunate as to marry a washerwoman." On leaving the court, he began to write for the theatres with Regnard, and afterwards alone, composing some dramatic pieces, which, though containing much wit, were uneven and irregular in their style. His works make 6 vols. 8vo, and amongst the best are "L'Esprit de Contradiction," "Le Double Veuvage," "Le Mariage fait et rompu." B. at Paris, 1648; D. 1724.

DUGDALE, Sir William, dug'-dail, an English antiquary, who, in 1638, was made a pursuivant-at-arms by the name of Blanche Lyon. He subsequently became Rouge Croix, which gave him a residence in the Herald's College, and opened up the treasures of antiquity to his inspection. He was with Charles I. in several engagements, and in 1642 was created M.A. by the University of Oxford. On the ruin of the royal cause he compounded for his estate, settling in London, where he completed his "Monasticon Anglicanum," in 3 vols. folio. At the Restoration he was made Norroy, and in 1677 Garter king-of-arms, on which occasion he received the honour of knighthood, which, on account of his limited estate, he would much rather have declined. B. at Shustoke, Warwickshire, 1605; D. there, 1686.—Besides the "Monasticon," Dugdale wrote the "History of Warwickshire," of which an enlarged edition appeared in 2 vols. folio; the "History of St. Paul's Cathedral;" the "History of Embanking and Draining of Fens and Marshes;" "Origines Juridicales, or Historical Memoirs of the English Laws," &c.; the "Baronage of England," 3 vols.; a "Short View of the late Troubles in England;" the "Ancient Usage in Bearing of Arms," &c. He was a most laborious man, taking great delight in illustrating the antiquities of his country.

DU GUESCLIN, Bertrand. (See GUESCLIN, DU.)

DUHALDE, John Baptist, doo'-hald, a French Jesuit, who compiled, from the accounts of the missionaries, an "Historical and Geographical Description of the Empire of China and Chinese Tartary," 4 vols. folio, formerly a work held as an authority. B. at Paris, 1674; D. there, 1743.

DUIDA, doo'-e-da, a mountain of S. America, near the S. extremity of Venezuela. Height, 8,500 feet. Lat. 3° 10′ N. Lon. 66° 10′ W.

DUILLIUS NEPOS, du-il'-le-us ne'-pos, a Roman consul, who obtained a naval victory over the Carthaginians, near the Lipari Islands, in which they lost fifty-eight vessels, this being the first engagement at sea which the Romans had fought, 260 B.C. He was honoured with a naval triumph, the first that ever appeared at Rome, and was also allowed peculiar honours. Some medals were struck in commemoration of this victory, and there still exists at Rome the portion of a column which was erected in the Forum on this occasion, and the inscription on which is one of the most ancient specimens of the Latin language.

Duisburg, doo'-is-boorg, a strong town of Rhenish Prussia, on the Rhine, 14 miles from Dusseldorf. Manf. Woollens, cottons, soap, leather, and tobacco. Pop. 8,000.—This town is the capital of a CIRCLE of the same name, which has an area of 227 square miles and a population of 100,000.

Dujardin, Charles, doosh-ar'-dă, a Dutch painter, distinguished for his representations of market scenes, mountebanks, and robbers. He also engraved in aqua fortis. B. at Amsterdam, 1640; D. at Venice, 1674.

Dukn's, a county of Massachusetts, U.S., comprising Martha's Vineyard, Chabaquiddick, Noman's, and the Elizabeth Islands. Pop. 5,000.

Dulcigno, dool-cheen'-yo, a seaport-town of European Turkey, with a strong castle, 12 miles from Scutari. Pop. 8,000.

Dull, dul, a parish of Perthshire, Scotland, 4 miles from Aberfeldy. Pop. 3,500.

Dulverton, dul'-ver-ton, a town and parish of Somersetshire, 150 miles from London. Manf. Woollens, and there are lead-mines in the neighbourhood. Pop. 1,500.

Dulwich, dul'-idj, a village of Surrey, 5 miles from London. It has a college, founded in 1619 by Edward Alleyn, an actor. (See ALLEYN.) Its picture-gallery contains some excellent Flemish and Italian paintings, bequeathed to it, in 1811, by Sir F. Bourgeois. Pop. 1,700.

Duman, doo'-ma, a son of Ishmael.—A city of Judah, and a province of Idumea.

Dumaran, doo'-mar-an, an island of the Asiatic archipelago. Ext 20 miles long, by the same breadth. Lat. 10° 30' N. Lon. 120° E. It has a town on the S. coast, with a population of about 2,000.

Dumas, Lewis, doo'-ma, an ingenious Frenchman, who was bred to the law, but applied himself to mathematical and mechanical studies, inventing an instrument called the bureau typographique, to teach children reading and writing, mechanically. He also devised another for instructing them in music, and wrote works on these subjects, explanatory of his method. B. at Nimes, 1676; D. 1744.

Dumas, Alexandre, one of the most fertile French dramatists and romancists. His dramas number more than eighty, and his novels more than forty. He wrote about 1,200 volumes, many of them representing a low state of morals, rather repulsive than attractive to the general tone of English sentiment. He also wrote "Impressions of Voyages," and his "Memoirs," which were commenced in 1852, and by 1856 had extended to twenty-seven volumes. B. at Villers-Cotterets, in the department of the Aisne, 1802.—His son, of the same name, wrote "Trois Hommes forts," "La Dame aux Camélias," and the "Demi-Monde;" productions which, however they may exhibit the possession of talent in their author, are very low in their morality.

Dumas, Jean Baptiste, a distinguished French chemist and botanist, who, in 1823, received the appointment of demonstrator of chemistry at the Polytechnic School, and was also made professor of chemistry at the Athénée of Paris. From this period the science of organic chemistry stands deeply indebted to his exertions. In 1829 he founded the Central School of Arts and Manufactures, and, in 1834, became professor of organic chemistry in the School of Medicine. In 1845 he was made president of the Society for the Encouragement of Industry, and, in 1849, received the porte-feuille of Agriculture and Commerce. In 1851 he acted as vice-president of the Great Exhibition in London, and subsequently became vice-president of the superior council of public instruction in France. B. at Alais, in the department Gard, 1800.

Dumbarton, dum-bar'-ton, a county of Scotland, bounded N. by Perthshire, E. by the counties of Stirling and Lanark, S. by the river Clyde and Renfrewshire, W. by Lochlong, an arm of the sea, and by Argyleshire. Area, 230 square miles, in two detached portions. Desc. Mountainous, but fertile in the lowlands. Benvorlich rises 3,262 feet above the level of the sea. Rivers. The Leven. Lakes. Numerous, the largest is Loch Lomond. Pro. Oats and potatoes. Minerals. Iron, coal, freestone, and lime. There are several extensive print-fields on the Leven; and cotton manufactures, tanning, weaving, and paper-making are also carried on. Pop. about 43,000.

Dumbarton, or Dunbarton, the chief town of the above county, near the confluence of the Leven with the Clyde, 14 miles from Glasgow. It consists principally of one well-paved street, and has a capacious church, with a handsome spire. Manf. The principal is crown-glass. Some tanning and weaving are also carried on. Pop. 5,500.—The ancient castle of Dumbarton crowns a lofty and precipitous rock, which rises abruptly from a level plain at the confluence of the Clyde and Leven, by which its base is washed on two sides. It has a barrack, containing 1,500 stand of arms, and an armoury, in which is the double-handed sword of the patriot Wallace. It was from this castle that Mary, Queen of Scots, whilst yet a child, was conveyed to France; and it was to it that her friends intended to conduct her, after her escape from Lochleven. It is one of the four fortresses stipulated, in the articles of the Union, to be kept in repair. In 1847 it was visited by her majesty, Queen Victoria.—In communication with Glasgow both by steamboat and railway.

Dumdum, dum'-dum, a town and cantonment of British India, 8 miles from Calcutta. It has a cannon-foundry, is the head-quarters of the Bengal artillery, and may be considered as the Woolwich of India.

Dumfries, a royal burgh and parish, the capital of Dumfriesshire, stands on the Nith, over which are two bridges, 28 miles from Carlisle. The town consists of several streets, the principal of which runs parallel to the river. There are two churches, several other places of worship, an hospital, infirmary, and lunatic asylum. The other public edifices are a town-house, a county gaol and court-house, an academy, theatre, assembly-rooms, and several associations, with libraries, reading-rooms, a mechanics' institute, and an observatory. In the centre of the town there is an obelisk erected in honour of Charles, duke of Queensberry. Manf. Hosiery, hats, baskets, leather, and shoes. These articles are exported, with freestone, sheep, and grain. Imp. Coal, slate, iron, hemp, wine, and colonial produce. Pop. of town, 11,107; of parish, 12,298.—Dumfries was exposed to repeated calamities, from the invasions of the English during the border wars. In this town, John Comyn, the competitor for the Scottish throne, was, in 1305, stabbed by Robert Bruce. In the churchyard of St. Michael's, Robert Burns, the Scottish poet, is buried; and a monument is there erected to his memory.

Dumfriesshire, dum-freez'-sheer, a county of Scotland, bounded N. by the county of Lanark; E. by those of Peebles, Selkirk, and Roxburgh; S. by the Solway Firth and the English border; and W. by the counties of Kirkcudbright and Ayr. Area, 1,007 square miles. Desc. A large portion of the country is mountainous, barren, and covered with heath; but in the dales of the Nith, the Annan, and the Esk, it is fertile. Rivers. Independent of the Solway Firth, it is watered by the Nith, the Annan, the Esk, and many tributary streams. There are also several small lakes; and sulphurous and chalybeate springs at Moffat. Pro. The usual crops; and a great many cattle, sheep, and pigs are reared. Minerals. Lead is found in great abundance. Coal and lime are also abundant. Manf. The principal are linen, for home consumption; also cotton and carpeting, &c. Pop. 80,000.

Dumont, Pierre Etienne Louis, doo'-mawng, a Swiss divine, who became minister of the Protestant church in Geneva, and afterwards went to London, where he became acquainted with Sir Samuel Romilly and other eminent men. After a visit to France, he returned, and became the editor of several of the treatises of Jeremy Bentham, from pure admiration of the wisdom of that philosopher. In 1814 he returned to Geneva, and became a member of its representative council; and there, on the panopticon plan of Mr. Bentham, had a prison erected, in 1824. B. at Geneva, 1759; D. travelling in Northern Italy, 1825.

Dumont d'Urville, Jules Sébastien César, door'-veel, a French naturalist and navigator. Being commissioned by Charles X. of France, in 1826, to go in search of La Perouse, the French navigator, and his companions, he took the command of the frigate Astrolabe, and was so far successful, as to obtain a knowledge of the fate of these voyagers. Whilst engaged in this duty, he made some important surveys of the coasts of various islands in Australasia and the Eastern seas. An account of his labours was published in 1830, and is esteemed as a valuable contribution to science. In 1837 he proceeded on a voyage to the south pole, and penetrated to lat. 64° 20′ S.; lon. 134° 18′ E.—On his return he published an account of his expedition. B. 1790; killed in a railway accident between Versailles and Meudon, 1842.

DUMOURIEZ, Charles François, doo-moor'-e-ai, an officer in the French military service, who, at the commencement of the great revolution, espoused the liberal side, although attached to the constitutional monarchy of 1791. Suspected, as well as detested, by those whose political principles were more violent, he retired from internal politics, and took service under General Luckner, then fighting against the Austrians on the northern frontier. Here he soon distinguished himself, and, receiving the command of the army opposed to the duke of Brunswick, took up a position in the forest of Argonne, which enabled Kellermann to beat the Prussians at Valmy, and saved France from invasion. He next entered Flanders, won the battle of Jemmapes, took Liège, Antwerp, and a large portion of the country; but was compelled to return to Paris on the trial of Louis XVI. After the execution of that monarch, he resumed his command, entered Holland, and took Breda; but was defeated at Neerwinde and Louvain. As he still wished for a return of the government to constitutional monarchy, he displeased, because he was averse to the proceedings of, the Convention against the Belgians, and entered into secret negotiations with the enemy, which brought an accusation of treason against him, when, with several of his officers, he fled to the Austrian head-quarters. His ideas of a constitutional monarchy, however, were not conformable to the notions of the allies, and he refused to serve against his country. He now wandered through several parts of the continent, with a price set upon his head, and at length crossed to England; but was thence driven by the operation of the Alien Act. He then took refuge in Hamburg, where he remained for some time; but again returned to England, and, throughout the remainder of his days, enjoyed a pension from the British government. B. at Cambrai, 1739; D. at Henley-upon-Thames, 1823.

DUN, de(r)n, the name of several small towns and parishes of France, none of them with a population above 5,000.

DUNA VECSE, doon'-a veks, a market-town of Central Hungary, 40 miles from Pesth. Pop. 8,000.

DUNBAR, William, dun'-bar, a Scottish poet, who wrote several beautiful effusions, and, after being almost unknown for 200 years, was resuscitated in his poems, which are now acknowledged to be amongst the most original in his language. His "Thistle and Rose," an allegory celebrating the matrimonial union of James IV. of Scotland with Margaret, daughter of Henry VII., is a rich specimen of poetical imagery. B. at Salton, E. Lothian, 1465; D. about 1530.—His poems were published, with notes, by Sir David Dalrymple.

DUNBAR, dun-bar', a seaport town of Scotland, in Haddingtonshire, at the mouth of the Firth of Forth, 26 miles from Edinburgh. The principal street is broad and spacious. The harbour is difficult of access, but one of great safety for shipping. The town has a parish church, assembly-rooms, town-hall, and public libraries. Manf. Cordage and sail-cloth factories, iron-foundries, breweries, and distilleries. Pop. of parish, 4,500; of town, 3,000. West from the harbour stand the venerable ruins of the castle, which project into the sea. After the battle of Bannockburn, Edward II. took refuge in this fortress, and afterwards pursued his flight by sea to Berwick. In 1337, Black Agnes, the countess of Dunbar, defended it for nineteen weeks against the earl of Salisbury. Dunbar was erected into a royal burgh by David II.; and here, in 1650, the Scotch royalists were defeated by Cromwell.

DUNBAR, a township of the United States, in Pennsylvania, 8 miles from Unioh. Pop. 2,100.

DUNBLANE, or DUMBLANE, dum-blain', a town and parish of Perthshire, Scotland, on the Allan, 24 miles from Perth. It consists principally of one street, intersected by lanes. Its cathedral is now in ruins, except that part of it which serves for the parish church. Pop. of parish, 3,300; of town, 2,000.—Not far from this place is Sheriffmuir, where, in 1715, a battle was fought between the royal troops and the followers of the Pretender. The town gives the title of viscount, in the peerage of Scotland, to the duke of Leeds.

DUNBOE, dun'-bo, a parish of Ulster, Ireland, in the county of Londonderry, 5 miles from Coleraine. Pop. 4,000.

DUNCAN, Adam, Lord, dun'-kan, a British admiral, was bred to the sea, and, in 1761, attained the rank of post-captain. Being intimate with Admiral Keppel, the latter appointed him his captain; and, in 1787, he became rear-admiral; in 1793, vice-admiral; and, in 1795, admiral of the blue. In the war he was appointed to the North Sea station, where he blockaded the Dutch in the Texel, till the summer of 1797, when an alarming mutiny broke out in his squadron. His conduct on this occasion was firm, and, notwithstanding the difficulties in which he was placed, he detained the Dutch until he was enabled to meet them in action. An engagement then took place on October 11, off Camperdown, when the Dutch admiral, De Winter, after a brave resistance, was obliged to strike. Eight ships were taken, two of which carried flags. For this service the gallant admiral received the thanks of parliament, was created Viscount Duncan of Camperdown, and Baron Duncan of Lundie, in the shire of Perth. An annual pension, also, of £2,000 was granted him, and the two next hairs of the peerage. B. at Dundee, Scotland, 1731; D. 1804.—Lord Duncan was of a singularly manly and athletic form, his height being six feet three inches. His character was that of an amiable, upright man.

DUNCANNON, dun-kan'-non, a town of Wexford, Ireland, 22 miles from Wexford, on the shore of Waterford harbour. Pop. 5,200.—It gives the title of viscount to the Ponsonby family. After the battle of the Boyne, James II. embarked here for France.

DUNCANSBY HEAD, dun'-kānz-be, the N.E. headland of Scotland, in the county of Caithness, 1¼ mile from John o' Groat's House. Lat. 58° 39′ N. Lon. 3° 1′ W.

DUNDALK, dun-dawlk', a seaport-town of Ireland, in the county of Louth, on the Castletown river, at the mouth of a bay in the Irish Channel, 45 miles from Dublin. It consists principally of one wide street, intersected by many lanes, and has a good harbour. Among the public buildings are a market-house, court-house, gaol, guildhall, barracks, schools, and several churches. Manf. Flax-spinning, pin and starch making, breweries, and distilleries. Pop. 11,000.—King Edward Bruce, brother of Robert, king of Scotland, was slain in battle near Dundalk, and buried near the town, at a place called Faughart.—DUNDALK BAY extends about 8 miles inland, and is about the same in width.

DUNDAS, Sir James Whitley Deans, dun-dās', a modern English naval commander, entered the navy at an early age, and was present at several minor actions during the Napoleon wars. He was for some years a lord of the Admiralty, under Lord Melbourne, and, in 1841, became rear-admiral. In 1853 he was appointed to the command of the English fleet which was to assist Turkey against Russia. At the commencement of the following year, he entered the Black Sea, and in April the English and French fleets bombarded Odessa. In the December of the same year, however, Admiral Sir Edward (afterwards Lord) Lyons superseded him in the command. B. in Scotland, 1785.

DUNDAS, Richard Saunders, also an English naval commander, but having no relationship to the above. Entering the service at an early age, he was a captain at 22, and, in 1840, took a part in the war with China, and afterwards commanded a squadron in the Mediterranean, under the order of Admiral Parker. Between 1828 and 1846, he was twice secretary to the Admiralty, and from 1852 to 1855 was a lord of the Admiralty. In 1853 he was appointed rear-admiral, and, in 1855, was nominated to succeed Sir Charles Napier in the command of the English fleet, to act against Russia in the Baltic Sea. Doubting, like his predecessor, the success of an attack on Cronstadt, he took vigorous measures to destroy the enemy's commerce in the north, and, assisted by the French admiral Penaud, attacked Sweaborg. After a bombardment of 45 hours, the Russian arsenals, barracks, and magazines were almost entirely destroyed, with a loss also of 2,000 men. This was the most terrible blow to the naval power of the czar during the whole of the war. D. at Melville Castle, Edinburghshire, 1802.

DUNDAS ISLANDS, a group lying off the E. coast of Africa, between the equator and lat. 1° 30′ S. They comprise nearly 500 coral islets.—Also a strait in N. Australia, separating Coburg Peninsula from Melville Island. It is 18 miles across.

DUNDEE, dun-de′, a seaport-town of Forfarshire, Scotland, on the Tay, about 8 miles from the open sea. It is large and well built, consisting of several principal streets, diverging from the market-place or High Street, which is a spacious square, 360 feet long by 100 broad. There are, besides, various smaller streets, which are generally narrow. A little to the W. of the High Street stands the Old Church, said to have been built in 1189, by David, earl of Huntingdon; besides which there are other elegant churches and chapels for various religious denominations. On the S. side of the High Street the town-house is built, upon the site of an old church. At the E. end of the square is a handsome trades-hall, about 100 feet from which was the castle-hill, so called from a castle which once stood on it. There are many friendly and religious societies, a barracks, gaol, bridewell, an infirmary, a dispensary for out-patients, an elegant lunatic asylum, and an orphan institution. There is also an academy. The harbour is commodious, easily admitting trading vessels of large burden. Manf. Dundee is the principal seat of the linen manufacture in Great Britain, and there are large spinning-mills in the town and neighbourhood. Osnaburghs and other coarse linens, canvas or sail-cloth, sack-cloth and cotton bagging, are all made for exportation. Coloured threads are manufactured of good quality, and are in high repute. Trade is chiefly confined to the Baltic and to London; and many of its vessels are employed in the Greenland fisheries. Besides the above manufactures, it makes gloves, machinery, and has sugar-refineries, tanneries, and shipbuilding-docks. Pop. about 80,000. Lat. of lighthouse, 56° 8′ N. Lon. 2° 58′ W.—Dundee was erected into a royal burgh by King William, who began his reign in 1165. Its ancient rights were re-established by a charter of King Robert Bruce, and finally confirmed by the great charter of Charles I. It has frequently suffered from the calamities of war, and was taken and given up to pillage and massacre by Monk, during the protectorship of Cromwell. In 1844 it was visited by her majesty Queen Victoria, to commemorate which, a Norman triumphal arch was erected in front of one of the quays. It is the birthplace of Hector Boece, the historian, and of Admiral Duncan, the hero of Camperdown. Both by railway and by steamboat, Dundee is in communication with the principal inland, and some of the largest seaport-towns in the United Kingdom.

DUNDONALD, dun-don′-ald, a parish of Ayrshire, Scotland, 4 miles from Irvine. Pop. 7,300.

DUNDONALD, Earl of, Thomas Cochrane, a British admiral, and the tenth earl of this name, entered the naval service in 1793. He soon distinguished himself by his bravery, being almost continually engaged in the most difficult and daring enterprises, in boarding vessels, or cutting out rich prizes from beneath the very mouths of the guns in the land fortresses of the enemy. In 1809 he commanded a fleet of fire-ships, with which he destroyed the French fleet in the Basque Roads, for which he was rewarded with the knighthood of the Bath. In 1814 he was charged with having spread a report relative to the abdication of the emperor Napoleon I., which had a great effect on the funds, and which caused him to be brought to trial. He was found guilty, and sentenced to pay £1,000, to stand in the pillory, and to undergo one year's imprisonment. When this happened, he was a member of the House of Commons; he was therefore deprived of his seat, stripped of the order of the Bath, and struck off the list of captains. These proceedings were iniquitous in the extreme, as they arose almost entirely from his being a radical reformer and strong opponent of the Liverpool-Castlereagh administration. The public were enraged at such a sentence. The punishment of the pillory was remitted, he was reseated in parliament, and his fine paid by public subscription. His prospects of advancement in the service of his country were, however, for the time, annihilated. Accordingly, he sought employment abroad, and in 1818 received the command of the fleet of the Chilians, to fight for their independence. In this war he displayed his usual bravery. In 1822 he exchanged the Chilian for the Brazilian service, and, in the following year, was made marquis of Maranao by Don Pedro. On leaving this service he returned to England, and, in 1827 and 1828, assisted the Greeks in their war of independence. By his father's death he now succeeded to the title of Lord Dundonald, and, on the accession of the Whigs to power in 1830, was reinstated in his command in the British navy, and made a rear-admiral. In 1841 he became vice-admiral of the blue, and, in 1847, had his order of the Bath restored to him. In 1851 he became vice-admiral of the white, and, in 1854, admiral of the United Kingdom. Being greatly devoted to scientific pursuits, he offered, in 1850, to blow up the walls of Sebastopol during the siege of that fortress; but the committee appointed to consider his plan, rejected it. D. 1775. As we write, his life, under the title of "Autobiography of a Seaman, by Thomas, Earl of Dundonald," is announced for publication.

DUNDRUM BAY, dun′-drum, in the county of Down, Ireland, 7 miles from Downpatrick. Breadth, at entrance, about 10 miles.—Here, in 1846, the Great Britain steamer was stranded, but was afterwards got off with little damage.

DUNFERMLINE, dun-ferm′-lin, a town and parish of Scotland, in the county of Fife, about 2½ miles N. of the Firth of Forth, and 13 miles from Edinburgh. It is irregularly built, having been the work of many different periods, and some of the streets are narrow and inconvenient. It has a collegiate church and various other places of worship. The ancient abbey, originally founded in the 11th century, by Malcolm and his queen, was a Culdee monastery. Its spire is 155 feet high. There are several charitable endowments, a town-hall, gaol, several public schools, a mechanics' institute, and a handsome guildhall, with a steeple 132 feet high. Manf. Dunfermline has been long noted for its table-linen, diapers, and damasks. There are also rope, tar, and soap works; breweries and a tobacco-factory. Pop. of parish, 22,000; of town, 9,000.—Here Edward I., of England, stayed for some months in 1304, and on leaving it, set it on fire. King Robert Bruce rebuilt it, and was buried in it. In February, 1818, a tomb was discovered, supposed to have contained his body. Only an inconsiderable portion of the abbey is standing. Adjacent to it there was a royal palace, wherein the unfortunate sovereign Charles I. was born, in 1600, and where Charles II., in 1650, subscribed the Solemn League and Covenant. It is a station on a branch of the Edinburgh and Northern Railway.

DUNGANNON, dun-gan′-non, a town of Ireland, in the county of Tyrone, 11 miles from Armagh. It has a church, an hospital, a court, market-house, and bridewell. Manf. Linen and earthenware. Pop. about 4,000.—This was the principal seat of the kings of Ulster till 1607, when the last of these sovereign chiefs was forced to flee from his country, leaving his possessions to be presented to Sir Arthur Chichester by James I.

DUNGARVAN, dun-gar′-van, a seaport-town of Ireland, in the county of Waterford, on a bay of the same name, 24 miles from Waterford. Its chief edifices are a parish church, several Catholic chapels, a convent, castle, barracks, bridewell, and market-house. It exports grain, butter, and cattle; but its inhabitants are principally supported by herring fisheries. Pop. 6,300.

DUNGENESS, dun-je-ness′, a cape or headland on the coast of Kent, 3½ miles from Lydd. It is defended by a fort, and has a lighthouse in lat. 50° 55′ N.; lon. 0° 58′ E.

DUNKELD, dun-keld′, a town and parish of Perthshire, Scotland, on the Tay, 14 miles from Perth. It is of great antiquity, and was the capital of ancient Caledonia. The town is not well built. The scenery around it, however, has been long the object of admiration to all strangers. Here are the ruins of an ancient cathedral, the choir of which now serves for the parish church. In the neighbourhood is the duke of Athol's seat, with delightful grounds adjoining, in which are still shown the two first larches introduced into Britain. They were brought, in 1738, from the Tyrol. Manf. The principal are linen and yarn. Pop. about 3,000, new and old town.

DUNKIRK, or DUNKERQUE, dun'-kirk, 'the church on the downs,' so called from sand-banks on the coast, a fortified seaport-town of France, in the department of the Nord, 40 miles from Lille. It is, in general, well built, and has several churches, a theatre, concert-hall, hospitals, a college, public library, military prison, and is defended by a citadel. The barracks are extensive and elegant, but the churches are less remarkable for architecture than for the paintings they contain. Large sums were expended by the French government on its harbour and docks: these it was agreed to demolish at the peace of Utrecht; but their destruction was never completed, and, at the peace of 1783, they were abandoned. Manf. Soap, starch, and cordage. There are, besides, tanneries and iron-works. Pop. 30,000.—In 1388 this town was burned by the English; after which period its possession was repeatedly contested by the French and Spanish. In 1658 it was given up to the English by Turenne; and, in 1662, sold by Charles II. to Louis XIV., for £200,000. It was made a free port in 1826, and is a station on the Railway du Nord.

DUNMORE BAY, dun'-mor, a bay on the W. coast of Ireland. Lat. 52° 44′ N. Lon. 9° 35′ W.

DUNMORE HEAD, a cape on the W. coast of Ireland. Lat. 52° 6′ N. Lon. 9° 35′ W.

DUNMOW, GREAT, dun'-mou, an ancient town and parish of Essex, 37 miles from London. Pop. 3,300.

DUNMOW, LITTLE, a village and parish of Essex, 2 miles from Great Dunmow. Pop. 400.—Here a flitch of bacon is given to any married couple who, having been married a year and a day, will swear that they have not quarrelled once in that time, or repented of their alliance. The flitch is said to have been claimed only six times since the reign of Henry VI.

DUNNET HEAD, dun'-net, the N. extremity of Great Britain, having on it a lighthouse, 340 feet above the sea. Lat. 58° 40′ N. Lon. 3° 21′ W.

DUNNING, John, dun'-ning, an eminent lawyer, was the son of an attorney at Ashburton, in Devonshire. After studying under his father some time, he entered the Middle Temple in 1752, and in 1756 was called to the bar. He soon rose to distinction in his profession, and obtained a seat in parliament, where he distinguished himself on the side of the opposition. Afterwards he became solicitor-general, recorder of Bristol, and chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster. In 1782 he was created Lord Ashburton, but died in the following year. B. at Ashburton, Devonshire, 1731.—His lordship was an upright lawyer, and often pleaded the cause of the poor, unsolicited, and without a fee.

DUNNOTTAR, dun-not-tar', a parish in Kincardineshire, Scotland, comprising the town of Stonehaven. Pop. 2,000.—It contains the castle of Dunnottar, now in ruins. In the time of the parliamentary wars, this was the fortress in which the Scottish regalia were deposited. After a siege by Cromwell's forces for six months, it capitulated; but, before this, the regalia were secretly conveyed from it.

DUNOIS, John, doo'-nwaw, count of Longueville, and called the "Bastard of Orleans," grand chamberlain of France, was a natural son of Louis, duke of Orleans. At a very early age he distinguished himself by his great bravery, and had the better of an action with the English in 1427, at Montargis. At the siege of Orleans, he shared the laurels of success with Joan of Arc, and in 1432 contributed greatly to the victory at Patay. The same year he brought under the royal authority the town of Chartres, and in 1436 re-occupied Paris, which had been taken by the English. After these considerable services to the state, he sullied his fair fame by engaging in a conspiracy against Charles VII., and instigating against that king the revolt of his son, afterwards Louis XI. He repaired his disloyalty, however, by throwing himself at the feet of the former monarch, and caused all to be forgotten in his devotion at the sieges of Harfleur, Gallardon, and Dieppe. In 1444 he was appointed lieutenant-general, and, from this time to 1450, was engaged against the English, who were now driven out of both Normandy and Guienne. He was appointed, for his services, grand chamberlain. B. at Paris, 1402; D. 1468.—This is the warrior alluded to in the opening lines—of the favourite French national air "Partant pour la Syrie," which was composed by Hortense Beauharnais, the mother of Napoleon III.

"C'était le jeune et brave Dunois"—

DUNOON, dun-oon', a parish and village of Scotland, on the Firth of Clyde, 8 miles from Greenock, on the opposite side of the firth. Pop. about 5,000.—This is a favourite watering-place of the Glasgow citizens.

DUNROSSNESS, dun-ross-ness', a parish at the S. extremity of the Shetland mainland, Scotland, terminating in Sumburgh Head. Pop. 4,500.

DUNS, John, duns, commonly called Duns Scotus, a famous Franciscan divine, who was educated at Oxford. In 1301 he became professor of theology at Oxford, and was so distinguished by his eloquence, that it is said 30,000 scholars came to listen to his precepts. In 1304 he went to Paris, where he acquired a great reputation as a disputant, and was called the "subtle doctor." He opposed the notions of Thomas Aquinas, which produced two parties, the Thomists and the Scotists. B. supposed at Dunstance, near Alnwick, Northumberland, 1265; D. at Cologne, 1308.—His works were printed at Lyons in 10 vols. folio, 1639.
